Therefore the Pythagoreans used to play a lesson on the harp and sing to it, when they were going to bed: Quo citius et blandius obdormirent. (Quintil. lib. 9. cap. 4.) The apostles therefore having supped late, drank wine, wearied with travel, now being midnight, sleep's principal season, not walking but sitting still; all which were valde suadentia somnum, as Virgil speaks, provoking and attractive of sleep; why then doth Christ reprove them, for not watching with him one hour? But is there not a time to wake, and a time to sleep? Eccl. iii. 2. What! in that very hour when the Lord of life was betrayed into the hands of death, the King ready to die for his people, the Creator as it were unmade to new-make his creatures, the innocent suffering for the nocent, could they not even then forbear sleeping? Not one hour; it was short: watch; it was easy: not be exposed to scorn, not cast into prison, not beaten with scourges; but only spectare et expectare, to look and wait, while their Master was finishing that great work of their own redemption. Not watch with me, me your Saviour; one hour, I say not a whole night. He found them all sleeping, but directs his reprehension to St. Peter, Mark xiv. 37; because he before, with fervent zeal, had confidently promised this, yea, far more than this, to lay down his life for Christ: "Simon, sleepest thou?" There is a time to sleep without reproof. Samuel slept. David slept, Psal. iv. 8. Christ himself slept, Matt. viii. 24. Peter had often slept before without reprehension; yea, and afterwards too with consolation, angels guarding and delivering him, Acts xii. 7. But now to sleep! "Couldst thou not watch with me one hour?" I say not a thousand, nor a hundred, nor a score, but one: not month, or week, or day, or whole night, but hour; and this not to fight for me, but to watch with me: Simon, dormis? Simon, signifies obedience: Christ calls him not Peter, nor Cephas, but Simon; arguing his forgetfulness, not only of his Master's love, but of his own name. But if it be such a sin to sleep, what is it to betray? Judas, tradis? was worse than, Simon, dormis? It is better to sleep with Peter, than to betray with Judas. He that sleeps well thinks no harm; but there be some that study mischief in their beds, Micah

ii. 1. Ut jugulent homines surgunt de nocte latrones. We may better suffer desidiosum monachum, than the pope's wakeful Judas, discipulum decipulum, his snare and gin to entrap poor souls, and send them to Rome, like virgins taken up for the Turk, to suffer his antichristian ravishments.

To conclude; seeing that sleep comes from cold and moist humours dominant in the brain, and wakefulness from hot and dry reigning in the head, let us cast away the cold and crude humours of sin, and stir up the holy and almost extinguished fire of zeal. That as Christ at his first coming found the shepherds by night watching over their flocks; so at his second coming, whether by day or night, he may find us all watching over our souls.

2. As this is terror to the ungodly, so comfort to the righteous. As justice is ever waking, so mercy is never asleep. He that keeps Israel, never lets his providence fall into a slumber. Yea, even in the lethargy of our disobedience, when we remit of our uprightness, the hand of this ever-watching God preserves us. David was asleep a long while together, but the Lord that chose David slept not for his good. Upon this confidence he betaketh himself to rest: "I laid me down and slept, for the Lord sustained me." "I will both lay me down in peace, and sleep: for thou, Lord, only makest me dwell in safety." As he sets his angels to guard us in the natural sleep of our bodies, so his preventing grace doth keep us in the spiritual slumber of our consciences. But let not this make us presume upon his mercy too much; nor so trespass upon God's un-sleeping protection, as to take our ease in our corruption. Thou sayest, Others have long slumbered, and yet been graciously awakened; as David, Paul, Zaccheus; why not I? I dispute not: God will measure out his graces at his own pleasure; and though they run over to some, they are plentiful enough to all. "The same Lord is rich unto all that call upon him," Rom. x. 12. "My grace is sufficient for thee," was Paul's answer; and it may suffice all suitors.

God hath given us no small space, not a few mercies: if we will sleep with Peter, we put it to the hazard whether we shall ever rise with Peter. We cannot expect miraculous revocations; a whale to reduce us, as Jonah; or the sun to stand still for us, as to Joshua; or the sea to divide itself, as to Israel; or a voice heard from heaven, as to Paul. Shall we say, The arm of God is shortened, because we see not these wonders? Will we not be wakened without miracles? Must the course of nature be altered, the pillars of earth moved, the channels of the sea discovered; must we see signs in the sun and moon, and have some rise from the dead to warn us, or we will not be wakened? "The Jews require a sign, and the Greeks seek after wisdom: but we preach Christ crucified," 1 Cor. i. 22, 23. Woe unto us, if the open face of the gospel cannot rouse us without a sign, and the simplicity of Christ persuade us without further wisdom! "They that sleep, sleep in the night," 1 Thess. v. 7. But the night is past; let us therefore give over slumbering. The less sleep we give sin in our souls, the sweeter sleep we shall find to our bodies. Thus shall we be sure, that while the wicked are overtaken with this un-sleeping damnation, we shall be guarded and guided with a vigilant preservation. For Christ "died for us, that, whether we wake or sleep, we should live together with him," 1 Thess. v. 10; to whom be praise for ever.

For if God spared not the angels that sinned, but cast them down to hell, and delivered them into chains of darkness, to be reserved unto judgment.

THE apostle having dogmatically confuted, and prophetically condemned, the depravers of true doctrine, proceeds to an exemplary demonstration of the judgments of God upon sinners. For God cannot be unlike to himself; nor doth tolerate that in one, which he doth punish in another; but hates iniquity wheresoever he finds it, and preserves one immutable tenor of his justice. Whensoever sin goes before, punishment shall certainly follow after, unless seasonable repentance come between. Of this he makes

An illation, ver. 9.

The relation considers two generals; God's justice in punishing offenders, mercy in sparing his servants. This holds in three histories. 1. Of the angels: they that fell are confounded; there is his justice: they that stood are conserved; there is his mercy. 2. Of the old world: when the impenitent were swept away with a flood; there is his justice: and righteous Noah, with seven more for his sake, were saved in the ark; there is his mercy. 3. Of Sodom and her sister cities: when fire from heaven burnt up the reprobates; there is his justice: and righteous Lot was delivered; there is his mercy.

Now upon all these premises comes the illation, ver. 9, "The Lord knoweth how to deliver the godly out of temptations, and to reserve the unjust unto the day of judgment to be punished." If our faith be as much, his mercy is not less; if their rebellion be no less, his justice is as much. The first judgment takes hold on altitude, the second on latitude, the third on plenitude. For height and excellency, the angels were glorious in heaven, yet some are cast into hell. For breadth and numerous amplitude, no less than a whole world were drowned. For fulness and opulency, the Sodomites lived in a second Paradise, yet were they burned. There is no wickedness so high, none so broad, none so rich, but God's justice can overthrow it. Let men be as high as angels, as many as will make a world, as rich as the Sodomites; yet if they be unrepentant sinners, they shall perish.

We begin aloft first, and behold the angels revolting from heaven, and for their fault turned out of heaven. Wherein we have considerable,

Their excellency, by nature angels.

Their apostacy, they sinned.

Their penalty, were not spared.

In the former I will touch upon four points:

1. Their creation, which though it be not precisely specified by Moses, is most certainly included. "By him were all things created, that are in earth or in heaven;" who were created in heaven but the angels? "whether thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers," Col. i. 16. Which though some understand of empires, orders, and governments; others, the palaces of God's majesty, and seats of immortality. But the opinion approved of the most, and the most approved opinion, conceives all there spoken of angels. He "maketh his angels spirits," Psal. civ. 4. Some philosophers conceived that angels had their beginning of the souls of men; that good souls became angels, and bad souls devils. And some would father this opinion upon Plato, but inconsiderately. Plato, indeed, thought and taught a metempsychosis, a transmigration of souls into new bodies. Such was that Homeric fiction of Ulysses' companions turned into hogs and bears. But he said never, that of souls were made angels.

But why was this omitted by Moses in his history of the creation? 1. Some think it was to avoid idolatry in the Israelites, who, if they had known angels, would have fallen to their adoration. (Chrysost. Theodor.) But they could not be ignorant of the angels, which had so often appeared to their fathers, and done them so many ministerial kindnesses. 2. Others thus: Moses treated of things that had their beginning with the material world, but angels were created before the visible world. (Basil. Damasc.) But this is a false supposition; for before the world there was nothing created. 3. Others thus: Their creation is comprehended under the names of heaven and light, because they are set over all heavenly things. (August. Bed.) But this were to leave the literal sense, and to divert it unto allegory, which may not be admitted in so plain a history. The best opinion is, that their creation is omitted for two reasons. 1. Because Moses applieth himself to the simple capacity of the people, and describeth the creating of visible and sensible things, leaving spiritual as above their understanding. (Hieron. Ep. 139. ad Cyprian.) 2. Lest men should think that God needed the help of angels, in the production or disposition of the other creatures. As if the fabric of the world had been too great a business for himself alone to undertake; and therefore should be required the ministration of those angelical powers.

That they were created is undeniably plain; now the next query is, when. 1. Some think they were made long before the world. (Origen Tract. 35. in Matt. Damascen. lib. 2. cap. 3. de Fide.) But the Scripture testifies that the evil angels apostatized as soon as ever they were created. "He abode not in the truth," John viii. 44. And our text infers, that as soon as they sinned, they were cast into hell. But before heaven was made there was no hell. Before the constitution of the world, there could be no distinction of place; for there was nothing but God. 2. Some from the first verse of Genesis would prove, that the angels were created together with the world; "the heaven" comprehending angels, as the continent doth the content, the house doth the inhabitant. And whereas it is said, "darkness was on the face of the deep;" Origen thinks this deep to be that place whither the devil and his angels were cast. But the Holy Ghost showing the eternity of Wisdom, saith, "I was from everlasting, from the beginning, or ever the earth was. When there were no depths, before the mountains were settled, before the hills was I brought forth," Prov. viii. 23—25. The angels therefore were not before the earth and hills; for then this should be no good argument to prove the antiquity and eternity of Wisdom, which is the Son of God. 3. It is most probable, that they were created upon the fourth day, when the stars and other ornaments of heaven were made. "When the morning-stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy," Job xxxviii. 7. They are said to rejoice and praise God together with the stars; therefore then it seems they took their being and beginning; for, questionless, immediately upon their creation they praised God. Besides, the heavens were that day perfected, the matter of them being only before prepared. It is fit that the house should be formed, before the inhabitant be produced. And this may satisfy any honest inquisitor, unless he rather desires to wrangle than to learn. But these be the Lord's own secrets, whereof we may be ignorant without danger. Howsoever, we have proved that the angel is a created substance; which confutes that Pythagorean dotage of philosophers with this two beginnings, one of good and another of evil: together with that Manichean heresy among some Christians, of which rank were the Archonitick and Caian heretics, of whom we read in Epiphanius; that the angels were from everlasting, coeternal with God; whereas it is plain that they are creatures of his making.

2. Their nature; an incorporeal substance, subtle and powerful, created after the image of God, resembling him as they are spiritual and immortal, but especially as they are holy and just, and full of divine created perfections. They are substances, though invisible, that have being, life, sense, understanding; and not mere qualities. Pure qualities can neither sin nor be capable of punishment; but my text proves both these concurring in the reprobate angels. But how can an incorporeal substance be capable of punishment? Yet who would ask that question, that finds a soul within himself troubled with passion; even when no offence or distemperature riseth from that gross and corporal part? yet is his soul vexed with the sense of sin, with sorrow, care, and perturbation of conscience. Though the angels be spiritual, they are capable of punishment, for the torments of hell are spiritual. This confutes the Sadducees of our times, who think angels to be nothing but motions, and melancholy passions; or those that take evil spirits to be only evil qualities and dispositions inherent with us; or the Libertines, that think good or evil angels to be nothing else but good or bad fortunes and successes. But whom they would not beware of in their sins, they shall feel in their torments. As they that live like angels on earth, shall be made like angels in heaven; so they that will not believe any devils, yet live like devils, must have their portion with devils; and stultus in culpa, will be made sapiens in pena.

2. Their office. Angel is not a name of nature, but of office. (Greg.) They stand round about the Lord as attendants, and execute his imposed hests like ready servants. (August.) A quo dominatio, ab eo denominatio: this name is given them for some supereminent quality. "He rode upon a cherub, and did fly," Psal. xviii. 10. They are said to have wings for their speed of obedience. Therefore Gregory says, that their titles are according to their messages. They that are sent on business of less moment, are called angels; they that of greater importance, archangels. The angel sent to contract that sacred match between the King of heaven and the Virgin Mary, was called Gabriel, Luke i. 19. Gabriel signifies, the power of God: a fit ambassador for such a message; because the conception of Christ, and by it the redemption of the world, is called, the strength of God's arm, Luke i. 51. Gabriel was sent, 1. I do not think, with Hierome, because virgins are as angels: as Isidor. Cœlibatus, as if cœli beatus. Indeed Christ says, that in heaven "they neither marry, nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels of God," Matt. xxii. 30. But so all the faithful are virgins to Christ, and shall be made as angels by Christ. 2. Nor yet so much to show that he was a high angel, because of his high and glorious message. 3. But indeed, as Aquinas in this truly, that our human nature might be repaired after the same manner it was ruined. As a serpent was sent to Eve by the devil, to work our woe; so an angel was sent to Mary by God, to bring news of our bliss. By Eve man was separated from God, in Mary God was united to man: an evil angel was the worker of the separation, a good angel was the messenger of the conjunction. So great is their office, that Christ himself accepted the name, "the Angel of the covenant," Mal. iii. 1. Popish writers deny that Christ was ever called an angel in the Old Testament. For that, Gen. xlviii. 16, they would thence prove prayer to angels. "The Angel which redeemed me from evil, bless the lads:" but no angel redeemed us, but Jesus Christ. They say, If at any time the Son of God appeared, it was most likely to be in Mount Sinai, at the giving of the law; that being the most noble apparition of all. Yet saith Stephen, Ye "received the law by the disposition of angels, and have not kept it," Acts vii. 53. Angels then appeared, not Christ. But the angels there were ministering spirits, giving their attendance, and executing their office. It is no good argument, Because the law was given by angels, therefore not by Christ. St. Paul clears it, "The law was ordained by angels in the hand of a Mediator," Gal. iii. 19. The ministry was of angels, the authority of Christ. They further object, If Christ had appeared at any time before his birth, it was most likely then when word was brought to Mary of the incarnation of God's Son; both for the dignity of the person to whom, and of the ministry what. But the messenger was Gabriel, not Christ. Ans. 1. Mary was not yet so great a person, as to be preferred before all the patriarchs, Christ's progenitors. Her dignity came not by her own worthiness, but by God's special grace: freely beloved. 2. There was greater reason that the same angel Gabriel, the first revealer of the prophecy to Daniel concerning the Messiah, should also be the messenger of the accomplishment of it. 3. It was not fit that the Son of God himself should be the messenger of his own coming into the world. Princes send their officers before, to give tidings of their coming; and should not that great Prince send his angels before, that it might appear he was Lord of the angels?

This is their office, wherein they are patterns to us. "Bless the Lord, ye his angels, that excel in strength, that do his commandments, hearkening unto the voice of his word," Psal. ciii. 20. For this we pray, that the will of God may be done by us on earth, as it is done by the angels in heaven, Matt. vi. 10. Our obedience cannot be like in perfection, must be like in proportion; for quality here, for equality hereafter. We must obey like the angels, if we desire to shine like them. In life we are men, in hope angels: now while we want the perfection of angels, God bless us from the presumption of the devils. (August.) Let us confess Christ before men, that he may confess us before the angels, Luke xii. 9.

4. Their glory. When the Scripture attributes the highest praise to inferior creatures, the comparison is drawn from the glory of angels. Jacob commending the countenance of his reconciled brother says, I have seen thy face, as the face of an angel, Gen. xxxiii. 10. "Man did eat angels' food," Psal. lxxviii. 25; which was manna, a most excellent meat, that if the angels needed sustenance, they could wish no better. "Though I speak with the tongues of angels," 1 Cor. xiii. 1. Si quæ sint angelorum lingue: if the angels had tongues, they must needs be admirable. They looked stedfastly on Stephen, and "saw his face as it had been the face of an angel," Acts vi. 15. David admiring man's creative glory, with uncontained passion breaks forth, "Thou hast made him a little lower than the angels," Psal. viii. 5. Man in his greatest glory is inferior to angels. Famous men in the church are called angels. So John Baptist: "I send my angel before thy face," Matt. xi. 10. "The angels of peace," Isa. xxxiii. 7. "To the angel of the church," Rev. ii. 1. The preacher of repentance was called the "angel of the Lord," Judg. ii. 1. The prophet is called the Lord's angel, Hag. i. 13. "He is the angel of the Lord of hosts,"

Mal. ii. 7. The king of Tyrus is called an "anointed cherub," Ezek. xxviii. 14. The widow of Tekoah put the term upon David, "As an angel of God, so is my lord the king to discern good and bad," 2 Sam. xiv. 17. This was their happy estate, unto which nihil defuit, nisi quod non immutabilis fuit, there was nothing wanting, but the unchangeableness of it. But optimi corruptio pessima: they were the best of all creatures, they are the worst of all creatures; being not content to remain angels, they became devils.

"The angels that sinned." I come to their apostacy; wherein consider four circumstances; the persons, the cause, the manner, and the measure of their fall.

1. The persons that fell: some of the angels, not all: they that sinned; for they that sinned not, stand for ever conserved by the mercy of God. This is St. Paul's distinction, "I charge thee before God, and the Lord Jesus, and the elect angels," 1 Tim. v. 21. Some are elected; and because election presupposeth refusal, the rest are rejected. Upon this falling, they are not properly any more angels, but devils and spirits of darkness. Satan, in Hebrew; an enemy, or detractor. Solomon acknowledging his peace saith, I have not an adversary, 1 Kings v. 4. The princes of the Philistines put the word upon David; "Lest he be an adversary to us," 1 Sam. xxix. 4. So David to the sons of Zeruiah; Why are you adversaries unto me? 2 Sam. xix. 22. So Christ to Peter; "Get thee behind me, Satan," Matt. xvi. 23. The Greeks have, diabolus, διαβόλος, insidiosè capere. His whole exercise is to deceive man, and to reduce him to his own ruin. Thus he is called, The father of lies, the prince of darkness, &c. all corruptive, destructive names. Beelzebub, the god of flies, or the master-fly. Flies, though beaten off, will return again; so doth Satan after many repulses. The red dragon; dyed into that sanguine hue with the blood of souls. The tempter; "unclean spirits," Matt. x. 1. Which discovers their folly that, proverbially, The devil is not so black as painters make him. But, by their leaves, let us not trust him; but endeavour by a good life, and a holy faith, to keep ourselves out of his clutches.

Proclus, and Psellus a Greek writer, make many kinds of devils. Some fiery spirits, Lelurion, conversant about the orb of the moon: some aerial, in that part of the air next us: others watery, earthy, subterranean, metalline spirits, which obsess the covetous and metal men. And the Scripture in some sort allude to it, which calls them powers of the air, and wanderers through the earth. "Woe to the inhabitants of the earth! for the devil is come down unto you," Rev. xii. 12: down, as if before he had been hovering in the air. They delight in filthy places, deserts, and sepulchres, and hogs. They drove one into the wilderness, Luke viii. 29. Another amongst the tombs, Matt. viii. 29: from whom being cast they entered the swine, and drove them into the sea; as if they delighted in the waters, sporting like the leviathan in the ocean. They make some deaf, other dumb, other furious, all miserable whom they possess. They insinuate themselves into men by sly temptations, and therefore are called familiars. The best and blest angels seem also to have their distinctions; "thrones, dominions, principalities, powers," Col. i. 16. I do not speak of those nine orders, as the bold Dionysius, and the over-venturous papists. But they are so called, because God by them governs the nations, moves the heavens, restrains devils, works miracles, conveys prophecies, protects his servants, and executes judgments upon his enemies. Yet so as these names may be given to all angels, by occasation of divers employments; or to some for a time, and not for ever.

2. The cause, which was indeed wholly in themselves. For either God or man must be the cause of their sin, or themselves; but neither man, nor God, therefore themselves. Not man; for had not the angels fallen first, they could not have been the cause of his fall. That nature continuing good itself, would never have procured evil to others. But now their whole endeavour is spent upon hindering man's ascent to that glory, from whence they are justly dejected. Man either was not then made, when the angels revolted; or if he were, how could he living on earth ruin the spirits in heaven? The devil cannot challenge man, but man may thank the devil, for this perdition. He first tempered the cup for himself, and then tempted man to drink; but he had better never have pledged him.

Not God; for then that were injustice, to condemn them for that which himself caused. It were unrighteous to make them fall, and then punish them for falling. But he did foresee it and would not prevent it, and in not hindering it he seemed to cause it. Indeed, this holds in the creature; who is bound, foreseeing an evil, to do his best in preventing it, and otherwise is made accessory to it. But God is an absolute Lord of all, and not bound to any of his creatures, further than he bindeth himself. In Christ he hath bound himself to believers, and all his promises are yea and Amen; and he will keep his word. But shall any creature challenge him for not doing that he never promised to do? But God did not confirm them in their created grace, therefore caused their fall. Ans. God did not purpose their confirmation: he gave them power of willing, not will of standing. He is not tied to confer more grace upon his creature, than himself pleaseth. It was enough that he created them righteous, without addition of their confirming. He is not bound to do whatsoever he can, nor to give account of whatsoever he doth.

In a word, the angels had in themselves the proper cause and beginning of their own fall; which was, a free and flexible will. They might will good, and perseverance in good; and that will being mutable, they might also will evil, and so fall from God. The same kind of will was in innocent Adam. But good trees cannot bring forth bad fruit; therefore the angels being good, could not sin of themselves. Ans. Those words must be construed sensu composito, non disjuncto. Indeed a good tree, remaining good, cannot produce evil fruit; but being changeable, it may. But God foresaw it, therefore the angels could not escape it. Ans. Yet is not his prescience any cause of their fall, but only an antecedent. Because we sin, therefore it was foreknown to God; not because it was foreknown to God, therefore we sin. God saw Judas's treason in the glass of his prescience before Judas had a member composed, or the world was formed; yet was not this the cause why Judas betrayed Christ. He foresaw it; he did neither compel it, nor command it, nor allow it. Prescience is to God, as memory is to us; memory presents to us things past, prescience to God things to come. Our memory is not the cause why things past were done; nor is God's foreknowledge the cause why things to come shall be done. We remember some things we do, we do not all the things we remember. So God foresees all he does, he does not all he foresees. We remember an orchard such a time planted, that now yields good fruits, by nature, not by violence; so God foresaw it. We remember a murder done, by will, not compulsion; so God foresaw it. Neither our memory, nor God's prescience, caused these; but they come to pass, natural by nature, voluntary by will, contingent by hap, necessary by necessity. But did God only foresee it? No, he also decreed it: why, then, how could they avoid it? Ans. He decreed to leave them to themselves, that they might fall if they will, and then to give them no grace of rising. But then as good hit me, as throw me: it is all one to thrust an old man down, as to take away his staff that should keep him up. Nay, but the old man throws away his own staff, and God doth not reach it him: they did forsake their own grace, and fall by their own folly. But here let us fall from disputation to admiration. "Oh the depth of the wisdom of God! how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out!" Rom. xi. 33.

3. The manner: this was by sin, saith our apostle. But what was this sin? Though it be no where precisely expressed in the Scripture; yet from two places it may be collected, that it was a rebellion against God arising from pride. "Ye shall be as gods," Gen. iii. 5. He tempted man to this sin, an ambitious pride of bettering his estate. Now it is probable, that he sought to overthrow him by the same way he fell himself. "He charged his angels with folly," Job iv. 18. The sin whereof Eliphaz would accuse Job, was a justifying or lifting up himself before God. From this hypothesis or supposition he reasons, that if God so plagued pride in those angelical natures, how will he dissemble it in man, who dwelleth in a house of clay, whose foundation is in the dust! Some say, God subjected the world to man, not to angels; "What is man, that thou hast put all things under his feet?" Psal. viii. 6. This the reprobate angels could not endure, therefore rebelled and fell. Yet still the manner and matter of their revolt appears to be pride; an insinuating sin: it crept into Paradise, and robbed us of our birth-right; we may curse it to this day. It climbed into heaven, and robbed angels of their glory; they may curse it for ever. It is an impudent and stupid sin, more insensible than Solomon's drunkard. We have not only thrust thorns, and needles, and goads, but even swords and spears into her heart to make her bleed; and yet she is proud to be spoken against.

I speak not of pride in the husk, but in the heart. Her tailor, fashion, is now held an honest man; I am sure a powerful one. How ridiculous soever a garb appears, fashion can persuade men to it. Oh that our preaching were in fashion too! then we should hope to persuade you. We tell pride, that as the freshest rivers run into the salt sea; so all the honours of the world shall end in baseness, all the pleasures of the world in bitterness, all the treasures of the world in emptiness, all the garments of the world in nakedness, all the delicacies of the world in rottenness. If Christ bids us cut off and cast away the offending eye, hand, foot, all which are needful members tied with joints and nerves to the body, we may well spare these unnecessary dependants, no parts of our flesh, but flags of our shame. The Pharisee prays not for supply of defects, nor acknowledgeth a defect of supplies; but tells his own fullness, and that great difference which his mistaken eyes saw between himself and the publican, Luke xviii. 11, 12; swelling with his own wind till he burst. They plough with the oxen of their own imaginary righteousness, and contemplate the farm which their own works have purchased, and marry themselves to merit as to wife; therefore in the pride of their peremptory stomachs they scorn the Lamb's supper. Therefore Christ refuseth them in his call, but seeks sinners; not sinners in perverse-ness, but sinners in sense and conscience, in plea, action, confession, and condemnation of themselves.

It is a needy and acknowledged emptiness, that lies at his gate who is rich in mercy, like Lazarus with all his ulcers open, and begging the very crumbs of commiseration.

Humility is the hardest of all virtues; all vices are against it, yea, all virtues are against it; men are proud of their wisdom, proud of their beneficence. Yea, humility itself is against humility, and by a strange, prodigious birth brings forth pride: as Diogenes, and that worse Cisterian, is proud of his very patches. How common is it for men to disclaim vain-glory vain-gloriously! making a remonstrance of that within them, whereof they study a renouncement from them. But the best things are always most humble. The boughs of trees, the more laden with fruits, the nearer they hang to the ground. The best gold goes down in the balance, the lighter stays above. Good corn lies in the bottom of the heap, the chaff keeps aloft. The good angel lifts him up that would worship him; "See thou do it not; I am thy fellow servant," Rev. xix. 10. The bad angel affects it; "All these will I give thee, if thou wilt fall down and worship me," Matt. iv. 9. Good angels are fearful to be worshipped of that nature, which they see exalted in Christ; evil angels desire to be worshipped of that nature, which they know is made after the image of God. Satan is "a king over all the children of pride," Job xli. 34. Pride turned angels into devils; humility shall turn men into angels. Of all sins, let us bless ourselves, yea, the Lord keep us, from pride; that humbling ourselves, we may be exalted by Jesus Christ.

4. The measure: they left their condition totally and wholly; they quite forsook God, his image, heaven itself, and the office therein assigned them. "He abode not in the truth," John viii. 44: by this truth is meant the image of God; which Paul says, consists in righteousness, and the holiness of truth, Eph. iv. 24. It is called truth, 1. Because it never deceived any man, as unrighteousness doth; which promiseth pleasure, profit, content, and performs nothing but grief and shame. 2. There is no hypocrisy in it, it makes no show of other than it is. This original condition the angels voluntarily left, forsaking their place, as St. Jude speaketh. God in the beginning appointed most excellent places for his several creatures, wherein they were to perform their required homage and service. Heaven was the proper place assigned to the angels; to man in his innocence, Paradise; after his fall, the families of the patriarchs; before and in Christ's time, the temple; now, the congregations of the faithful. These were our appointed places to set forth the praises of our Maker. This place the angels left, forsaking the presence of God, and their own office wherein they should have been for ever employed.

But do not the devils keep in the air? Some do by God's permission; but not as in their proper place and first habitation, for that was in the comfortable presence of God in heaven. But wheresoever they are, they carry a hell about them; if they be not in hell, yet hell is in them: as the militant saints have in them the kingdom of heaven, though the kingdom of heaven do not yet contain them. And the blessed angels protecting us on earth, are still in a heaven, by reason of the gracious and glorious presence of the infinite God that is with them. So the devils are never remote from their hell. "He was a murderer from the beginning," John viii. 44: whereupon Manichee grounds, The wickedness of the devil had no beginning: hence came that conceit of two beginnings. Ans. 1. He was not so from the beginning, as Christ, who had no beginning.

The latter confutes it; it is not said, in the beginning, but, from the beginning. 2. Neither was he made so in his own beginning of being; as some sottishly draw that literal Leviathan into any allegory: "There is that Leviathan, whom thou hast made to play therein," Psal. civ. 26; as if God had made him a devil. 3. Nor yet so from the beginning, that in the same instant he took of God a being, and of himself an evil being; as it is said of our soul, cum infunditur, inficitur, the infusion and infection meet together. For he was first made good, and therefore must by intervention of space become bad. 4. But because there was a little time between his creation and apostacy: "He abode not in the truth." "How art thou fallen from heaven, O Lucifer, son of the morning!" Isa. xiv. 12. He was a son of the morning, not a son of the day; he stood not so long. 5. Especially, he was a murderer from the beginning, not of himself, but of mankind. And St. Austin's reason is good, Man could not be murdered before he was made: the devil could not be a murderer before he had something to kill; unless we say, he was his own murderer. But from the beginning he murdered us; and we should never have recovered that wound, unless it had been by a second murder, the killing of Jesus Christ.

But if the angels in their innocence and excellency fell wholly and utterly from God, then much more may weak man rend himself from God by sin, yea, and also from Christ. Ans. The grace of creation came far short of the grace of redemption. There was a power to stand or to fall; but that power was in itself. Here is a power to stand, none to fall; but this power is not of ourselves. The power stands in the promise of God, and gracious covenant in Christ. "I will make an everlasting covenant with them, and they shall not depart from me," Jer. xxxii. 40. We so stand as never to fall. God doth not trust our salvation in our own hands; but we are dead, and our life is hid with Christ in God, Col. iii. 3. If our portion were in our own hand, we would quickly spend it, as that prodigal did his patrimony, Luke xv. We are the foolish children of Adam, and would part with our salvation for an apple; and by nature the brothers of profane Esau, that sold his birthright for a mess of pottage. But it is there laid up, where we can never spend it, nor the devil find it. There is a difference between the state of nature, and that which is above nature; betwixt a created and a regenerated will: not that the latter is not also created: but because the former is in the will by creation, so is not the latter. 1. The created will had a freedom to will that is good; so hath this. 2. The created will had a power to will perseverance in goodness; so hath this. 3. The created will had not the will itself, nor the act of perseverance; the regenerate will hath both these.

Here the doctrine of the Romish school errs, which teacheth, that in conversion the will hath a freedom to receive grace, or not to receive it; so man's power of faith and salvation should be in his own hand. But the unconverted will refuseth grace, yea, rebel-leth against it; and no man can come unto Christ, unless the Father draw him, John vi. 44. It is not the will itself, but the conversion of the will, that makes it willing to goodness. The will of regenerate man is not as the will of created angels, able to stand or fall; but God hath conformed it, and confirmed it, to will its own standing for ever. True saving grace is never lost; without Christ man could never get it, but when Christ hath given it him, he shall never lose it. Some schoolmen say, that God doth creaturis dignitatem causalitatis communicare, and Austin seems to favour it; but man could as well make himself, as make himself good. And if he were naturally worthy to have grace, where had he that grace to be naturally worthy? Sure this makes him little beholden to God, that gives him but the grace whereof he is worthy. As we say, God could do no more in mercy; so this says, God could do no less in justice. But they for the latter object, "Hold that fast which thou hast, that no man take thy crown," Rev. iii. 11. Now si alius potest accipere, tu potes perdere, if another may take it, then thou mayst lose it, and so fall from grace. Indeed common graces a man may have and lose, but not that grace which makes him accepted with God: he can as soon lose the being of nature, as the being of this grace. The Romists, as they establish a free-will to get grace, so they confess a power to lose it; on both sides they run into gross errors. As August. contr. Tul.: Ut statueret liberum arbitrium, negavit præscientiam futurorum: itaque dum vult facere liberos, facit sacrilegos. But our seed is immortal whereof we are made holy; therefore our holiness is immortal. Three things can never be lost; the love of God in Christ, the grace of the Spirit, and our inheritance in heaven. We are in Christ; and unless Christ could be severed from God, we cannot be severed from Christ. Indeed for pagans, that are not in Christ, but in darkness; and for Jews, that are not in Christ, but in the law; and for Libertines, that are not in Christ, but in the flesh: these all may perish; but they that be united to Christ, never. There is a cordial union, of friend to friend; a carnal union, of man to wife; a vital union, of soul to body: these may be parted; but a spiritual union, never. As Christ is in God, and God in Christ, so are we in him. Prove it: "That they may be one, as we are one: I in them, and thou in me," John xvii. 22. But, "Thou hast left thy first love," Rev. ii. 4. Not fallen from love, but from such a degree of love. Besides, there is a counterfeit charity, but true can never be lost. To conclude, we stand not of ourselves, but by the grace of Christ, and mercy of God. We may look on our right hand for comfort, on our left for supportance, and find refuge to fail us, no man caring for our soul; but if we cry unto the Lord, Thou art our refuge, thy mercies fail us not, Psal. cxlii. 4, 5. The sea hath no mercy, the fire hath no mercy, the earth hath no mercy, beasts have no mercy, man hath no mercy, the world hath no mercy, the devil least of all hath mercy; but the Lord hath mercy. David by experience gives it, the children of God affirm it, and let no man at the peril of his own soul deny it.

Thus we have considered the apostacy and fall of these angels; a point somewhat intricate and thorny, and would have been much more confused, had I followed all the perplexful, barren, and unnecessary questions of the school; which have in them more subtlety than doctrine, more doctrine than use; full of scholastical, yea, sophistical doubts. One charged a painter to draw him equum volitantem, a trotting or prancing horse; and he (mistaking the word) drew him equum volutantem, a wallowing or a tumbling horse, with his heels upward. Being brought home, and the bespoker blaming his error; I would have had him prancing, and you have made him tumbling: If that be all, quoth the painter, it is but turning the picture the wrong side uppermost, and you have your desire. Thus in their quodlibetical discourses they can but turn the lineaments, and the matter is as they would have it. I speak not this to disgrace all their learning; but their fruitless, needless disputes and arguments; who find themselves a tongue, where the Scripture allows them none. It speaks of the angels' sin generally, without particularizing what it was: hereupon say the papists, it is an insufficient judge to decide all doubts and controversies. But because it doth not answer punctually the curiosity of their idle brains, can it not therefore decide all profitable questions, and satisfy all just doubts? Yes, it determines all things that concern our consciences, and everlasting salvation. In unnecessary things it is silent, as if it forbade us to inquire. For use to ourselves:

1. Seeing the fault for which God confounded the angels was the leaving of their being and first estate, this should humble us to bewail the same sin in ourselves, for we have also left our beginning. The image of God was imprinted on us, as well as on them. They defaced it in themselves. When the devil telleth a lie, he telleth it of his own, John viii. 44; no man suggested it to him. To this they also tempted us, so that we lost our beginning: a thing that few of us truly lament; our original corruption. Sometimes men sorrow for their actuals, but seldom for their originals: as if that should not trouble them which they brought into the world along with them; or as if that were their parents' fault, none of their own. But the royal prophet confessed, I was conceived and born in sin, Psal. li. 5. When a little child, I was a great sinner. (August.) I dispute not problems, whether this comes to us by imitation, which was the Pelagian heresy; for certainly it comes to us by propagation. The good man may generate, cannot regenerate, the children of his flesh. (August.) Nor is it material to be decided, whether the soul be infected by the contagion of the body, as good unction is by a fusty vessel; for the soul is infected as soon as ever it is infused; or whether in the very moment of infusion God did forsake it. Only let our care be, as in a common fire, not to question or examine how it came, till first we have put it out. A passenger brought to a pit by the cries of one fallen into it, fell a wondering how he came there: to whom the poor man replies, Forbear marvelling how I fell in, and do thy best to help me out. Miserable parents have brought forth a miserable child into this miserable world; Nec citius tulerunt natum, quam damnatum. (Bern.) We are sure we have it; oh that half so sure we were all delivered from it! How should this humble us, to look unto the rock whence we were hewn, and the pit whence we were digged! Deny not thy pollution, but cleanse it. All our tears are few enough to wash out our original stains: what are left for our actual and continual aspersions? Men rail on fortune, challenge the stars, blame bad company, curse the devil, for their sins; still they miss the proper cause, their original apostacy, and corrupt beginning. Satan could not make men profane rebels, unless their unclean nature had first made them sinners. From this impure beginning comes all iniquity; for naturally the seeds of all sins are within us, and if corruption precede, eruption will easily follow. And God will smite him that sins, though (as Saul said) it be my son Jonathan. Indeed he smote his own Son Jesus for our sake, not for angels'. Christ's side was lanced, to let out our imposthume. It is his grace alone that reduceth us to our beginning; yea, to a far better beginning, such a one as shall never have ending.

2. Seeing the angels sinned, let him that thinks he standeth take heed lest he fall. No height of man can match the angels: if justice spared not sin in them, how will it forbear us? No strength of man can match the angels: if they were not able to resist the judgment, what can we do? Heaven is a great way farther from hell than is earth: if sin could tumble down angels, how much more easily the sons of men, from so low and conterminant a place! Adam was excellent in Paradise, yet short of the angels in heaven; their beauty and glory was far greater: but if God punished sin in the angels, how will he dissemble it in men? The Jews thought it a high privilege to say, We are the sons of Abraham; yet Abraham was but a man. We go further, and say, We are the sons of God: but how? By creation only: so were the lost angels: we must have a better title than so, or else sin will confound us with the angels. God forbore not sin in those his selected and eldest sons on earth, the Israelites; not in his celestial children, the angels; yea, he is so far from sparing it in any, that to save some he spared not his own Son. What then is our title? In Christ: indeed there it is only good; a blessedness which was not granted to the lost angels. But then let us walk worthy of this Christ, that we may confirm an argument of comfort to our own souls.

"But cast them down into hell, and delivered," &c. I come to their penalty; the first branch whereof is their dejection; he "cast them down into hell." Herein is locus a quo implied, the place from which they were cast, heaven; and locus ad quem expressed, the place into which they were cast, hell: there is pœna damni in the former, pœna sensus in the latter. The one privative, a loss of all blessedness; the other positive, an infliction of all cursedness.

"Cast them down." This implies some place from whence they were cast; and that is heaven, the place of their creation, the seat of blessedness, the palace of glory, the eternal mansion of joy. Lift up your hearts awhile, to contemplate that place, from whence they fell, and whither we desire to rise.

First, take it generally; there is a heaven wheresoever God's gracious presence shineth. Yea, as the father said, I had rather be out of heaven with Christ, than in heaven without Christ; so we had better be on earth with God's favour, than in heaven without it. For as the sun makes a day, so the countenance of God makes a heaven, wheresoever it shineth. Absence of light causeth darkness; if God turn away his face, nothing remains but wretchedness. "In thy presence is fulness of joy," Psal. xvi. 11. For the fulness of joy be in his presence, then the fulness of sorrow is in his absence. "Thou didst hide thy face, and I was troubled," Psal. xxx. 7. For the light of God's countenance David often praises; nothing was so terrible as the hiding of his face from him; especially if it be true what the French nightingale sung, That hell is every where, where God is not. If the king's favourite be for ever decourted, and banished the royal presence, this more afflicts him than those that never saw it. An unknown good is uncared for: many men little affect heaven, because they never apprehended the sweetness of it. But that which is retained with great sensible joy, cannot be lost without great sensible grief. Had these wicked angels never known the delectableness of God's presence, their own expulsion out of heaven had been less plague unto them. Now they may name all their thoughts, those children of their minds, Ichabods; for the glory is departed from them, 1 Sam. iv. 21. It was Absalom's extremest discontent to be kept from the court; therefore in passion he solicits Joab, "Let me see the king's face," 2 Sam. xiv. 32.

This is their eternal misery, never to see God's pleased countenance. Darkness is the more intolerable to them, because they were created children of light; their dismal plaints, extorted by flames, more irksome, because they once bore a part in the music of heaven, the melody of angels. As Elisha said to that great lord, "Thou shalt see it with thine eyes, but shalt not eat thereof," 2 Kings vii. 2. There is good cheer, and they for whom it was provided must never taste it: "None of those men which were bidden shall taste of my supper," Luke xiv. 24. Thus miserable are they that live out of the orb of mercy, drawing their unhappy breath without repentance; upon whom fury and indignation waits, the length and breadth whereof cannot be measured; with a diligent train of insufferable plagues, that will never cease to punish so long as there is a will of God to bid them. It is a question whether the rich man's own positive and sensible torments more afflicted him, or the sight of his once despised Lazarus in the bosom of rest. "The wicked shall see it, and be grieved; he shall gnash with his teeth, and melt away," Psal. cxii. 10. What so vexeth him? The horn of the righteous exalted with honour. There shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth, when you shall see the saints in the kingdom of God, and yourselves thrust out, Luke xiii. 28: when you shall see it.

We may also consider this point at home; and think how it afflicted our first parents to see that Paradise, out of which they were cast and kept with a flaming sword. Every earth was not fit for Adam, but a garden, a Paradise. Excellent pleasures have been found in gardens planted by men; yet is the least leaf, twig, or pile of grass past all men's making. When he that creates the matter undertakes the form, this must needs be transcendently perfect. No tree, herb, flower, was there wanting, that might be for ornament or use, for sight, scent, or taste. The bounty of God extended itself further than to necessity, even to delight and recreation. Yet for all this, if God's gracious presence had not shone there, no abundance could have made him blessed. Yet behold, God offered him all fruits there, and restrained but one; Satan offered him but one, and forbore all the rest; and man chose rather to be at Satan's finding, than at God's. Then did the justice of God turn him out of his gates with a curse: why should he feed a rebel at his own board? That God from whose face he fled with fear in the garden, now makes him fly with shame out of the garden. The angels that should have kept him, now keep Paradise against him. It was easy to have kept happiness, easier to lose it, but most hard to recover it. That very cause which drove man out of Paradise, hath also withdrawn Paradise from the world. Now as when man was toiling in the cursed and weedy earth, what a vexation must arise in his conscience, by the sight of his discharged Paradise! so terrible is it to the devils sailing in the air, to contemplate that heaven from which they are banished for ever.

Secondly, more specially, and in a stricter acceptance, heaven is the local receptacle of infinite and interminate joy. "In thy presence is fulness of joy; at thy right hand there are pleasures for evermore," Psal. xvi. 11. For quality, they are pleasures; for quantity, fulness; for dignity, at God's right hand; for eternity, for evermore. There shall be no fear to have the eyes dimmed with tears, or the soul surprised by death, or the heart dejected with sorrow, or the ears disturbed with cries, or the senses distracted with pain. There are possessions without impeachments, kingdoms without cares, length of years with strength of delights, greatness of state without conscience of corruption, love of all without jealousy of any. There men shall be good and not persecuted, happy and not envied, rich and not robbed, kings and not flattered. The inhabitants are at the same instant ravished with seeing, satisfied with enjoying, and secured for retaining. There is the glory of God, whose brightness they behold; safety from foes, whose ruin they rejoice at; ("The righteous shall rejoice when he seeth the vengeance; he shall wash his feet in the blood of the wicked," Psal. lvi. 10;) the company of saints, whose comforts they participate; the receipt of a kingdom, and with it the full possession of the fee-simple of life, the tenure whereof is inviolable. Joy so tempered, that it shall satisfy and not glut; persons so sublimed, that what makes them everlastingly happy, shall never make them weary. There is a river, and the spring the throne of God, the water crystal, the banks set with the trees of life. There is a city, the gates of it pearl, the streets of it gold, the walls of it precious stones, the temple in it God, the light of it the Lamb, the vessels to it kings of the earth; the cheer joy, the exercise singing, the city praise, the subject God, the quire angels.

Such is heaven, which, alas, man's parvity is as far from comprehending, as his arms be from compassing. Heaven shall receive us, we cannot conceive heaven. Do you ask what death is? saith one: if I could show you, I were first dead. Do you ask what heaven is? when I meet you there I will tell you. Could this ear hear it, or this tongue utter it, or this heart conceive it, it must needs follow, that they were translated already thither. Howsoever, what hath been spoken may remonstrate this, how great an infelicity the privation of heaven is. One spake truly, that the tears of hell are not sufficient to bewail the loss of heaven. This fully appears by that judicatory sentence, Matt. xxv. 41; when the wicked shall haply reply, Though we may not ascend with thee unto glory, yet let us have thy presence on earth: let us be any where, so thou, O Christ be with us. No, depart from me; from peace, from joy, from comfort, from my presence, from my salvation, from my glory, for ever. Oh wretchedness, that disdains all comparison! if there were no hell, this were enough to wring out everlasting tears.

Application. Seeing both these angels, and also men, were cast out of their original and proper residence by sin, and God hath made ours recoverable by Christ, which is not granted to them, let us studiously seek an entrance into that eternal rest. We transgress daily, yet the Lord shutteth not heaven against us; we find more mercy than our forefather. His strength was worthy of severity, our weakness finds pity. We lost a paradise that cannot be found, but we may find a paradise that cannot be lost. Here is no fiery sword to keep us out: we care not to seek where that paradise is which we lost, but this we both care to seek and hope to find. As man is the image of God, so was that paradise the image of heaven: both the images are defaced, both the first patterns are eternal. The first Adam was in the first paradise, and stayed not; the Second Adam is in the second paradise, and there abides. "This day shalt thou be with me in paradise," was his promise to the penitent malefactor. Paul was there, and heard and saw what he could not utter. By how much the third heaven exceeds the richest earth, by so much doth that paradise which Christ hath found exceed that which we have lost. Now if we desire to have our salvation perfected above, we must begin it below. The gate of heaven is opened on earth. The place where God manifested his favour, Jacob called Bethel, heaven gate; "This is the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven," Gen. xxviii. 17: as a man calls that the court, where he was first brought to the presence of the king. Now this is done by a holy expectance, hearty affection, patient forbearance,

By a holy expectation, and a life expressive of such hope. He that looks to wear a crown, habituates himself to royal affections. "Our conversation is in heaven, whence we look," &c. Phil. iii. 20. They that hope to carry earth up to heaven, strive first to bring heaven down to earth.

By a hearty affection. If we cannot get in, yet let us get as near as we can, and keep about the gates of the city: where the faithful are congregated, there heaven itself is opened. Cain thought it not the least part of his curse, to be cast out from the face of God; from Adam's family, where the face of God was seen in his holy worship.

By a patient forbearance and withdrawing our affections from terrene things. This world is but an inn; and no man seeks for his inheritance in his inn.

By a prepared assurance armed for all encounters. No prisoner fears that gaoler, look he never so stern, who knows that his commission is but to bring him to the court safe. To the saints, death is not a penalty, but a remedy. It is not so much a death of nature, as of corruption and calamity.

By a constant perseverance, resolving, upon the worst disasters, not to turn back: knowing, that if the gospel take away riches, it will requite them; if it take away life, it will restore it better. Patience shall never be a loser by it.

Lastly, by a ravished exultance and joy, that ariseth from the meditation of heaven. Which so transports us, that for the time we think ourselves there; and conceive of former sorrows, as men awaked from a busy dream. What shall be the possession of that place, whereof the contemplation is so sweet! It is a pleasure to sit on the quiet and secure shore, and discourse of escaped wrecks. This is our true paradise; the lower remains as it is a place, not as it is a paradise. On earth we lost it, in heaven we shall find it. There faith shall be turned into beatifical vision, expectation lost in possession. There we shall know the truth of things we argue here below. How sweet now would the knowledge of some secrets be unto us! yet are many not worth the knowing: there those deep and glorious mysteries shall be made plain, and we shall discourse them one to another. Discourse them, I say; for now the souls in heaven have the language of intelligence, and when their bodies are joined they shall have the language of utterance. And because the perfection of all shall be a blest everlastingness. I will give you the kingdom of heaven, saith Christ; this disgraceth all earthly kingdoms. I will give you an incorruptible crown; this disgraceth all corruptible crowns. I will give you eternal joy; this disgraceth all momentary pleasures. Eternal life is the gift of God through Jesus Christ, Rom. vi. 23.

"Down to hell." This is locus ad quem, the next part of their punishment; a sensible pain, the position of intolerable and interminable plagues. In handling whereof consider three circumstances; that it is, what it is, where it is.

First, that there is a hell, is plain; for they could not be cast into a place that had no being. Yea, it is manifest that it had a being before sin; and God made it before he had present and actual use of it. It was constituted ere the angels fell, that it might receive them when they fell. Hell was made before sin was hatched, as heaven was formed and fitted before the inhabitant was produced. For we must observe that God created angels and men after his own image, wise, innocent, powerful. But withal he gave them a mutable condition, which had power of standing, and possibility of falling. Power to stand was of God the Creator; possibility to fall was of themselves the creatures. To be unchangeably good is only proper to God. (August.) Augustine in his Confessions gives the reason. Because God created man of nothing, he left in him possibility to return unto nothing. If God had given them an immutable nature, he had created them gods, not creatures. (Basil.) Now out of the whole host of angels he kept some from falling; and when all mankind was fallen, he redeemed some by his own Son. And as he shows mercy upon some in their salvation, so it is fit he should show justice upon others in their just damnation. Now because there must be distinct places for the exercise of both these, which are in God equally infinite, by an irrevocable decree from the foundation of the world, a glorious habitation was ordained for the one, and a terrible dungeon for the other. "These shall go away into everlasting punishment; but the righteous into life eternal," Matt. xxv. 46. So certain are both these places, that they were of old prepared: "Inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world," ver. 34. "Depart, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels," ver. 41. "Tophet is ordained of old," Isa. xxx. 33: neither about to be prepared, nor certain to be prepared, but prepared. Of old; for the Lord, that beholds all things, past, present, future, uno actu, uno ictu, at once, and at the same time: as he foresaw the different estates of men and angels, so he provided for them different places. That there is a hell,

First, the Scripture plentifully testifies, Mark ix. 43, &c. I know that many have wrangled against it; Danæus reckons up nineteen several sorts of heretics that denied it. But say what they will, the wicked would give much to be sure that the Scripture was not true. They will not believe, and yet they cannot choose but believe: their case is fearful.

The heathen affirmed a hell and place of torment for bad men; they retained so much light, as to know of that future darkness. Some of them have been terrified with their own inventions, and distracted with horror of the torments described by their own pens. As Pygmalion doted on his own picture, so were they amazed with their own comments. How much more, if they had known those intolerable horrors as they are, not as they were described! Par nulla figura Gehenna.

Besides, many wicked men are punished, and many as wicked escape. Now it is fit that partners in sin should not be severed in torment. God doth not punish all here, that he may allow some space of repentance; nor doth he forbear all here, lest the world should deny his providence. He spares that he may punish, and he punisheth that he may spare. He afflicteth some in the suburbs of hell, that they might never come into the city itself. But quos malos fert incruciatos, refert cruciandos. The evil he now suffers uncorrected, he refers to be condemned. Sin knows the doom; it must smart, either here or hereafter.

Further, in all things natural and supernatural, there is an opposition and contrariety. There is good, there is evil; light and darkness; sorrow and joy. Now as there be two ways, so there must be two ends: heaven, whither the good angels shall carry the saints; hell, whither the black and grisly spirits shall hurry the reprobates.

Again, all men naturally do honour the good, and punish the evil. The barbarians themselves have laws of castigation, and executions to cut off irregular persons. Shall the Lord in his justice come short of creatures, of barbarous creatures? The law of nations requires that malefactors, if they escape with life, be banished for ever. And shall not God banish rebels on earth, from his glorious presence in heaven, into that fearful island of hell? If this were not, Nero was as good a man as Paul; Esau should still have his birthright in bliss, and Cain be a saint as well as Abel. As believers say, "If in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable," 1 Cor. xv. 19; so might the wicked say, If in this life only we have sense of sorrow, we are of all men most happy.

Lastly, every prince is allowed this concurrence to his state; that as he hath a pleasant palace for himself and his servants, so he hath a gaol and prison for rebels and traitors. That heaven is glorious where the high King keeps his magnificent court, the outer side of whose pavements we delight to behold, and admire for beauty. So is that hell a dismal dungeon where he puts his enemies, the outside whereof men are not suffered to see, lest they should die with horror of the sight. They that have seen the flames and heard the roarings of Etna, now Monte Gibillo, the flashings of Vesuvius, the thunderings and burning flakes evaporating from marine rocks, have not yet seen the very glimmerings of hell. A painted fire is a better shadow of these, than these are of hell-torments.

I am sure I speak to no atheists; I could say, dost thou think there is no hell? What devil will so affirm? they know it, and feel it: Why art thou come to torment us before our time? Shall not men tremble to deny what the devils confess? (Chrysost.) What, eat, drink, and play, epicure; no pleasure after death? None indeed to reprobates; there is nothing but hell for them, and they shall find small pleasure in that. Believe it, and avoid it: by believing thou shalt avoid it. We are sure God hath made it; let us be but half so sure that we shall escape it. A good king having ordained positive laws by which he would govern, caused instruments of execution to be made, gibbets, wheels, racks, and such torturous engines. And being made, he commanded them to be brought forth, and exposed to open view; and upon every one was written, Ne noceat, ne noceat. That it may do no harm: observe it, that you may never feel it. So God admonisheth us of hell, ne noceat; he doth as it were show it us, that it may never hurt us. "Thou hast showed thy people hard things," Psal. lx. 3; but showed them, not inflicted them. By threatening us, he would save the labour of plugging us.

But shall God menace this, and we not be moved? Is the hand-writing on the wall, and Belshazzar still merry? God loves him that trembles at his word. Isa. lxvi. 2. Do we not tremble at it? how should we then escape it! We read of a bird of paradise, so called for her excellent beauty, that being taken in the fowler's net, she doth groan and weep night and day, and so languish away. We were once such birds of paradise, but by sin taken in Satan's nets; captived in wickedness, and condemnable to this hell of wretchedness. Oh how should we groan and weep till we get out of this prison where we are, into the liberty where we would be! Sin must have sorrow; either here by attrition legal and contrition evangelical, or hereafter by destruction infernal. Let us be as ready for repentance, as ever we have been for disobedience. (Isidor.) It is too common for men to put far away from them the evil day. They injuriously oppress others, and luxuriously riot themselves. Why? "My Lord delayeth his coming," Luke xii. 45. As if it would be long before he be present, that is in no place, at no time, absent. Whereas the shadow doth not more diligently wait upon the body, than doth confusion upon sin. Therefore so live to-day, as if thou wert not to live to-morrow. Seeing for the wicked is prepared a hell, let us seek for heaven. Corrupt nature prepared us all for the former, let holy grace prepare us for the other. It is said of heaven, It is open to the prepared, shut to the unprepared. The contrary is true of hell; to the prepared it is shut, to the unprepared it is open. God sawed the prophets many fearful visions, to their terror and astonishment; but withal he encouraged them, that the judgments should light upon others, and he would deliver their souls. Ezekiel's quaking and trembling was but for a sign, Ezek. xii. 18: Israel's should be in sense and anguish of heart. If we tremble at these torments while the wicked laugh and are jovial, we shall put off our fear to them, laugh and be merry when they tremble. As Daniel said to that monarch, "Let not the dream trouble thee; the dream be to them that hate thee, and the interpretation to thine enemies," Dan. iv. 19: let our hearts repent and believe, and let not this terror trouble us; the terror be to the devils that hate God, and to the reprobates his enemies. "His enemies will I clothe with shame; but upon himself shall his crown flourish," Psal. cxxxii. 18. For tormenting cares, we shall have flourishing crowns, in the communion of saints and angels.

The next question is, What is hell? It is that place where the justice of God confineth reprobates to their eternal punishments. The plagues thereof are internal, external, eternal. Internal, that consist in a plenary desertion of God; so that they are continual sinners and continual sufferers; two contrarieties being reconciled in them, extreme presumption and extreme desperation. Presumption, for with bitter malice and curst heart they shall perpetually blaspheme, and sin against the Holy Ghost, Rev. xvi. 11. Desperation, without all hope of mercy, or admitting one thought of peace. The one being a sin against God's justice, the other against his mercy. External, that consist, 1. In a deprivation of all comfort; that they do feel being not more bitter than the thought of that they cannot feel. (Chrysost.) A privative cause hath a positive effect. Tully banished from Italy, though it were into Greece, wept bitterly when he remembered Rome. Exiled Demosthenes, though he found much kindness amongst his enemies, yet would weep when he looked towards Athens. The captive Jews hung up their harps when they remembered Zion. Another laments that Roma relinquenda est; but when he considers, Scythia est quo mittitur, bursts out into tears. It is the most unhappy part of unhappiness to remember former welfare. Dura satis miseris memoratio prisca bonorum. 2. In a sensible passion of universal anguish; as a brand in a great fire, no part free from burning. Eternal, not determinable with time, for then time shall be no more: everlastingness shall make absolute their sorrows: man's arm may be weary of smiting, not God's. It is fabled of Jupiter, that if he should spend his artillery as fast as men sin, his quiver would soon be empty. Vulcan could not make his thunderbolts fast enough. But the damned are punished in hell, so long as there is a God in heaven.

The Scripture speaks sometimes of hell figuratively; Gehinnon, Tophet: which was a valley by the fuller's field near to Aceldama, on the south side of Zion. Called Gehinnon, because it was in the tenure of a man named Hinnom. (Aret.) There the Jews, after the example of the Ammonites, sacrificed their children to Moloch in the fire. An idol which they worshipped for Mercury. (Montan.) Others say for Saturn, whom the poets feign a devourer of his own children. It was of brass or copper, with hands stretched out to receive the infants that were to be sacrificed. His priests were called Chemmarim, because they were reeced or smoked with the incense offered to the idol. It was defaced and defiled by good King Josiah, 2 Kings xxiii. 10, and made a draught or common sewer for the filth of Jerusalem. The Chaldeans cast the slain Jews into that place, Jer. vii. 32. Therefore it was called, the mouth of hell, that could not be filled. For further description of hell, the Scripture useth three principal terms; the worm, outer darkness, and unquenchable fire, Mark ix. 44.

First, the worm. This we must not understand a corporal worm, which were terrible enough; for a man to live always dying, and die always living, with an adder sucking and stinging his vital parts. "The vengeance of the ungodly is fire and worms," Eccus. vii. 17. But we must know that after the world's dissolution, there shall remain no mixed body, but only man's; no generation nor corruption in the revived bodies. Therefore the worm cannot be corporal, but spiritual; the stinging of a vexed conscience. As from the corruption of dead bodies breed the worms that devour them, so from the corruption of sin riseth this worm of conscience. Some understand it to be the memory of past sins, which shall so long gnaw their souls and bodies, like a vulture preying on their hearts, as the remembrance of committed iniquities continues, which will be for ever. Object. But if the memory be so perfected, then the recognition of former joys shall be some ease. An old soldier, after his exhausted strength, glories in the battles he hath won. Ans. Nay, this shall rather be matter of sorrow: to remember the evils they have done, bitter; the good they once had, more bitter; the good they might have had, most bitter. Object. The torments of hell are far beyond any pains of this world; but a man here, lying under some lethargical and stupifying pressure, cannot consider those intelligible conclusions, as he might being abstracted from his pain. Ans. The soul is here joined to a corruptible body, straitened by the organ; so that while the body is afflicted, the consideration of the soul is hindered. But there the soul cannot be inclined by an incorruptible body; but while the flesh suffers according to the capability thereof, the soul is prostrated to all the pains she can endure. Object. But the damned are the subjects of time, and time causeth forgetfulness. Ans. Time is the cause of forgetting, but only by accident; because motion, which is the measure of time, is the cause of transmutation. But after this world there shall be no more motion of the heavens; and even the soul that is now separated, is not changed from her disposition by the motion of heaven. "Son, remember," Luke xvi. 25: this is a gnawing worm; which if it hath made some acknowledge a hell on earth, what shall it be to their sense in hell itself? The eyes which sin hath shut damnation shall open. (Greg.)

Therefore it is good counsel now, Foresee with fear the evil that shall be hereafter, lest you remember with grief the good that hath been heretofore. Oh that our foresight were but half so sharp as our sense! Let us now consider seriously the pains that shall be, that we never be put to remember grievously the joys that have been.

Secondly, outer darkness: "Cast him into outer darkness," Matt. xxii. 13. But it is objected, that the sight of their misery shall aggravate the sense of their misery; but nothing can be seen without the light, therefore not outer darkness. Again, the damned shall have a visory power after the resumption of their bodies, which were superfluous if they should see nothing with it. They shall see, and without light they cannot see; how then, outer darkness? Ans. Though that fire do not shine to any comfort, yet for their extremest vexation it shall give some light; so much, as to show their fellows their torments, and them the torments of their fellows. (Greg.) Basil in Psal. xxix. 7, "The voice of the Lord divideth the flames of fire." God's power shall separate the clarity of fire from the adustive virtue. That the clearness may delight the righteous, and the sharpness afflict the wicked. So Theodor. in Psal. xcvi., The shining property shall be extracted to comfort the saints; the burning property remain to punish reprobates. But then vision itself is some delight: as Aristot. in his Metaphys., The sight of the eyes is pleasant; and to the same purpose Solomon. Yet by accident it becomes afflictive; as when men are forced to see what they would not see. In hell there shall be nothing diaphanous, perspicuous, clear; but a shady, foggy vision, like a distracted dream. They shall see that, which to avoid they would wish themselves to have no eyes.

Let us therefore decline the works of darkness, as we desire to escape the place of darkness. Interior darkness must be doomed to inferior darkness. What is more just, than that they who refused the light when they might have it, should be denied the light when they desire it? Many now nuzzle themselves in ignorance, as if they meant to make their own beds in hell. Voluntary blindness shall be confined to necessary blindness; and they that might now see if they would open their eyes, shall there open their eyes and not see. Let us be children of the light, not of the night: and as we wish to see that glory without us which may make us happy, so let us strive to see that grace within us which may make us holy. Now the Father of lights defend us from that prince and place of darkness.

Lastly, fire, unquenchable fire. It hath been much controverted, whether in hell be true substantial fire, or only fire allegorical. Calvin is only for the allegory; and so some others, that give this reason: There is mention of wood and of worm, as well as of fire: now these are allegorical, why not therefore the fire? But in Scripture things spoken together are not always taken in the same nature and manner. Christ is called the Rock of our salvation: the rock is allegorical; is our salvation therefore allegorical? Ye shall "eat and drink at my table in my kingdom," Luke xxii. 30: eating and drinking is allegorical; is therefore the kingdom allegorical too? It is then to be concluded that there is true and substantial fire in hell. "The Lord will come with fire, to render his anger with fury, and his rebuke with flames of fire," Isa. lxvi. 15. If he will judge them in fire, why not condemn them to fire.

Grant it substantial fire, then it is questioned whether it be material, corporeal, or spiritual. It is not material; that is fire nourished with fuel. Etna, and other places of the earth, burn continually without fuel; much more that infernal fire. He that makes the damned live without food, is able to maintain this fire without wood. Not spiritual: indeed Gregory calls it an incorporeal fire; but it passeth the nature of fire to be spiritual; and he that makes it spiritual only, goes about to make it no fire at all.

It is therefore a corporeal fire: but being so granted, there arise some exceptions. Object. If it be corporeal, how can it diversely torment divers reprobates? There is but one fire in hell, but it doth not cruciate all after one manner and measure: as every one hath been more wicked, he shall be more wretched. Ans. But we must know that this fire is the instrument of the Divine justice: now no instrument works only by its own virtue, and after its own measure, but is regulated by the virtue of the principal mover. The fire in a furnace is increased or qualified according to the will of the kindler; so is this disposed by the power of God; "the breath of the Lord, like a stream of brimstone, doth kindle it," Isa. xxx. 33. We know that one and the same fire doth otherwise burn iron, than wood or straw. According to the nature of the incensed matter is the rage of the fire. All men on earth are under one sun, yet do not all equally feel the burning of that sun: one is hotter than another, a Moor than a Briton. So in that one fire there is not one manner of burning. That which is here wrought by the diversity of bodies is there by the diversity of sines. (Greg. Dial. lib. 4.) There may be a several degree of pain to every one, and yet one common fire to all.

Object. But if it be corporeal fire, it must be maintained with fuel, or else it will go out: but there is no fuel in hell. Ans. Yes, the bodies and souls of the damned shall be instead of fuel. And because those materials are everlasting, therefore it follows that hell-fire can never go out, for it is against the nature of fire to cease so long as it hath combustible matter to feed it. Object. But if it be corporeal, then is it of the same species with our fire; now man knows the nature of this, but not of that. Ans. Fire is found in two places and manners; either in the proper matter, as it is in its own orb or sphere; or in another matter, whether earthly, as appears in a coal, or airy, as appears in the flame. But howsoever or wheresoever it is found, it is always in respect of the nature in specie, fire. In the bodies which are the matter of the fire there may be difference; as burning wood and burning iron differ. Still is it fire, though diverse from ours in certain properties which are unknown to us; and may we never know them.

Gregory, upon Job xx. 26, "A fire not blown shall consume him," objects, that if it be corporeal fire, it needs fomentation. Indeed our elementary fire must be kindled and nourished, because it is brought artificially and by violence upon the combustible subject. But hell-fire needs not, because it either subsists in the proper matter, or in an alien subject, not by violence, but by nature a principio intrinseco. The wrath of God makes it unquenchable, so that it neither needs feeding nor wants raging. But our fire is corruptible, that eternal; how then of the same nature? So are the reprobate bodies now corruptible, then made incorruptible; therefore the same nature of fire shall become everlasting, to torment the same bodies become everlasting. Object. But the nature of our fire is to shine and give light, which hell-fire doth not: "The light of the wicked shall be put out, and the spark of his fire shall not shine," Job xviii. 5. Ans. The fire doth not shine in the proper manner of existing: it shines not in its own orb, saith the philosopher. Besides, gross and foggy smokes, and thick darkness, may keep fire from giving lustre; yet still it remains fire. The conclusion then is for corporeal fire in hell; 1. Because there is not only the punishment of loss, which answers to the aversion from the Creator, but also the punishment of sense, which answers the conversion to the creature. Now what plague so terrible to the sense as fire? 2. "Wherewithal a man sinneth, by the same shall he be punished," Wisd. xi. 16: but by sensible things they sinned, therefore by sensible things punished.

But, lastly, if it be corporeal fire, then it torments only the body; for how can a corporeal fire work upon a spiritual substance? Bernard thus: There is a double punishment, the worm, and fire. The one gnaws the conscience, the other burns the carcass. The one outwardly burning, the other internally corroding. And Meditat. cap. 4: In carne cruciabuntur per ignem, in spiritu per conscientiae vermem. So Isidor. de Sum. Bon. lib. 1. cap. 31: The pain of the damned is double: Mentem urit tristitia, corpus flamma. So Bed. in Marc. 9. lib. 3: Ignis erit poena extrinsecus sevens, vermis dolor interior accusans. These seem to restrain that fire from working on the soul. But it is plain the fire is "prepared for the devil and his angels," Matt. xxv. 41. But the devil hath no body, yet he burns in fire. The rich man cried out, and shall cry for ever, "I am tormented in this flame," Luke xvi. 24; yet was his body in the grave, and his soul only in hell: neither is that altogether a parable; for then Christ would only have propounded the example, and concealed the name. He that denieth spirits to be tormented in fire, let him take heed lest his own spirit feel it. But how this corporeal fire shall torment devils and damned spirits, who knows? I do not doubt but that rich man was in the burning of pains, and the poor man in the refreshing of joys; but how to apprehend that flame of hell, that bosom of Abraham, that tongue of the rich and finger of the poor, that thirst of torment, that drop of comfort, shall hardly be found of them that seek humbly, never of them that seek curiously. It is more safe to doubt of that is secret, than to dispute of that is uncertain. It is miserable by seeking what God hath secreted, to lose what God hath granted. Seeing then this is substantial and corporeal fire, wherein differs it from our elementary fire? In five respects.

1. In regard of heat. The fire in a landscape which is painted fire, or their purgatory fire, which is fabled fire, is a better representation of elemental fire, than elemental is of eternal fire. That furnace whose heat was septupled, and the flames licked up them for whom it was not meant, was raging, but not a glowing spark to hell.

2. In regard of light. Our fire comforts in shining, that is oppressed with horrible darkness. It retains the property of burning, it hath lost the property of shining. (Basil.) Therefore it is called Hades sine sole domus: Jude calls it the black darkness. The darkness of Egypt was strange and fearful, so thick that it was palpable; yet a mere holiday to hell. The poets described it by Cimmeric darkness; an Italian territory betwixt Baiae and Cumæ, where the Cimmeric inhabit; so environed with hills, and overshadowed with supercilious and hanging promontories, that the sun never comes at it.

3. Elemental fire burns the body only, eternal also the soul. The passion of the body is but the body of passion; the soul of pain is the pain of the soul: yet if a consumable body be not able to endure burning flames for a day, how will an unwastable soul endure them for ever!

4. Elemental fire, as it burns, so it consumes; hell-fire rageth more and wasteth less. The reprobate shall have the punishment to be burned; not the happiness to be wasted. Pœna gehennales puniunt, non finiunt corpora. (Prosper.) Iron will hold burning long, yet consumeth; in hell there is neither cessation of fire burning nor of matter burned. It is a fire of consummation, not of consumption. If it were terminable, it might be tolerable; but being endless, it must be easeless.

5. Our elemental fire may be quenched, that never goes out. This is maintained with wood, and put out with water; that, as it hath nothing to maintain it, so nothing to extinguish it. There shall be weeping of eyes, no mitigation of flames: if there be any tears, they shall rather be like oil to feed and nourish it, than like water to put it out.

These are three principal expressions of hell; but is there nothing of pain besides these? It seems they suffer nothing else but fire, because Christ dooms them only unto fire, Matt. xxv. 41. Indeed fire is the principal, but there are other accessories and concomitances. (Basil.) In the last purgation of the world there shall be a separation made in the elements. Whatsoever is pure, refined, sublimed, and perfect, shall remain above for the solace of the blessed. Whatsoever is feculent, sordid, and ignoble, shall be cast down to the punishment of the damned. That as every creature becomes matter of the saints' joy; so every creature be made matter of the reprobates' sorrow. "God shall make the creature his weapon for the revenge of his enemies; and the world shall fight with him against the unwise," Wisd. v. 17, 20. As they have departed from that one God, one good, by sin in many material things, which are various and vain; so that one justice shall by many material things confound them. But, Ad calorem nivium transibit ab aquis nivium, Job xxiv. 19; as the vulgar Latin reads. Now the variety and vicissitude of passions yields some refreshing; as when a man passeth from extreme cold to extreme heat, there is a mediate intermission: but there is no refreshing admitted in hell. Answ. The damned may pass from extremity of cold to extremity of heat, without any refreshing, because the passing shall not be by any transmutation of the body from the former natural disposition, nor by reduction to any equality of temper, but sensible pains working upon the sensible parts; secundum esse spirituale, non secundum esse materiale, in organum. (Aquin.) The sum is this; the torments of hell are comprised under fire, because that is most violent, vehement, and sharply afflictive. Water doth only kill; fire doth vex also, and torment; yea, which is worse, this fire doth never kill. It shall be so extreme, that the damned shall prize a cup of cold water above ten thousand worlds.

The use. As we desire to escape the fire of hell, let us avoid the fire of sin. There be certain fiery sins, which shall find fiery punishments; as Nadab both offered and suffered strange fire. There fire is properly neither burning nor shining, but only stinks and makes a smother: sin, a spiritual fire. There is fire both burning and shining; that we call elemental fire. There is fire shining and not burning, as the sun. There is fire burning and not shining, and that is the fire of hell. Thus Paul calls lust a burning; "It is better to marry than to burn," 1 Cor. vii. 9. Who then would burn in lust, that fears to burn in hell? I read of a man, that, when he was tempted to lust, would lay his hand on burning coals, concluding, If I cannot endure this for a while, how should I endure hell-fire for ever? Rage and malice are burning sins. The angry man beholds not the law, but the law beholds the angry man. Therefore is anger called a great heat. They that nourish that fire within them, are nourished for a worse fire without them. Blasphemy is a burning sin. The tongue is a fire that fireth the whole course of nature, and is fired of hell, Jam. iii. 6. Let them whose mouths flame with oaths fear these flaming torments. The rich man's tongue was tormented in fire, because it was used to spit fire against heaven. Drunkenness is a burning sin: too much wine is the oil of hell's own lamp. They inflame the reckoning, till they inflame their brains, inflame their bloods, inflame their bodies; buy as much sickness as will make up a burning fever, and as much sin as will serve to inflame their own hell. In the German proverb, fire is of all the genders. Hic ignis, that is fire; hec ignis, that is a harlot; hoc ignis, that is wine. The first chapter of John, verse 5, Mundus positus est in maligno, that is, in igne malo: all the world is on fire with sin, to make work for the fire of hell. "A fire is kindled in mine anger, and shall burn unto the lowest hell," Deut. xxxii. 22. "When his wrath is kindled but a little. Blessed are all they that trust in him," Psal. ii. 12. "The coals thereof are coals of fire, which hath a most vehement flame," Cant. viii. 6. Wild-fire may be tamed, streams of fire have been quenched; only that fire can never be extinguished in the subject it hath possessed. One thing only now can put it out, the water and blood that came out of Christ's own side. Only that water can quench the fire of lust in us, and that blood quench the fire of hell against us.

"Down to hell." Let me a little further enlarge this discourse of hell; wherein if you do not find a due method, know that the nature of the place denies it. Who can speak methodically and orderly of that, that knows no method, no order? If any expect an absolute description, I excuse myself. But as Pythagoras guessed at the stature and pitch of Hercules by the length of his foot, and we say in the proverb, Ex ungue leonem; so by shadow and resemblance we may a little conceive what it is in sufferance. This is a cup of the deadliest wine that ever was tasted; those deep graves in the Psalm, from whence there is no rising again. The gates of that infernal prison being kept from egress, as the gates of Paradise were warded from entrance; not by cherubims with a flaming sword, but by the angels of Satan, with all the instruments of death, and the seal of God's eternal decree set upon them. This is that outer darkness, to comprehend and wrap up the damned. Outer, because in extremity, without the limits of any mercy to be extended; where no light of sun, moon, or star, much less the face of God, shall ever shine; where the eyes shall distil like fountains, and the teeth clatter like armed men, and the mind muse on nothing but sad desperation. Many and fearful agonies have wrung and wrestled the spirit of man, since the spirit of life was first breathed into him; yet if all were put together, to answer the measure of hell-torments amongst them, the hand of Tophet hath an unmeasurable portion left behind to distribute to her children, an endless patrimony of howling and gnashing of teeth. Balance them together, and the least pain of hell is greater than the greatest of this world. (Aquino.) Horrible torments have been inflicted on moral delinquents; they are all but ticklings to those torturings. There is a threefold woe, Rev. viii. 13; woe for the bitterness, woe for the multitude, woe for the everlastingness of those pains. It had been better for that man never to have been born, Matt. xxvi. 24. A woe, ten thousand times more than can be imagined by any heart as deep as the sea. These are those waters of gall, vials of unmerciful plagues, pestilence and blood, and huge hailstones, fire and brimstone. Not such as fell upon Sodom, the witnesses whereof, for many succeeding ages, were heaps of ashes and clouds of pitch; but fire and brimstone from a bottomless mind, which burneth in the lake of death, and shall never be quenched.

Of all these torments there are two dire and dismal effects, "Weeping and gnashing of teeth," Matt. viii. 12. Fletus de ardore, stridor dentium de frigore. (Raban.) Fletus ob ignem qui non extinguitur, stridor ob vermem qui non moritur. Fletus ex dolore, stridor ex furore. (Bern.) They are cast into darkness, for the inordinateness of their concupiscible; weep, for the inordinateness of their irascible; gnash their teeth, for the inordinateness of their irrational part. (Gorrah.) This manifesteth two extremities in hell; incomparable cold, and intolerable heat. (Greg. in Matt. viii.)

"Weeping." Here are some questions moved, whether this be a corporeal weeping. Some affirm it; because the sorrow which is in pain shall answer the pleasure that was in sin. As she hath lived deliciously, give her so much torment and sorrow, Rev. xviii. 7. But reprobates in their sinning had both an inward pleasure and an outward delighting; therefore they must have in punishment both an inward grief and an outward weeping. Answe. But then damnation being eternal, this effusion would also be eternal; and so the tears would make an inundation larger than the ocean, able in time to put out the fire of hell. Therefore we must distinguish; in corporeal weeping there are two things, a resolution of tears, and a commotion or perturbation of the head and eyes. This weeping is not the resolution of tears, because then the motion of the first mover ceasing, there is no generation, nor corruption, nor alteration of the body. But there must be a generation of that moisture which distils itself into tears, if that weeping were corporeal. Yet there shall remain a weeping, which ariseth from the perturbation of the soul, and anguish of the body. There may be here a howling like dragons, whenas yet no tears fall. It is observable that the expense of tears outwardly mitigates the sorrow within, and easeth the heart, the burden of indigestible grief emptying and venting itself at the eyes; but hell by eternal tears could never qualify eternal pains.

It is further objected, weeping is the effect of sorrowing, and sorrow of repenting; therefore it seems, if the damned weep in hell, that they repent in hell. "And they repenting, and groaning for anguish of spirit," Wisd. v. 3. So Aristot., They shall be grieved for that wherein they were delighted. Answe. To repent may be understood two ways; either in respect of sin, or of the punishment annexed to sin. To repent of sin for itself, is to hate it for no other cause but because it is sin and displeasing to God: thus they do not sorrow. To repent of it for the punishment bound to it, is a sorrow by accident; that ariseth not from their evil doing, but from their evil suffering. The will of the damned is never bettered by their torment. To wish they had not sinned, without further relation, were a good will; but a good will and they are everlasting strangers. The will of the devil is still invertible; nor doth he grieve for his pride, but for the punishment of his pride. Again, there shall be a greater perverseness of the damned in hell than is of sinners on earth; but divers sinners here, through blindness of mind and hardness of heart, do not repent of their sins; though the most savage beasts, through grief and pain, are restrained from their sensual pleasures. On earth there may be repenting without weeping, in hell there shall be weeping without repenting.

But is there no recovery of original good in hell? If the damned are sorry for their sins, this argues repentance. If they were readmitted to life they would spend their life in obedience; this argues a will to goodness. That rich man had some care of his living brethren; this argues charity. No, there is no repentance, no rectified will, no charity; haply some remnants of natural light, none of supernatural grace.

There is no repentance. They are scorched with heat, and blaspheme God's name; but repent not to give him glory, Rev. xvi. 9. They curse him for their pains and sores, but repent not of their deeds, ver. 11. True repentance ariseth from faith and hope; but there can be no faith of releasement where is certain knowledge of eternal punishment : knowledge and sense exclude faith. There can be no hope of termination, where be chains of desperation. There shall be a desperate sorrow for pain, no penitent sorrow for sin. None are now saved but by the blood of the Lamb; but when the world is ended, that fountain is dried up. The worm of conscience shall gnaw them with this remorse, bringing to their minds the cause of their present calamities; how often they have been invited to heaven, how easily they might have escaped hell. They shall weep for the loss of the one and gain of the other, not for the cause of either, which were repentance.

There is no will to good, or at least no good will. As the will of the blessed is wholly set upon good, so the will of the damned is wholly set upon evil. Neither can the saints in heaven will that which is evil, nor the reprobates in hell will that which is good. This we perceive in the devils, who have been so long damned, yet even to this day their unchangeable will is totally bent to wickedness. But evil is altogether against the will; (Dionys.) if therefore they will any thing, it is good either in existence, or in appearance. Ans. There is a double will in them : natural, which is not of themselves, but of the Founder of nature : deliberative, that is of themselves; which being wholly averted from the supreme end of goodness, cannot but be evil. So that if naturally they could will good, yet the form of that will being so corrupted, it must necessarily be bad. Indeed evil as it is properly evil, moves not the will; but as it is an estimative good. Such is their malice, that they never will any thing but evil, though they esteem it good. So that if they were now repealed again to this world, they would neither repent their sins, nor amend their lives, nor glorify God, nor seek Jesus. Let us now labour to rectify our wills, and order them to the seeking of good; lest we there lose both the good itself, and the very will unto it. For in inferno erit stimulus poenitudinis, nulla tamen correctio voluntatis : ita culpabitur iniquitas sua, ut nullatenus possit diligi vel desiderari justitia. (August.) They shall curse their own wickedness, yet neither love nor desire righteousness.

There is no charity; not so much as any love to God, the infinite good; much less to man. None to God. But goodness and beauty is every one's love; therefore much more God, the cause and fountain of it. Nay, they shall hate God; "Do not I hate them that hate thee?" Ps. cxxxix. 21. Indeed if God could be seen of them in his goodness, mercy, bounty, they could not hate him; but they no further apprehend him but by the sense of their own torments, the effects of his justice, and so hate him. They suffer, and they blaspheme; there is in them a furious malice against him; being cursed of him, they recuse him, Rev. xvi. 9, 11, 21. They curse him for making them, curse him for condemning them, curse him because, being adjudged to death, they can never find death. They curse his punishments, because they are so insufferable; curse his mercies, because they may never taste them; curse the blood of Christ shed on the cross, because it hath satisfied for thousands, and done their unbelieving souls no good; curse the angels and saints in heaven, because they see them in joy and themselves in torment. Cursings shall be their sins, blasphemies their prayers, tears their notes, lamentation all their harmony. These shall be their evening songs, their morning songs, their mourning songs for ever.

No charity to man; for they rather wish all damned with themselves, than any to be freed from their own prison. As in the blessed there is perfect charity, so in the damned perfect envy. Now nothing is more repugnant to charity than malice and hatred. But it is objected, that inordinate affections are not taken away from the damned; therefore they would not have them condemned in hell, whom they inordinately affected upon earth. Ans. The love that is grounded upon virtue, is constant and durable; such charity we shall bear with us to heaven, and be made perfect in it. But the affection grounded upon lust and sinful passion, a disease that runs in the blood, doth quickly vanish; like fire in wet straw, that only makes a smother, and goes out in stench. Therefore the adulterer, though he so dotes on his mistress, that he is content to venture his soul for her embraces; yet having lost that soul, he doth as heartily wish her in the same bed of torment; that as they have been delighted together, so they might be afflicted together. Object. But as by the multitude of participants the joys of heaven are enlarged, so are the sorrows of hell increased: how then will they desire more company, when thereby they enhance their own penalty? Ans. Yet such is their unchangeable malice, that it contents them not to suffer their own singular torments; but had rather endure more grievous misery, to have a more numerous society. And for the rich man's prayer for his brethren, Luke xvi., it proceeded not from a charitable soul, but from fear and horror of more torments to be multiplied on himself; he desired not their salvation, but his own less damnation. He knew that, being the elder brother, his vicious example might draw on their greater disobedience; and as their sins increased, so he felt his own tortures enlarged. Therefore no grace in hell, but everlasting sin; no devotion, but extreme damnation.

The wicked in hell still remain sinners. So Christ saith, "All that came before me are thieves and robbers," John x. 8: are; in propriety of speech he should have said, they were thieves: no, they are still, they remain so. "Depart from me, all ye workers of iniquity," Luke xiii. 27. Workers, in reference both to the act past, and present habit. (Chrysost.) For he doth not say, ye that have wrought, but workers. They that die sinners, remain sinners even dead; although they cannot sin, yet they retain the desire of sinning; and he that is a liar in purpose, ceaseth not to be a liar in practice. Death separates the soul from the flesh, it separates not sin from the soul.

Seeing the effect of those horrors is weeping which shall never be comforted, let us prevent them by weeping where we may be comforted. The time of living is the time of repenting. If a man dies without repentance, repentance is dead to him for ever. If we compare Matt. v. 4 with Luke vi. 25, we shall find, that the decree of God hath disposed weepers to laughing, and laughers to weeping.

"Gnashing of teeth." This is the effect of an inexpressible sorrow. A just and fit punishment, that they who once gnashed their teeth at others in contempt, should gnash their teeth at themselves in torment. The psalmist complains, They gnashed their teeth at me, Ps. xxxv. 16; and the Jews gnashed on Stephen with their teeth, Acts vii. 54. Therefore they shall gnaw their tongues for pain, Rev. xvi. 10: their tongues gnawed their neighbours, now they shall gnaw their own tongues. They showed their teeth in derision, they shall gnash their teeth in damnation. No part of the damned shall be free from anguish; the memory afflicted with pleasures past, the apprehension with terrors present, the understanding with torments to come and continue, the eye with darkness, the ear with hideous screechings, the smell with killing stench, the taste with gall of bitterness, the very teeth with such an anguish, that the extremest tooth-ache here is but a pleasure to it. Such is the extremity, universality, and eternity of those pains: if they be so universal in all parts, oh that they were not so extreme! if so extreme, oh that not so universal! if both so universal and extreme, oh that not so everlasting; each torment easeless, endless, remediless! There be ignis la-chryma, and frigidi anhelitus. Therefore called Avernus; absque vera temperatura, where the freezing cold shall not mitigate the scorching heat, nor the scorching heat qualify the freezing cold. Avernus is a lake in Italy, that Cæsar purged; evaporating such a mortal steam, that it killed the birds which flew over it. Therefore called Avernus, quasi avibus adversus. Profundus sine fundo; full of incomparable heat, intolerable stench, innumerable griefs.

Vermis cum tenebris, flagellum, frigus, et ignis;
Dæmonis aspectus, scelerum confusio, luctus. (Hugo.)

From all these must needs arise the gnashing of teeth. Two things would seem to mitigate the terror of hell, patience and hope: this gnashing of teeth excludes them both.

For patience. Many grievous extremities have the saints of God digested on earth by patience, that universal antidote against future evils, and qualification of present severities. It hath blunted the edge of tyranny, and made the sufferers smile in the midst of those pangs, the very sight whereof hath astonished the beholders. Whatsoever the damned suffer, let them have but patience: nay, there shall be no patience in hell; this gnashing of teeth is the effect of a most impatient fury. Men commonly say, in necessitated sufferings, What remedy but patience? Patience therefore is a confessed remedy, but all remedy is denied to the reprobates there; even that poorest succour which the anguished heart can imagine, patience. Oh the universal privation in that dismal place! where every thing is present that may vex them, every thing absent that may comfort them; where they must suffer everlastingly, and cannot suffer patiently.

For hope, there is none. The proper object of hope is, saith the school, a difficult good. A good of difficulty, not of impossibility: where is no possibility can be no hope. There is no hope of good, no despair of evil. (Hugo.) Men say in extreme passions, If it were not for hope, the heart would burst: there is no hope, yet the heart must hold; the misery is, that it cannot burst, but lies (like a tormented malefactor) upon the wheel, ever dying, yet without all hope to die. There is no hope in hell, no hope with us on earth for them that are in hell. We cannot hope for the devils, they are condemned to hell and past hope; nor can we hope for the dead, because there is no purgatory. Indeed concerning the dead, there may be hope of their happy condition, but none of their permutation. This is a double torment; neither deliverance, nor hope of deliverance. Sad and heavy despair absolves their infelicity; comfort they neither feel, nor have hope to feel.

Seeing only hope is confined to this life, let us make much of it, that it may enrich us. "Hope maketh not ashamed," Rom. v. 5, because it is never disappointed; for if it could be illuded, it would be ashamed. The hope of life immortal, is the life of our life mortal. (August.) The poets feign, that all the gods and goddesses, that is, virtues and graces, did once dwell upon the earth; but finding all things so corrupt, and men so bad company, they all went up to heaven with justice; terras Astræa reliquit: all but only hope, and she stayed behind still. But now if we hope well, we must do well. He tempts God, does not hope in God, that hoping doth nothing for himself. (August.) Though there be hope of the barren fig-tree, yet still the dresser labours in the manuring of it, Luke xiii. 8. It is in vain for a man to hope his children shall do well when he teacheth them ill. The means must be used, where hope is nourished. Hope is only for the present: the saints in heaven have no hope, for they are in full possession of joy; the damned in hell have no hope, for they are in full possession of torment. Only the living have hope, and in the living God is their hope; which himself bless and answer in Jesus Christ.

The last question is, What is the place of hell? My text says, it is downward. So doth the Scripture frequently. "Let them be cast into deep pits, that they rise not up again," Psal. cxi. 10. Bring them down into the pit of destruction. They are in the depths of hell, Prov. ix. 18. "The way of life is above to the wise, that he may depart from hell beneath," Prov. xv. 24. So the terms declare it, and the word describes it; Sheol, which is taken for a pit, grave, or hell; all downwards. Mercer. in Gen. xxxvii., says that Sheol signifies all places under the earth. It must be below, because it is every where opposed to heaven, which is highest of all. Abyssus, which is a great deep, a vast gulf under the earth, a bottomless pit: the devils entreated Christ not to send them to that place, into the abyss, Luke viii. 31. The apostles that preached to the Jews, used the word Gehenna; "It is set on fire of Gehenna, hell," Jam. iii. 6. They that preached to the Gentiles, used Hades: which they took to be a place under the earth ordained for punishment. The word here used is Tartarus. Hesiod affirms it to be so far under the earth, as heaven is above it. So the Rabbins held; Sheol is absolutely below, the very centre: "Hell from beneath is moved," Isa. xiv. 9. "It shall burn to the lowest hell," Deut. xxxii. 22. Nic. de Lyr. affirms it Circa centrum terræ. Tertul. in Apologet., Hell is a subterranean treasure of hidden fire. The poets so took it;

Facilis descensus Averni;
Sed revocare gradum, superasque evadere ad auras,
Hoc opus, hic labor est.

All things perishing, sink downwards.

But against this it is objected, that Dives in hell saw Abraham and Lazarus; which he could not do, if hell was so deep and remote a bottom wherein he lay overwhelmed. And albeit hell is below and downward in respect of heaven, yet haply it is not so in regard of earth. "Woe to the inhabitants of the earth! for the devil is come down unto you," Rev. xii. 12: yet he was then cast no lower than the superficies of the earth. There be divers arguments on both sides. First, as they that live know not the state of the dead, so the dead know not the state of the living on earth, much less of the saints in heaven. (Greg.) So August., As the rich man had a care of his brethren living, yet he knew not what they did; so have men a care of their dead friends, yet know not how they speed. Against this is opposed, that if they in hell had not the sight of heaven, their own sufferings would less afflict them; for their most grievous torment shall arise from the vision of what joys they have lost. When they shall see it, "they shall be troubled with terrible fear," Wisd. v. 2, and be amazed at the saints' salvation. So Bern., The faithful shall have a sight of hell, and the unfaithful a sight of heaven; that the one may be rejoiced, by seeing what horrors they have escaped; and the other may be afflicted, by seeing what comforts they have forfeited. "The wicked shall see it, and be grieved; he shall gnash with his teeth, and melt away," Psal. cxii. 10. Bar the sight of their eyes, and you ease the grief of their hearts. That weeping and gnashing of teeth proceeds from sight; "when ye shall see Abraham, &c. in the kingdom of God," Luke xiii. 28. It is the exile from the presence of the Lamb, from the society of saints and angels, from the felicity and joys they see, that most bitterly scourgeth them. The not knowing of earthly affairs never troubles them; but heaven they must in part see and know, else they cannot be tormented with the loss. But on the other side it is said, that the sight of heaven is never afforded to saints in the flesh but as an inestimable favour. It was Paul's greatest grace, and that which had like to have endangered him unto pride, to be rapt up into the third heaven, and behold the life which the blessed live with God. But what extraordinary grace was this, if it be also granted to the reprobates? Ans. St. Paul saw it by tasting it; and hoped again to see it by possessing it. Such a sight is not permitted to the children of perdition; they only see it to the grief of their hearts, that they cannot enjoy it.

The school gives this conclusive sum, that the damned shall behold the glory of heaven before the day of judgment, but not after; neither shall they know it as it is in itself, but only by a kind of luscious and glimmering sight perceive it to be an invaluable glory. And this shall vex them, both that they can no better see it, and shall never taste it. Afterwards they shall be deprived of that vision, and shut up in everlasting night; neither shall the withdrawing of this vision diminish their tortures, because the remembrance of that once seen shall for ever stick by them. Hence they shall continually grieve, finding themselves unworthy, even to see those pleasures, which the godly are vouchsafed to inherit and inhabit for ever. But how could that rich man, or can the damned spirits, be said to see the glory of heaven, whenas they want those luminary organs of the body, the disposition of sight, besides the thick interposed darkness? Ans. This is no reason, for even spirits see, and have the eyes of intelligence and apprehension, able to distinguish between light and darkness. They apprehend this glory either universally or particularly. A universal apprehension they have, whereby they perceive the saints to be in great glory; in particular, what this glory is they know not. At a great feast, the beggar at the door sees in part the joy and cheer of the guests; but not so well as the guests themselves that are banqueting. And as this must needs grieve the beggar, to see it and not to taste it; so shall the damned vex, for envy both at others' plenty and their own want.

Thus if we grant that the damned shall see the glory of heaven, then it will probably follow that hell is in the air, only separated with an unpassable gulf. If they do not see it, then is it likely to be in the bowels of the earth. Howsoever, it is below, downwards, in the inferior parts of God's workmanship. But precisely to say where, whether in the air, water, on the face of the earth, or in the centre of the world's centre, we may safely be ignorant of it, we cannot but dangerously dispute it. Only, as just spirits dissolved from their bodies, presently ascend to the empyreal heaven; so the souls of the lost tarry below, confined to the inferior elements, there to be punished. If any ask further about the local place of hell, I answer with Socrates, I never was there myself, nor spoke with any that came from thence. When one demanded what the gods did and loved, Euclides answered, Whatsoever they do or love, I am sure they hate all curious examiners. Many doubt where it is; none can describe what it is; but all agree that it is.

Seeing hell is a descent, and a bottom downwards, let us keep ourselves as far as we can from it while we live, that it may never devour us when we die. Sin doth naturally sink downward, and separate from God who is above. A sinner ever descendeth till he come to the lowest that may be: his affections are downwards, and sure his hope and inheritance is not above. But as we bury dead flesh under the ground, so it is not unlikely of dead souls. And as the heaviest bodies draw to the centre of the earth, so do the saddest and heaviest spirits, which the mercy of God hath forsaken. We read of a woman bowed down with a spirit of infirmity eighteen years, and could in nowise lift up herself, Luke xiii. 11. A woeful estate, noted by the evangelist: Ægriitudinis manifestas, behold; ægotantis fragilitas, a woman; miseriæ acerbitas, it was a spirit of infirmity; morbi diuturnitas, eighteen years; corporis curvitas, bowed together; elevandi impossibilitas, could not lift up herself. Such is the estate of wicked sinners, that if their bodies were like their souls, they would grovel like beasts. And indeed Bestialior quam ipsa bestia est homo, ratione vicens, et non ratione vivens. They cast themselves down, and none but Jesus Christ can help them up. "A certain man went down from Jerusalem to Jericho, and fell among thieves," Luke x. 30. From Jerusalem down to Jericho: hell is down a hill. Jericho signifies the moon. (Hieron.) He that walks after the moon of this inconstant world, must needs fall among thieves. Sin brings a man easily down to Jericho:

*Sed revocare gradum, superasque evadere ad auras,
Hic labor, hoc opus est.*

The rule of philosophy is, that light things ascend upwards; yet is nothing lighter than vain thoughts, and they sink downwards: sin is hell's high-way. "If ye be risen with Christ, seek those things which are above," Col. iii. 1.

First, understand the things, then undertake the search. Though we cannot thoroughly see them, yet let us thoroughly seek them. This is to be wise; but in audacious curiosity, to measure every foot in hell, and dispose every cabinet and chamber in heaven; this is to be wise beyond sobriety. "We walk by faith, not by sight," 2 Cor. v. 7. "Let us lift up our hearts with our hands unto God in the heavens," Lam. iii. 41. The Lord, in all our holy services, requires the heart; in his temple, at his table: "My son, give me thine heart," Prov. xxiii. 26. "Unto thee, O Lord, do I lift up my heart," Psal. xxv. 1. There was "a woman clothed with the sun, and the moon under her feet, and upon her head a crown of twelve stars," Rev. xii. The head of the church is wrapped in the stars, and the world is under her feet. She forgets the land wherein she was born, and the home-stall wherein she was bred, and seeks Jerusalem above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God. "If riches increase, set not your heart upon them," Psal. lxii. 10: they are heavy things, and will sink you downwards. If our love be to things downward, our souls cannot rise to God upward. We never minister the blessed sacrament, but we tell you of a "Lift up your hearts:" you then answer us, "We lift them up;" but it is to be feared that many hearts are so heavy that they cannot be lifted up. The philosopher being asked which was the heaviest part of the earth, answered, That which bears an ignorant person. How little a piece of flesh so ever a wicked heart be, a talent of lead is light unto it.

The merry wanton that dissolutely lives, being asked how he escapes sickness, lives so long and so jovial, answers, I have a light heart. But when this man comes to feel the weight of his sins, let him tell me then whether he be light-hearted. Nabal could be drunk in his health; but when he is sick, his heart lies and dies in him like a stone; nothing in the world can lift it up. The heart cannot raise itself, it is the Lord that draws it up, John vi. 44. "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me," John xii. 32. The apothecary hath no drugs so cordial, the sycophant no jest so jovial, the vintner no wine so sprightly, the musician no stroke so lusty, that it can lift up a sinful heart. Down, down it sinks, without the animation of God's Holy Spirit.

But if Christ be our delight, our hearts are with him. His body doth not descend down to us, we must ascend up to it. (August.) Indeed, if in so large a quantity it be presently real in the sacrament, as it was on the cross, in full dimensions, what need any man lift up his heart to that he holds in his hand? No, he is above, contained in the heavens, till the time of restitution: and if he be our joy, thither we also aspire. The finger points to the grief, the eye follows the pleasure, and the heart follows the treasure. God hath given us both a face to look, and a faith to climb upwards. Let us send up our hearts before, that our souls may follow after. (August.) How preposterous and mismatched is an erected countenance and a grovelling spirit!

Things nearest heaven take least care for earth: the fowls of the air neither plough, nor sow, nor carry into the barn. But men most love what they must leave, and think seldom or never of the place where they should be for ever. Some are too precise for public prayers, without a sermon; as if God were only to serve them, and they not bound to serve God. Are there not many that will bestow more upon a licence to eat flesh in Lent, than upon their souls all the year? and are their thoughts upward? The poorest piece of garment they wear, their hats, their cuffs, their shoes, their shoe-ties, cost them more than their souls: and are not their thoughts downwards? They will rather lose their inheritance in heaven, than let Christ have his inheritance on earth: and what, are their desires upwards? Down, downwards they sink, like the trash that God blesseth not; their minds buried in their coffers, as dead bodies are nailed up in their coffins. And when they have dejected themselves as low as they can, then must this bottomless bottom receive them, and overwhelm them with everlasting pressures. A material millstone hung about their necks, cannot sooner or surer carry them into the depth of the sea. For us, let our hearts be upward, that our souls may never sink downward. St. Bernard mentions four degrees of ascending: The first ascent is of knowledge, the second of faith, the third of love, the last of glory. Let us know God; this is the first step to blessedness: knowing, let us believe on him; that is the next: believing, let us love him; that is the third: and loving, we shall live with him; that is the height and perfection of eternal joy.

"And delivered them into chains of darkness, to be reserved unto judgment." Here are two things; the measure of their present confusion, and the time of their future damnation: as a malefactor is first cast into a dungeon, at the assizes brought forth to judgment, and then led to execution. Now they are overwhelmed with the desertion of favour, then shall be confounded with imposition of plenary torture. To be chained in a black and confused vault, seems an insufferable plague to the delinquent; yet had he rather abide there still, than come forth to the light, when he is sure to be punished with death. Therefore they cry to the mountains and rocks, to fall on them, and cover them, Rev. vi. 16: the reprobates rather desire the loads of rocks and pressure of mountains for concealment, than be summoned unto judgment. Their punishment is just; they broke God's bonds before, Psal. ii. 3, now they shall have chains to hold them. Lucifer's I will be like the Most High, hath made him lower than the lowest. The highest seat in heaven could not content him, the lowest bed in hell must contain him. Not pleased with the glorious light above, he is cast into the hideous darkness below.

He is delivered into the chains of darkness; where we must suppose God sitting as a just judge on his throne, and having summoned the revolting angels before him, doth here sentence them to present sufferings. Not but they shall also pass under another trial, at that day of universal retribution, when Christ shall sit on his tribunal, judging quick and dead. But as a justice finding a transgressor, makes his mittimus, and sends him to the gaol, there to lie in chains till the sessions; so we have here three answerable circumstances: The mittimus, He delivered them. The gaol, Into chains of darkness. The sessions, To be reserved unto judgment.

He "delivered them:" but into whose hands? Indeed he delivers guilty mortals into the hands of guilty angels. He "delivered him to the tormentors," Matt. xviii. 34; that he might be their slave in suffering, whose subject he had been in sinning. This night they shall fetch away thy soul, Luke xii. 20: they to whom I have given commission to do it; devils. They shall require it, that did defile it. This was part of St. Paul's excommunication, "to deliver unto Satan," 1 Cor. v. 5, who is the hangman. So he writes of Hymenæus and Alexander, "Whom I have delivered unto Satan, that they may learn not to blaspheme," 1 Tim. i. 20: to Satan, that executioner of condemned souls. But to whom doth the Lord deliver Satan himself? Some answer, that themselves are the instruments to torture themselves. After a sort, every transgressor is his own tormentor; and wickedness is a vexation to itself. Ambition racks the aspiring; envy eats the marrow of his bones that envieth; the covetousness which would be most rich, keeps the affected with it most poor; ebriety begets the head-ache; lust afflicts the body that nourisheth it; and we say of the prodigal, he is no man's foe but his own, therefore we grant that he is his own foe. It is a foolish powder, that thinks to blow up the house, and to escape itself from burning. If it were but so, that he delivered him over to himself, such is the power of God's justice, that without the least trouble to himself, he can make an offender his own afflicter. How many impious wretches, after obstinate presumptions against God, have wrought desperate executions upon themselves!

How should this teach us to hate sin! We think ourselves certainly our own friends. No, by sin we become our own enemies. That which makes us at enmity with God, will make us at feud with ourselves. Though the Lord's hand should not touch us, nor were any malicious devil to rack us, nor any other creature to scourge us, we should thus punish ourselves. If God speak the word, the hand shall rebel and strike the head, the nails tear the skin, the teeth gnaw the flesh, the feet precipitate the shoulders, the stomach famish the members. These that are made to take one another's part, and to assist the whole in a peaceable communion, shall become mutinous like the Midianites, and sheathe their swords in their fellow's bowels. It is a plague woeful enough, when God shall deliver a man over to himself. "Let me not fall into the hand of man," was David's desire, 2 Sam. xxiv. 14. No, as I am man, not into mine own hand. There is not less mercy in Nero's enemies, than in desperate Nero's own heart to himself. But every man will do good to himself? Yes, so long as he is his own man; but when he becomes God's instrument, let him fear himself. When the prophet had told Hazeal the tyrannous massacres he should do to Israel, he replies, Am I a dog, that I should do this? 2 Kings viii. 13. No, he was not yet a dog; but afterwards God forsook him, then he became a dog, and did it. Libera me a malo homine; that is, as Augustine glosseth it, a neipso. "Deliver me from the evil man, O Lord;" and because I am an evil man, and there is no worse, deliver me from myself. Such a delivery should have been to us all, but for another deliverance that came between: a liberavit, not a tradidit. He hath "delivered us out of the hands of our enemies," Luke i. 74. Tradidit demones, liberavit homines. He delivered his own Son to death, that he might deliver us from death.

"Into chains of darkness." Into darkness, there is their misery. Into chains, there is their slavery. Darkness signifies the wrath of God, and is opposed to that favour of his, which is called the light of his countenance, Psal. iv. 6. There is true light where the Father of lights shineth; and his absence causeth darkness. That city hath no need of the sun or moon to shine in it; for the glory of God doth lighten it, and the Lamb is the light of it, Rev. xxi. 23; such a glorious light, that the very sun is obscurity to it. Created lights, which now so comfort us, and which some worship for deities, shall then resign their honours. "The sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light," Matt. xxiv. 29. Shall not then the sun shine at that day? Yes, it is not darkened by loss of its own light, but by the comparison of a greater light; as a torch is of small benefit, when the sun appeareth. Otherwise, "the light of the moon shall be as the light of the sun, and the light of the sun shall be sevenfold, as the light of seven days," Isa. xxx. 26. But then these lights shall be overshadowed; as the moon that rejoiceth travellers in the night, gives place when the sun riseth; and men do not mind a lord when the king appeareth. Therefore it is called a "light which no man" (in his mortality and sin) "can approach unto," 1 Tim. vi. 16. In heaven there is all light and no darkness, in hell all darkness and no light. As the joy of the saints and angels in heaven, so the wretchedness of the lost in hell, is so great that it cannot be enlarged.

This is an unspeakable terror, to be cooped up in everlasting night. If Job calls the grave a tetrical place because of this darkness, where the organ of seeing is not yet exercised; "A land of darkness and the shadow of death, where the light is as darkness," Job x. 22; how intolerable is the darkness of hell! But how agreeth this with other scriptures, that allow the devils to wander about the world, and to be conversant in the air? 1 Kings xxii. 22; Job i. 7; Luke viii. 31; Eph. ii. 2. "Shortly," Rom. xvi. 20, therefore not yet trodden down. How then are they shut up under darkness? Ans. It was the devil's censure to be cast into hell; yet so that before the day of judgment, the wisdom of God hath disposed a permissive egress into the world, and that for some of them; that as a great number of them are in hell, there tormenting the damned souls, so the rest wander in the world to tempt sinners. This is manifest, Rev. ix. 3, where the bottomless pit being opened, there came out of the smoke innumerable locusts upon the earth, and the purpose of their coming is expressed, that they might hurt those that had not the seal of God in their foreheads. So, Rev. xx. 2, Satan is bound for a thousand years, at the expiration whereof it follows that he be loosed. Until the judgment day God doth lengthen his chains.

Let us love the light, that darkness may never swallow us. All sins are therefore called the works of darkness; not only because the evil-doer hates the light, but also because Satan, the prince of darkness, is the founder, and shall be the confounder of them. "They that sleep sleep in the night; and they that be drunken are drunken in the night," 1 Thess. v. 7. This was wont to be the custom, sin durst not show her ugly face by day. But now men are grown so impudent, that they make the works of darkness become the works of light, committing them in the sunshine. So Absalom had "a tent spread upon the top of the house, and went in unto his father's concubines in the sight of all Israel," 2 Sam. xvi. 22. Zimri brought a harlot to his tent in the sight of all Israel, even when they were weeping before the tabernacle, Numb. xxv. 6. Vice was once like the owl, only a night-bird; now, proud of her borrowed feathers, she dares outface virtue at noon-day. These be the strange Epiphanies of the time: as one observed on Matt. ii. 2, "We have seen his star, and are come to worship him," There were two blessed Epiphanies; a manifestation of Christ's star to them, and a manifestation of their piety to him. Instead of these, pride struts in pomp, homicide stands on terms of justification, drunkenness reels up and down the streets. "The works of the flesh are manifest," Gal. v. 19. These be monstrous Epiphanies; yet still the works of darkness, and precipitate into the place of darkness, to the enlargement of Satan's kingdom. The pope scatters his emissaries abroad, to augment idolaters, and augment his supremacy; the Turk amplifies his territories; and other princes expatiate their dominions: all these kingdoms are extended, but the kingdom of darkness surmounteth them all. For, though never was more light in men's brains, never more universal darkness in their hearts.

The stream of wickedness is so violent, that many (who had some inceptions of goodness) are even content to run with it, rather than swim against it, or especially reprove it. Usury and sacrilege scorn to be reprehended, and he is taxed of indiscretion that meddles with them: whereupon some let all alone, resolving to sit down and hold their peace. A friar that had been for his boldness decourted, afterward admitted to preach to the king of Spain, told this fable: The lion was faulted by the lioness, that his breath stank. Being mad angry with this imputation, he traverseth the forest, to be more certainly informed. The first subject beast he met withal was an ass, and breathing upon him, he demanded the relish of his breath: the ass plainly told him that it was very unsavoury. Thou art too bitter, quoth the lion, and tore him in pieces. Next he met with the hound, and put the same question to him; who answered, It is very sweet. Thou art a flatterer, quoth the lion, and tore him in pieces. Last he lighted on the fox, and examining him concerning his breath, the subtle villain replied, Indeed I cannot tell whether it be sweet or sour, for I have caught such a cold that I cannot smell. If we should commend the times for devout and holy, you might justly condemn us for fawning flatterers. If we should say they are stark naught, full of impiety and darkness, then we are held too cynical and censorious. What then? shall we answer, We have caught a cold, and cannot smell or tell? No, we are bound to love our own souls better than you can love your own sins. In a word, let us receive the light of grace, that the light of glory may receive us.

"Into chains." These cannot be understood literally, for material chains; but metaphorically: and so they are two; the powerfulness of Divine justice, and the guiltiness of their own conscience. The devils are bound, like madmen or bandogs, in the chains of eternal damnation. Wheresoever they are permitted to wander, their own guilty consciences are those chains which bind them over unto judgment. Such are the horrors of that place, that the damned are bound to insufferable torments; they must endure what they cannot endure, without being able to remove a foot. These chains shall so hamper them, that not one part of body, or faculty of soul, shall have the power of activity to gratify their owner withal. The mind is bound to contemplate nothing but endless infelicity, the memory bound to recount nothing but fearful sins, the fantasy bound to present nothing but horrid visions, the eyes bound to see nothing but offensive objects, the ears bound to hear nothing but howlings and roarings, the nostrils to smell nothing but the stench of brimstone, the hands to catch hold of nothing but flames, and the feet to walk no further than these chains will give them leave. "Delivered them into chains of darkness:" the collections and inferences here observable are divers.

1. Conclusion, that there is certainly a God, for how else should Satan be bound? He is that strong man, and therefore there must be a stronger than he to bind him, Luke xi. 21, 22. If there be a destroying power, without question there is a preserving power, superior to it, and correcting it; for if the devils were not curbed, they would confound us all in a moment. It is not more natural for fire to burn, nor for heaviness to sink downward, than for Satan to destroy. "He is a king over all the children of pride." Upon earth none can match him, Job xli. 33, 34; but there is one in heaven that chains him. If there be a roaring lion that would devour us, certainly there is a blessed power that preserves us.

Let this teach us to get as close as we can to God, that Satan may not reach us. The chickens be safe under the wings of their mother, and we under the providence of our Father. So long as we hold the tenor of obedience, we are the Lord's subjects; and if we serve him, he will preserve us. But when a man is fallen to the state of an outlaw or rebel, the law dispenseth with them that kill him, because the prince hath excluded him from the benefit of his protection. All the fear of Satan ariseth from the want of the due fear of God. The more a man fears God, the less he fears every thing else. "Fear God, honour the king:" he that fears God, doth but honour the king, he need not fear him. It would affright a weak Christian, to consider the presence and number, malice and power, of wicked spirits. But when, with the prophet's servant, he sees those good angels on his side, as present, as diligent, more able to help than the other to hurt, he takes heart again. He knows that God (most good) bounds the temptation of the one, and directs the protection of the other. Though there be many legions of devils, and every one stronger than many legions of men, and more malicious than strong; yet Christ's little flock lives and prospers. "I am the Lord, I change not; therefore ye sons of Jacob are not consumed," Mal. iii. 6. The devil would do it, and doth attempt it; but God's unchangeable mercy prevents it. That we here meet, pray, worship, is against the devil's will; only our gracious God maintains it. That every moment we perish not in the jaws of that lion, let our hearts acknowledge, and our tongues praise the Lord our Maker.

2. Conclusion, that Satan can do nothing but by God's permission: he is bound in a tether, and cannot go one inch beyond his chain. Christ tells Peter, that Satan had desired to winnow him, Luke xxii. 31: desired; he must beg an ill turn before he can do it. Whatsoever he doth is by a limited power, and by dispensation from God. He could not seduce a prophet, nor take one poor sheep from Job, nor enter a hog, without licence. It is an ethnical error of our times, in strange accidents to give the honour of God to sorcerers and conjurers. If a tempest arise beyond common experience, presently, as if the God of heaven were fallen fast asleep, and minded nothing the judgment is given, There is some conjuring there must needs be a pestilent convention and stipulation betwixt men and devils; as if God were not able to raise as great a storm as the devil. Look upon the witches of Egypt: their cunning failed in the most contemptible creatures; and they are forced to cry, "This is the finger of God." Though the circuit of Satan be very large, even to compassing of the whole earth; yet he hath his days assigned to stand before the Lord for the renewing of his commission, and there is a chain tied to his power that he cannot move beyond his allowance. Yet hath he a little liberty to tempt; for the probation of some, for the reprobation of others, in all for the glory of God. He is the basest of all creatures, a slave, a scullion: now how is that person shamed, that is given up to a base slave to be corrected!

So little he fears to tempt us, that he ventured upon Christ himself, Matt. iv. As we read there was a great battle in heaven, Rev. xii. 7, so here was a monomachy or single combat on earth. It was a dainty sight to behold little David grappling with great Goliath, and great Goliath grovelling under little David; a lamb matched with the wolf, and the wolf overmatched by the lamb. First, the devil tempts him to diffidence. Art thou hungry? turn these stones into bread, ver. 3: not into quails, pheasants dainties; but into bread, without which man could not live. Then to presumption, "If thou be the Son of God, cast thyself down," ver. 6. That he might get credit to his ministry, he would have him show the people some strange device. Lastly, to apostasy ver. 8; which was the sin that turned himself out of heaven: wherein first he propounds a promise, All these will I give thee; and indents a bargain, if falling down thou wilt worship me. He is like an old bitten cur, that being fleshed to the game, will not be staved off; hell's bandog, fed with the livers of God's cast-aways. He tries all courses, like Balaam or some superstitious gamester on the losing hand shifts places, still in hope to win. He took him up into a mountain: Cyprian says, he went on foot with him; for Christ would not use him pro vehiculo, quem novit precipitalem. This opinion is not against the text, nor the text against it. For καταλαβάν doth not imply portage; no more than Matt. xvii. 1 Christ took them: it were gross to think that he carried them on his back. But that he carried him is the most received opinion, because it is said that he set him on the pinnacle. This was no disparagement to Christ; no more than to suffer apprehension, ligation crucifixion of his enemies.

He reserves the old malice to all Christ's members. Why should any serve him? there is no goodness in him. He is the greatest sinner of all; for quicquid efficit tale, ipsum magis est tale. Wicked Pharisees may make their proselytes twofold more the children of hell than themselves; but the malice of the devil cannot be matched. He never gives man any thing, but, as Michal was given to David to insnare him, 1 Sam. xviii. 21. St. Peter calls him an adversary at law, 1 Pet. v. 8: he wrangles with God against us. Augustine brings him in thus pleading: They were thine by creation, they are mine by prevarication: they were thine by redemption, they are mine by defection; they left thy sacraments, and accepted my allurements. He pleads many things against us, but we have one argument to confute him, our faith; "Whom resist stedfast in the faith," 1 Pet. v. 9: and all our defects are supplied by an Advocate in heaven, Jesus Christ the righteous. I know that God casteth his sometimes into the sieve for trial, but the Lord Jesus strengthens them.

Satan is called a lion, and that fitly; for he hath all the properties of a lion: as bold as a lion, as strong as a lion, as furious as a lion, as terrible as the roaring of a lion. Yea, worse: the lion wants subtlety and suspicion; herein the devil is beyond the lion. The lion will spare the prostrate, the devil spares none. The lion is full and forbears, the devil is full and devours. He seeks all: let not the simple say, He will take no notice of me; nor the subtle, He cannot overreach me; nor the noble say, He will not presume to meddle with me; nor the rich, He dares not contest with me; for he seeks to devour all. He is our common adversary, therefore let us cease all quarrels amongst ourselves, and fight with him.

Seeing the devil is bound with chains, and cannot range further than his bonds allow him, let us not come within his reach. The bandog is tied up that he may not hurt the passenger: but how if the passenger will come within his compass? Give no place to the devil, Eph. iv. 27; for the devil hath no place unless we give it him. "Resist the devil, and he will flee from you," Jam. iv. 7. He cannot come in, except we open him the door. Now who would open the door to let in his enemy? Yet many do: by swearing, they open the door to let him in at their mouth; by lustful looks, they open the door to let him in at the eye. Pride admits him into our wardrobes, covetousness into our purses, adultery into our beds, schism into our studies, drunkenness into our stomachs, idolatry into our devotions, hypocrisy into our hearts. As if his chain were not long enough, wicked men put themselves in his way. Think when thou art about to commit a voluntary sin, Now I am running within the devil's chain. I durst not so venture within the chain of a lion, bear, or other savage beast, which can but tear my flesh. Hath God tied him up from me, and shall I run unto him? shall I trust his mercy, that is nothing else but malicious cruelty? O but the hand of God holds his chain. But say the hand of God let go his chain, for thy presumption? what remains then but ruin? As we hate the devil, let us hate those works that lengthen his chain? Do we pray to be delivered from the gates of hell, and yet frequent the gates of hell? We read of a beast that being too unwieldy to hunt for his prey, stands still and enticeth the rest unto him with his glorious spots and colours, and so devoureth them. But Satan is quick and nimble enough to pursue men, they need not wilfully run into their own ruin. "Oh that I had wings like a dove! for then would I fly away and be at rest," Psal. lv. 6. Let us fly from him as fast as we can, and so far as he may never overtake us; which is done by turning to God with faithful repentance and devout obedience: so shall his chains be shortened, our souls delivered, our Creator glorified, and ourselves everlastingly saved, through the merits of Jesus Christ. Amen.

3. Observe, that Satan is punished everlastingly, without all hope of recovery; bound with chains, and, as St. Jude calls them, everlasting chains. There was no deliverance ever ordained for the devils; for Christ took not the nature of angels, Heb. ii. 16; he took not their nature, therefore was not their Saviour. Now there are divers reasons why Christ should seek lost Adam, rather than the lost angels.

(1.) The angel sinned without instigation. As there was none to tempt him, so there is none to save him; "When he speaketh a lie, he speaketh of his own," John viii. 44. He took sin of himself, no other suggested it to him. He fell alone, nothing cast him down: he must rise alone, there is nothing to help him up. The wind blows out the torch, we light it again; but if the wind blow out itself, and cease moving, who shall raise it? If Satan hurt man, Christ heals him; but if Satan hurt himself, let him heal himself.

(2.) The devil was the party seducing, (man only seduced,) and still endeavours what he can to destroy all; therefore none stands up to preserve him. Because his hand is against all, therefore all hands are against him. Being thrown out from the presence of God, in spite he wounded his image, that he might do him all the mischief he could: therefore he perisheth without redemption.

(3.) The angels were more excellent and glorious natures by creation, and nearer to God than men; more subtle, more powerful; their dwelling in the highest heaven. Whereas one half of man was but refined dust, and his mansion the earth, more remote from the glorious presence of God. The higher the angel was in glory, the deeper in misery. (August.) But man, the more frail he was by constitution, the more easy he is to redemption. Therefore God took pity on man, who was but dust; and pitied not the devils, because they had once been angels.

(4.) The whole human nature fell with Adam; "In Adam all die," 1 Cor. xv. 22. All mankind was lost, and unless the human nature had been repaired, man had been wholly frustrated of his end. But all the angels did not fall with Lucifer, but only some; and so none were partakers of his punishment, but such as had been partakers of his sin. Innumerable multitudes of angels stood in heaven, as well as a great company sunk to hell. "Thousand thousands ministered unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him," Dan. vii. 10. Some of that nature stood by conservation, without redemption; for redemption presupposeth loss: but if our nature had not been redeemed, not one man could have been saved.

(5.) Man was distinguished into sexes, male and female; because they were to generate their like: as, "Adam begat a son in his own likeness," Gen. v. 3. But angels have no sexes; as Christ confuted the Sadducees: In heaven "they neither marry, nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels of God," Matt. xxii. 30. They cannot beget a generation of spirits. Every devil sinned in himself, and is punished in himself only. But Adam having sinned, and being to multiply his kind, must needs convey his sin to his seed. Therefore was the Lord Jesus made of his seed, that the guiltiness which Adam to all his seed had propagated, by one of his seed might be expiated.

(6.) Satan immediately upon his fall was cast into hell. "He abode not in the truth," John viii. 44. But so was not Adam; for howsoever he was cast out of Paradise, yet not out of the world, but had space and grace given him to repent. And albeit that menace, "In the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die," Gen. ii. 17; yet God spared him nine hundred years. Indeed presently he became mortal, and fell into a consumption; as the original speech is, "dying thou shalt die." And for the second death, the Seed of the woman excused him; he died not that death at all. Indeed Augustine mentions the Tatian heresy, which held that Adam was damned. But, "She preserved the first formed father of the world that was created alone, and brought him out of his fall," Wisd. x. 1. Which is agreeable to the scripture, Luke iii. 38, which saith that Adam was the son of God; therefore he was not the child of death and hell. God relieved him with a promised Messiah, a news that never came to the apostate angels.

(7.) If the whole human nature had perished, to what purpose had been this world? The world was made for man, not for angels: either heaven or hell was ordained for them, this middle walk for man. Now why should either the sun shine or the earth fructify for man, if he were not redeemed? Spirits have no use of these things, man hath the benefit; and man should not have the benefit of any creature, but for God's favour in Christ. For he did forfeit his patent, and none but a Saviour could renew it. But for the elect's sake, the rain should not fall, nor the earth stand. Therefore if man had perished, all this world had been in vain created. Man is the sum and abridgement of all creatures, and contains in him more generality than the angels. Stones have being, but not life; plants have being and life, but not sense; beasts have being, life, sense, but not understanding; angels have being, life, sense, and understanding. Now man participates with all these; a being with stones, a life with plants, a sense with beasts, an understanding with angels. He is the compendious index of God's great book in folio. "Preach the gospel to every creature," Mark xvi. 15: no creature hath part in the gospel; but only man is called every creature, as having in him the chief perfections of every creature. Some hold, that man bears the image and superscription of God more fully than the angels; and hath something more, an organical body united to his spirit, which the angels have not. He is the common end why this world was made; therefore, "Unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given," Isa. ix. 6: to us, not to angels. To us is born a Saviour, Luke ii. 11: to us, not to the lost angels. There is enmity put between the Seed of the woman and the seed of the serpent, Gen. iii. 15; therefore the Seed which saves man shall be at enmity with the devil.

(8.) Lastly, the principal reason of all is the free mercy and gracious decree of God; who made both men and angels good in creation, and finding both men and angels lost in transgression, vouchsafed to men, not to angels, a redemption. What did we deserve at his hands, that he should pity us dust and ashes, passing by those celestial spirits? "What is man, that thou art mindful of him?" Psal. viii. 4. For the wonder had been less to say, What is the angel, that thou art mindful of him? That we should find him a Saviour, whom they find a just Revenger; that we should be loosed from the chains of our sins, and they delivered into chains of plagues; that the same Christ should with his own blood free us, that shall with his word sentence them; that the same Almighty hand should lift us up to heaven, that casteth them down to hell! Oh the riches of that mercy, which even to taste will keep a man from ever being poor! Of all mixed creatures men are the best, for they have reason; of all men Christians are the best, for they have religion; of all Christians holy believers are the best, for they have salvation. In the sorest troubles, men have some hope, Christians have good hope, believers have sure hope. Let us bless God for making us men, but most of all for making us Christian men; for in that he gives us his Son, he gives us himself. He gave the water to fishes, the earth to beasts, the air to fowls, the heaven to angels; but he gave himself to man. Having no greater to swear by, he swore by himself, Heb. vi. 13; so, having no greater to give, he gave himself. "Whom have I in heaven but thee?" saith that royal prophet, Psal. lxxiii. 25. The Romists in 89 cried out, whether maliciously or blasphemously, God shows himself a Lutheran, and the God of Lutherans: but indeed he shows himself a Christian, and the God of Christians. By how much we find more mercy than all creatures, let us be more thankful than all creatures. It is an harmonious sweetness, to have God's bounty and our gratitude meeting in that middle way, the hand of Jesus Christ; without whom neither could we receive his goodness, nor would he accept our goodness.

4. Observe that the punishments of hell are eternal: these chains can never be broken; were they of cords, of wreathed trees, of iron, they might be burst asunder, but the chains of vengeance never. "Bind him hand and foot, and cast him into outer darkness," Matt. xxii. 13. Now if a man were bound hand and foot, and thrown into a well five thousand fathom deep, what hope could he have of coming forth? But how doth this stand with God's justice, to punish temporal offences with eternal scourges? It was the rule of his own law, that pena non debet excedere culpam, Deut. xxv. 3. Answ. There is a double quantity considered in punishment; the one according to the intention of pain, the other according to the duration of time. In respect of the former, the quantity of punishment must be answerable to the quantity of sin. How much sin, so much sorrow, Rev. xviii. 7; the more pestilent iniquity, the more torturing fire. For the other, we must not think that the continuance of punishment is limited with the continuance of the fact. Among men, adultery is but a short pleasure, yet often pursued with a long penance. But the duration of torment respects the disposition of the delinquent. Pene singulorum inaequales intensio, poene omnium aequales duratio. (Aquinas.) The pains of all are equal in continuance, unequal in grievance.

But a good judge will make his penalties medicines and corrections, rather than destructions. Answ. So doth the Lord in all corrigible offenders; but those he cannot mend by chastising, his justice must satisfy itself by confounding. But God delights not in the death of a sinner, Ezek. xviii. 32. "What profit is there in my blood, when I go down to the pit?" Psal. xxx. 9. The Lord hath no use of their eternal damnation. Answ. Yes, as mercy hath had her place and day, so must justice have hers. Whom mercy saves, she saves for ever; though their works were short, and nothing unto God, Isa. xli. 29, yet the very effects of his own grace. Therefore, whom justice condemns, she condemns for ever; not respecting so much the persons that have sinned, as the Person against whom they have sinned. (Greg.) Almighty God, as he is good, is not delighted with their torments; but as he is just, he is not satisfied without their torments. Factus est malo dignus aeterno, qui hoc in se peremit bonum, quod esse posset aeternum. (August.) He is justly plagued with an evil that is eternal, who hath corrupted in himself a good that might have been eternal.

But if God's justice must be satisfied upon those sinners for whom Christ satisfied not, why is not this rather in reducing them to nothing? Seeing the unthankful deserve to be deprived of all benefits; now one especial benefit is being; therefore let them not be. Answ. It is true, the creature that disobeys the Creator, deserves to lose his being; but because it was given him to this purpose, that he should serve him, therefore it shall never be taken away. For God will have his homage and service out of that being; whether of grace and salvation to the praise of his mercy, or of punishment and confusion to the praise of his justice.

But one would think, that the mercy of God should terminate their sorrows. "Thou hast mercy upon all," and "thou lovest all the things that are," Wisd. xi. 23, 24. "God hath concluded them all in unbelief, that he might have mercy upon all," Rom. xi. 32. He hath also concluded the devils under sin. Neither will his goodness suffer that which he made for blessedness, to perish for ever in torment. These be the plausible conceits that over-merciful Origin hath brought for the recovery of lost spirits. And whereas Christ's doom is, "Depart, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devils," he would have these words rather spoken by way of threatening than by way of truth. But the Scripture delivers it plainly and fully: The devil shall be tormented in the lake of fire day and night, for ever, Rev. xx. 10. Besides, his opinion, as it straineth, so it restraineth mercy. It extends it to the future deliverance of the damned, so it extenuates it in regard of the blessed. For if the lost be ever to be taken out of hell, then will it follow that the saints also are one day to be shut out of heaven. And so what the bad should gain, the good should lose; yea, the very mercy of God cannot get more glory by the one, than it shall lose by the other.

But though the devils be everlastingly chained, is there no mercy for reprobate men? shall they never get loose? "My spirit shall not always strive with man," Gen. vi. 3: therefore his indignation shall cease. Doth he not often threaten, and not do, as to Nineveh? Ans. God doth sometimes menace and not strike, because our repentance steps between: but when everlasting burning hath wasted all the moisture of repenting, will he do so then? Here indeed we may speed as well as Nineveh: We shall stand if our sins fall; but we shall fall if our sins stand. (August.) But at that day the date of repentance will be out. But such is the charity of the saints in this life, that they pray for their enemies: now this charity shall be more perfect in heaven, therefore they shall intercede for them in hell; and God hath promised that their prayers shall be heard. Ans. Here they pray for them that they may be converted; for if they knew that such were (in God's decree) reprobates, they would pray for them no more than they do for devils. Their present suit is, that they may be recovered out of the snare of the devil, Tit. ii. 26. Now they may be recovered, not hereafter; there may be present conversion, no future permutation. For that objected out of Psal. lxxvii. 7, "Will the Lord cast off for ever? will he be favourable no more?" there is meant only the temporary affliction of the church. Still as the joys of heaven, so the pains of hell, are eternal. Death is to men, as the fall was to angels: as lost angels after their apostasy, so lost men after their death, can never be recovered. Hell is made deep, Isa. xxx. 33; so deep, that there is no hope of crawling out. Ex inferno nulla redemptio. Therefore it is called infernus, ab inferendo, of casting in; for the wicked are so cast in, that they can never get forth. From earthly gaols and dungeons there may be some trick of escape; but hell is so deep, that nor earth nor heaven can help out one poor soul. That rich man, Luke xvi., solicited for his brethren: why did he not beg his own deliverance, who was able to have taught them by his own experience? O he saw a vast interposed gulf: he must let that alone for ever.

One deep calleth another: the depth of hell calls for our answerable humiliation. He that will not be humbled for his sins here, must be tumbled into that depth hereafter. "Out of the depths have I cried unto thee, O Lord," Psal. cxxx. God will hear the voice that comes out of the depths. The deeper we have been in the law, the higher we are in the gospel; the deeper in hell, the higher in heaven. The deeper a bucket dives into the well, the more water it brings up; the lower a man is humbled with sorrow for sin, the higher he shall be exalted with the grace of salvation. Never came prayer, sigh, or groan from the depth of repentance, but it was heard in the height of mercies. Of David's prophetic imprecation against his enemies, ("Let them go down quick into hell," Psal. lv. 15,) we may make a good appreciation for ourselves. Let us go down quick into hell by meditation, that we be never sent quick thither by condemnation. Let us descend every day while we live, that we never come there when we are dead.

5. Observe, that God punisheth sin wheresoever he finds it, though it be in the very angels. For all the men and angels in the world are not so dear to him as his own honour: and what dishonours him but sin? For this cause, 1. He made a law against it; "The law was added because of transgression," Gal. iii. 19. He could not have written the law with his own finger, if he had not so abhorred sin. 2. Gracious are the promises he hath made to obedience; grievous the plagues he hath to threaten disobedience. 3. His own hands have smitten it; the whole world is a bleeding witness thereof: and man may say, Quorum pars magna fui, The whole creature groaneth in expectance of his pacification. He hath drowned the world in a flood of waters, and he shall burn it in a flood of fire, because of sin. The sentence shall stand unchangeable, so long as heaven and earth endureth, "Tribulation and anguish upon every soul of man that doeth evil," Rom. ii. 9; be he Jew or Gentile, learned or simple, poor or peer; yea, man or angel. 4. So doth he hate sin, that he spared not his own Son, when he appeared in the similitude of sinful flesh. If the justice of God could ever have swallowed sin, or dismissed it with impunity, he would have forborne it in his own bowels. Yea, such a Son as never knew the least thought of disobedience; the Son of his love, the Son of his joy, the Son of his light, the Son of his delight; a Son fully as good and as great as his Father. Yea, because he stood in the place and bore the person of sinful man, he plagued him as the most deadly enemy that ever he had. That he might slay sin, he slew his Son.

How should this make us all hate sin! He doth hate, not love God, that loves what God hates. Let us be content to meet our afflictions, as Peter and Andrew met their crosses, as their dearest friends; embracing them in our arms, and saluting them with the kisses of peace. Or as the martyrs welcomed their deaths, running to the stakes as if they had run for a garland. But for sins, were they as dear to us as the sight of our eyes, the children of our bodies, the spouses of our bosoms, because they are traitors to our Father and Maker, let us deal with them as Abraham did with Hagar and Ishmael, put them out of our house for ever.

6. Observe, that great offenders meet with great punishments; and according to the condition of their place, is the nature and proportion of their fault. The more glorious the angels' excellency, the more damnable their apostasy. If the light become darkness, how great is that darkness! Matt. vi. 23. The more notable the person, the more notorious the corruption. The freshest summer's day doth soonest taint the loathsome carcass; and festered lilies smell far worse than weeds. If virtue turn into vice, the shame is treble. For many Jews to deny Christ, was not so much as for one Peter; the adulteries of many Israelites less infamous than one David's. If all the cities of the world had done filthily, it were short of this wonder. The virgin daughter of Zion is become a harlot. If Judas become a traitor, how great is his treason! If Ahithophel prove a villain, how mischievous is his villany! If Absalom rebel, how unnatural is his rebellion! The least mote that flies in the sun, or between our eyes and the light, seems a greater substance than it is. Deep are the blows made by a mighty axe. Sin in a magistrate is not only sin, but subornation.

There is no dispensation for sin, no protection from judgment. Not the rich man's opulency, not Belshazzar's monarchy, not Adam's perfection, not the angels' glory, could countenance sin, nor ward punishment. No place, no robes, no riches, no excellency, can give it privilege. Clothe an ape in tissue, and the beauty of the robe adds but more scorn to the beast. The richer colours or bolder countenance is set on wickedness, the more ugly it appears. Therefore as they that govern well in high places, shall shine with a higher degree of glory in heaven, because they, being intrusted with the treasures of God, enrich his church; so they that are in good offices evil men, for the mischief of both their actions and examples, shall be cast deeper into hell. Potentius potenter punientur. "A sharp judgment shall be to them that are in high places," Wisd. vi. 5. Mercy may soon pardon the meanest, but mighty men shall be mightily tormented. "Tophet is ordained of old; yea, for the king it is prepared," Isa. xxx. 33. Kings are not exempted from judgments; Pessimus in imperio, maximus in inferno. What made the damned churl move for his brethren, but that every step they followed of his leading, he felt increasing the pile of his torments? "If ye do wickedly, ye shall be consumed, both ye and your king," 1 Sam. xii. 25. For the Lord freeth none according to place, but according to grace; not for outward condition, but of his own free favour.

Nor yet let the poor and ignoble clap their wings, as if they were the only men that God loves. Not many rich, not many wise, not many noble, are called, 1 Cor. i. 26. Not many, but some; and not many after the flesh; but many wise, rich, noble, after the Spirit. The gate of heaven is narrow, and but few enter of any condition; yet certainly the noble sooner than the rabble; more wise men are admitted than fools; for morality is the first step to Christianity. And at the last dreadful day, it is the bond-man, as well as the great man, that calls upon the rocks to cover him, Rev. vi. 15. But do any of the rulers believe on him? John vii. 48. Yes, Christ had his church even in Cæsar's family. They were the noble men and honourable women at Berea, which received the word, Acts xvii. 11; it was the people that persecuted it. There was one Lydia, a seller of purple, converted, Acts xvi. 14: God saved a purple seller; why not then a purple wearer? The poor that is murmuring against God, and seditious against the rich, is in more danger of judgment, than another that hath not more opulency than charity. Wealth doth not damn the rich, but when the getting or keeping of it doth damnify the poor. Rich Abraham is in heaven, not because he was rich, but because he was good. Poor Lazarus is there, not for his poverty, but for his piety. (August.) Howsoever, let them that must be patterns, be good patterns: the life that cannot be but exemplary, should not be but holy.

7. Lastly, infer, that if God spared not the angels, so near to his own person, (a thing which the very children of God tremble to think,) how much less will he spare dust and ashes! He put no trust in his angels; "how much less in them that dwell in houses of clay, whose foundation is in the dust!" Job iv. 18, 19. What is the manliest prowess on earth, when the loins be girded up with strength, and decked in the greatest glory, to encounter with the fortitude of God? "The lion hath roared, who will not fear?" Amos iii. 8. The Lord hath thundered from heaven in casting down angels to hell; shall not flesh and blood quake for fear? The Scripture, as well acquainted with the pride of man's nature, hangs talents of lead at the heels to keep it down. The 8th Psalm, which is a circular Psalm, ending as it began; "O Lord, our Lord, how excellent is thy name in all the earth!" that whithersoever we turn our eyes, we may see ourselves beset with his glory round about. How doth the prophet discountenance man, by his disdainful interrogation, "What is man?" Then still as the Psalms go in order, they grow in strength to deject the haughtiness of man. "Arise, Lord; let not man prevail: let the nations know themselves to be but men," Psal. ix. 19, 20. We are men, and the sons of men, not the generation of angels; to show our descent. Men in our knowledge, gross and dull-brained; not quick, free, subtle, and celestial spirits; the conscience of our own infirmity doth convince us. Men of the earth, not of the air, fire, stars, sun, heavens; much less of the substance of angels; but earth is the matter whereof we are framed. The disgrace is yet deeper; "I am a worm, and no man," Psal. xxii. 6. The prophet either in his own name, regarding his personal contempt; or in the name of Christ, whose figure he was; or in the representation of all mankind, as if it were a robbery and presumption to take upon him the name of man, he says, "I am a worm, and no man." Thus Abraham conferring with God, sifts himself to the coarsest bran; "I am but dust and ashes," Gen. xviii. 27. If any of the children of Abraham, that have succeeded him in the faith, or any of the children of Adam, that succeed him in the flesh, think otherwise, their own catastrophe shall confute them.

Man is an excellent creature, if we compare him with the fairest flower of the garland, the tallest cedar of the forest, the stateliest beast in the wilderness. Nay, the sun and stars are not so excellent, for they want sense, and man hath reason; not one of them was formed after the image of God, there are no sparks of Divinity in them. But if we look up to the angels, there is a large and ample difference. We have bodies, and they are full of gross corruptions; so many diseases, that who is physician good enough to number them, I say not, to cure them? There is in the soul uncleanness, in the understanding blindness, in the will perverseness, in the affections wantonness, in the whole man sinfulness. The angelical nature is subject to none of these infirmities. If thou wert a sinful angel, thou shouldst be punished; therefore if a sinful man, what hope to be spared? It was the page's note to King Philip of Macedon every morning, Remember thou art a man: for in remembering this, we remember all unworthiness.

If any soul be humbled with this meditation, (and indeed who are fit for so precious seed but the tilled ground? comfort is well bestowed on a broken heart,) let this cheer them: God that spared not offending angels, neither hath spared offending men; but he punished one man for many men, he spared not the man Christ Jesus. All believing men have answered his justice in that one man: hence my faith is bold to say, Lord, thou art just, and hast not spared me; but thou art merciful, and hast not spared him for me. Thou hast punished our sins through his sides.

"To be reserved unto judgment." This is their binding over to the assizes; the sum whereof is, That the fulness and extremity of their torments is not yet come, but there abideth a more fearful and final condemnation for them. They are now entered into divers degrees of penalty, but the plenary wrath of God is not poured on them till the last judgment. They are already damned, and they know it; "The devils believe, and tremble," Jam. ii. 19. It is so certain, that justice admits no revocation of it, nor do themselves study any evasion from it. And yet there is still a reservation of greater plagues. But they have no bodies, and therefore are not capable of receiving more by addition. Ans. Their punishment ariseth from the wrath of God, which then shall in a greater measure empty itself upon them. The hand of man, while he strikes, can make his blow heavier or lighter as himself pleaseth.

They are now suffered to tempt men, which is a pleasure to their malice, thinking themselves by this means somewhat revenged on God: as he that defaceth the picture of his enemy, when he cannot come at his person, easeth his spleen a little. So the dog gnaws the stone, that cannot reach the thrower. In a word, now they are suffered to wander abroad, then they shall be confined to their prison. The prisoner that is allowed to walk abroad, though with his keeper, is not so miserable as the dungeoned. Now they contain their hell, then their hell also shall contain them. Now they seem to rejoice at our sinning, then they shall have enough to grieve at their own suffering. Now the bottomless pit hath been opened for the egress of those locusts, then it shall be locked up for ever with the eternal seal of justice. But he is judged already; "The prince of this world is judged," John xvi. 11. Yet still he is reserved to another judgment. There is a double judgment, one of discussion, another of retribution. For the discussive judgment, these bad angels come not under it, their rebellion is so apparent. What need a jury pass upon the malefactor, that confesseth his fault? For that of retribution, they shall then receive it in the view of the whole world; that the justice of God may universally be acknowledged, when he shall render to every one according to his works. "Know ye not that we shall judge angels?" 1 Cor. vi. 3. Good men shall have the honour to judge bad angels. For this they challenged Christ, that he came to torment them before the time, Matt. viii. 29. They confess that there is a time designed for the plenitude and perfection of their torments.

He is reserved; but till the judgment come, let us watch him, for he watcheth us. There is no corporeal enemy, but a man naturally fears; the spiritual foe appears less terrible, because we are less sensible of him. We talk of travellers that have seen the world over; none ever saw so much as he. He hath seen earth, seen the sea, seen hell, seen heaven. He compasseth; as the hunter that makes as though he would raise a mound about the deer to preserve them, when indeed he lays a toil to destroy them. Great conquerors have been chronicled for victories, and extension of their kingdoms; Satan is beyond them all. Saul hath slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands; but Satan his millions. He that fights with an enemy, whom nothing but his blood can pacify, will give him no advantage. If we know that we have an adversary at the next door, that pries into all our courses, and upon the least error will sue us on an action of trespass, we will be circumspect to disable him of advantage. Satan no sooner spies our wanderings, but he presently runs with a complaint to God, bills against us in the star-chamber of heaven; where the matter would go hard with us, but for the great Lord Chancellor of peace, our Advocate Jesus Christ. As God keeps all our tears in a bottle, and registereth the very groans of our holy passion in a book; so Satan keeps a record of our sins, and solicits justice against us. Were God like man, subject to passions, or incensible by the suggestions of the common barrator, woe were us. But he will hear one son of truth before ten thousand fathers of lying. No matter what the plaintiff libelleth, when the judge acquitteth. We have forfeited our estates by treason, and the busy devil begs us; but there is one that steps in, and pleads a former grant, and that both by promise and purchase. "Lord, rescue my soul from destructions, my darling from the lions," Psal. xxxv. 17. Lord Jesus, challenge thine own; let not Satan enter upon by force or fraud, what thou hast bought with thine own blood.

Thus in general, the particulars here considerable are two (for I purpose no common-place of the day of judgment): First, the necessity of it, in that they are reserved to it. Then the severity of it, in that it is a judgment. These be inherent in the words; there be some short adherent circumstances which I shall salute as I pass; they may be within the circumference, these are in the heart and centre.

The necessity. As the creation was that beginning, which did produce things to their being; so judgment is that conclusion, which shall perduce things to their ending. There is a double operation of God: one that wrought the production of things, the institution of nature, and distinction of places; from this God rested the seventh day. Another of providential government, whereby he conserves and disposeth things; from this he resteth not. "My Father worketh hitherto, and I work," John v. 17. According to both these there is a double judgment: one at the departure out of this life, which answers to God's disposition; that they which kept not the appointed rule of their Maker, might undergo the justice of their Avenger. The other at the last day, when God to all things determines an end, as immediately of himself he gave them a beginning. But it is objected, Judgment shall not rise up a second time, Nah. i. 9: there is one judgment at the end of life, if there be another at the end of the world, then there is judgment a second time. I might answer, that the prophet speaks there of a temporal destruction, which shall make an utter end, that there shall be no need of a second blow; "Affliction shall not rise up the second time." But to take it in their reading: Every man must be considered as he in an individual person, and with relation as he is part of mankind. So there is a double judgment proportioned; one at his death respecting the singularity of his person, the other at last respecting his partnership of the world: and thus as he is a member of the universe, his judgment must be in the universal.

But judgment is the determination of doubtful things, and every one before that day shall be put past doubting of his future estate. Yet there must be a general judgment, that the equity of every one's sentence may be approved, and the justice of God glorified. Object. But it is against the proper form of judgment, to let execution go before sentence. Now every soul, as she departs, receives her reward, and is presently possessed of joy or punished with sorrow; if therefore there be a future judgment, here is execution before sentence. Ans. The first is but the effect of the latter: by that they presently feel, they know what they shall eternally feel. Besides, but one part of man only passeth that censure, the soul alone is blessed or cursed; therefore a general judgment must pass upon the reunited body; which as it hath served the soul in holiness or sin, so must accompany the soul in bliss or pain. Object. The body is but an instrument of the soul: so the philosophers; because the soul doth use it as an organ. Therefore it is for the soul alone to suffer: the body feels no pain when the soul is departed from it. Ans. Let it be but an instrument, yet was it a living instrument: as therefore the soul, being the mistress in sinning, shall be no less in suffering; yet the body must have its due share in being punished, as it had the full part in being delighted.

But, he that believeth not is already judged, John iii. 18: what need then any more judgments? Ans. He is judged by God's prescience, judged by his own conscience, not by the last sentence. There is a fivefold judgment. 1. The judgment of disposition; so all unbelievers are now judged. 2. The judgment of comparison: "The men of Nineveh shall rise in judgment with this generation, and shall condemn it," Matt. xii. 41. Evil men shall thus judge them that be worse; not according to the opinion of the accuser, but according to the weight of the crime. So Jerusalem is said to justify Sodom, Ezek. xvi., yet were the Sodomites then in hell. 3. The judgment of approbation: so the saints shall judge the angels, 1 Cor. vi. 3; judge the nations, Wisd. iii. 8; judge the tribes of Israel, Matt. xix. 28; judge the whole world, 1 Cor. vi. 2. 4. The judgment of definition; so, "The Father hath committed all judgment unto the Son," John v. 22. 5. The judgment of remuneration, which shall reward every man according to his practice.

That there shall be a judgment, is universally granted: "I speak to them that know the law," Rom. vii. 1. Though there be a particular judgment precedent, this hinders not the general subsequent. Here the wicked condemn themselves, there God shall condemn them. As is their conscience, such shall be their sentence. "If our own heart condemn us, God is greater than our heart," 1 John iii. 20. Besides the common reasons that be given, 1. That the godly here suffer for well-doing, therefore shall be crowned for well-suffering. It is fit that they whom the world hath unjustly condemned, shall by the Lord be justly acquitted. If there be Judas to censure Mary, and not a Jesus to justify Mary, truth shall be utterly lost. 2. That many notorious sinners are punished here; which is but the little image and earnest of the general sessions hereafter. God strikes some, to save themselves; and some again, lest they should destroy others. Graceless sinners, imboldening themselves to riot by the remoteness of judgment, are often cut off beforehand. "Some men's sins are open beforehand, going before to judgment," 1 Tim. v. 24. They have not the patience to tarry so long for their own damnation. As when the desperate pirate, ransacking and rifling a bottom, was told by the master, that though no law could touch him for the present, he should answer it at the day of judgment; replied, Nay, if I may stay so long ere I come to it, I will take thee and thy vessel too. A conceit wherewith too many land-thieves, oppressors, flatter themselves in their hearts, though they dare not utter it with their lips. These God judgeth beforehand, as he did Herod immediately upon his elevation: the people called him a god, but the worms soon confuted their ridiculous deity. That as when Moses had powdered the calf, he might upbraid Israel, Behold your god; so when the angel had wormed that idol, he might say, Behold your king. Beside these, and many other beaten arguments, I fasten upon two instances.

1. Many perverse sinners are forborne here: they transgress in health. They trouble others, tremble not themselves: all feel their plagues, no plagues do they feel, Psal. lxxiii. 5. They sink others' eyes into their heads with leanness, while their own eyes stand out with fatness, ver. 7. What, shall they never be called to an account for this? Shall a man covet and take, take and keep, keep and devour, devour and never bring it up again? Shall an extortioner make every hour advantageous, laugh at the groans of the oppressed, dance to their tears, and yet escape? Every sin is sometimes suspended, saving only the usurer's: others sin by day only, or by night only, and the most violent ague of wickedness hath some intermission; but he sins day and night continually: and is there no day nor night of answer? Shall a man eat the bread of sacrilege, drink the wine of sacrilege, sleep in sacrilege, clothe his family with sacrilege, leave to his children an inheritance in sacrilege, and no reckoning? What though no judge, no court, no parliament question or medicine this disease; shall not the Judge of all condemn it?

Many sins have been punished, that are now forborne; because the Lord hath appointed a day to judge the world in righteousness, Acts xvii. 31. The wickedness of the old world is as abundant in the new world; yet is not the world drowned with water, because God hath ordained for it a deluge of fire. The sins of Sodom are practised every where; yet do the committers escape fire and brimstone on earth, because they are reserved to fire and brimstone in hell. Do not many persecute the church as violently as Pharaoh, with chariots and armies, who yet escape drowning? There is a reservation of a deeper and bottomless sea for them. Divers murmur at God who are not stung with fiery serpents, as the Israelites, because they are reserved to a fiery serpent in hell. Many take bribes, like Gehazi, without a leprosy, because of that eternal leprosy which waits for them. How many a deceitful trader says and swears, (with a little inversion of Ananias' lie, I sold it for so much,) It cost me so much, yet is not stricken with death temporal, because he is reserved to death eternal! Are not many monopolists amongst us, as bad as those Philippians, Acts xvi. 16, that got a patent of the very devil? It is plain that they did monopolize the damsel, and the damsel had monopolized the devil. Satan was wont to be a spirit latent; now he durst be a spirit patent: it is time that this patent devil were cast out.

But there is a reservation of all to judgment. Mercy now stretcheth out her wings like a hen; then justice shall stretch out her wings like an eagle. God's hands seem now so fraught with mercies, that judgment hath no room to be grasped in them. But shall wicked men live, sin, die, and there an end? No, the Lord hath sworn the contrary. He swears that unbelievers shall not enter into his rest, Heb. iii. 18. An oath among men is the end of all strife; and shall not faith be given to God when he swears? The less evil they feel, the more let them fear. If mercy allows a toleration, justice hath a reservation; there will come a day of reckoning.

2. To omit the demonstration of the prognostic symptoms, forerunning this judgment: that same trumpet of war in every corner, the divulgation of the gospel, not only by the antichristian seminaries, who at once have named it and shamed it; the revelation of antichrist, whereof all Christendom is a bleeding witness; the incorrigibility of sin, that it is even dangerous to be good, and God's reproofs do not weaken, yea, scarce waken sinners; the general decay of nature assures us this judicial conclusion of the world. That which David said should be, now is: the world is waxed old like a garment; so old that most men are turned butchers, spending their times and studies to patch it. The lawyer talks of a tenure called a perpetuity; that is his patch. The usurper thinks to amplify his dominions by fire and sword; that is his patch. One says the world is naught, yet he aspires to be a great man in it; that is his patch. The covetous says, it is but transitory and short, yet he hoards as if it were everlasting; that is his patch. Another would dip it in new colours, make us believe it is an honest world; this is like painting of an old, withered, and worm-eaten face. Some, as old as this garment is, would still bestow lace and gauds upon it, as if they meant to make it a fool's coat: these are proud and haughty, who only seem to affect new clothes and new fashions; yet love the world, that is so old a garment, and quite out of fashion.

If we see a man whose eyes grow dim, his ears deaf, his face furrowed, his hairs white, his legs doubling under him; we say, his living date is almost expired. Such a dotage doth the world labour of, yet men covet as if there were a thousand generations to provide for. As a man that is dying hath many fantasies, so the declining world is troubled with many delirements and errors. In a surfeited body the corruption labours downwards, to the feet, and makes an issue there; so the putrefaction and turpitude of all times is sunk down to this latter age, and one extremity answers another. Faith is rare, though there be many Christians; and charity so cold, as if a continual February of indevotion had frozen it. There was lately a great frost, and we called it a hard time; the rivers were crusted, the teeming earth obstructed, and the conveyances of water locked up; yet it is thawed and dissolved by the imperious and friendly sun. But there is still a spiritual frost, a hardness of men's hearts, that extinguisheth the heat of zeal, the warmth of charity, the spark of faith. "Out of whose womb came the ice? and the hoary frost of heaven, who hath generated it?" Job xxxviii. 29. Out of whose womb comes this sinful ice, but the devil's? It is not a frost of heaven, but the hoary frost of hell. The fruits of piety are withered, the springs of grace dried up, and the waters of charity that should make glad our city of God, are congealed to covetousness. Who can loose these bands of Orion? Job xxxviii. 31. The sun of grace shineth, yet this frost melts not: it is reserved unto judgment, to be melted with the fire of hell.

Thus truly is the world grown an old man. 1. It stoops like an old man, as if the head were too heavy for the shoulders; sinks downward with ponderous cares. 2. It is full of raw humours like an old man; the stomach is so oppressed with crude and unwholesome vanities, that it is mortally feverish. 3. It is cold like an old man; that the blood cannot be warmed, no heat of zeal can be got into it. 4. It is testy like an old man, weary of his own desires, angry at the doing of that he commands to be done: desires, obtains, and then despises; nothing can please him. 5. Picking with the fingers like an old man; scratching all together into heaps, in defiance of any future dissipation. 6. It hath lost all the senses like an old man: his ears so deaf that he cannot hear the gospel, his eyes so blind that he cannot see the evil of his sins, his tongue so faltering that he cannot utter his prayers, his feet so lame that he halts with his best friend: even ready to close up his lights, the sun and moon be put out: the great spiritual court is breaking up, all officers discharged; and he that takes their accounts, ready to appear in the clouds, the Judge of all, Jesus Christ. We see the necessity of this general judgment; it is necessary for the justice of God, necessary for the good of man, necessary for the glory of him that is both God and Man.

The severity of it follows; it is such a judgment, as shall leave nothing unexamined, uncensured. He that was the true Saviour will be a severe Judge; the God of the universe, the universal Judge. There are many gods, many kings, many priests, innumerable men. Now he that is God shall judge all those gods; he that is King, shall judge all those kings; he that is Priest, shall judge all those priests; he that is Man, shall judge all men. The apostle Jude calls it the great day. Great, for there shall be, 1. A great congregation; never did so many meet together before, never shall after. All shall be summoned, and all must appear, though they were resolved into dust many thousand years before; and this citation shall be made by the sound of a trumpet. 2. A great examination; when not only visible and actual works shall be revealed, but even the most secret thoughts, reserved intentions, and scarce born conceptions. Nothing is so hid, that it can be kept from his sapience, or escape his sentence. 3. A great judication, giving sentence of absolution unto the faithful, and sentence of condemnation upon the wicked. And this shall be done suddenly: no subpoenas to fetch in witnesses, they are all ready; no appeal, for there is no higher court; no tedious pleading, for then all sinners are struck dumb, Matt. xxii. 12; no demur, for the Judge is perfect in the law, it was of his own making; no writ of error, for he must needs judge wisely and truly, that is wisdom and truth itself; no reprieve, for there is no hope of pardon; no psalm of mercy, that day is past, this is the time of justice. 4. A great retribution; every man shall receive his reward according to his work; to the godly there is the free reward of life and glory, to the ungodly deserved death and torment. This king hath treasure enough for all; not one of the faithful shall want mercy, not one reprobate shall escape without penalty. Great was the lamentation of the drowning Egyptians, and no less the rejoicing of Israel safe on the shore: but oh the unspeakable joy of the sheep on Christ's right hand, and the unventable sorrow of the goats on his left; when both the songs of good men and angels, and the cries of bad men and devils, shall echo to the glory of one most holy God! 5. A great resignation, when Christ shall deliver up the kingdom to God the Father, 1 Cor. xv. 24; and cease to reign, not as God, for so he is equal with the Father, but as Mediator. For then all his redeemed ones are embraced with the everlasting arms of blessedness; and for the rest he shall never make intercession, for they had never part in his redemption. Up go the saints and angels in their eternal quire, down sink the reprobates and devils to their eternal fire, where the one shall live singing, and the other live burning, as long as there is a God in heaven.

Thus Power had her day in creation, Providence hath her day in preservation, Mercy had her day in redemption, and Justice must have her day in retribution. That great Sun of righteousness appeareth in four signs of his zodiac. In his conception he came through Virgo, he was born of a virgin. In his birth, through Gemini, two natures being united in one person. In his resurrection he was found in Leo, triumphing like a victorious lion over all his enemies. When he comes to judgment, he shall appear in Libra the Balance; justly weighing out to every man a portion of reward, according to the proportion of his work.

This is his second coming; the first was of grace, this is of justice. The first was to propitiate, not to judge: God sent not his Son to condemn the world, but to save it, John iii. 17. The second shall be to judge, not to propitiate: "The Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment unto the Son," John v. 22. In the first he came a Physician to heal, in the next an Avenger to punish those that would not be healed. Then a Lamb to suffer, now a Lion to triumph and conquer. His first coming was soft, as the dew upon the mown grass; his second shall be terrible, in lightning and fire.

Seeing there must be a judgment, and we must all be judged, let us prepare our souls for a good answer. Christ bade his disciples, when they were brought before men's judgment-seats, to study no answer; but let every one study an answer before he comes to this judgment-seat. Yet alas, what answer can be made? If God contend with us, we cannot answer him one of a thousand, Job ix. 3. Christ's word must stand. "What shall I do when God riseth up? and when he visiteth, what shall I answer him?" Job xxxi. 14. If great men honour themselves more than God, what shall they do? If covetous men love money more than Christ, what shall they do? If men have robbed the Lord of his patrimony, what shall they do? Here is a What shall they do for all? Men have now their colours, reasons, pretences, and qualifications; but then what shall they answer? The wicked shall plead to Christ, We are the work of thy hands; but he will reply, You have lost my image and superscription. But, Lord, remember thy passion. Yes, but this is no time of compassion. The sentence is terrible, "Depart, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels," Matt. xxv. 41. When they shall cry, Lord, though we may not ascend with thee unto glory, yet let us abide still on the earth. Nay, go, depart. If we must go, let it not yet be far, not out of thy sight and gracious presence. Nay, depart from me. If we must go, and go from thee, yet let us have a blessing with us. Nay, depart, ye cursed. If we must go, and from thee, and with a curse, yet somewhat qualify thy anger, and let our curse be but easy. Nay, depart, ye cursed, into fire. If we must depart from thee, cursed, and into fire, yet let not that fire burn long, suffer it to be soon extinguished. Nay, but go into everlasting fire. If there be no remedy, but we must go from thee the God of glory, and with a curse, the character of infelicity, and into fire, torment in extremity, and that everlasting, without hope of recovery, yet let us have some pleasant and loving company. Nay, but the very devil and his angels. A heavy doom, which if we desire to evade, let us before the day of trial make sure of the Judge: if we can get him our friend, we shall speed well in the judgment.

VERSE 5.

And spared not the old world, but saved Noah the eighth person, a preacher of righteousness, bringing in the flood upon the world of the ungodly.

THIS is the apostle's second exemplary argument against the indemnity of sin: his first instance was, how it sped in heaven; now he expresseth the mischief it did upon earth; after the expulsion of angels, the submersion of terrene creatures. The first judgment took hold on altitude, this prevails against multitude: for sublimity, they were angels; for universality, this is a whole world. There God used his own immediate power, in the dejection of those revolting spirits; here is the same offended power working by a mediate instrument. The angels were above the elements, therefore no element was exercised in their punishment: here is element against element, water against earth; that man, who was of elements composed, and by elements preserved, might also by elements be destroyed. When man forsakes his own end, which is to glorify his Maker, the creatures also forsake their (less principal) end, which is to serve man their master. The elements rebel against man, when man rebels against God: becoming a traitor to his Creator, they owe him no more service; but instead of serving him, they serve God against him.

"Deep calleth unto deep at the noise of the waterspouts," Psal. xlii. 7: the deluge of sins called for a deluge of waters; deep iniquity, for deep calamity. The world was grown so foul, that God saw it was high time to wash it: yea, so was the uncleanness dyed in grain, that when the polluters were washed away, the pollution stuck on still; as the plague cleaves to the house, even when the infector of it is dead. And as a sordid cloth lies long a soaking before it be cleansed, so deeply had impiety sized itself into the earth, that God saw it meet to steep it long under the waters, even a hundred and fifty days, Gen. vii. 24.

God's blessing did not more multiply than Satan's curse; there came an Increase and multiply from them both. God spake it to his creatures, men: Satan to his creatures, men's sins. Mankind began but with one; yet he that saw the first man lived to see the earth peopled with a world of men. Men grew not half so fast as sins; "As they were increased, so they sinned against me," Hos. iv. 7. One man could soon multiply a thousand sins; never man had so many children; so that still the number of transgressions exceeded the number of persons. When the earth was scarce sprinkled with men, the whole world was filled with sins; so that the top of the conspiracy bore up to heaven, and carried ill news to the Maker of all. Whereat offended, he sent down a watery messenger of destruction; which as it came from heaven, so swelled up back again to heaven, with tidings that God's justice was now glorified on them, whose mercy would not be glorified by them. The corruption of the world is not less now, yea, more: it is past all purging by water, therefore hath God reserved it to fire. Only as the ark did save Noah in the day of water, so Christ will preserve us in the day of fire.

"And spared not the old world," &c. Here is a double act; of justice, of mercy: that of justice on a whole world, the other of mercy upon eight persons. It is often, God doth strike few to save many: here he strikes many and saves few. His judgments are sometimes particular, that his mercy may be general; here his judgments are general, and his mercy particular. So the whole may be distinguished into,

The vengeance, Spared not the old world.
The deliverance, Saved Noah the eighth person.
In the vengeance or execution of wrath consider,
The matter passive, Sinful world.
The instrument executive, The flood.
The subject suffering is described by,
The universality, The whole world.
The antiquity, The old world.
The impiety, The ungodly world.
For the penal instrument let us meditate,
I. Whence it proceeded.

2. How far it prevailed.

3. How long it continued.

In the deliverance are two special things ;

The number expressed, Eight persons.

Thus are our meditations fetched a great way backward, that our souls may be set somewhat further forward : let us consider the old world, that we may become the better for it in the new. History is delightful to all, and gives us means to travel former times ; that we may in some sort know what is done before us, though we cannot see what shall be done after us. In all this plentiful discourse, your good apprehension must be my best persuasion ; your capacity, my oratory. Secure we ourselves first in the ark, and then launch into this ocean of water : the Spirit of God direct us in our voyage, and bring our souls to the haven of eternal peace.

To begin with the vengeance : God was angry with the whole world because of sin ; neither was this a slight or easy wrath, but a fire long a kindling. It repenteth me that I made man : here is a displeasure indeed, when the Lord shall repent his own work. The wrath of God came upon them to the uttermost, 1 Thess. ii. 16 : εἰς ῥήλας, that is, such a one as consumes either totally or finally. The wrath of God is either in resolution or execution. In resolution, it is either suppressed in his bosom, or expressed in his threatening. In execution, it is either temporal in body, or spiritual in soul : as Peter said, Behold two swords, or rather one sword with two edges. This ἡ ὀργή, the wrath : God hath armies of afflictions, but if the wicked escape them all, this same great wrath will surprise them. Neither must we think here God subject to passions ; what be affections in us, are perfections in him. But to the purblind one candle seems many. As God is said to have an arm, because the arm is the instrument of our power ; an eye, because he discerns all things ; a foot, because he is present every where, &c. And that he will preserve unharmed is called, "the apple of his eye," Zech. ii. 8. His essential substance is called his soul : benephesha, by his life, or soul, that is, by himself, Amos vi. 8. And, wicked men his soul hateth, Psal. xi. 5. Thus he is said to be angry, and to repent. But as man repents by retracting his purpose, so God by changing his sentence. When God is said to alter his will, that he becomes offended with the man, with whom he was formerly pleased, the man is changed, not the Lord. (August.) He repents not as man does, for he cannot delire and err as man does. He is not angry, but all his actions proceed from a perfect love of virtue and hate of vice. We cannot properly grieve the Spirit, nor crucify Christ ; but our sins do all that is possible to it ; and as much as in us lies, we bring melancholy into heaven, that court of joy. If the king lose a subject he is so much the weaker ; take a drop from the ocean, it hath the less ; but what is the loss of thee or thy harlot to God ? he is never the poorer, nor are they missed. But when he repents of all the generation of men, this shows sin to be exceeding heinous. In a word, man's is a passive repentance, God's is an operative repentance. Let this teach us,

1. To glorify God, lest he repent that he made us. "I am fearfully and wonderfully made ;" (all God's works are admirable, man wonderfully wonderful ;) "marvellous are thy works ; and that my soul knoweth right well." What infers he on all this ? Therefore "I will praise thee," Psal. cxxxix. 14. If we will not praise him that made us, will he not repent that he made us ? Oh that we knew what the saints do in heaven, and how the sweetness of that doth swallow up all earthly pleasures ! They sing honour and glory to the Lord. Why ? Because he hath created all things, Rev. iv. 11. When we behold an exquisite piece of work, we presently inquire after him that made it, purposely to commend his skill : and there is no greater disgrace to an artist, than having perfected a famous work, to find it neglected, no man minding it, or so much as casting an eye upon it. All the works of God are considerable, and man is bound to this contemplation : "When I consider the heavens," &c. I say, "What is man ?" Psal. viii. 3, 4. He admires the heavens, but his admiration reflects upon man ; Quis homo ? There is no workman but would have his instruments used, and used to that purpose for which they were made. The cutler hath made thee a knife ; to cut thy own meat, not thy neighbour's throat. If thou, like the envious man, will keep thy knife in thy hand, and swallow thy meat whole ; or, like the fool, cut another's meat, and thy own fingers ; this is to abuse that instrument, and pervert the end for which it was framed. Man is set like a little world in the midst of the great, to glorify God ; this is the scope and end of his creation. If he shall apply himself to proud desires, base designs, covetous courses ; here God's meaning is misunderstood, his work misapplied. He is created for the service of God ; if he cannot be wrought and brought to that, he shall be beaten in pieces. As the potter turns and works a piece of clay ; frames it for such a vessel, it will not do ; then tries to make another fashion of it, yet it fadgeth not ; till at last, after many eluded trials, he dasheth it against the walls. God's Spirit will not always strive with this world, more than it did with that ; but if we still strive against him, let us see who in the end shall have the worst of it. Ariosto going through the streets, and hearing a potter basely sing his odes, took a cudgel and broke his pots ; answering his complaint, Thou hast marred my verses, and I have marred thy vessels. If we abuse God's creatures, he will spoil our pleasures.

2. Let us repent of our sinning, lest God repent of our making. Oh that for want of a little sorrow, we should hazard the loss of such a joy, as the delight of our Creator ! When we sin, we give him cause to grieve at our doing, but while we continue impenitent, we give him cause to grieve at our being. Shall our Maker repent that we are, and we not repent that we are so evil ? Did he not make us of nothing ? and is he not able to reduce us to nothing, to worse than nothing ? and yet do we provoke him, and put him to it by our rebellions ? Repentance is a grace of continual use, because sin is a thing of continual practice. It is better going to the house of mourning, than of mirth, saith Solomon ; more expedient for the soul's health : through his own experience, he taught us this experience. In pride we patch our clothes, in repentance we rend them in pieces. It unmakes a man that which sin made him ; whereas impenitence keeps him for ever the same. They that lived unconverted sinners on earth, remain the same in hell. "All that came before me are thieves and robbers," John x. 8 : in congruity of speech he should have said, were thieves : yes, not only were, but are so still. Saul is still a homicide ; you cannot say so of David, that he is still an adulterer, because he repented, and by that was renewed.

Our repentance is said to appease God : now appeasing presupposeth anger, and God's anger is twofold ; of a Judge, and of a Father. As he is a Judge, offended with his enemies, and this wrath is only appeased by Christ. As he is a Father, and so our repentance may please him in Christ ; not in respect of ourselves, but God's Spirit. Thus our repentance through Christ may pacify his paternal wrath. This is an excellent remedy, but not so easy. The king of Nineveh and his people put on sackcloth, and fasted; but yet, "Who can tell" whether the Lord will turn to mercy? Jonah iii. 9: we are not sure of it, it may be so, but who can tell. Though the Jews rent their hearts, yet it is but "Who knoweth" whether God will return? Joel ii. 14. Though they gnaw their tongues for pain, yet they repent not of their deeds, Rev. xvi. 10, 11: so hard a task is repentance.

Neither is repentance without amendment, any more than continual pumping without mending the leak. The bird fighting with the serpent, ever anon flew to an herb, which was her medicine, and cured her of the poison; but at last, the herb being wasted, the bird died. Repentance is that herb, which, while opportunity lasts, will help the poison of sin; but that once gone, and it will not be ever present to presumptuous sinners, what remains but perishing? The medicine is made for the wound, not the wound for the medicine. The argument of our liberty is repentance; the bonds of servitude are broken with a broken heart. Is the mourning voice of that Dove, the Holy Ghost, heard in thy bosom? Demosthenes would not plead for his client, till he cried to him; and then answered his sorrow, Now I feel thy cause. Let our penitent contrition cry unto Christ, and then he will plead for us.

God "spared not the old world." Thus in general, now more specially to the parts. World hath divers significations: it is taken, 1. For this whole visible engine, the fabric of all things contained under heaven and earth. 2. For the vicious and miserable condition of it, contracted by sin, and inherent in all things. 3. For the noblest and most excellent part of it, man; and thus sometimes only for the saints: "God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself," 2 Cor. v. 19. Commonly for the wicked; "The whole world lieth in wickedness," 1 John v. 19. So the world is opposed generally, vel numero vocatorum, vel numero electorum. The first circumstance we light upon, is the universality of this destruction, which seizeth on a whole world. Wherein the answer to three questions may satisfy us.

1. Why the creatures were punished with man's ruin, that were not guilty of man's sin. This was just with God, 1. Because they were all made for man's use, and therefore man suffers in their loss. As a foul traitor being executed, hath his house fired, his very land harrowed with brambles, and sown with stones. 2. Seeing they were made for man's use, he being taken away, they were of no further use. The general being slain, the army perisheth; the head being cut off, the members die. (Chrysost.) 3. Such was the greatness of sin, that it brought destruction, not only upon the sinner, but on all that belonged to him. 4. Because brutish men had abused the creatures by their filthy riot and excess, therefore God saw it just to punish the instrument with the principal; so that there is not a creature which is not subject to some vanity, Rom. viii. 20. He that requites his prince's favours with treason, not only suffers in his own person, but every thing about him feels the smart. His followers are suspected, his favourites disgraced, his children disinherited, his friends discomfited, his house decayed, all things droop with him; his gardens are overrun with weeds, his orchards lie uncouth, man and beast is made sensible of his judgment. Adam, that was beholden to God for his very self, apostatizing into treason, his house grew out of fashion to him, his pleasures were turned to thorns, the arms of his nobility were defaced; and he that was made a master of living bodies, breaking his allegiance with God, became despised of his own servants, some of them shaking off the yoke of our government when we shook off our Maker's. Especially the greatest and the smallest of them: the greatest, as lions, tigers, panthers, are hardly tamed; but the least, as bees and gnats, not at all. In a general destruction, when the enemy triumphs, not only men, women, and children lose their lives; but the houses are fired, the trees cut down, the walls razed, the horses slain in fight, the cattle burnt in the stalls: as Saul had his charge for Amalek, Spare neither man nor beast, 1 Sam. xv. 3. Are there not rots of cattle, and murrains of beasts, as well as mortalities of men? In a spoiling war or plague, who remains to fill the empty crib or manger? Do they not suffer with their masters? Do not the very beasts of the rich fare the better for the prosperity of their owners; whereas the poor man's cattle partake of the poor man's want?

I do not think that all manner of creatures perished in the waters; for besides them preserved in the ark, the fish escaped. The rabbins conceived, that the fish also perished, growing hot in the flood, as in a caldron; but Moses confines this destruction to things on the dry land, Gen. vii. 22. The fishes were spared. 1. Man had not so abused them, as the other kinds: and herein our sinfulness exceeds theirs; for not only the delicacies of the land, but neither can the rarities of the sea, satisfy our riot. They were then more separate from man's sin, therefore from his punishment. But in the fiery deluge, to show that even thither our excess hath reached, the very fishes shall not escape. 2. They lived in that element wherewith God purposed to overthrow the world; so that the same thing that was ordained for subversion, was to them rather for preservation. 3. They were not partakers of the earth: now the earth was cursed, not the sea; because Adam did unlawfully eat the fruit of the earth, not of the sea. 4. Such was the good pleasure of God, that among other creatures he would then spare the fishes: then, I say, for at other times he hath both threatened and destroyed them also; he "slew their fish," Hos. iv. 3; Psal. cv. 29.

Further, from the number of those preserved in the ark, divines have probably exempted, 1. Those creatures that live as well in the water as on the land; as otters, sea-wolves, water-serpents, and water-fowls. 2. Such as come of corruption, and do not breed by generation; as worms of dung, moths of putrified herbs, &c. 3. Such as are of a mixed kind, engendered by male and female of diverse kinds; as the mule cometh of the horse and ass: these needed not come into the ark, it was enough that the breeders of them were there. (August.) Some of the rabbins have conceived, that the seeds of herbs and plants were kept in the ark; but they might by God's providence grow in the earth, under the waters; as did the olive which the dove found at the sinking of the deluge. Yea, some of them, more ridiculously, amongst the living things preserved, would thrust in the spirits of the air to the ark. But neither are they male and female, nor subject to the submersion of waters; and it were better for man to have that kind destroyed than conserved. For the phenix, amongst many ambiguities, I yield to their persuasion, who think there is none; and that by the disagreements of her most justifying reporters. For her country, some make her of Arabia, others of India. For her life, some five hundred years, others six hundred and sixty. For her death, some say she sings and dies; others, that with the motion of her wings she sets her nest a fire. Pliny, and Pompon. Mela, write, that of her ashes comes a worm, and of the worm another phenix; which takes the bones of the old phenix with her nest, and carries it to Heliopolis, the city of the sun in Egypt; there laying it on the altar, and solemnizing the funeral. But who would not smile at the nonsense of this fiction? For if the phenix be burnt to ashes, where are her bones left for this transportation? But one, say they; and what creature is without sex, among beasts, fishes, or fowls? God's "Increase and multiply" had been a vain and superfluous charge to her. If there were but one before, then certainly that perished in the flood; for none were preserved in the ark but by pairs and couples. So that if formerly but one, now consequently there is none. The saying of St. Ambrose is objected: Phœnix cum mortua sit, reviviscit: solos non credimus homines resuscitari. We answer, he doth not deliver his opinion, that the phenix being dead reviveth; but by that which the heathen affirmed, out of their own grounds, he proves the resurrection which they denied. Let not this first question pass without a double meditation.

It instructs our understanding what the horror of sin is, whose contagion hath infected all the creatures that belong to us. Cursed be the earth for thy sake: the earth thou treadest on, the earth meriting no curse, the earth made before thee, made for thee, and thou made of it; cursed be this earth for thy sake. What have the poor creatures done? We are not content with their rule, without their ruin: though they be ad usum et esum nostrum, yet we tyrannize over them, and are scarce satisfied with their spoil. Oh that the guilty should thus dare to domineer over the innocent; and hold himself more absolute lord over his beast, than he thinks God over himself! He that shows no mercy to his beast, (which yet is not his creature, but bought with his money,) teacheth God how to deal with him, who is his creature, and bought with his Son's blood. The prophets, when the Lord hath been angry, and the plague heavy, and no excuse for the people's iniquity, not knowing what to say for themselves, ashamed in their own name to crave pardon, have put him in mind of the brute creatures: "How do the beasts groan," &c. Joel i. 18. Not that God is more respective of beasts than of men; Hath God care of oxen? 1 Cor. ix. 9; but when men become bruter than beasts, God will pity beasts sooner than men. The penitent Ninevites imposed a fast upon their very flocks and herds with themselves, Jonah iii. 7. Hath God care of beasts, or have beasts care of God? Are they not without religion, yea, without reason? O pardon repentance, a greater absurdity than this! It was a glass to reflect their own estate; the bellying of half-famished cattle puts them in mind how themselves ought to be starved. Such a use was of the Levitical sacrifices: to see them slain, their blood exhausted, their flesh burnt to ashes, might well strike them at heart with the survey of their own demerits. It teacheth the young lion obedience, when he sees the dog whom he loves and plays withal, cudgelled before him. When the prince's garment is beaten, he soon conceives himself blame-worthy by that representation. The moan and misery of the dumb thing schools us, as stripes on our garments, to tell us we have parts in that bargain. That which wants reason is punished, that we who have reason might be humbled. We are little better than beasts, if we find no other use of beasts than to serve our own riot: they may teach us as well as serve us. The looking-glass is an insensible thing, yet it reflects to a man his own form. This is the first lesson.

It also informs us to moderate our affections, and not to surfeit on this world which we have made so corrupt by our sins. What creature is there, on which our impiety hath not stuck some blemish? what do we use, whereon we read not engraven the characters of our own obliquities? Our apparel is but the cover of our shame; by our bravest accoutrements we may take measure of our delinquencies. Adam was more glorious without raiment, than all his posterity can be by it: neither can the glory we seek in our clothing, conceal or countervail the ignominy that came by our sinning. For our meat, is not our life maintained by the death of other creatures, our preservation by their destruction? Sin brought this necessity; without that no creature should have lost his life to become our food. This was not from the creation, creatures were not made to this end. Innocency would have preserved all to a higher and more excellent use. We should have had meat far sweeter, and such as should have cost no creature its life. Let my soul thus meditate; This creature dieth not for itself, but for me; not for its own fault, but mine: if I had my desert, I should rather die than it. Do we not read our steaming and sordid lusts in the infected air; our blasphemies in the blemished moon, glimmering stars, and blushing sun; our oppressions in the harrowed and wounded earth; our impieties in the groaning of all creatures? If a rich man should heap all his wealth together, and then set his house on fire, hath he cause of joy to see this? There is an ataxy and disorder in all the world wrought by our sins; the trees must fall under the wounding axe, the bowels of the earth be rent, to build us a dwelling; and shall not this move us? Can we glory in our shame, with that insulting monarch, This is my Babel? Dan. iv. 30. We had a better mansion once, without any of this violence, Paradise. Thus as he that rifled the poor scholar, robbed ten men at once, he having borrowed of one his horse, of another his spurs, &c.; or as when Æsop's jay was stripped of her brave plumes, there were twenty birds undone, that had lent her their feathers; so when death deprives man of his life, he finds many creatures to have spent their bloods and beings towards his maintenance. Our comfort be it, that our patent is renewed in Christ; the Second Adam regretting what the former had lost. And he that was content to become a creature, and to proffer his blood to us, thinks now no creature too dear for us. For his sake they are our servants, let us become his servants: to us the use, to him the thanks and glory for ever.

2. In the next place we are to examine, whether no other creatures escaped the deluge besides the fore-exceptioned. The waters prevailed, until "all the high hills that were under the whole heaven were covered," Gen. vii. 19. Yes, saith Cajetan, those under the airy heaven: nay, saith Moses, under the whole heaven. Some have wrangled about the mountains: as Athao in Macedonia, so high, that it casteth the shadow to Myrinum, a town in Lemnos, eighty-six miles off. Atlas is said to have a top higher than the clouds; and Tabor, to rise up thirty furlongs; Caucasus, to be lightened with the sun above, when day-light is shut in below. (Joseph.) But Moses affirms expressly, that all these high mountains were surmounted, and covered by the waters. Cajetan excepts the mountain of Paradise from this inundation: but where doth he find that Paradise was situate on a mountain? Out of Eden went a river to water the garden, Gen. ii. 10; but rivers do not use to run upon hills. His vain fear was, lest then Enoch should have been drowned in the flood, whom he supposeth to be in Paradise. But indeed Enoch was taken up into heaven, a higher paradise, where no flood could reach him.

Bellarmino thinks that all the mountains were not overflowed, but only those where the wicked dwelt. And Josephus reports a hill in Armenia, where all that fled thither for succour were saved from the deluge. But what speak we of fantastical dreams, against evident scriptures? Thus the Hebrews' fable, that Og the king of Bashan, who lived till Moses' time, was one of those giants before the flood. When I read in Pliny of a giant's body found in Crete forty-six cubits in length, I believe it as I do the ballad of Gargantua. The waters being fifteen cubits above the greatest mountains, those giants must needs be of incredible height that escaped.

But then, say they, the flood seemed to ascend unto the middle region of the air; for it was so many cubits higher than the mountains, and some mountain-tops ascend to the middle region, yea, above the clouds. As Olympus, which Zenagoras by mathematical instruments found to be ten stadia high; insomuch that the ashes remaining of the sacrifices, are neither dispersed by the wind, nor dissolved by the rain. So the waters should seem to rise higher than the place where the rain is engendered. Answe. The report of Olympus is found to be untrue, by the testimony of Philadelphius, who went up the hill on purpose to make experiment. (Ludovicus Vives.) Besides, no hill is above four miles in height; and the middle region is at least fifty miles from the earth. Again, divers inhabited those places, who are said to live half as long again as other men. This showed it to be a wholesome site for air, which could not be the middle region, full of clouds and foggy mists.

The conclusion then goes strong for the universality; a whole world perished, save only what the ark preserved. The day of vengeance is come, the guests are entered their wooden castle, the door of the ark shut, and the windows of heaven opened. Now those deriders, seeing the violence of the waters, some rising up, other coming down, both joining their forces to drown the earth, come wading middle deep, and bitterly crying out for safety in that vessel floating, which they had flouted in making. But now they are justly rejected, and find no room in God's mercy, whose word could find no room in their hearts. Others hope to outrun the destruction; and being clambered up to the tops of the highest mountains, they look down upon the waters with some transient flattery of hope. Still the waters rise, and their hills appear to them like floating islands. They give many a look when the heavens will clear up, and those bottles of rain be exhausted. Oh how would one hour's sunshine have cheered their hearts! And yet suppose it should cease spouting down, where was the provision which should keep life and soul together, till the channels of the sea, veins and hollow ventricles of the earth, should suck up that inundation? The beasts and fowls hovering in those mountains, were rather ready to prey upon their carcases than become their food: hunger will make those devourers of men, which before yielded to be devoured by men. There were wolves howling, dogs barking, lions roaring, owls screeching, cranes chattering, serpents hissing; men, women, children crying; all in one forlorn place.

Still their death comes nearer, and overtakes the refuges of their confidence. Then from the drowning hills they climb up to the highest trees, and there with paleness and horror behold their threatening death, which they would strive to avoid, and know they cannot. From the tops of all they descry afar off the ark floating on the waves: and now look on that with envy, which they formerly beheld with scorn; cursing their impenitent hearts, which God must needs kill ere he could waken.

But in vain they flee whom God pursues: there is no mountain so high but his hand can reach it; no depth so low, but his eye sees it, and power rules it. There is no way to escape him, but by coming to him. At last their destruction surpriseth them, poor miserable creatures, half dead with fear and hunger, and now wholly dead with water. Lo here the full conquest of justice, and the whole world overwhelmed with a universal ruin. God hath fetched back again all that life, which he had given to his unworthy creatures; and the world was reduced to that form wherein it stood in the third day of the creation, waters being over the face of the whole earth.

Let this contemplation be useful to us: the season of repentance is before the beginning of vengeance; but if judgment be gone out, men cry too late. While the gospel moves us, the doors of the ark are open: if we now neglect it, we may seek it with tears, and not find it. Mercy to impenitence would be injury to justice. Let every soul take this very time to redeem the time; for he is so fugitive, that he will not tarry the pleading of his own cause.

3. Lastly, we are to examine how in all this righteousness of God may be justified. What, all the world? might it not have been satisfied with a family, as the monstrous children of Lamech? or with a city, as Sodom? or with a country, as Canaan? or with a fourth part of the world, as Europe? but all? Because a man's garden, that hath been fruitful, is overrun with cankers, will he therefore destroy it? Doth not God threaten only the barren tree, such a one as cumber the ground, Luke xii. 7; not the whole vineyard? The husbandman fells not all his green and unripe corn, because some weeds are grown up in it: yea, Christ himself forbids it, with a "Let both grow together," Matt. xiii. 30. Nor because a man's servants have abused his house, and left it sluttishly noisome, will he therefore straight pull it down; but rather see it cleansed and aired, the rubbish swept out, and the uncleanness washed away. The Lord doth no more here; he punisheth the defilers with due destruction, washeth and scoureth this great house of the world, but then lets it stand: he makes it clean, he doth not make it nothing. But to clear this point, two subordinate questions must be scanned.

1. Whether all that were temporally destroyed, also everlastingly perished. If so, then Abraham could object, Far be it from thee to destroy the righteous with the wicked: shall not the Judge of all the earth do right? Gen. xviii. 25. Shall infants and innocents share in the same confusion with obstinates? 1. Some say, that all were temporally punished, that they might be eternally saved; as St. Hierome of the Sodomites, They received in this life their full punishments. But if reprobates might escape thus, hell would not be so full. 2. Some extenuate their sin, as Cajetan; that they were not wholly void of faith, but believed not Noah in this particular. But it is not safe for man to extenuate what the Lord does aggravate, that the whole "earth was filled with violence, and all flesh had corrupted his way," Gen. vi. 11, 12. They were not only full of incredulity, but foul with all manner of impiety. 3. Others say, that they were condemned to hell, yet redeemed thence by Christ's descension; who went and preached to the spirits in prison, which were disobedient in the days of Noah, 1 Pet. iii. 19, 20. Thus the pontificians have conceited that Plato, at Christ's preaching in hell, believed; and was, with many others, delivered; as the soul of Falconilla, by the prayers of St. Tecla, and Trajan's, at the intercession of Gregory. But these imaginations cross God's determinations, who hath interposed a great gulf, Luke xvi. 26: their worm never dieth, and out of hell there is no redemption. 4. Others, that they were not cast into hell, but many of them into purgatory, and from thence delivered by Christ's descending. But to answer both these errors, so falsely grounded on the apostle's words, Being quickened in spirit, he went, &c.: Christ's soul could not be said to be quickened, for his soul never died; therefore by his soul he did not preach either in hell or purgatory. Christ hath two spirits, one as man, another as God; so the Holy Ghost is called the Spirit of Christ. But the Spirit here is properly neither of these, but his Divine power; by which he preached in Noah, in all the prophets before him, and the apostles after him. But if it be not meant of purgatory, what is then this prison? Augustine says, this prison was the body; and the men were called spirits from the better part; but we seldom find living men called spirits. Montanus says, this prison was the ark; but then there had been in the prison too few spirits, for in the ark were but eight. Some will have this prison to be ignorance, according to that prophecy of Christ, that he was sent to preach "liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound," Isa. lxi. 1. But to those Christ could not be said to preach in spirit, but in person. Some would have this prison the grave; but then souls should lie in graves by that consequent. Others, to be hell; and that is indeed a prison, without light, without liberty, without comfort. Let us keep ourselves free-men, and beware of multiplying our debts, that we be never cast into this prison. But certainly there is no preaching in hell, because there is no repenting in hell: Shall thy loving-kindness be declared in hell, &c.? Psal. lxxxviii. 11. To conclude; the Scripture never called the receptacle of believing souls a prison: to think, therefore, that first they were condemned, and afterward redeemed, is a point of contradiction. The same Christ that came in his flesh, and preached the gospel to the world, came to them in the days of Noah by his Spirit, and in Noah preached repentance to those unbelievers; who because they repented not, but continued in disobedience, are now damned spirits in hell. This I take to be the true sense and orthodox exposition.

Charity may seem to except from everlasting ruin, innocents and ignorants. Innocents, as infants, that were not capable of faith and repentance. Ignorants, such as did not hear of the forewarned vengeance. The one could not believe for want of discretion; the other, not be called unbelievers if they had no premonition: on these our charity hopes there was mercy. In the first judgment, when the angels fell; in the last judgment, when Christ shall come; only the elect shall be saved, and only the reprobate condemned. In this middle and intervenient judgment, some were preserved, that were not elected, as Ham, cursed of his father: so we think, some were drowned, which yet were saved. Our probable reasons are four.

1. It is not likely that the whole posterity of Methuselah and Enoch, and of other holy patriarchs, were condemned; for the Lord hath promised to be good to the children for their fathers' sakes.

2. Howsoever they believed not Noah at the first, but thought him a fantastical fellow; yet when they saw the event answering his prediction, and death climbing up to their latest refuges, their souls might be humbled to repentance. Many having learned that godliness in one day's misery, which many years' prosperity could not teach them.

3. The apostle resembles baptism to the ark, 1 Pet.

iii. 21; but as all dying without baptism are not damned, so neither all that were without the ark eternally perished. They might be drowned in the deluge on earth, yet escape the abyss of hell.

4. If God had meant to destroy their souls with the confusion of their bodies, he would not so have lingered the execution. It was forty days a coming, Gen. vii. 4, whereas God could have despatched it in four hours; that by degrees their hearts might be softened with sorrows, as the earth was soaked with waters.

But if they repented, why is it not recorded in Scripture? So neither is Adam's repentance, nor Solomon's: it expressly says they sinned, not expressly they repented; though of their repentance there is no question to be made. But it is concealed to deter us from the like rebellion, lest it become so doubtful of our conversion. But if they did repent, why then were they not saved from the deluge? Because they repented not in time, at Noah's preaching. Repentance is never too late to save the soul, but it may be too late to deliver the body.

Let us repent betimes, before the judgment come; for if it be once come, we may save our souls, but our bodies must perish. They that were even akin to Noah, because they repented not at the preaching of Noah, could not be saved with Noah; but losing this opportunity, they too late wish themselves in the ark: albeit mercy shall never be denied to true repentance, yet, speed well their souls, they must lose their lives. When the Lord strikes a city with his pestilence, many sinners begin then to relent, and bleed in contrition for their offences: this shall happily deliver them from hell and the wrath of God, yet this exempts them not from death of that plague. Men commonly fear God's temporal blows more than his eternal, yet of both they neglect the antidote and prevention. This will make him strike, if not home. A wise man will not be drunk, if only for the head-ache; nor a good man sin, if only to avoid the heart-ache. If we have not repented so early, but that he will punish us; yet let us not repent so late, but that he may save us.

How was this just, to punish the infants and innocents for the sins of their parents? Doth not God say, "The son shall not bear the iniquity of the father?" Ezek. xviii. 20. Doth not he make this to the enraged prophet an argument of sparing Nineveh; the many thousand little ones, "that cannot discern between their right hand and their left?" Jonah iv. 11; that cannot speak, cannot help themselves; that stick to their mothers' breasts, as apples to the tree; if you pluck them away, they perish. Is this the babes' welcome into the world, the milk to feed them; when they cry, to quiet them with death? Is this the nursing of their tender and ungrown limbs, to wrap them up in waves of swaddling cloths, and to rock them asleep with pitiless destruction? Whose ears can endure the lamentable and confused cry of so many infants, and not cry for company? The midwives of Egypt had more mercy; Pharaoh's daughter was moved to take up weeping Moses. It is the property of a cruel nation, not to show favour to the little ones, Deut. xxviii. 50. When the prophet foretold Hazael of this cruelty, in dashing infants against the stones, he asked if he thought him a dog, 2 Kings viii. 12, 13; so brutish he held such a villain. Men have more years and sins, but what have infants done? The Scripture hath many circumlocutions of their ignorance and simplicity. God gave a special charge concerning them, in the bloodiest victory of war, unless for some nations which he had accursed, Deut. xx. 14—16. Christ took them up in his arms, blessed them, and placed one in the midst; proposing them as patterns for the imitation of riper years. Whose eyes can behold the shrinking of their soft members at every pull of grief, their limbs sprawling on the ground, their flesh scorched with heat as a scroll of parchment, or sinking on the waters, without pity?

Thus justly, concerning little ones, doth God expostulate with men; but men may not thus expostulate with God; for to him alone they are not innocent. Man's rule is to punish him only that offends, and not to put the children to death for the fathers, Deut. xxiv. 16. Yet so far as afflictions go untouching life, children oft suffer for their parents; being deprived of liberty, goods, honours; as in cases of treason. The Lord threatens to visit the sins of the fathers upon the children, even unto the fourth generation, Exod. xx. 5; so long, that (by the course of nature) their parents may live to see their wickedness plagued in their posterity: yet if the son repent, the same God hath promised that he shall escape. And howsoever this judgment be not always verified, yet it is enough to terrify us all. But it never misseth, where the parents' sins are become the children's by imitation. They are then called their fathers' sins; because they were by their age the founders, by their example the teachers, and in their own persons the beginners of those sins: as it is commonly said, We may know what house such come of, by some tricks of their ancestors.

Jew and Gentile have excepted against the Divine justice for this. Bion took on against the gods, that the parents' demerits were devolved and translated upon the progeny; which he scornfully matched as if a physician for the father's disease should minister physic to the son. The Jews had such an ungracious proverb, "The fathers have eaten a sour grape, and the children's teeth are set on edge," Jer. xxxi. 29. But the Lord answers them, "Plead with your mother," Hos. ii. 2: for the husband may lawfully put away his prostituted wife, and her adulterous brood, because they are none of his children. "All souls are mine; as the soul of the father, so also the soul of the son is mine," Ezek. xviii. 4. If it were as Horace sung to his friend; Delicta majorum immeritus luis: but who can say, My heart is clean? Is it possible to be born Morians, and to have none of their tawny and swarthy complexions? Again, is it not just with God to punish our fond indulgence, in the very object of our idolatry? We hope these young plants shall succour us with their fruits, when we are grown sapless; but doth not the staff we so nourish to bear us, become often a cudgel to beat us? David cursed the wicked both ways: in their descent; Let his children be vagabonds, and beg their bread in desolate places, Psal. cix. 10. In their ascent; Let the iniquity of his father be had in remembrance, and let not the sin of his mother be blotted out, ver. 14. We have seen the blood of the church exhausted by sacrilegious parents, required at the hands of their posterity with ruin; God so cursing their generations, that we might read the nature and quality of the sin, in the visible characters of the punishment. The whole world was so foul, that the very fruit of their bodies (without contraction of actual sins) seemed odious to God; and in his justice he punished those innocent babes with a death temporal, whom he might yet deliver from the wrath eternal.

But some haply were not so heinous transgressors, but would have believed had they been informed; why should they suffer? They had all sin enough to drown them in one deep, if some found the mercy to save them from the other deep. God doth not punish many for the sins of some; but all men are sinners. Although one be not principal in respect of the fact presently inquired, as David was in numbering the people; yet none fall but for their own offending. He may be accessory in consenting, or concealing: if he be neither principal nor accessory in that, yet he may be culpable in a thousand others; secret, perhaps, to men, but known to God. The serpent hath a sting, though he doth not always put it forth; and man hath malice, though he show it not.

Who then can say, I have paid the things that I never took? Jonah is the offender, the whole ship is in danger; but he that had not sinned with the prophet, had sinned in somewhat else. They had all offended at sundry times; what wrong is it if they were all whipped at once? Here is all the difference, their faults had several places, their punishment shall have but one. All Israel smarts with David, not for David's, but their own, disobedience. The Lord need not beat his brains, or break his sleep, to invent an accusation against us. We have no thought, word, work, but yields him cause and matter enough. It cannot be denied, but the sins we sever in our conceits, according to the distance of time or place; some of old, some late; some in one quarter of the world, some in another; these the knowledge of God unites, and views all at once. In France one hath followed incontinence; may not that country disease overtake him in England for it? A young man is a voluptuous rioter; shall not his old age rue it? Will any time or place exempt him from diseases incident to that sin? Thou art the same person still, unless repentance have made thee new.

It is true that some are more noxious than others; as Bias said to a savage crew in a dangerous storm, when they cried to their gods, Do not speak so loud, lest the gods should hear you. Intimating them so wicked, that it was the hazard of a worse vengeance to have them taken notice of. But the best of all have sins enough; and optimus ille est qui minimis urgetur. Thieves are brought out of divers quarters, have trespassed at sundry times, committed several offences; yet are all imprisoned in one gaol, punished in one day, hanged upon one and the same tree. A company of men makes a body, and the whole body is punished for the fault of one member. The tongue talks treason, the whole man is plagued for it. In felony (which is contractatio rei alienæ invito domino, animo furandi, as the law defines it) the hand only takes, and bears away; but the feet are clapped in iron, the belly pinched with famine, the bones lie hard, and the neck is in danger. The eye may be sore, and a vein pricked in the arm to cure it. The hoof of the beast is tender and weak, the top of the horn anointed for remedy. Besides, God hath several intentions in one judgment. The principal he plagues, the same punishment shall teach a second obedience, try the patience of a third, prevent some grievous sin in a fourth, humble another, call home another to grace and repentance. In all, he judgeth some, bettereth others, honoureth himself, and gets glory to his blessed name. But to conclude the generality of this ruin:

Universal sin brings universal punishment. If all flesh be corrupted, all flesh must be destroyed. Find me one just man in the city, saith God, and I will spare it, Jer. v. 1. How great had been this mercy, if there had not been a general apostasy! Sodom had been spared for ten, Jerusalem for one; and yet he might rather have looked for ten in Jerusalem, than for one in Sodom. By swearing, &c. they break out, till blood toucheth blood, Hos. iv. 2: their sins were rounded into a ring, no room for piety to get in amongst them. Therefore the whole land shall mourn, and every one therein languish, ver. 3: universally wicked, universally punished. If the Lord should make such a judicial scrutiny, and strict inquisition for sinners, as Jehu did for true worshippers, 2 Kings x. 23, who could plead, Not guilty? Lactantius reports a prophecy of Sibylla, The fisher's hook shall take the Roman empire. If they mean by the empire, all the souls in the empire, I could wish that St. Peter's net had caught and brought more to heaven than it hath. But if by empire they intend the imperial dignity, titles, privileges, honours, and royal augusteity, I could wish for their own sakes (that now usurp that office) they had caught less than they have. For when the majesty of a prince came in, the piety of a priest went out. But will you hear the hook that hath caught them and all; the hook of covetousness, baited with riches. Doubtless there are some elect, otherwise the world could not stand; but the greater part drowns the better part. Is the fear of God amongst men? Who would ask such a question? But if we fear God, we will serve him; if we love him, we will obey him. Now the question grows bitterer and bitterer, from wormwood to gall. The devout man is even flouted out of his holiness, and zeal counted an irregularity. Hypocrisy is the world's apparel, malice his diet, pride his wife, greediness his dog; and thus he solaceth himself in a wilful rebellion. We have all run into a præmure against our high Sovereign, and deserve confiscation of all we have, of all we are.

But I am willing to leave this spittal of incurable sinners; for who can endure to look long upon ulcers? Therefore to touch at the way to cure universal wickedness, is by universal repentance. We may perceive how willing God is to save us; for all this while we forbore not sinning, yet he forbore plaguing. None can be so bad as God is good. Sin reigning in men is a tyrant; Satan's possessing them, worse: Christ threw them out both. Man may be willing to forgive a mite, the Lord a million: three hundred pence, and ten thousand talents, are all one to his mercy. Satan hopes well of our sins, but let Christ hope better of our repentance. Let us all disappoint Satan, and answer the gracious mercy of our Redeemer. He made us in the world, he made us not for the world, but chose us before the world, and came himself into the world, to call us out of the world, that we might not perish with the world, but live after the world, in a blessed and glorious world, his own immortal kingdom in heaven. This for the universality, the next the antiquity of it.

"The old world." Old? It rather seemed to be the young world, and this the old; according to David's prophecy, "They shall wax old as doth a garment," Psal. cii. 26. A man of twenty is young; he of eighty, old. The world of a thousand years standing, is young in respect of the same world grown up to five thousand years. The more time upon the back, the more aged a thing is. That then seemed to be the world's infancy, this the veterity; that the nonage, this the dotage. The world then brought forth giants; now, in comparison, dwarfs; and it is the youth of a woman that makes her bear the goodlier children. In age the womb faileth, and brings fruit of a less stature, 2 Esd. v. 54.

Old is like Janus, and looks two ways; to the time long since passed, and long hence to come. So olim, among the Latins, extends both to past and future times. That which has been, is called old, as done of old; that which shall be hereafter, is said, in older days. It is used both ways, Psal. cii. "Of old hast thou laid the foundation of the earth," ver. 25; where old signifies a thing done long ago. "They shall wax old like a garment," ver. 26; where old is a quality hereafter to be fulfilled. If we take the world in respect of the matter and structure of it; that was the young world, this is the old. If for the men who are daily born into it, that was the old world, this is the young. This is as clear, as that the child is younger than the father. From those that were in the ark, is the whole world of men descended; therefore it is so called the old world. Which gives us three observations.

1. That antiquity, if found in impiety, is no privilege of impunity. Indeed the arguments of commendation are often derived from ancientness; and men commonly love the things wherewith time hath made them long acquainted. It commendeth rivers, as in Deborah's song; "That ancient river, the river Kishon," Judg. v. 21. It commendeth customs; "Remove not the ancient landmark, which thy fathers have set," Prov. xxii. 28. It commendeth friends; "Thy own friend, and thy father's friend, forsake not," Prov. xxvii. 10. "Forsake not an old friend, for the new is not comparable to him," Ecclus. ix. 10. It commendeth wine; "No man having drunk old wine desireth new: for he saith, The old is better," Luke v. 39. It commendeth an inheritance; "The Lord forbid that I should give the inheritance of my fathers unto thee," 1 Kings xxi. 3. It commendeth wisdom; "Rehoboam forsook the counsel of the old men," 1 Kings xii. 8, and that turned to his ruin. Concilia senum, hastæ juvenum. It commendeth truth; "Seek out the wisdom of the ancient," Ecclus. xxxix. 1; and, Inquire for the old way, Jer. vi. 16. It commendeth service in the field; as Clitus to Alexander, Despisest thou the soldiers of thy father Philip? Hast thou forgotten, that unless this old Atharius had called back the young men refusing to fight, we had yet stuck at Halicarnassus.

Yet if age be blended with naughtiness, the older the worse. An old river without water quenctheth not our thirst. An old custom without warrant of goodness is as authenthical for practice, as an old tattered garment is for handsomeness, or an old cough for wholesomeness. An old friend that hath lost his honesty, is worse than an old picture that hath lost the colour. Old wine no man commends; when it is turned to vinegar, let them take it that like it. An old house is no safe harbour, when it is ready to fall on the inhabitant's head. An old man that hath lost his experience, is like a boulder; much good flour hath gone through it, but there is nothing left in it but bran. "Days should speak, and multitude of years should teach wisdom," saith Elihu, Job xxxii. 7. But "great men are not always wise, neither do the aged understand judgment," ver. 9. Gravity should speak first, but if it speak worst, better hold the peace. "Better is a poor and wise child than an old and foolish king," Eccl. iv. 13, who will no more be admonished. If an old man speak lies with the same confidence as known truths, and so vehemently praise former customs that are ridiculous, and teach the younger as scornfully as he would do a dog to fetch; here age hath lost the credit. The hoary head is only then a crown of glory, when it is found in the way of righteousness, Prov. xvi. 31.

Custom is a second nature; an old habit is not easily forgotten. Nature endures no sudden alterations, say physicians. Therefore for a man to grow old with his errors, is to be dead to all virtues. And he will find it as hard to become good, as to re-enter the womb, and be new-born. An old dog bites sore, an old ulcer is hardly cured, and an old vice within a degree of impossible to be amended. Age therefore hath no privilege. Look back upon Shiloh, saith God, Jer. vii. 12. Shiloh's antiquity could not countenance Shiloh's iniquity. Indeed with us, grey hairs require reverence, though mixed with some infirmities; "Thou shalt honour the face of the old man, and fear thy God," Lev. xix. 32. And they are wretched days, when "the child shall behave himself proudly against the ancient," Isa. iii. 5. Yet no wonder if the children despise the parents, when the parents despise God. That world might say to the Lord, as Esau to Isaac, "I am thy first-born," Gen. xxvii. 32. Like a tree, it grew crooked from the first planting, no art could straighten it, therefore the axe must hew it down. But whether we the younger children, or that world the eldest, Cain and Lamech the first-born, all have sinned; and all must have perished, but for the sufferings of the First-begotten of God.

2. In this glass we may behold the state of the world before us. Even the former times abounded with sins; they had their aberrations and deliriums as well as we. It is the fashion of people to admire former days. "What is the cause that the former days were better than these?" Eccl. vii. 10. But Solomon taxeth that inquiry of folly. Because we feel not our forefathers' evils, therefore we think they had no evils at all. The deluge of popery in this land is still commended by divers Rome-affected, Rome-infected spirits. Why? O then men lived neighbourly together, without quarrels and suits of contention. Did they so, and is the gospel the cause why men do not so now? Is it not the gospel of peace, teaching us to love others as ourselves? Shall men be litigious furies, and lay the fault on God's mercies? Hath the Lord opened our eyes for no other purpose, but to see to scratch and wound one another? But then were men merry and jovial, and not troubled with melancholy cares. If they rejoiced in their riches, and not in their graces, it was a mirth for the devil. If it were in the Lord, doth the gospel sad us? The statutes of the Lord rejoice the heart, Psal. xix. 8. Is any mirth like the meditation of our peace made by Christ? Cannot we answer the jovial world, (as the grave musician, being called into company that sang wanton catches, and expostulated why he did not bear his part,) I am as merry as they that sing? It is God that puts more gladness in our hearts, than all their abundance can fill them withal, Psal. iv. 7. Shall men bate of their mirth, because God is near them in his favours? or a man be afraid to walk abroad, because it is fair weather?

Pleasure is not gone, when sin is gone: it is not Isaac which is sacrificed, that is, our laughter and mirth; but the ram, that is, the brutishness of it. (August.) Yea, rather let us count it our chiefest delight, that we have lost our former delight. Because our forefathers sat uncontrollably at the pot, and had priests without more virtue than to take up differences at the ale-house, were those the better times? But then, say they, was more plenty of all things, to demonstrate that God loved us: corn was cheap, and men were charitable, they kept good houses: and well fare the religion that made us fare so well. As if God had no better blessings in store for us than acorns. This was the argument of the apostate Jews, We had plenty of victuals, and were well, when we burnt incense to the queen of heaven; but since we ceased that sacrifice, we have wanted all things, Jer. xlv. 17, 18. Part of their reason's strength they fetch from antiquity, Thus did our fathers; part from their own prosperity, Thus sped we. But how easily doth the prophet evade and dissolve this ridiculous sophistry! "Therefore," for this cause, "is your land a desolation, and a curse, without an inhabitant," ver. 22. Did this bring you a blessing? No, rather a curse and ruin. Our fathers bestowed their cakes on the queen of heaven, but did not the King of heaven plague them for it? Say he fed their bodies with quails, did he not put leanness into their souls? Shall we call Nabal's sheep-shearing a blessing? All their superstitious peace was no better than the very revels of Bacchus, and an holy-day to the devil. Shall we seek Christ no further than among the loaves? John vi. 26. Jesus was in the ship, yet, We have no bread, Matt. xvi. 7: Jesus was at the marriage, yet, We want wine, John ii. 3. We may want bread and wine, and yet have Christ's company. If food fail, it is because manna is to come. If wine be absent, yet grace and salvation are present. If God take away flesh, and give manna; deny sun and moon, and give himself, Rev. xxi. 23; he does us no wrong. As the Israelites repined for a king, when the Lord was their King; so our ancestors refused Christ for their head, and chose the pope. But God answered, I gave them a head in mine anger, Hos. xiii. 11. He fulfilled on them what was written, 1 Sam. viii. 13, &c. This head took away their fields and vineyards, and gave them to his servants, monks and friars: he took away the tenth of their sheep and seed, and put their goodliest young men to his work, and made them all his servants; that they were forced to cry out because of their king which they had chosen. Such have they found their Romish heads; that, like ill physicians, have purged away the good humours, and left the bad behind them.

Lo now the praise of antiquity, when it hath swerved from the rule of piety! Where is now the validity of that pontifical argument, concerning the ancientness of their church? This plea might the Jews still make, We are the sons of Abraham; but Christ told them of another father. As much say the Turks, We are the sons of Abraham by Sara, so called Saracens: but they were none of Sara's sons. It hath been unanswerably proved, that the fundamental heads of the present Romish faith, had their several births, some two hundred, some four hundred, some eight hundred, some a thousand, some a thousand and four hundred years after Christ. But say they were old; yet wanting the warrant of sacred truth, they are no better an argument of purity, than the old world was of innocence. Truth is not to be rejected for mere novelty; for old truths may come newly to light, and God is not tied to his times for the gift of illumination. Yet is this the foundation, whereon they rear their Babel, their babble; whose top must reach up to the firmament, and command not earth only, but heaven itself: and thus they mean to make them a name, lest they be scattered abroad, Gen. xi. 4. The world was good when God framed it, must it therefore be good when he drowned it? Isaac was strong when he married Rebekah, must he therefore retain the same corporeal strength when he blessed Jacob? The cathedral church of St. Paul two hundred years ago might haply be in good case, may it not therefore now want reparation? The church of Rome was pure when Paul planted it, must it now be so when antichrist hath corrupted it? Show us the same integrity that Rome then had, and we are of the same faith that Rome then was. Otherwise, not how old a thing is, but how good it is, should be the inquiry of Christians. The old man is corrupted and lost; he must become new that will be saved.

3. If that was an old world, how old is it now? Have not the accession of so many hundred years made it somewhat weaker? Yes, the world is sick at the heart; not only in some superfluities, as warts and swellings, but in the integral and essential parts. The air, like a prodigious mother, produceth strange and abortive births. She was lately delivered of a burning child, a portentful comet; which divers have took the altitude of, but God only knows what it meant. The springs, instead of nourishing the young plants, prove sepulchres to bury them. Nature is so preposterous, as if her brains were turned, and she knew not what she did. But the God of nature knows, and tells us by these tokens, that the world is old. As a tree, it was green in the spring, yellow in summer, white in the autumn, is now stark and cold in the winter of his age. As man, which is the little world, so the world, which is a great man, had his infancy, youth, middle age, old age. From Adam to Noah was the world's infancy; from Noah to Abraham, the childhood; from Abraham to David, the youth; from David to the captivity, the middle age; from that to Christ, the old age; from him to the end of all things, the dotage. (August.)

God hath made man's life shorter, that his sins might be fewer. From nine hundred it is fallen to seventy; and how few see half those! Methuselah lived not one day to God; he saw not a thousand years, which with God is as one day: but we scarce live one hour in respect of his day. Of nine hundred and sixty, our eighty is but as the twelfth part. If a man live to the tenth part of Methuselah's age, he is a child again; when the light is sent to his windows, and the glasses there chambered cannot receive it; when the hollow receptacles of sounds are shut up, and the faltering discourse is interrupted with harsh parentheses, coughs. We are now old in as short time as they were scarce past children. "We are but of yesterday," Job viii. 9. And as our lives are abridged from a fathom to a span, so are our bodies contracted. When the age was long, the proportion was great; that a man could grapple with a savage beast on some terms of equality: as Samson coped with a lion, David with a bear, and came off with victory. These were bred in the world's prime and youthfulness; we now in the withered and decrepit age. We are scarce the shadows of our forefathers, whether in length or strength of life, whether in stature or force of nature. We are not sooner grown up to be men, but straight we are none; death makes as quick a riddance of us, as it will do of all things. The world's stomach being old, is weak of retention; and the crudities of sin are so hard of digestion, that the vessel must soon be broken. Magistrates are the arms of the world, counsellors the brains, lawyers the tongues, the rich the stomachs, the poor the backs, merchants the feet, officers the hands, and divines the hearts. Now there is a general corruption in all these, (let it not be understood, all of every kind, but every kind of all,) this epidemical distemper witnesseth it is old, and near the dissolution.

Now the greater the corruption, the vaster the destruction. Some think that the fiery deluge shall ascend no higher than did the watery. It may be the earth shall be burned, that is the worst guest at the table, the common sewer of all other creatures; but shall the heavens pass away? It may be the airy heaven; but shall the starry heaven, where God hath printed such figures of his glory? Yes, cælum, elementum, terra, when ignis ubique feror ruptis regnabit habenis. The former deluge is called the world's winter, the next the world's summer. The one was with a cold and moist element; the other shall be with an element hot and dry. But what then shall become of the saints? They shall be delivered out of all; walking like those three servants in the midst of that great furnace, the burning world, and not be scorched, because there is one among them, to deliver them, "the Son of God," Dan. iii. 25, their Redeemer. But shall all quite perish?

No, there is rather a mutation than an abolition of their substance. Thou shalt change them, and they shall be changed, Psal. cii. 26: changed, not abolished. The concupiscence shall pass, not the essence; the form, not the nature. In the altering of an old garment, we destroy it not, but trim it, refresh it, and make it seem new. They pass, they do not perish; the dross is purged, the metal stays. The corrupt quality shall be renewed, and all things restored to that original beauty wherein they were created. "The end of all things is at hand," 1 Pet. iv. 7: an end of us, an end of our days, an end of our ways, an end of our thoughts. If a man could say as Job's messenger, I alone am escaped, it were somewhat; or might find an ark with Noah. But there is no ark to defend from that heat, but only the bosom of Jesus Christ. "I have seen an end of all perfection," Psal. cxix. 96: if perfection on earth have an end, imperfection cannot long continue. There shall be an end of our eating, an end of our building, an end of our covetous scraping, an end of our works, and end of ourselves, but no end of our souls; and if we be found in the faith, no end of our blessedness, for then begins a world without end. Of these three observations, I desire to make three applications.

1. Let us turn good with all the speed we can, for how far off soever the general end may be, our particular end is near. I know that long life was God's promise to his servants; but when long life ceaseth to be prosperous, it ceaseth to be his promise. He shortens our life. 1. That we be not afflicted with evils; the righteous are prevented of the evil to come, Isa. lvii. 1. 2. That we be not infected with evils, corrupted by the times, as Joseph was caught with the Egyptian oath. 3. Their memory lives though they die. If the good name be preserved, a man is alive though he be dead. 4. If God takes away temporal, and gives eternal life for it, there is no hurt done us. He that promised ten pieces of silver, and gives ten pieces of gold, breaks no promise. When Herod promised half his kingdom, if he had given it all he had broke no promise. God's promise shall stand, when the mines of India shall fail. All men's lives are short, why should I think mine long? "Our end is near, our days are fulfilled; for our end is come," Lam. iv. 18.

Oh then let not the end of our days and the strength of our sins come near together! It is said of St. Chrysostom, that he made an end of nothing but of sin. Let it not be said of us, that we have put an end to all things except our sins. A man hath begun to build, he would fain end; begun to travel, he would fain come to his journey's end; commenced a suit, he desires an end. Before all, let us strive to end our sins: if we end them by repentance, though the end of our lives prevent the end of our other businesses, we shall never find cause of sorrow. It is a saying in schools, From evil seeds come evil plants. The body "is sown in dishonour; it is raised in glory," 1 Cor. xv. 43. If we would reap a glorious body, let us sow a gracious body. Let us not be of their number, whose end is a destruction without end. Let repentance make an end of our sins, before death make an end of our days; and then our end is not properly an end, but a better beginning. Seeing the world must be changed, let us that have corrupted it, first change ourselves. If fire must purge the elements, let us get that celestial fire of the Spirit to purge us; that when all the dross and feculency of the world shall be on a light fire, we may be found pure, and presented clear at the appearing of Jesus Christ.

2. As this teacheth all this old world, so it specially directs itself to all that be old in the world. I know that age is subject to infirmities, and hath endangered even saints to a relapse. If all must once err, error falls less unhappily in youth than in age. Covetousness, pettishness, sluggishness, pride, are incident to old years. This David knew, when he prayed so earnestly, "Cast me not off in the time of old age; forsake me not when I am grey-headed," Psal. lxxi. 9, 18. Some strive to keep themselves from any need of that prayer; either by artificial tinctures, dyeing their hairs into other colours. So though they cannot make white black, yet they can make it appear black. They study colorare capillos mendacio, as a father speaks. Or by lewd and wanton lusts they prevent the baldness of age, and leave themselves not so much as one hair of an honest man.

Apostacy in old age is fearful. He that climbs almost to the top of a tower, then slipping back, hath the greater fall. The patient almost recovered, is more deadly sick by a relapse. There were stars struck from heaven by the dragon's tail, Rev. xii. 4; they had better never have perched so high. The place where the Israelites fell into that great folly with the daughters of Moab, was in the plain, within the prospect of the Holy Land; they saw their inheritance, and yet fell short of it. So wretched is it for old men to fall near to their very entry of heaven: as old Eli in his indulgence, 1 Sam. ii.; old Judah in his incest, Gen. xxxviii.; old David with Bathsheba; old Asa trusting in the physicians more than in God, 2 Chron. xvi. 12; and old Solomon built the high places. Some have walked like cherubs in the midst of the stones of fire, yet been cast as profane out of God's mountain, Ezek. xxviii. 14, 16. Thus the seaman passeth all the main, and suffers wreck in the haven. The corn often promiseth a plenteous harvest in the blade, and shrinks in the ear. You have trees loaden with blossoms, yet in the season of expectation, no fruit. A comedy that holds well many scenes, and goes lamely off in the last act, finds no applause. "Remember Lot's wife," Luke xvii. 32: think on that pillar of salt, that it may season thee.

Old age is best in three respects: 1. Because it hath passed the follies and disorders of youth, which Job calls bitter things to the memory, Job xiii. 26. 2. Because the inconveniences of it, albeit numerous, are but corporeal; commonly bettered with the good estate of the mind. 3. Because it is nearest to dissolution; within a short step of blessedness. Yet of all, it is then most miserable, when it desires to spin out a longer thread; when it is far from Elijah's mind, Let me die, I am no better than my fathers, 1 Kings xix. 4. There is nothing more pitiable, than an old man that for his pleasure's sake would be young again. We can scarce say of such a one, that he hath been a man in his days. Art thou young? look forward, propound goodness to thy life. Art thou old? look backward, be sorrowful for sins past. Art thou middle-aged? look both forward and backward; repent the past, amend the present, be armed for the future.

Let the life of man be distinguished into three ages, the last is fully in proof, then good or never. First, all is in hope: a woman hath an embryo in her womb; will it be born living? she hopes so. It hath life; will it have proportion? she hopes so. It hath proportion; will it have the exercise of reason and understanding? she hopes so. In process of growing, reason appears; will he have grace and faith? she hopes so. He professeth; is his profession sound at the heart? she hopes so. He hath all these; will he live long? she hopes so: all is in hope. Now middle age is half in proof, and half in hope: in proof, how good it is; in hope, how much better it may be. Old age is all in proof, it is then seen what good a man hath; what interest in heaven, what contempt of the world is in him. Let us beware of tergiversation in our old age. "Ye did run well; who did hinder you?" Gal. v. 7. Let our alpha and omega be good, our first and last alike gracious; that we may come with joy to him, who is Alpha and Omega, first and last, the beginning and end of all comfort, Jesus Christ.

3. Let the terror of this parallel destruction humble us all. Lord, what a terrible day will it be, when Christ shall appear in the clouds, all the world rise out of their graves, and the whole heaven and earth burning with flames! If ever earth could sample it with a day, it was the intended gunpowder treason day, Nov. 5. Gunpowder, invented by a monk, taught by the devil, that great master of fireworks. It hath been said, that Africa brings forth every year a new monster: it never brought forth such a one as this, to which nihil nisi nomina desunt. Herod slew all the children of Bethlehem, yet there was some mercy in that, for the men escaped. Haman's plot was damnable enough, even the ruin of Israel; yet they had a month's day of preparation. But this was worse; with suddenness it would have prevented doomsday, and sent up bodies before the resurrection. It was cross to all other kinds of death: that at other times sends the soul upwards, the body downwards; this would have sent the soul downward, and the body upward. Let the memory of it live to their shame and our thankfulness. Shame, said I? Alas, they make it their glory! O but the papists condemn it, and call the plotters "unfortunate gentlemen." Unfortunate, because the fortune did not succeed as they would have it. It is the success they blame, not the villany. But the papal chair never approved it: and who can say the papal chair ever disliked it? The actors are seen, however the poet lies hid: and the pope hath not to this day judicially condemned the powder treason. It should have been a dead day, let it be a red day in our calendar. Their rage was without measure, so let our thankfulness be without end.

That was a little image or figure of the general fiery deluge to come. If the horror of the former be able to shake us with the remembrance; thinking how fearful it had been, by a sudden blast to have our souls sent upward with our bodies, and perhaps both to come down again with the weight of unpented sins, which then was no thought or time to retract; how should the meditation of this other make us tremble; which as it shall be more sudden for the time, so more universal for the ruin! Shall we still slumber in our old security? The apostles said of Lazarus, "Lord, if he sleep, he shall do well," John xi. 12: but, Lord, if we sleep we shall do very ill. Worldly men are like Nicodemus; they would fain come to Christ, but they are loth to go till it be night; that is, till death sends them. But, the repentance that is wrung out by death, we may fear it will be dead sooner than he that lies sick. (August.) Now, now let us break off our sins, by the contrition of our souls; for now repentance is a supersedeas to discharge all the bonds of sin. And lay hold upon Jesus, who as he saved Noah in the day of water, is able to preserve us in the day of fire. Samson found honey out of that lion which himself had killed. Our sins have killed the Lion of Judah; oh let our faithful prayers suck honey out of him! there is no honey so sweet as his mercy.

Thus having considered the universality, that it was a whole world; the antiquity, that it was the old world; I come in the next place to the impiety, that it was an ungodly world.

"The world of the ungodly." The sins of that world were very grievous, and too heavy for the supportation of the earth: nec medium in malo, nec remedium a malo. These sins began to multiply with the multiplication of men: the seeds of this mischief were sown before the birth of Noah's sons; at their birth, like ill weeds, they sprung abundantly; at last they were so rank and ripe, that God could forbear them no longer. But it seemeth that the great defection was about the seventh age: then Lamech, of Cain's race, fell to bigamy; then was Enoch translated, that his soul might be no longer grieved with the wickedness of the times. Then the righteous abhorring the filthiness of Cain's posterity, separated themselves, and began to call on God. At length the very righteous seed declined, by falling to folly with the daughters of the wicked.

Some Hebrews think that this pregnancy of sin began with the increase of women; whose number gave more occasion of lust, Gen. vi. 1. But this argues no special multiplying of that sex more than the other; but when both were increased together, both were corrupted together. If any ask how the world could be so soon peopled; I reply, how was it after the flood? Ninus king of Assyria, who reigned some two hundred and thirty years after the deluge, is reported to have in his army seven hundred thousand footmen, and two hundred thousand horsemen. The earth was corrupt with their filthy sins; and they are said to be all flesh, Gen. vi. 11, 12: not only their bodies, for that is common to all, but even their souls were carnal. For flesh is taken either according to nature, or according to sin. Man is called flesh, when he is subdued to carnal sense; all the imaginations of his heart continually evil. Wickedness is enlarged by these respects. 1. For generality; all flesh was corrupt: so Adam's sin did spread over all. 2. For continuance; they were exercised in it a thousand years. Continual habit had made it so alimantal, so elemental to them, that they could not live without it. 3. For adhesion; as covetousness cleaves to a man, even while he sleeps, or wakes, or walks, or works, or lives; waxing younger, when all other sins decay with age. 4. For abundance: not only addicted to some special vices, but to all wickedness which their profane hearts could conceive. If their fancies could but imagine it, their hands were ready to do it. 5. For supine carelessness: let Noah preach what he will, and build as he will, let it rain how it will, they are the same men still. 6. For shamelessness: they were grown to such presumption, that they durst sin God in the face: "They declare their sin as Sodom, they hide it not," Isa. iii. 9. Therefore their corruption is said to be "before God," Gen. vi. 11. Thus in general, now for the particulars.

The first act of degeneration was unlawful marriages: "The sons of God saw the daughters of men," &c. Gen. vi. 2. Some think these sons of God were angels, and that they fell for their intemperance with women. But, 1. God destroyed the world, not for the angels' sin, but man's. "My spirit shall not always strive" (he says not, with angels, but) "with man," ver. 3. 2. "The devil was a murderer from the beginning," John viii. 44: but if the angels had fallen for the love of women, then they had not sinned until a thousand years after the creation. (Chrysost.) 3. In heaven "they neither marry, nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels of God," Matt. xxii. 30; therefore angels are not subject to carnal lusts. Some have thought these were devils, who, companying with women, begat giants. But this is ridiculous, for the devils have not generative faculties; and if they could have, yet they are none of the sons of God. We read of a whole legion, six thousand devils in one man, Luke viii. 30; this could not be, if they were corporeal. If elemental was their nature, then were they subject to mutability, to mortality: as Plutarch writes of the death of Pan, a famous devil among the pagans. And how should man's soul be immortal, if these more subtle spirits were mortal? Others think that they were incubi, who assuming airy bodies, in the act of generation are called succubi: and so they imagine that Merlin was begotten of a spirit. Indeed spirits may assume male and female shapes, but are not true bodies. They appear so to the eye, not to the feeling; visible, not palpable. "Handle me, and see; for a spirit hath not flesh and bones," Luke xxiv. 39. But it is objected, that Abraham washed the angels' feet, and discerned them not. For answer, this is the difference between the apparitions of good and bad angels. Unto the good God gave the use of true bodies during that ministry; so that they did eat and drink. The other are not so allowed, therefore are called phantasmata, visions, fancies.

Others think that these sons of God were men tall, and of a great stature; as things excellent in their kind are ascribed to God. Great cities, the cities of God; tall cedars, the trees of God, Psal. civ. 16. But indeed, they were called the sons of God, because they were of the righteous seed; and the other, the daughters of men, because they descended of lewd parents. Even the wicked are the sons of God according to nature, according to their works they are not.

Now see the issue of this unhappy conjunction, giants; which as they were men of a monstrous stature, so of a fierce and tyrannous nature. Thus they were called Nephilim, mighty oppressors; Enim, terrible; because of their pride, Anakim, as it were, in chains of gold; for their strength, Gibborim; for their naughtiness, Zanzummim. Such were Goliath, Ishbubenob, and Og, Deut. iii. 11. Here they are called Nephilim, or falling; both because of their terror, they made men fall to the ground; and for their error, falling themselves from virtue and goodness. These were not from the commixtion of spirits with women, but procreated of men; which is no more against nature, than for dwarfs to come from well-constituted parents, who are as admirable for their smallness, as the other for their tallness. Nor were all thus, but only those born by this unlawful conjunction. For as the root, so was the branch; the marriage impious, and the issue ungracious.

That which was the first occasion of sin, was the occasion of the increase of sin. A woman seduced Adam, women betray these sons of God. The beauty of the apple betrayed the woman, the beauty of these women betrayed the holy seed. Eve saw and lusted, so did they; this was also a forbidden fruit. They looked, liked, lusted, tasted, sinned, died. Sins first creep in at the eyes: except we have made a covenant with them, there is no safety for our souls. This marriage did not beget men so fast as wickedness.

Consider here how dangerous it is for the believer to unite himself to an ungracious spouse. I know that marriage is honourable. The wife before man sinned, was for his society; after he had sinned, for a remedy. Man in himself was only but begun, in woman he was perfected and made up: till then a great part of himself he had in vain and useless. And they that have placed the chief glory in virginity, could never find any fault in matrimony. Man and wife are the original match of all others. All other relative pairs and couples, as father and son, master and servant, king and subject, come from this. When God made Adam, he made only one. When he made Eve, he made not only her, but in her all the world to come. While man was alone, and had both sexes in himself, what could he do to fill the earth? Therefore in his body he bred a she-man; Adam being the mother of Eve, as Eve is the mother of us all. Therefore she is called the mother of the living, because she is a means to continue a kind of immortality among the mortal sons of men; and in some measure to shadow out that immortality which is in heaven. Families, cities, countries, the whole habitable world, the militant, yea, triumphant church, no small part of the kingdom of heaven, ariseth from marriage. St. Hierome himself praiseth marriage, because it begets virgins: The wife being no virgin, is the mother of virgins that be no wives. No marriage, no saints; no generation, no regeneration; no increasing below, no multiplying above: if the earth be not replenished with men, how should heaven be so furnished with saints?

But as the blessings that come by good marriage are innumerable; so be the curses by ill matches many and mischievous. For marriage is a new foundation, whereon men build the future state of their mortality. A man cannot choose himself, he may choose his wife; and in her choice it lies much to mend or mar himself, and, which is more, even his posterity. "Be not unequally yoked with unbelievers," 2 Cor. vi. 14. From hence follow an lliad of evils, and the whole infelicity of life; when matches are made of such as match not: when planets are set together of an unhappy conjunction, malevolent effects must needs issue from them. But it is objected, that the unbelieving husband is sanctified by the believing wife, and the wife by the husband: and "what knowest thou, O wife, whether thou shalt save thy husband? and, O man, whether thou shalt save thy wife?" 1 Cor. vii. 14, 16. This may be, and was not in those times a sufficient cause of divorce. But are not the good perverted by the bad, sooner than the bad converted by the good? Often have you heard how much a superstitious wife, by her curtain lectures, hath wrought upon her Christian husband: when did you hear a believing husband prevail with his misbelieving wife? Marry not thy son to a Canaanite's daughter, for she will turn away his heart from following the Lord, Deut. vii. 14: he is not so likely to turn her.

This hath been full in examples: the Israelites were won by these forbidden matches, to serve other gods, Judg. iii. 6. When Ahab sold himself to wickedness, it was Jezebel his wife that stirred him up, 1 Kings xxi. 25. Thus was Samson the strongest, Judg. xvi., and Solomon the wisest, beguiled; "his wives turned away his heart after other gods," 1 Kings xi. 4. This was Jehoram's ruin; his wife, the daughter of Ahab, undid him, 2 Chron. xxi. 6. When water and earth are tempered together, they make but mire and dirt. What crueller tyrant was ever begotten than Mahomet, who was yet the son of a Christian lady? As the sons of Jacob said of Dinah, We cannot give our sister to one that is uncircumcised, Gen. xxxiv. 14; so let parents say, We may not give our daughter to a person unchristened. Albeit irreligion be not a cause of divorce, yet it is of restraint. We may not marry with all those with whom we must live being married. If adultery may separate a marriage consummated, may not idolatry hinder a marriage not begun? Let no man separate whom God joins; so let no man join whom God separates. We would not have our children marry without our will and consent; and shall they marry without the will, liking, and consent of our Father in heaven?

This was Rebekah's care; "If Jacob take a wife of the daughters of Heth, what good shall my life do me?" Gen. xxvii. 46. Manoa's for Samson; Is there not a wife among thine own people, but thou must go to the Philistines? Judg. xiv. 3. Is there no friend but an enemy? no tree but the forbidden? no helper but a tempter? no wife but the Canaanite? can none please us, but such as displease God? He that is married to such a wife, careth more to please her than God, 1 Cor. vii. 33. Of all the guests bidden to the great feast, he that was married (likely to such a wife) desired not to be excused, but impudently protests, that he cannot come. If from ish, and isha, you cast out jod and he, there remains to that couple nothing but fire, say the rabbins. So wretched is it to couple without God; when the eye makes the match for beauty, or the ear by hearsay, taking a wife upon trust or the hand for money; marrying (though not by picture, yet) for pictures. Themistocles being consulted, whether it were better for a man to marry his daughter to an honest poor man, or to a rich of small virtue and goodness; answered, I had rather have a man that wants money, than money that wants a man. How base is that love, which hath no other weight than riches! How do parents breed an ague in the bones of their children, that shall shake them to their very graves, when the tie of their loves is either portion or proportion only, without regard of either religion or conscience! One said truly, He that weds for state or face, buys a horse to lose a race. There is Cæsar's stamp, and God's stamp: most men marry for Cæsar's stamp; and these are worse than the old world, for they married for Adam's stamp. God's stamp is grace, Cæsar's money, Adam's beauty.

The motive of the old world to this unfortunate conjunction, was beauty; they saw that the daughters of men were fair. This is the common attractive; men place their loves upon Adam's image in the face, rather than upon God's image in the soul. Yet what is that same goodly frame of flesh and blood, but only a natural colour which the Creator hath laid upon dust and ashes; but the effect of well-digested sustenance, not much above that we behold in pictures; a thin, weak veil drawn over a corruptible body; a transient delight of the eye; a glory that fades with life, yea, often before life; a piece of fine glass, that sickness or old age will soon break? Yet is this the snare that hath caught many souls: to enjoy this, David lost his peace for a while, Samson lost his eyes for ever. Thus the Midianites entraped Israel with their dancing whirligigs; and the wisest king was wrought to folly. I do not lay the fault on beauty, God's admirable workmanship upon clay; for who blames a clear and crystal river, because some melancholy, distracted man drowns himself in it? And when this outward ornament is joined with inward lustre, it graceth all actions. But it is the mind's beauty that keeps the other sweet and delectable; a fixed and constant goodness, which, as it disdains all the tinctures of painted hypocrisy, so is far beyond the ruin of time, sickness, or any other mutability: like heaven, which is fair outwardly to our mortal eyes, but shall appear fairer within to our immortal souls. Without this, all affection is ill-placed, and will soon perish. He that loves for no other end but to please his senses, hath a sensual love, little better than brutish.

It is the soul that requires love; and for that only cause which makes it lovely, virtue. The outward worth of beauty is nothing, it is the soul within that makes it precious. When grace and holiness have beautified the principal, then admit the other circumstances and additions, as beauty, birth, or wealth. For these indifferents, by goodness are made good, as fire turns all the objects into itself. The love built upon beauty without this, is not long-lived; but running mad with extravagant desires, rests still unsatisfied. Hence it comes, that God and the church put them together; the devil and lust put them asunder. "He that loveth silver shall not be satisfied with silver," Eccl. v. 10: so nor he that loveth women, for one is not lust's limits. He that affecteth many, shall be satisfied with none. One God hath ordained one woman for one man. One is love's number: he which trespasseth upon plurality, and loseth that content, may be all his life seeking it, but shall never find it. To the reproof and reproach of them be it, that walk the streets, yea, frequent the church, for no other purpose but to feed their eye with such spectacles. When a gallant had the name of a brave soldier, one observed how still in his walking he would turn about to gaze upon women; concluding, that that man could not have a valiant and constant mind, whose head every weak woman could turn and writhe about with her very look. Let this breed in our hearts an abhorring of carnal lusts, a sin the very devil does not commit: pride he knows, malice he knows, flattery, hypocrisy, murder, treason he knows; but incontinence of flesh he wonders at. Let no beauty that sticks upon mortal cheek so far prevail over our affections, as to prostrate those bodies to the service of harlots, that are the dear-bought members of Jesus Christ.

The next apostasy of the old world, was by sensuality: "They did eat, they drank, they married," &c. Luke xvii. 27. But were these sins, or matter of reprehension? Nature hath made them necessary, discretion voluntary, and only some circumstances arbitrary. Did God drown them for this? No, but their sensuality and security in these brought destruction. "Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; eat, drink, and be merry," Luke xii. 19. This was not his fault, that he thought he had enough, but that he meant to lie down and wallow in it. Lawful actions depraved by bad circumstances, become damnable sins. Is this a time to receive money, and garments, and vineyards? saith the prophet to his servant, 2 Kings v. 26; all which at another time, and in another manner, had been approved. Things beneficial in their use, are dangerous in their abuse or miscarriage. Without a wooden conveyance we cannot cross the seas; yet if that vessel sink, all the passengers are lost. That worldly things are good, is easily perceived by our care to get them: that their abuse is deadly, many souls feel, that cannot return to complain. It is easier for a camel to enter a needle's eye, than a rich man to enter heaven's gate, Matt. xix. 24. It is not certain, it is not easy, it is not likely, and (it may so fall out, that) it is not possible for a rich man to be saved. Riches commonly cool all heavenly heats, force away the divine meditations of spiritual causes, as too melancholy fits; and bring a man to such a fool's paradise, as one among Penelope's suitors, that went so oft with his friend, till he was caught himself.

It is likely, that more go to hell for abusing lawful things, than for using things simply unlawful. Gross sins appear in their own ugly forms, terrible as deformities and devils; but who suspects his eating, his drinking, his common discourse? Who fears that his building should be laid in the foundation of sin? or that his marrying a wife should unsolder his conjunction with Christ? But there is nothing better for a man, than that he should eat and drink, and let his soul enjoy good in his labour, Eccl. ii. 24. And doth not St. Paul call the forbidding of meats and marriage, the doctrine of devils? 1 Tim. iv. 1, 3. We grant it; neither would we have any man make the way to heaven harder and more rugged than God himself hath made it. This is the liberty (and indeed of whom else, but) of Christians.

Pleasures have their allowance, with two limits.

The one of quality, they must be good and lawful; for God that hath given leave to be merry, hath not given leave to be mad. There is a good mirth, if men could hit on it, called, to be merry and wise. It is no praise to be sparing of a vicious delight, for the very taste is deadly. Admit the serpent's head, his body will ask no leave. The other of quantity: for measure, God hath hedged in man's appetite, like that foaming element; if he break over those dams, the inundation is perilous. As delights have their warrants, so also their terms; and it is no hard matter to fault in this indulgence. Is the work of our salvation effected, our common duties performed? We may then eat, drink, and be merry. We are not born for play; but for labour, as the sparks fly upward. Our recreations should be like our physic, not our diet: the latter we take when we are well, to keep us so; the other when we are sick, to make us well.

Some things are to be avoided, not because they are ill, but near to ill: it is good to leave something that we may take, for fear of taking that we should leave. There should be difference betwixt a beast, that devoureth all within his tether; and a man, to whom God hath given reason to rule his appetite. It is sin's policy, to steal in by the law; when men range in the borders and extremities of their freedom; and even from that takes an argument for us to allow it, which was made on purpose to condemn it. The Jews might give forty stripes: yet St. Paul confesseth he received but nine and thirty; their reason of forbearing the full number, was lest their fingers should itch to give another. What folly is it, when a man hath field-room enough, to ride on the brink of a river! The note that comes too near in the margin, will skip into the text at the next impression. It is a dangerous query, how near a man may go to hell, and yet escape the devil. Will any wise man try how near he may come to the infected house, and yet escape the plague? or holding by the rotten rails of a turret, presumptuously vault over, in a proud glory of his venturousness? Israel had room enough in the plains of Moab; but venturing too far, they were snared with Midian. Let no man cast with himself, how old he may be before he needs return, lest he reckon without his host. If I forget Jerusalem in my mirth, &c. Psal. cxxxvii. 5. It is easy to forget heaven in our mirth. If God allow a handful, men are apt to fathom an armful. Pleasures are like the popish relics, the interest is more than the principal.

Through all creatures let us look to their Maker; through all delights, to their Giver. "Rejoice in the Lord alway," Phil. iv. 4; then in the midst of all the changes and chances of worldly contents, there will be an immutability of joy in God. There are two sorts reprehensible.

First, they that avoid all lawful delights for fear of sin. As if it were not possible for a Christian to separate the gold from the dross, but he must needs cast away the ore. Will any simple Jew condemn the clear streams of Jordan, because they run into the Dead Sea? We see some proud of their fantastical clothes, dressed up like children's puppets, or antics in a pageant; must we therefore go naked? Some are drunk with wine, may not therefore a sober man drink it? Is there no physic but opium? must we either be sensually wicked or senselessly stupid? Why did God place man in Paradise, but to solace himself? why hath he given us such variety of creatures, but for use? Doth the Lord invite us to this feast, and we depart (like sullen guests) from so rich a table hungry? This pretence of mortified strictness doth injury, both to our liberty, and our Maker's liberality. Every good gift comes from above; there is nothing but good from heaven: he that rejects the gifts, wrongs the Giver. God cannot abide such a discontented answer, Keep thy rewards to thyself, and give thy gifts to another, Dan. v. 17. Many great kings have been blessed saints: they could not have been kings without a number of earthly pleasures; they could not have been saints with earthly affections. If God therefore have mingled us a pleasant cup, let us cheerfully drink it, and give thanks to Jesus Christ. Charity is not strait-laced, but yields much latitude to the lawful use of indifferent things: these are fit for those that are fit for them.

Next, they are to be blamed, that with neglect of better things, settle and fix themselves upon these. It is the heart that makes all evil, when that lying speech of Satan is borrowed, All these are mine. Christ teacheth us, first to seek the kingdom of heaven, then shall the rest be cast upon us. When the bargain is made for salvation, the rest come in like lumber. When you have fed heartily on the body of your Saviour, and gotten assurance to drink the wine of heaven, then eat, drink, and be merry. First marry thy son's soul to Christ, then his body to a virtuous wife. The factor employed in foreign parts, first despatcheth his master's business, then his own. How preposterous is it, to omit that only thing in this world for which we came into the world, to serve our Maker!

The last sin of the old world, was security. The Lord's forbearance did so little stir them, that they were scarce waked with his vengeance. The savagest creatures, lions, tigers, bears, by God's instinct came to seek succour in the ark: men did not seek it. Even brutishness is more sensible than corrupted reason. The Sybarites, that no disturbance might come near their beds of violets, banished all cocks and clocks: the former must not break their sleeps, nor the other vex them with report of the fugitive time. Epimenides the Cretan slept fourscore years in a cave; some say but forty, and that was enough in conscience; beyond a miracle, and doubtless beyond the truth. But the old world slept a hundred and twenty years, and all Noah's hammering about the ark wakened them not. Oh that the conscience of man, in the midst of so many sins provoking God, so many temptations assailing his own soul, so many enemies against him, so many dangers about him, should still be secure! She is observed by her own eye, when none else mark her; chased by her own foot, when none else follow her; hath a thousand witnesses within her, when there is no outward stir against her: and yet the wicked sleep.

Satan, like Jael to Sisera, or Judith to Holofernes, watcheth till a man be asleep, and then kills him. Preachers cry, but sinners will not waken: and as in places of judicature they often determine to hear causes, but do not hear to determine causes; so men commonly remember to hear, but do not hear to remember. Pliny writes of some bears so sleepy, that they are hardly roused with blows and wounds. Many discourse of religion, as men talk in their dreams; they speak wonders of goodness, yet are no such manner of men, neither the one working, nor the other waking. "This wisdom descendeth not from above, but is earthly, sensual, devilish. For where envying and strife is, there is confusion and every evil work. But the wisdom that is from above is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, and easy to be entreated, full of love and good fruits, without partiality, and without hypocrisy," James iii. 15—17.

Let us take the apostle's caution, Be sober and watch. Be sober; for ebriety is a drink-offering to the devil. And watch; for security is a porpoise before a tempest: keep your souls waking, then shall your bodies sleep in quiet. As there may be a corporeal watching when the mind sleeps, so there may be a spiritual watching when the body sleeps. Temptations, like Delilah, tell us a fair tale, but their end is to bring us asleep, and pluck out our eyes. But if in all our earthly business we still carry a heavenly mind, the judgment of God shall not, as it did the old world, ever take us napping. The house doth every day get some dust, therefore let it every day be swept: the soul contracts some sins, the besom to sweep it is made of examination and repentance. At night, ere we shut our eyes, let us open our hearts, and cleanse our consciences: before we shut the door let us cast out the dust. He never breaks his sleep for debt, that pays as he takes up. Let us watch in righteousness, this is the way to sleep in peace. When the stomach is obstructed, the body takes but ill rest, and the slumbers are broken off with distracted dreams. If the conscience be oppressed, in vain the soul looks for quiet. If hardness of heart, like opium, shall consoporate it, that sleep is mortal. The shepherds were watching over their flocks by night, Luke ii. 8. As Christ found the shepherds watching over their flocks at his first coming, so may he find us all watching over our souls at his second coming, in the glory of his kingdom.

I conclude. In this glass let us see the present state of this world. Certainly we may vie sins with them, and stand upon comparisons, without bating them one ace for heinousness. If the world were then foul, it is now foulness itself. Some things are so clear, that they refuse trial; and some so filthy, that they abhor purgation. Nor do I confine this corruption to some parts of it; as there be national sins, peculiar to age, to country, to constitution: mores sequuntur humores. But all the world is sick and rotten: paganism possessing a great moiety of the whole, and heresy perverting the half of that is left. We may say of it, as Tully to Antony, It is wretched if it feel it, more wretched if it feel it not. Men perish because they are ignorant of their perishing: yea, they more perish, because they are ignorant of their not knowing.

Let us hear St. Paul delivering the state of our old world, and see how our experience accords with his prophecy, 2 Tim. iii. 2—4. "Men shall be lovers of their own selves." Have we not seen this self-love stalking in the garb of impudence, vomiting disgraces against all men, and arrogating to itself? fly-blowing good things to deter others, that himself might devour them? "Covetous." O they swarm like the frogs in Egypt; that, as a shrewd censurer said, stand where you will, and of every ten men that pass by, nine and three-quarters are covetous. When the uplander wondered to see a white crow, the fen-man answered, In our country we wonder to see any black ones. It is no marvel to see one covetous, it is marvel to see one not covetous. "Boasters;" a great rabble. Some boast their portion, others their proportion: rather than want matter of ostentation, they will boast their vices: as if one should be proud of his scabs, or make a scarf of his halter. "Proud;" a universal disease; the rich display it in their wearing, the poor in their swearing. I will not tell you, that this idol goes in strange and fantastical dress; that is indeed an inseparable sign, yet but one; you shall have her sit as pertly under a broad felt pulled down to the eyes, as under a beaver; and find her as soon in a little Geneva-set, as in a great Spanish ruff.

"Blasphemers." Men have sworn themselves hoarse with oaths. There is a word that is clothed about with death, Ecclus. xxiii. 12; and that word is too frequent in the jaws of men, till the fearful name of God be made as vile as common air. "Disobedient to parents." This is so arrogated to the young, and so tolerated by the old, that for this cause God shortens their days, and sets parents a weeping for the loss of their children's bodies, that regarded not the loss of their souls. "Unthankful." This vice hath usurped a propriety of that which is only borrowed: customary fruition hath made men scarce think themselves beholden to God. Otherwise, why do not rich men abound in praises, as God hath made them abound in riches? Perhaps they do not think their riches came in God's name, and therefore cannot with a good conscience thank him for them. "Unholy," or profane. God hath made all us, and all ours; he reserves but the tenth of our goods, and the seventh of our time, but our whole selves. We are his peculiar, Tit. ii. 14: now shall we make that virgin common, prostituted to every base gipsy, pride, lust, avarice, which the Lord hath redeemed, and required holy and peculiar to himself?

"Without natural affection." When men wilfully transgress against grace, God suffers them to sin even against nature. They that have lost the love of their Father, shall lose the love of their children. It is just, that for being false to their best Friend in heaven, they should neglect their friends on earth, and be neglected of both. "Truce-breakers." There is a faith that knits us in a covenant with God, and a faithfulness that ties us in a covenant with man. We are truce-breakers in both; have broke the vow made in our baptism, and are so full of levity, that there is more credit given to the print of our seals than to the faith of our souls. If any nation break truce with us, who wonders, when we have broken truce with God? "False accusers." This was wont to be the devil's own office only; but now, as if men grudged Satan the honour of calumnation, they monopolize it into their own hands. The makebate runs from house to house, and carries the burning coals of contention, till he sets them all a-flame, and then warms his own fingers at the fire. "Incontinent." The devil hopes that this vice in the next age will be held a virtue, for it is gotten already out of the disreputation of a sin. Drunken houses and brothels vie for number: in every part of this great metropolis you may see both these snares. "Fierce." The violences of former times were courtesies to ours. Then it was a friendly imposition, You shall stay and eat with me: now it is a friendly enforcement, You shall stay and drink with me: and if there be any failing in the quantity, they are as fierce as tigers. "Despisers of those that are good." It is the honest man's commendation, to condemn a vile person, but to honour them that fear the Lord, Psal. xv. 4. And David's delight was in the saints, and such as excel in virtue, Psal. xvi. 3. To honour virtue: to honour virtue in rags, and to loathe vice though in a robe of state. But now let in the jester; Ibis Homere foras: they like him worse, that goes about to make them better. "Traitors;" who because they cannot warp a prince's justice to their own humours, will strike at that sacred blood. If the former world had any actors to do it, this world hath more, even patrons to defend it. "Heady:" that whereas God hath made man's reason to go foremost, his hand after it; these do first, and think afterwards; and then beat their wits to make good what their wills have made necessary. "High-minded:" that are like chimneys; they overlook all the house, yet are the foulest part of it. They think that neither God nor man knows their worth, nor rewards them to their merits. "Lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God." After this long catalogue of particulars, as if the apostle were weary of the enumeration, he gives you this, the sum of all profaneness. God did form them, pleasures deform them; God would save them, pleasures would destroy them: they are madmen to love pleasures more than God.

Thus I have showed you some representation of these evil times; the works of the old world, the works of the old man. They are old in your practice, old in your remembrance; oh that so old, that they were dead in your performance! Novus annus, novus animus: let me tell you of a new lesson; indeed more truly old than the other; for goodness was before sin, truth ancienter than falsehood; but new to your relish, new to your apprehension, new to your approbation, new to your practice. "Whatsoever things are true," that do not savour of hypocrisy; "honest," not of vanity; "just," not of iniquity; "pure," not of obliquity; "lovely," not of deformity; "of a good report," not of infamy: if virtue hath given them worth and weight; and praise, an ornament of grace and beauty; receive, hear, learn, think, do these things, "and the God of peace shall be with you," Phil. iv. 8, 9.

Such is the fearful estate of the world by reason of sin. Oh that we might see an end of these things, before we see an end of all things! "Help, Lord, for the godly fail from among the children of men," Psal. xii. 1. When ungodliness so reigns, that piety is almost quite lost, it is high time to cry, Help, Lord: and indeed, Quid jam nisi vota supersunt? Oh may the virtue of that blood, which is able to buy off all our sins, mortify sin in us, and purge sin from us; that our remaining days may be spent in a due preparation for our great audit, at the second appearing of Jesus Christ. Amen.

"Bringing in the flood upon the world of the ungodly." The eyes of all things look up unto thee, O Lord, Psal. cxlv. 15; not only expecting their conservation by thy providence, but also attending thy direction for their obedience. The winds from their caves, the rain from their bottles, the waters from their channels, all answer the Lord, as the Israelites did Joshua, "All that thou commandest us we will do, and whithersoever thou sendest us we will go," Josh. i. 16. We are ready to be charged; what shall we do? He saith, Clouds, pour down, seas, break loose, smite the world, drown it. Lo, how they concur in their ready execution, and unite their forces to a universal flood. The points I insist upon are three; how this deluge was caused, how far it prevailed, how long it continued; with some useful observations derived from them.

First, how it was caused. It was a work of Almighty power, which also used the concurrence of some natural means. "All the fountains of the great deep were broken up, and the windows of heaven were opened," Gen. vii. 11. The Hebrews have called fountains, gnaim, which signifieth an eye; eyes being like fountains to distil tears. This eruption of the great deep, was not the Tartarean waters about the centre of the earth; they could not surge so high. But either the sea, which some think to be higher than the earth, and restrained only by God's providence from overflowing it: "Hitherto shalt thou come, but no further: and here shall thy proud waves be stayed," Job xxxviii. 11. In nature it is acknowledged, that the place of waters is above the earth: therefore Aristotle calls it a strange thing, that a light thing should be placed below a heavy. Indeed the waters were created higher, but depressed by God's command. At first thou didst cover the earth with the deep as with a garment; and the waters stood above the mountains. But at thy rebuke they fled; at the voice of thy thunder they hasted away. They go up by the mountains, and down by the valleys, unto the place which thou hast founded for them. Thou hast set a bound which they shall not pass over, nor turn again to cover the earth, Psal. civ. 6—9. The sand is this bound by "a perpetual decree," Jer. v. 22: though they toss and roar, they shall not prevail. And it is fondly imagined, that the sea is now higher than the earth. "They that go down to the sea in ships," Psal. cvii. 23: down, therefore not higher. Thou hast "founded the earth upon the seas, and established it upon the floods," Psal. xxiv. 2: upon the seas, therefore not under them: and so founded, not so only forced. He stretcheth out the earth above the waters, Psal. cxxxvi. 6; therefore not the waters above the earth. "All the rivers run into the sea," Eccl. i. 7: but the natural course of the waters is downward. But how then find we springs in the tops of mountains? Not by miracles, but natural; God so disposing them to exercise their natural motions. Not that they come of some vaporous sweat or distillation of the earth; for then they could not so vehemently boil up. Nor by the transcendent height of the sea; as a spring rising in a hill, and conveyed in pipes, will force the ascent to the same height it bears at the fountain. But the sea doth so violently rush into those receptacles of the earth, which she finds hollow, that it forceth springs even upon mountains. Most interpreters by this "deep," understand the deep heads and springs of waters within the earth, which were opened and enlarged to this inundation; those "waters under the earth," Exod. xx. 4, the rivers and deep gulf gushing forth.

"The windows of heaven." This signifies not an eruption of any waters in the crystal heavens, as they call that above the starry sky. Some have conceived waters to be above the firmament to mitigate the heat of the stars. But, 1. The waters are a heavy substance, and should be kept there against nature. 2. If these waters had come from thence, there must have been a dissolution of the starry heaven. 3. The watery heaven should then be a vacant place. 4. The celestial bodies have no need to be refrigerated; for they are of no fiery and elemental nature, they admit no qualities; the sun itself not being hot really, but in effect. But it is objected, "Ye waters that be above the heavens," Psal. cxlviii. 4. By heaven is understood there the lower region of the air. So it is said, "The Lord thundered in the heavens, hailstones and coals of fire," Psal. xviii. 13: but thunder, lightning, and hail, come not properly from heaven, but from the air. There be three heavens: aereum; so we called the fowls of heaven, that is, of the air: sydereum; so the firmament is called heaven: empyreum, the fiery heaven; so called, not for the heat, but for the glory. If the air be so comfortable, that is but lightened with the sun, what is the heaven, where the sun itself is! If that be so refulgent, how glorious is the heaven where God himself dwells!

This opening of the windows is the breaking of the clouds, wherein the waters are contained. "He bindeth up the waters in his thick clouds; and the cloud is not rent under them," Job xxvi. 8. Here he unbound those vessels, and made vents for the rain like windows. Seneca writing of the general deluge, which he thinks not past but to come, gives these reasons: 1. The swelling and overflowing of the seas. 2. The earth itself putrifying and resolving into waters. 3. The conjunction of celestial bodies: as the world shall be drowned, saith he, when such stars concur in Cancer; so it shall be burned when the same company meet in Capricorn. But, indeed these seem to be true causes: 1. The issuing forth of waters from the earth. 2. The violent eruption of the seas. 3. The continual rain from the clouds. 4. Which were increased by the liquefaction and distilling of the air into water.

But the principal Agent here was the Lord: "I will cause it to rain upon the earth," Gen. vii. 4. It was his special work, by the ministry of angels, after no ordinary manner. There was no fatal necessity in it; for seeing God created the world in such wisdom and order, that one part should concur to the preservation, not to the destruction, of another, it is vainly imputed to the constellation of the stars; for they can have no general operation over all the earth, but only in that place where their influence worketh.

The instruction we collect is this, that all God's creatures are at his beck, even the greatest lions on earth, whales in the sea, devils in hell. What is greater than the heaven? Yet this ever-wheeling body shall suspend its swift diurnal motion at his command, to do service to his servants; "Sun, stand thou still upon Gibeon; and thou, moon, in the valley of Ajalon," Josh. x. 12. The sun cometh forth as a bridegroom out of his chamber, and rejoiceth as a strong man to run a race, Psal. xix. 5; yet to confirm the faith of Hezekiah, he shall fly back as a coward, ten degrees at once in the dial of Ahaz, Isa. xxxviii. 8. What is more huge, firm, and unfit to be dealt withal, than the earth? yet he makes it tremble, and open the jaws to devour his enemies; if he touch the hills, they smoke for it, Psal. civ. 32. The whale wallows up and down the sea like a mountain, yet was he tamed to become the prophet's chariot, and bring him to land, Jonah ii. 10. The famished lions forbear Daniel, they dare not touch the dish which God had reserved for himself. And for Jonah, how he should lie in the bowels of that leviathan three days, not concocted and stifled, is no wonder to them that contemplate the power of God. The belly of the fish could not be hotter to the prophet, than the fiery furnace was to the three servants; neither is it more to bring a living man after three days from a fish, than to raise a dead man after four days from the grave.

The angels are of a powerful nature: yet the good are made ministering spirits for the heirs of salvation, Heb. i. 14; the bad God ties in chains, and muzzles their malicious forces. Those that had prepared themselves to slay the third part of men, were bound up in the great river Euphrates, till he loose them, Rev. ix. 14, 15. He needs not the posts of Persia, which Haman used, nor the dromedaries of Egypt, to signify his will; but "his word runneth very swiftly," Psal. cxlvii. 15. The day is his, and the night is his; the open place and the secret; the very wings of the wind shall carry his precepts. The sea had a charge for the prophet, as the prophet had a charge for Nineveh, Jonah i. God said to the one, Arise and go, and he went not: he speaks to the other, Arise and go, and it went; fulfilling its Maker's command with all diligence. Thus all creatures have arms and legs, when God bids them go; spirit and life is put into them, activity to use them, wisdom to direct them, when they should punish. The mariners were tying a chain of delays, with a number of shifts, desirous to save or reprieve the guilty, Jonah i. 13; but in vain they labour to evade the counsel of God. While the men are in advice, the winds and seas are in action: the men are backward, the other go forward with their service: the men lose time, the other admit no dilation.

It is the Lord of hosts to whom all these obey; "fire and hail, snow and vapour, stormy wind and tempest, fulfilling his word," Psal. cxlviii. 8. There is no Neptune, admiral of the seas, nor Æolus, master of the winds, nor Mars, general of the wars, nor Jupiter, king of thunders; but only the Lord. Who divided and diverted Jordan? This retrogress was no ordinary thing; we might well say, "What ailed thee, O Jordan, that thou wast driven back?" Psal. cxiv. 5. Many being crossed by the creatures, fall to blaspheming them; but let us reprove them, as the prophet did Sennacherib; "Whom hast thou blasphemed? and against whom hast thou exalted thy voice? even against the Holy One of Israel," 2 Kings xix. 22. Whom are you angry withal? Do the rain and waters displease you? Alas, they are servants; if their Master bid smite, they must not forbear. They may say truly, what Rabshakeh usurped, Are we come without the Lord? he said, Go and chastise them, Isa. xxxvi. 10. Thus was it in this deluge; the Lord brought the flood. "The waters saw thee, O God, the waters saw thee," Psal. lxxvii. 16; they heard thy voice, and came streaming out of their cells. We are placed on the earth, as in the midst betwixt two swallowing pits; the waters of the sea below us, and the waters of the firmament above us; if the one were not kept down, and the other held up, by the power of God, they would drown us every moment. But if it be easy for him to alter the course of nature for the destruction of his enemies, he can with more ease keep the course of nature for the preservation of his friends.

The next circumstance is, how far it prevailed. This was even to the overwhelming of the whole earth; that not the tallest cedars, nor loftiest buildings, nor highest mountains could appear; even fifteen cubits upwards. Some mountains are said to be of an exceeding height; therefore cavillers find impossibility in these natural causes, for the waters to transcend them fifteen cubits. So neither the gapings of the sea, nor the sluices of the earth, nor the cataracts of heaven, with the help of all those signs which they call watery; as Cancer, Pisces, Pleiades, Orion; and among the planets, Venus and Luna, could do it. We need not here answer, that the superior and inferior waters did meet together; as the mists, which are waters above, and the springs, which are waters below, meet often on the tops of mountains. But what need arguments from natural causes, when every believer of the Scriptures perceives here the supernatural finger of God? So he commanded, so the creatures obeyed, and so the wicked were destroyed. From hence we may collect four meditations.

1. That no power of man is able to withstand the will of God; it must be accomplished, though a whole world perish. It shall stand firmer than the firmament; "Whatsoever the Lord pleased, that did he in heaven, in earth, in the seas, and all deep places," Psal. cxxxv. 6. What can a fly do against a bulwark? or man against God? unless he could fee and corrupt the heavens, with all that therein is; the earth and sea, with all that therein is; there is no rescuing of that which the Lord will smite. This the damned prove in hell by woeful experience; always willing what is and shall be ever absent, and always nilling what is and shall be ever present. In eternity they shall not obtain what they wish, and shall sustain what they do not wish. (Bern.) The men rowed hard to deliver the prophet, but the sea was tempestuous against them, Jonah i. 13. Man roweth, and God bloweth; there be arms for the one, winds for the other; which is likeliest to prevail? How much against how little! The ocean with his fury, against one wooden vessel; great waves against small strokes. Such are all devices and endeavours against the Lord. In the proverb, Ocnus weaves a rope, and an ass stands by and bites it off.

How impossible will it be for the wicked to stand in the day of judgment! If all the sinners on the earth, with all the devils in hell, oppose the Judge, it is less than for one unarmed man to set upon a legion of well-appointed soldiers. There is no fortification against, no evasion from, the Lord. Fugitive Jonah gotten to Joppa, and thence to sea, might think all safe: but lo, presently a pursuivant is despatched from heaven to attach him; vengeance is shipped in a whirlwind, and sails aloft in the air, to overtake him. If a still spirit cannot charm sinners, God hath a turbulent spirit, which is a more severe master, to enforce them. "There be spirits that are created for vengeance, which in their fury lay on sore strokes, to appease the wrath of him that made them," Eccles. xxxix. 28. If they deny appearance in his court of justice, there be pursuivants enough to fetch them in: his writ of attachment must be served. There is no dealing with God, but by prayers and peace-offerings. How vain were their shifts in this deluge! could they have laid mountain on mountain, and upon the top of all erected a tower higher than Babel was ever meant; yet He that sitteth in the heavens would laugh, the Lord would have them in derision, Psal. ii. 4; and smiling at their folly make an end of their ruin.

2. That strange sins meet with strange punishments. The monstrous and giantly sins of those monstrous giants we have heard; they were wonderful, yet the plague is of no less wonder. A continued rain of forty days, a prevailing deluge of fifteen cubits; this was without example before it, nor shall any match be after it, but the deluge of fire at the last. Sodom was guilty of a strange and unnatural sin, therefore destroyed with a strange and unnatural plague; hell out of heaven. Nadab offers strange fire, and suffers strange fire. Cain committed a strange murder, in killing his brother, the fourth part of the world; and strange was his punishment, to be a runagate in his own land; till he finds that he killed himself more than his brother. Oh how bitter is the end of sin, yea, without end bitter! Jonah admitted a wonderful neglect; the chastisement comes little short of wonder. Pursued by a tempest, discovered by a lot, condemned by himself, thrown overboard by his friends, wrapped in weeds, in the bottom of a depth, devoured by a whale; without light, without food, without company, without comfort; drowned, and not drowned; devoured, but not digested; alive, and yet as dead; so terrified in conscience, as if a reprobate; his soul in a swoon, his life at the last cast, the gasps and pangs of death upon him, the very throbs of desperation oppugning him, that his hope of eternal life was in his sense exiled: here was a punishment to the admiration of all the world.

The monstrous sin of this land, drunkenness, (and we may so call it, for it turns men into monsters,) is answered by as strange a punishment. What living man ever saw such a summer? (Anno 1621.) All eyes behold, all tongues confess, that it hath been strange weather for the season; but their hearts consider not how strange the sin is that procured it. There was a universal dearth, and it came to pass in the days of Claudius Cæsar, Acts xi. 28. The world's emperor bred the world's estate. The vices of princes infect the people, that qualis rex, talis grex. This Claudius was an insatiate drinker; his own mother called him a monster, a work of nature begun, not finished. No marvel if dearth comes in the days of Claudius; if God deny fruits to a drunken generation. We may justly fear a famine, and expect (not as Christ said, The harvest is great, and the labourers are few; but) that the harvest should be small, and the labourers many. If the Lord thus forbear to smite us, it is not to reward our repentance, but from the good pleasure of his grace. Howsoever, let us abhor the sin, whereupon follow so many mischiefs. As murder and outrage; violentia in vinolentia. Poverty: the children come to weep for bread, because their prodigal fathers have drunk it. Scandals: the honours of the noble are traduced, while the drunkard sits like a Cæsar, taxing all the world. Blasphemies: for such are the graces that come by the inspiration of the pot. Impudent demeanours: for sumptuous potations inflame presumptuous actions. Uncleanness: Bacchus is but a pander to Venus. Discovery of secrets: Noah being drunken revealed those secrets that lay hid six hundred years. Wicked fellowships: for such a trick or quality of insatiate drinking, the devil himself was once called Robin Good-fellow. There was a street in Rome called the sober street, because there was never a drinking house in it; find such a street in London, and chronicle it. I have no thought of invective against the creature; drink wine ad mensam, sed ad mensuram. Only let me tell you of better wine, out of God's own cellar, Cant. ii. 5. There be inebriated, Psal. xxxvi. 8. O felix et paucis nota voluptas! Christ hath begun to us, let us pledge him a health indeed, Psal. cxvi. 13; a saving health unto all nations, Psal. lxxvii. 2.

3. God's favour and anger changeth the use of the creatures. The rain from above, and the fountains below, are things we cannot lack; yet did his wrath make these the instruments of the world's desolation. He can turn principal helps to principal plagues. The wind is a fan to purge the air, as the lungs lie by the heart to do it good: it is the only means of sailing; yet how often hath it brought the vessel to ruin! Children, the dearest jewels of love, the living pictures of their parents, are often made their heaviest scourges. The wife, one half of man's self, the best of temporal blessings, becomes not seldom the fearfullest cross. The quails, so dainty flesh, were Israel's ratsbane; and the children of the prophets died by a bitter herb in the pot ordained for their sustenance. Fire, so unsparable an element, consumeth a whole city in God's anger. The earth, that firmly supports us, hath swallowed the wicked; the bread, that nourisheth, choked them. All which should make us fearful of offending, lest our comforts become our corrosives; the delight of our eyes, our eye-sores; our tables a snare, and that which should have been for our wealth, an occasion of falling, Psal. lxxix. 22. God's displeasure upon our sin, is able to turn nature upside down, that, like Sennacherib, we become the spoil of our own bowels.

There is no confidence to be put in worldly things; for if the earth itself be destroyed, what shall become of the temporalities it beareth? The foundation being ruined, the building cannot stand. What became of all that gold and silver, which in hoards and heaps the covetous had gathered? what became of their houses so stately and sumptuous? what, of the curious gardens, delightful arbours, the spacious bounds of oppression extorted from the poor? Who was the richest man, when all found one swallowing grave? The trees grow different in the forest; some greater, some straighter, some broader, some taller, some younger, some older, some fruitfuller, some doted. But when they are hewn down by the axe, and cast into the fire, who can distinguish them by their ashes, and say, This was an oak, that a cedar, the other a poplar? So in death and dust, who can say, This was the skull of a king; that of a lawyer, this of a client; that of a politician, this of a fool; that of an officer, this of a beggar? Such a one is rich, but he owes much: tarry till he hath paid all his debts, what is he then? As a man that hath his house of cedar, but owes for his fine and rent. Worldly riches are like the rivers in Job, chap. vi. 16, 17. In winter there is water enough in them, when there is no need of it. In summer, when we expect it, and should use it to quench our thirst, they are dry.

The devil, like the pope, forgeth a donation: All is delivered unto me, all is mine, Luke iv. 6. But question him like a thief at the bar: How is it thine? Delivered to me. But by whom? Nay, by whom he cannot tell; the time he remembers not, the place he hath forgotten; as much as to say, they are none of his. "Riches make themselves wings, they fly away as an eagle toward heaven," Prov. xxiii. 5. All riches have wings, and fly away: the evil-gotten, like Noah's raven, come back no more; the good and well-gotten, like Noah's dove, return with an olive-branch of peace. They are called riches of this world; would you have them go out of the world, and follow you past the grave? The dog will go with you so long as you go with his master; but if you leave him, he will leave you. They are seldom profitable, often pernicious, always dangerous. All those be good arguments, which are from the proper cause to the proper effect; yet they may fail by the intervention of a miracle. It is proper unto fire to burn, yet that vehement fire did not burn the three servants of God. It is proper to the sea to drown those that be cast into it, yet it did not drown the prophet in the very depth of it. It is proper to the sun to move, yet it stood still at the prayer of Joshua. Proper for it to go from east to west, yet for Hezekiah's confirmation it went from west to east. This was proper to them, and that they did not produce such effects, it was by miracle. So it is proper to worldly riches to insnare souls; if they do not, it is by miracle. They that worship the world, will flatter the devil.

Let this teach us to contemn the world, which we are sure shall be destroyed. Indeed, we may desire temporal things, according to our condition and requisite measure; but still with the saints' estimation of them, that threw them down at the apostle's feet, Acts iv. 35. St. Peter forsook all, yet the pope in his right engrosseth all. The rabbins say, that Moses, being a child, had Pharaoh's crown given him to play withal, and he cast it down to the ground, and kicked it about: as it were a sign of his future vili-pending temporal things, that he should esteem "the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures in Egypt," Heb. xi. 26. Christ's counsel is, Sell all that thou hast, and give to the poor, Luke xviii. 22: sell it, or if no man will buy it, give it; or if no man will take it, leave it; it is not worth thy keeping, especially not worth thy carking: do thou part from it, rather than it should part thee from Christ. He that impoverisheth his soul to enrich his body, is more mad than he that kills his horse to lose his money at a race. But, alas, "how are the things of Esau searched out!" Obad. 6; the things of this world sought after, by oppression, fraud, usury; as if this were the only end of getting, to have. But when all the poor members of Christ are clothed and filled, then put thy money to the bank. Howsoever the covetous, for one scruple of gold, will make no scruple of conscience; yet let us love temporal things, as poor people beg, for God's sake. Thus in the destruction of the world by fire, as it was once by water, when the wicked shall lose all, we shall lose nothing; because we reserve what we had, the favour of God, the kingdom of heaven, and the glorious riches laid up for us in Jesus Christ.

The last circumstance is, how long this flood continued. The exact time hath much puzzled interpreters: I will not perplex you with it. Only the plain text saith thus: It rained forty days, the waters prevailed a hundred and fifty days; then they began to abate, but so slowly, that it was the tenth month before the very tops of the mountains did appear. In all, the continuance seemeth to be upon a full year. Divines observe, that it began in the spring, the second month, which answereth to our May. 1. The world is then supposed to have taken its beginning; the plants then sprouting, beasts engendering, the ground aptest for tilling. Now that this was the time of the overflowing appears, because from the creation to the flood are reckoned just 1656 even years. 2. The first month being Nisan, which answereth to part of our March, part of April, and this being the second, proves clearly that it fell out in the spring. Howsoever this reckoning was discontinued in Egypt, (for the Egyptians began their year from the month Ptho, which answers to our September,) yet Moses here makes no new institution, but reneweth the old account. 3. That this flood might not be imputed to any natural causes, but only to God's power; the waters increasing in summer, which is a time for drought, and decreasing in winter, when naturally they do swell and rise. 4. That it might be more grief to the wicked, to perish in the midst of their pleasure and abundance; eating and drinking, making marriages and merriments, Matt. xxiv. 38: they were taken away in the height of their jollity. At this time the flood ceased; for in the eleventh month after the flood, the dove brought an olive leaf, the sign of the spring. And at the coming forth of the ark they presently began to multiply: now the aptest season for engendering is the spring, especially for fowls. Besides, if it had not then been a growing time, herbs and plants putting forth, where had been food for their sustentation?

Thus long it continued: at last in the midst of wrath God remembers mercy; and as he corrected with his rod of affliction, so he upholdeth with his staff of consolation, Psal. xxiii. 4. As in the ark he kept some seed alive to replenish the earth, when the rest perished; so he ceased the deluge, and at last delivered them out. "God remembered Noah, and every living thing," Gen. viii. 1; he remembered the very beast. "O Lord, thou preservest man and beast," Psal. xxxvi. 6. Xenocrates a heathen philosopher is commended for his pitiful heart, who succoured in his bosom a poor sparrow, that being pursued by a hawk came flying to him; and afterward let her go, saying, that he had not betrayed his poor suppliant.

Thus God sustained Noah and the rest for his sake, in a dark place, a whole year; being even then his light and comfort. "Unto the upright there ariseth light in the darkness," Psal. cxli. 4: a light shined to Peter, when he lay bound at midnight. Indeed what darkness can there be, where the Father of lights shineth? Now he delivers them again to their long-desired air, and causeth his sun to send forth comfortable beams upon them. It was time for a renovation to succeed this destruction; to have continued this inundation long, had been to punish Noah who was righteous. After forty days therefore the heavens clear up, after one hundred and fifty days the waters sink down. How soon is God weary of punishing, that is never weary of blessing! The ark, though it were Noah's fort against the waters, yet was it also his prison: he was safe in it, but pent up. Now therefore the Lord, that gave him life by it, thinks it time to give him liberty out of it. The justice of God is satisfied, the wicked punished, the waters diminished, the creatures delivered, the world again revived. After so long a storm there comes a calm; that He, who for his judgments ought to be feared, might also for his mercy be magnified. This world is as strait a prison in regard of heaven, as the ark was in respect of the world; and our preservation is as wonderful, if we could see it. Desire we therefore (in fear and faith) that day; that as they went out of the ark into the world, so we may go out of the world into that blessed kingdom of Jesus Christ.

"But saved Noah the eighth person, a preacher of righteousness." What a wonder of mercy was this! one poor family called out of a whole world; eight grains of corn fanned from a whole barnful of chaff; eight lilies growing amongst a whole forest of thorns! For these few was the earth still preserved under the waters, and all kinds of creatures upon the waters; which otherwise had all perished. Still the world stands for the elect's sake, for whom it was made and preserved; else the last fire should consume that, which the former water could not purify.

Here, first, let us consider the person saved, Noah: and him both by his condition, that he was a preacher; and by his conversation, which was in righteousness: for in that centre both his doctrine and practice met; both verbally and actually he preached. He was ordained into this ministry by the Lord: and as his whole life was an actual sermon, that taught obedience by precedent; so he continually incited the people to repentance, and forewarned them of the threatened vengeance. The observations are manifold.

1. That Noah had his calling immediately from God; whereas we are mediately ordained by the imposition of hands; which is a most reverend symbol in the church. For no man taketh this honour to himself uncalled, Heb. v. 4. Christ is said to be a Priest after the order of Melchisedec, ver. 6: but we have priests without any order at all; refusing to be ordered. What warrant have they that they are sent? I know there be different sorts and places: as Bishop Jewel, or the jewel of bishops, observes, All have idem ministerium, though diversam potestatem. A bishop and an archbishop differ not in potestate ordinis, sed in potestate regiminis. Nor doth a bishop differ from a minister, quoad potentiam sacerdotii, sed quoad potentiam jurisdictionis. Indeed the apostles, as they were immediately sent by Christ, so it was their prerogative royal, ministerially to give the Holy Ghost by imposition of hands; which power died with them. Yet still the ministry is an indelible character; and the bishop may suspend from execution of his office, but not put him out of the ministry, whom God hath put in. Christ breathed on them, and said, "Receive ye the Holy Ghost," John xx. 22. The furniture and provision for the ministers, is the Holy Ghost. We hear in every place the hissing of the old serpent; let the world hear from us the groaning of that Turtle, the Spirit of God.

2. That the Lord honoured Noah in conferring this office upon him. When he made him a preacher, he gave him this dignity, that he should be saved himself, and all those whom his ministry converted; that he might say, Here am I, and the children that God hath given me, Heb. ii. 13. I will but transiently touch at the honour due to preachers.

Certainly, a minister's life is full of honour here and hereafter too: so it is full of danger here and hereafter too. We believe physicians, when they give us prescripts; we believe lawyers, when they give us counsel; we believe even carpenters, in their rules; we believe not divines, though they bring nothing of their own invention; but may say of their sermon, as Jacob did of his venison, The Lord hath brought it to our hand, Gen. xxvii. 20: sit down and eat, that your souls may bless us, yea, bless God for us. Yet is every brain full of distraction about us, every mouth full of detraction against us, every hand full of retraction from us.

Men are so sick of preaching, that not the best and most honest divine can escape malignant tongues; and rather than the ungodly will be saved, their very exceptions against the preachers shall be their colour for going on in the ways of hell. Men suck their milk, like mules, and then kick them with their heels. Cominæus says, he that would be a king's favourite, must not have a hard name; that so he may easily be remembered when preferments are a dealing. It seems that preachers have hard names, for few remember them in the point of honour or benefit. The world regards them as poor folks do their children; they would be loth to have any more, because they are troubled to maintain them they have. In Jeroboam's time, the lowest of the people were made priests, and now priests are made the lowest of the people. A lay-man, like a mathematical line, runs on ad infinitum; only the preacher is bound to his competency, thus much, and no more. Never let him be rich, lest he be too bold, and tell us home of our faults. If he stoop not at the pulpit door, to take measure of the people's feet, let him fast when he comes down; they will soon shorten his commons. Therefore, the gentry to the court, and the country to the cart, and the university is universally despised. We ask not secular honours and eminent places; the minister, like the fig-tree, will not lose his sweetness to be preferred over the trees, Judg. ix. 11. Only find we honour in your consciences; we are ambitious of no preferment, but to be instruments of your salvation. "For what is our hope, or joy, or crown of rejoicing? Are not even ye in the presence of our Lord Jesus Christ at his coming?" 1 Thess. ii. 19. Yes, ye are our joy and glory.

3. That Noah faithfully executed this calling, and continued preaching a hundred years. In all which space, he declared to men the future judgments of God, reproved their iniquities, persuaded them to repentance, and upon their amendment of life, prophetically assured them of mercy and forgiveness. And this he performed; not only by verbal, but by actual preaching: the very building of the ark daily preached to the world. So that both in his doctrinal instructions, and exemplary life, he was a preacher of righteousness. Such is a minister's office; ὁπορομην, and ὁποροδοειν: as they deliver their sermons with what brevity they can, and with what fidelity they ought; so to order their conversation, that their society may delight the good, and their very absence convince the lewd. Christ gave Peter a threefold charge of feeding; and those three kinds are distinguished into precept, pattern, and beneficence. We do pascere verba, we should pascere exemplo, we are not able pascere subsidio. We are fain to eat our own bread, and wear our own apparel, only we desire to live with you, Isa. iv. 1: we spend our own means, only let us preach to you.

What Solon told Cræsus, of one of the happiest men living, Pauper et justus, in tuguriolo, &c. sic mortuus, is true of the preacher; no notice taken of him. They are truly called ministers or servants; not only Christ's servants, but even yours for Christ's sake. One of their titles is Diaconos, a minister of speedy labour: as a page runs by his lord, or as Elijah girded up himself and ran by Ahab; like Ahimaaz, so fast that you cannot see him for the dust. He is indeed a minister, for he doth not work for himself, but for another. But as he is a servant, so he hath some special place in the house among the servants of God: a faithful and wise steward, whom his Lord maketh ruler over his household, to give them their portion of meat in due season, Luke xii. 42. He is a servant, but none of the inferior; a steward. He hath a petty dominion over the rest of the family, his Lord hath made him a ruler. This is for his dignity; now for his duty. First, he must give meat to all the servants, young and old, rich and poor, weak and strong. Secondly, in due season, that is, when their appetites call for it; yea, he must not evermore stay till they desire it. Thirdly, he must do it with his own hands: he is but a deputy, and therefore must not always do it by a deputy. Yet the Lord doth, and the people must, allow him some vacation. He is an ill fisher, that never mends his net; a bad mower, that never whets his scythe. Yet such is the madness of the multitude, that they think his body to be of iron, and his spirit of angelical nature; that he can preach as easily and often as they would have him. And are in a hot anger, with Saul, who because David would not come at him, lying sick; "Bring him," saith he, "to me in the bed, that I may slay him," 1 Sam. xix. 15. Such is their pity to the minister; Bring him, though he lie sick on his bed; spare him not, though his heat and heart be spent. Yea, would it please God that our lives were made such a sacrifice, so they might be instruments of his glory, and your salvation.

4. That he had not such happy success of his preaching, as his own soul desired, and he might in reason have expected. A man may be lawfully called by God and his church, and yet not turn many souls. Let him never so plainly denounce the judgment of God against sinners, tell them that the ark was made to preserve believers, when all out of it should be drowned; though he wrought that with his hand which he taught with his tongue, yet still they believed not. Appears it not strange, that in a hundred and twenty years he should not convert one; not only of the wicked race, but not one of the righteous seed? O, it is the Lord only that speaks to the conscience! He is that flexanimous Preacher, whose pulpit is in heaven. Christ is the Physician, we are the apothecaries; and as we do not put into the compound one dram more than his prescript and allowance, so we cannot cure one soul, but he must do it. He is "the author of eternal salvation to all that obey him," Heb. v. 9. We have no power of ourselves to move a heart: Non omnis qui dicta audit, et audita credit, continuo illa faciendo obtemperat: God makes a minister to have more sorrow to bring forth a Christian unto the world to come, than a woman hath in her travail of bringing forth a child into this world, John xvi. 21. "My little children, of whom I travail in birth again, till Christ be formed in you," Gal. iv. 19. Who can express the throbs and throes he endures? they are only known to the anguish of his own sensible heart. Yet after all pains, he is glad at last that the child of grace is born: this so sweetens all, that he forgets his sorrow. Thus, like Jacob, he catcheth a maim, but a blessing withal. But, alas! it is brought unto the birth, and there is no strength to bring forth, Isa. xxxvii. 3.

If they came to Noah while he was building the ark, and demanded of him, as the Jews did of the prophet, Wilt thou not tell us what these things mean? Ezek. xxiv. 19; lo, the voice of his tongue interpreted the work of his hand, and the work of his hand expounded the voice of his tongue; yet they repented not. When God is pleased to convert, he can do it by the weakest means. For illumination of the mind, he often lights a great lamp of the sanctuary by a little wax candle; as he did Paul by Ananias. And for moving affections, he often by a puff of wind stirs up the waves of the ocean-sea. In the meanest book, a deep judgment shall find somewhat it hath not formerly seen, though it see not all it hath formerly found. God is not straitened according to the smallness of the organ. And when he withholds his contemned grace, Paul himself cannot move a soul. I know that nothing is more discomfortable to a good minister than this; yet hath it been the lot of many holy prophets, Isa. vi. 10; xlix. 4; Ezek. iii. 7; Acts xxviii. 24. This is fearful; when preachers sent for men's salvation, shall become means of their deeper confusion. There is nothing so humbles and abaseth them as this, 2 Cor. xii. 21: but whether in them that are saved, or in them that perish, we are still unto God a sweet savour of Christ, chap. ii. 15.

It is the measure, not the success, that God looks to: our reward shall be according to our works, not according to the fruit of our works; which is our comfort. Though we cannot convert men, yet we have laboured their conversion; and our labour (however fruitless among men) shall never be in vain with the Lord, 1 Cor. xv. 58. St. Paul doth not say, I did more good than the rest, but, I took more pains than the rest; "I laboured more abundantly than they all," ver. 10. If we should have no reward but according to the number of the souls we have turned, woe were us! For men's hearts are so yoked with their own wilfulness, that they will believe no preacher in the world further than their own fancies. But this must not discourage us; it is enough that we would have cured Babel, though she would not be cured; and "if our gospel be hid, it is hid to them that are lost," 2 Cor. iv. 3. If the Lord should examine us, what soul we have converted, where should we point him? "Charge them that are rich," &c. 1 Tim. vi. 17. It was God's charge to Paul, and Paul's to Timothy, and Timothy's to the people. Command implies obedience, but we may command and go without. We have the keys, and they do not rust upon our hands; but the power is lost in the people's hearts. Men have picklocks of their own forging, presumption and security; with these they can open heaven-gates, albeit double-locked by our censures. The father could have brought out the best robe himself, or sent his son into the wardrobe; but he commands his servants, "Bring forth the robe, and put it on him," Luke xv. 22; wherein he did grace the means, and bring that into credit. The Lord will have his sons beholden to his servants for their glory. It is a bold truth, you shall never wear that long garment of honour, unless it be brought and put on by the minister. He that can save you without us, will not save you but by us. If our words have lost the power in men, they have lost their right of heaven. But though we cannot save you, yet our desire to do it shall save us. We give God what we have, he desires no more; this is enough to honour him, and crown us.

This should teach all with faith and fear to submit themselves to the power of God's word, lest every sermon become one day a bill of indictment against them. There is no dallying with it; if it cannot save, it kills: like fire, what it may not soften, it will harden. This is enough to make the wicked tremble, who have gone away from so many feasts with hungry souls; heard so much, and practised so little. As every good turn aggravates the unthankful man's plague, so every good instruction enhanceth the reprobate's torment. O now let us redeem the time, hear to learn, learn to do, and do to live for ever.

5. Lastly, observe that so long as Noah preached, the world was warned. God needed not to have given them any warning of his judgments, they gave him no warning of their sins, no respite. Yet, that he might approve his mercy even to those upon whom he meant to glorify his justice, he gives them long warning that they might have space enough of repenting. Oh how loth is he to strike, that threatens so long before he executes! He that takes pleasure in revenge, suddenly surpriseth his adversary, and apprehends the speediest advantage; but the Lord is pleased they should be often warned, to show how willing he is to be prevented. God is so patient, that if sinners were not desperate, they should never smart. He doth first summon a parley, proclaim peace, Deut. xx. 10; hang out his white colours of pity, before the red streamers of blood be seen. He useth the commination of hell, as well as the promise of heaven; and both equally commend his goodness. The sharpness of the one, and sweetness of the other, working together like oil and wine, make men wise to salvation. Nineveh had not stood, if the prophet had forborne to say, It shall not stand. The message of their overthrow overthrew the message; the prophecy fell, and the city fell not, because her fall was prophesied. The denunciation of death wrought life; the sentence of destruction made a nullity in the sentence. They heard that their houses should fall; and they forsook not their houses but themselves, and both themselves and their houses stood.

Thus let us take the warnings of death, and turn them into inspirations of life. When it is threatened, we shall die in our sins, let this make us live to righteousness. If the summons of vengeance shall waken us to repentance, we shall no sooner change our minds, but God will change his sentence. If a mature and reverent consideration of those fearful judgments, plagues, death, dearth, hell, terrors of conscience, can truly humble us, we shall hear an angel sing, Grace, mercy, and peace, favour and eternal blessedness in heaven to us. God deals not with us as one did with Diogenes, who first broke his head, and then bade him take heed; but he beats his drum before he draws his sword. He does not as the cannon, first kill, and then make the report. But admonisheth us to repent, or else he will come against us, Rev. ii. 5.

There is not a soul among us, but hath been often warned: happy they, that can find this assurance in their souls that they have repented! Let not God continually lose his labour. Would we have him do nothing but premonish us? We are bound to take hold of every caution, to make use of all motions and monitions: he is not bound to follow us up and down with unregarded solicitings. Once warned should be always cautious. As Solomon to Shimei, Did not I forbid thee to go over Kedron on pain of death? 1 Kings ii. 41; so God hath warned us to keep home, confined us to Jerusalem, the city of obedience. If we pass the brook Kedron, the limits he hath set us, to seek our straggling servants, riches or pleasures, as did Shimei, he may justly punish us, and answer all our expostulations, Did I not give you warning? This seemed to be the rich man's care in hell, for his brethren on earth, that one might be sent from the dead to give them warning, Luke xvi. 28. We have warnings every way; Lord, let some of thy admonitions bring us to repentance; let thy commandment work us to amendment: that hearing what thou teachest, fearing what thou threatenest, and believing what thou promisest, we may find thy eternal mercies.

"But saved Noah." God's judgments are never so universal but some he spareth. Though Israel be reduced to a tenth, yet God will not lose his tithe. Though they be as the scattering grapes after the vintage, yet destruction shall leave here and there a berry. Though he have few names in Sardis, yet he hath some. In every loss that Job had, one still escaped to bring him news. Noah finds grace, when the world found perdition. He that was dead to the world, shall not die with the world: as he consented not to their sin, so he partook not of their punishment. No streams of water shall drown him, whom the deluge of sin hath not overwhelmed. Now because the Lord hath set him forth as a precedent to after-times, that he who will escape as Noah did must be such a one as Noah was, let us contemplate his righteousness in these four passages: The warrant of his practice. His faith in this warrant. The perfection of this faith. The issue, event, or success of all.

1. The warrant or ground of his obedience, was the word of God. He was "warned of God of things not seen as yet," Heb. xi. 7. This revelation came not by a prophet, (we find none at that time but Noah's self,) but either by the ministry of an angel, or immediately from the Lord himself. "God said unto Noah, The end of all flesh is come before me," Gen. vi. 13. Thus doth he single out the righteous, and acquaint them with his own counsels. "Shall I hide from Abraham that thing which I do?" Gen. xviii. 17. The Sodomites lie sucking in the air of security, but Abraham knew the nearness of their calamity. "Surely the Lord will do nothing, but he revealeth his secret unto his servants the prophets," Amos iii. 7. Neither is this the prerogative of the prophets only; but, "The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him; and he will show them his covenant," Psal. xxv. 14. We dote on nothing more than secrets; all are sick of an Athenian humour; yet is there no secret which carnal desires affect, worth the knowing. Would we participate that secret, which no affordment of nature, no mystery of art, no secretary of state, no wit of man, no cunning of devil, can find? Let us fear God: this is the key to open those supernal and supernatural secrets, which shall fill the heart with unexpressible, unexhaustible joy. Christ calls us more than servants; "for the servant knoweth not what his Lord doth;" even friends, because he hath made known to us the things of his Father, John xv. 15. God makes all his friends of his counsel, and communicates all things conducing to their blessedness, as one friend imparts his mind to another.

"His secret is with the righteous," Prov. iii. 32: the just man shall be ignorant of nothing that concerns his salvation. But in our times there are no such revelations; therefore the state of the church before Christ seems to be better than this. No; for albeit God do not now reveal particular and personal events, yet the assurance of salvation, the comfort of remission, the very feeling of reconciliation, these he declares to us, which are infinitely sweeter. Why should I inquire, Lord, what shall he do? John xxi. 21; it is enough for me to know what shall become of myself. Besides, we are requited in the complete Scriptures, we have the substance of their shadows, the performance of their promises. How should this encourage us all to become God's faithful servants; for we serve not such a Lord as is strange and austere to us, one that will not give us a good look or a fair word. Yea, he is so far from denying us these favours, that he calls us to his holy counsel, makes known to us his secrets, and communicates himself to us by his blessed Spirit.

This is a sweet comfort, if we apply it; especially considering the different estate of the wicked; who seeing, cannot perceive; and hearing, cannot understand, Matt. xiii. 13: as Zebul mistook armies of men for shadows of mountains. "The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit," 1 Cor. ii. 14. Nature is not here the schoolmaster, but grace; nor Athens the school, but Jerusalem. They are hid to the wise of the world, and revealed to babes, Matt. xi. 25. It is revealed to us, that God is our Father, the church our mother, Christ our Brother, the Holy Ghost our Comforter, angels our attendants, all other creatures our subjects, the whole world our inn, and heaven our everlasting home. That the joys of the wicked do scarce ever begin; and when they do, their end borders on their beginning; one hour sees them both merry and miserable. But our pleasures are eternal, millions of years being not a minute to everlastingness, and this house of the world a mere cottage to heaven. These things as God reveals, so we must seek. When the Shunammite would needs go to the prophet, her husband questioned her: "Wherefore to-day? it is neither new moon nor sabbath," 2 Kings iv. 23. It seems that at least on those days they consulted the prophets. O let not us neglect God's clearer revealings in the gospel, nor be strangers to the business of our own salvation.

2. His faith is this warrant: the things that God revealed, and he believed, were these three. 1. The great and just wrath of God against the sinful world. This he sincerely preached, and this they scornfully derided. But as the frantic laughs, when the physician weeps, and knows his end is near; so the wicked condemn the righteous, yet to them is known their miserable state. 2. That God would save him and his family: and this he believed, not only in the principal object of faith, his salvation by the Messiah; but even in the inferior and particular, his personal deliverance from this inundation. 3. The means of his preservation: by an ark which himself must make; that every stroke might put him in mind of the gracious promise, and still as that was builded, his faith might be confirmed.

This faith wrought in him a fear; being moved with fear, he prepared the ark, Heb. xi. 7. Yet carnal reason might object, What cause is there either to believe or fear? 1. The judgment was far off, one hundred and twenty years to come; and who would fear so remote a thing? 2. The world was full of wise and mighty men; they all heard of this, not one of them feared. Shall Noah, being one single man against all those strong examples, expose himself to derision by a needless fear? 3. The judgment was of such a nature, as it had no precedent; for would any man in common reason think, that God would drown all the world with water? That by water, an element so easily avoidable; and of such a quantity and measure as to overwhelm the whole world.

But lo here the invincible power of faith! it is fixed on God's word, and though heaven thunder, and earth shake, and hell roar, it will not be removed: spite of all contradictions Noah believes that he shall be saved; why he above all the rest? even this he believed with fear. "With thee, O Lord, is mercy, that thou mayest be feared," Psal. cxxx. 4. Even the mercy of a father makes a reverent son. He might say with David, Lord, thou hast spoken good concerning me and my house, for a great while to come. What am I, and what is my house, that thou hast done thus for me? 2 Sam. xviii. 19. That the Lord hath led us out of spiritual Egypt, first by a child, then by a woman, saved us in the deluge of superstition, gives us just cause to say, What are we, what are our people, that he should be so favourable to us?

It was strange enough, that God would take so weak an element as water, to drown those mighty giants. Strange enough, that he would save Noah by an ark: why not take him up into heaven, as Enoch; or build him a house on the top of some promontory? By an ark! alas, what safety is here? may not the tempests cast it on the hard rocks, or dash it upon the giants' castles, and break it in pieces? No; Noah must lie and swim on the waters, and yet the ark must save him from the waters. Thus shall he be safe in the sight of dying sinners; when they are expecting death on the tops of the mountains, they behold him secure to their greater vexation: as the pains of hell are aggravated upon the damned, by seeing their once despised brethren in the joys of heaven: when the rich that have run away from the poor in coaches, shall see the poor carried from them by angels. All this God delivered, Noah believed and feared.

Let this teach us to believe God's judgments, and fear them. "My flesh trembleth for fear of thee; and I am afraid of thy judgments," Psal. cxix. 120. God foretold of a flood, and Noah looked for it a hundred and twenty years after. There is no man living, but within less than a hundred and twenty years he is sure to die, and to be in danger of a flood of wrath: for quales egredimur, tales presentamur, and dilatatio proves often dilatatio supplicii: the deferring of punishment is the enlarging of punishment. Yet who trembles at it? who sends this holy fear to his heart, that his heart may send forth prayers for mercy? If men cry, Fire, fire; we stir, run, tremble; but let the fire of God's wrath, and the fire of hell, be cried, we move not, care not, fear not; as if this were a thing quite unconcerning us. And as the fantastical musician was so transported with his own raptures, that when the people cried to him, that his house was on fire, he returned them no other answer, but that either they should hold their peace, or cry in tune. So when preachers forewarn men of these judgments, they think that we are quite out of tune.

There is no judgment comes, but naturians will find out other causes for it than God. Ill weather is from the clouds, famines from ill weather, plagues from famines, or ill airs, or by apparent infection from other places: as if they concluded, as that scoffer subscribed on Adrian's college, God hath here nothing to do. But cannot nature have her place, unless she have God's place? He overthrows not natural means, why should natural means overthrow him? Shall we give the soldier's honour to his sword? Certainly, if men believed God, they could not think, nor speak, nor look upon his works, but with reverence.

And as our fear of God is, so is our faith: little fear, little faith; no fear at all, no faith at all. Judgment may be threatened; but the stubborn soldier Marius will not hear the laws for the clattering of armour. The great things of the law are drowned in some clamour; Satan, that cunning silversmith, raising an uproar more agreeable to men's humours, "Great is Diana." The shriekings of Moloch, and the pitiful lamentation of burning infants, were not heard, because they deafened themselves with the instruments of music. After the massacre of many Christian virtues, steps in conscience, in the phrase of Job's messenger, I am alone escaped to tell thee. We like not the message, and imprison the bringer; and if the subsidiary grace of God come to succour and relieve this crying and dying conscience, men study to stupify their own hearts. Thus "the children are come to the birth, and there is not strength to bring forth," Isa. xxxvii. 3. Strength enough, but it is to strangle the birth, not to bring it forth. The midwives of Egypt feared God, and preserved the children alive; but the still-born motions of God's Spirit may often testify to our faces, that we are bloody midwives. The frowns of men we fear, as ducks use to dop at every stone thrown into the water: we fear an ague, an enemy, a danger; yet not the Lord, who commands all these. Let us fear God more, and we shall fear all other things less: if we could turn all our fear into the fear of God, we should then turn all our works unto the praise of God; and he will honour them that honour him.

3. The integrity of his faith: for this he is said to be righteous; "A just man, and perfect in his generations," Gen. vi. 9. Not in respect of God's justice, "For all have sinned, and come short of the glory of God," Rom. iii. 23; and if he mark iniquity, who shall stand? Psal. cxxx. 3. Nor in respect of that perfection which is appropriated to the saints in heaven, Phil. iii. 12: this no mortal man hath attained. Nor yet so perfect, that he was without sin; "For there is not a just man upon the earth, that doeth good, and sinneth not," Eccl. vii. 20. Nor for supererogating, and going beyond his duty; in not only obeying the legal rules, but also in observing the evangelical counsels; as say the Rhemists. But either comparative, compared with others; therefore it is added, "in his generations." Or inchoative, which rather consists in the desire of perfection, than in the perfection of his desires. Or reputative, so esteemed, because he was without scandal to the world. But especially imputative, by way of imputation; he "found grace in the eyes of the Lord," Gen. vi. 8: and this is the perfection of faith, which clothes the person with the righteousness of Christ.

There is a legal perfection, such as was in Adam, is in Christ: none are thus perfect. "Though I were perfect, yet would I despise my life," saith Job, chap. ix. 21. Though "I know nothing by myself, yet am I not hereby justified," saith Paul, 1 Cor. iv. 4. They durst not trust themselves upon God's judgment. There is also an evangelical perfection; and this is twofold. It consists partly in the apprehension of Christ's righteousness, which is our justification; partly in the holiness of life, which is our sanctification. The former is absolutely perfect, for our justification admits no latitude; the latter is not so, for sanctification is perfected by degrees, and is here but partial, as in a child are all the parts of a man, though it want growth, stature, and maturity. The difference is not in the truth of being, but in the measure, degree, and quantity. There is to be perfect in all points; so are none here below. And to be perfect in all good endeavour, and in some good measure. Man is indeed bound to keep all the law, (and all those for whom Christ did not fulfil it, shall have it fulfilled on themselves in the penalty,) and that for good reason. A man in a rich estate borrows a sum of money; he is then able to repay it: but afterwards by his riotous living he grows unable; now shall his present and wilfully contracted poverty excuse his non-payment? Adam was of sufficient strength to keep the law: if he would forfeit that grace and natural sufficiency, shall his self-incurred weakness excuse his disobedience?

Perfection, now, consists not in a justifiable goodness of our own; and that we can attain, is not in great learning, but good living. Paul was perfect expectatione muneris, imperfect fatigatione certaminis. It is said of Chrysostom, He perfected nothing but the mortification of sin. The inner man may be perfect, not the whole: but then here is the comfort, what we have, is accepted; what we have not, is pardoned. (August.) That which is perfect, both justifies itself, and shames all imperfection. He that will be perfect, must have understanding, what to do; will, how to do it; memory, when to do it. Thus is a Christian perfect: First, in purpose of heart, as Abraham is said to offer up his son Isaac, because he had a mind and resolution to do it. Secondly, in inchoation. Solomon "began to build the house of the Lord," 1 Kings vi. 1: the original is, he built: the beginning is called the performance. Thirdly, in comparison, weighed with the condition of others; as Prov. xi. 3, where integrity is opposed to perverseness. "Walk before me, and be thou perfect," saith the Lord, Gen. xvii. 1. The way to be perfect, is to walk before God. It was Hezekiah's comfort, "I have walked before thee in truth," Isa. xxxviii. 3. Look that the inside be not rotten, this is the way to have a perfect heart.

Now because Noah's faith was the thing that wrapped up his soul in the favour of God, the ground of all his perfection and righteousness, the virtue whereby he lived, when all the world was drowned; how precious should this jewel be to us, without which we can neither live in this valley of tears, nor escape in the day of flames! There is no life but in the Son, and "he that hath the Son hath life," 1 John v. 12, and he that hath faith hath the Son. Justus ex fide vivet: faith, like Eve, is the mother of all that live. God himself is content to divide his praises with faith: whereas she can do nothing but by him, she shall do any thing with him. She can work wonders: subduing kingdoms, strangling lions, quenching violent fires, with handfuls conquering huge armies, Heb. xi. 33, 34, dividing seas, turning back streams, yea, commanding mountains to remove, overcoming the world; what call you these but wonders? Such wonders can faith do. Yea, God is pleased to do nothing for us without her, that doth all things of himself. True faith is not less than miraculous in the sphere of her activity, and with the warrant of God's truth. It is no præmunire, nor offence to God's crown and dignity, to say, it is his own arm to the saving of men. There is a kind of omnipotence in faith, when it shall say to the sun and moon, Stand still, and be obeyed. But as Christ could do no miracle in Capernaum, because they had no faith; so where men want faith, it must be a miracle, yea, beyond a miracle, if they be saved. I know it is easy to say, I believe: there is a titular faith, but it shall never save any, until saying, Be filled, gives a man his dinner; or, Be warmed, makes him hot. But he that can believe, with Noah, in a storm of indignation, in a deluge of destruction, when the arrows of vengeance fly about, and the Lord raineth coals of fire like hailstones, in flaming trials, and strongest temptations; then to believe, shall bring a glorious crown in the day of Jesus Christ.

4. The event or success of all; which was Noah's building of the ark. God that decreed to save him, ordained also the means of his preservation. Now the end of building it was double; one for the further conviction of the world, the other for the saving of him and his family. For the world, the Lord did not only give them time, but a faithful and righteous teacher. It is happy for him that teacheth others, to be himself righteous. It is absurd in him that stammers, to teach others to speak plain. Great learning and good living are a fair couple, a fit match; it is pity to part them. Let the mountains of learning so preach, that the little hills and valleys may receive benefit.

Noah's hand taught them, no less than his tongue; his business in building the ark was a real sermon to the world. For this cause God set him a building sixscore years before the flood. Why so, when he might have done it in three or four years? But because the Lord would give them space to repent, every stroke on the ark for all that long time being a loud sermon of repentance to them. Thus do the saints judge the world, 1 Cor. vi. 2, not only by their faith, but by their fact: the examples of holy men, are bills of indictment against the wicked. Thus the Ninevites are said to judge the unrepentant Jews, and the queen of Sheba those unbelieving children of Abraham. Noah being told of a miraculous thing, and believing it; being commanded an unreasonable thing, and obeying it; condemns all them that will not believe God's ordinary promises, nor obey his known precepts. Many despise those that sincerely profess Christ; but their sincere profession shall be the despisers' condemnation.

Haply those monstrous sons of Lamech came to Noah, and asked him what he intended by that strange work; whether he meant to sail upon the dry land? to whom he relates God's purpose, and his own. They go laughing away at his idleness, and tell one another in sport, that too much holiness hath made him mad; that instead of a palace, he was building a prison; and because other men delighted in castles of stone, he (to be cross to the world) would have a house of wood. Yet cannot all this flout Noah out of his faith: still he preaches, and builds, and finishes. And when all they, like ghastly wretches, lay sprawling on the merciless waves, he lies safe at the anchor of hope and peace. The faith of the righteous cannot be so much derided, as their success is magnified. How securely doth he ride out of this universal uproar, of heavens, earth, waters, elements! He hears the pouring down of the rain above his head; the shrieking of men, women, and children, roaring and bellowing of beasts on every side; the rage of the waves under him: he saw the miserable shifts of the distressed unbelievers; and now, in the midst of all, sits quietly in his dry cabin, not feeling evil. He knew that the great Master of the world, whose judgments now overflowed the earth, would steer him in these deep waters; and that the same hand which shut him up, would preserve him.

Let me here again commend to you the blessedness of faith: what a sweet security and heavenly peace doth it work in the soul, in the midst of all the inundations of evils! This is the adamant which nothing will break; the palm that sinks not under the weightiest burden; the oil that ever over-swims the greatest quantity of water can be poured on it: the sheet-anchor that holds when all other tacklings break. The day of fire shall be more terrible and universal than was the day of water; this defaced earth, that shall melt the heavens. Yet still faith finds an ark, not of combustible wood, but of indissoluble strength; it is the opened side of Jesus Christ. There, when the earth is burning under her, heaven above her, the elements about her, reprobates shrieking beside her, death and hell trembling below her, she shall find assurance and peace; and at last be metamorphosed into that blessed vision, and eternal fruition of such joys; to which his mercy bring us, that they then may be known unto us. Amen.

"But saved Noah the eighth person." "I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills, from whence cometh my help," Psal. cxxi. 1. From the mountains, not of the mountains, but of "the Lord, which hath made heaven and earth." While the justice of God was decreeing confusion to the world, his mercy was contriving a safety for his servant. And as his majesty was glorious in so weak an element for the ruin; so was his mercy, in so weak an instrument for the preservation. Here was omnipotency in both: he speaks to the creatures; Clouds, make rain, and let that rain make a flood, and let that flood drown the world. He speaks to Noah, Make thee an ark, and I will make that ark save thee; do thou as I bid thee, and I will do as I promised thee.

Generally two things occur to our consideration; the building of the ark, and the preservation by it; the vessel itself, and the freight. For the former, my purpose is not to declare the matter, measure, proportion, or fashion of the ark; but to borrow so much of the story as is pertinent and instructive to us. This summarily consists in two things; Noah's trial, and God's disposal. For his trial, God in building the ark did exercise three virtues in him; his patience, his confidence, and his obedience: let us consider them.

1. For his patience. Why did God set him about it a hundred and twenty years, when a small time might have finished it? This was for the trial of his patience. Thus he led the Israelites in the deserts of Arabia forty years; whereas a man may travel from Ramesis in Egypt to any part of Canaan in forty days. This God did to prove them, that he might know what was in their heart, Deut. viii. 2. He promised Abraham a son in whom he should be blessed; this he performed not of thirty years after. He gave David the kingdom, and anointed him by Samuel; yet was he not possessed of it in many years; insomuch that he said, "Mine eyes fail for thy word," Psal. cxix. 82. Joseph hath a promise that the sun and moon should do him reverence; but first he must lie bound in the dungeon. This God doth to try us, for in these exigents we show ourselves and our dispositions. Thus did he leave Hezekiah in the business of Babylon, to know his heart, 2 Chron. xxxii. 31. When he had made such a probation of Abraham, in the sacrifice of his son, he concluded, "Now I know that thou fearest God," Gen. xxii. 12. Did not God know before? Yes, he knows the very thoughts of men. It is not for his instruction, but ours. The Lord knows all, but thus he would have us to know our own hearts. "The heart of man is deceitful above all things," Jer. xvii. 9. The worldling knows his own house, his own horse, his own garment; he knows not his own heart. "Though I were perfect, yet would I not know mine own soul," saith Job, chap. ix. 21. "Cleanse thou me from secret faults," Psal. xix. 12. Ye know not of what spirit you are, saith Christ even to his apostles, Luke ix. 55.

We know not what patience we have, what courage, what zeal, till we be put to it. A man is that he is when he is tempted. Some presume more than they can; so did Peter, Though I should die with thee, I will not deny thee: alas, he knew not his own weakness. Others doubt of that they can, as Naaman; God be merciful to me when I come into the house of Rimmon: here I can serve God constantly, but when I wait on my master to the idolatrous temple, what shall I do then? Lord, be merciful to me in this. Go in peace, saith the prophet; God will strengthen thee. Every cock-boat can swim in a river, every sculler sail in a calm; every man of a patient temper or cheerly disposition, can hold up his head in ordinary gusts. But when a black storm rises, a tenth wave flows, deep calls unto deep, nature yields, spirit faints, heart fails; here is the trial, how dost thou now? When our hopes are adjourned, our expectation delayed, and instead of pleasing contents we find bitter sorrows; this will discover our hearts. If then faith prevail above sense, and hope against all natural reason and fear, our graces shall shine like orient pearls, in true and perfect beauty. After all the prorogations of promised ease, still to stand erect and triumph; here is the assurance of faith, that hath the word for compass, Christ at the helm, and the voyage is salvation.

2. For his confidence. Many obstacles might seem to stop him in the course of his proceeding, and to keep him from attempting this strange edifice. 1. The great quantity of the ark, amounting to many thousand cubits; a work of great labour, and no small charges. If this had been imposed on the sluggard: What, shall I spend all my days in building? As Florus, an idle fellow, would evermore say, I would not be Cæsar, always marching in armour: to whom Cæsar replied, I would not be Florus, always drinking in a tavern. Or on the covetous; he would have answered, It is too chargeable; shall I exhaust my estate to set up a fantastical house? he will not do it, to have a house in heaven. 2. The length of his labour; it was to have lasted sixscore years: now it is tedious to man's nature, to be always doing, and never to have done. 3. The building of it was a matter of mockery to the world; for it signified to the rebellious destruction, to himself preservation. Now that either the world could possibly be drowned, or that he should separately be saved, this they laughed at.

Lastly, it was a thing most harsh to natural reason. 1. It had no precedent; and to credit new and strange things, requires a new and strange faith. 2. It seemed not likely that God's mercy should be so wholly swallowed up of his justice. 3. To live in the ark, as in a close prison, without light, without fresh air, and comfort of liberty, among beasts of all sorts, and that he knew not how long! Reason might say, It is better to die with men, than to live with beasts; better to die a free-man, than to live a prisoner; better to die with company, than to live alone. That if God had purposed to save him, he could have devised means more direct, more easy, more safe than this; therefore his deliverance was to be doubted of. Thus, indeed, he might make himself a derision, and ridiculous story of the world, all this while: and if the wicked should alter their practice, God would alter his purpose, and so there would be no flood. If there were, yet the ark might dash against the mountains, and so he perish with the rest; and then he might with the same success have saved all this labour: therefore the best course is to let all alone, and to take my venture with the world.

All these had been strong persuasions in a natural man; but faith dissolves these impediments, as the sun doth dews: with resolute courage it breaketh through all difficulties, and flies over these carnal objections with celestial wings. As Abraham begat Isaac, so faith begets hope; and as Isaac begat Jacob, so hope begets obedience: he believes, hopes, and builds. It is grounded on the knowledge of God's nature; knowledge is the root of faith. Presumption ariseth from the ignorance of God's nature, that he is just; desperation from the ignorance of his nature, that he is merciful. Some are of the error, that God will not be so cruel as to damn his creature, but he will not be so kind to the wicked, as to be unjust to himself.

Let this teach us to fortify our faith: doctrines that are plausible to our natural affections, we can formally obey; but that which is above our reason, beyond our apprehension, or against our disposition, we call that into question. The Scripture saith, that Christ is in the sacrament really exhibited to the soul of a Christian: carnal senses deny this. Reason asks with the Capernaïtes, Will he give us his flesh to eat? Faith believeth this, and the soul findeth it with unspeakable comfort. God saith, that a poor good man is in better case than a rich sinner: reason and ocular experience deny it, but faith believes it, and feels it. For never did the poorest child of God wish to change his estate with the wealthiest worldling upon earth. God saith, our bodies shall rise again, how strange dissolutions or how many alterations soever they suffer: this is a wonder to nature, an amazement to reason; but the faith of a Christian rests upon it, and the soul of a Christian shall have comfort in it.

3. For his obedience. Though Noah understood by direct revelation that he should be saved, yet he used the means, he made an ark. He might have said, God hath bound himself by covenant to preserve me; his word is his word, and he will stand to it: let me labour or lie still, his will cannot be altered; though I be false, he will be true; though I omit what belongs to me, he will not forget what belongs to him: let me therefore spare the pains of so much labour, cost, derision. No, Noah is of another mind; the promise of safety, and the means of safety, be to him inseparable: he dares not but believe that God will do it, he dares not but use the means whereby he will do it. The pontificians think to flout us with our assurance of salvation: if we be sure of it, what need we then so trouble ourselves about it? I answer, though we be sure of it, not only in the certainty of faith, but, if it could be, by immediate revelation from God; yet still let us work out our salvation with fear and trembling. If God should say to a man by his very name, Thou shalt be saved; it is no more than here was said to Noah for his temporal deliverance. Yet Noah concludes, If I make not the ark, I am to look for no preservation: this was Noah's divinity. And for those that think they know a shorter cut to heaven, let them take heed they be not cut short of heaven. If we be elected, no matter how we live: desperate presumption! Noah would not trust his mortal life upon those terms, and shall secure men thus venture their souls? No, God hath decreed the means unto the end, and hath promised the end unto the means; and those things which God hath joined together, let no man put asunder.

Rebekah had God's oracle for Jacob's life, yet she sent him away out of Esau's reach. It was impossible for Herod to hurt the child Jesus, yet he must flee into Egypt. The Lord hath promised his children supply of all good things, yet they must use the means of impetration; by prayer. "Call upon me in the day of trouble," Psal. l. 15. He feeds the young ravens when they call upon him, Psal. cxlvii. 9. He feeds the young ravens, but first they call upon him. God withholdeth from them that ask not, lest he should give to them that desire not. (August.) David was confident, that by God's power he should spring over a wall; yet not without putting his own strength and agility to it. Those things we pray for, we must work for. (August.) The carter in Isidore, when his cart was overthrown, would needs have his god Hercules come down from heaven, to help him up with it. But whilst he forbore to set his own shoulder to it, his cart lay still. Abraham was as rich as any of our aldermen, David as valiant as any of our gentlemen, Solomon as wise as any of our deepest naturians, Susanna as fair as any of our painted pieces. Yet none of them thought that their riches, valour, policy, beauty, or excellent parts could save them; but they stirred the sparks of grace, and bestirred themselves in pious works. And this is our means, if our meaning be to be saved.

Thus for Noah's trial, now for God's disposal.

And herein we must consider two things; his direction, and selection: he was both the Pilot of the vessel, and the chooser of those that should be in the vessel.

For his direction. The vessel was great and huge; resembling a ship, yet so unlike it, that it is called an ark; capacious of all kinds of living creatures, with sufficient provision for them. This must float above the water, be laden with a heavy burden without stern to guide her, without anchor to stay her, without mast to poise her, without master to govern her. Noah was a husbandman, a preacher, but (without question) he had no skill to be a sailor; the art of navigation being not then found out. Therefore this unwieldy vessel must, in all reason, be cast upon hills and rocks, by the violence of tempests, and so split in pieces. No, but when heaven and earth seem to conspire against it, it shall preserve him. How so? Because God himself was the Master and Steersman of it, his providence was with it. It was indeed too vast a bulk to be governed by human skill; therefore, when by no man's art it could be set afloat, it was lifted up by the waters, and left to be guided, not by human prudence, but by Divine Providence. (August.)

As the Lord ordained it, so he directed and disposed it: "The Lord shut him in," Gen. vii. 16. He himself shut the door of the ark upon Noah, and made it fast after him, that no waters might get in unto him. God was his Porter to shut him in, Keeper to preserve him, and great Master of the vessel during that whole voyage. Such is his presence and providence over his children in all distresses. He forgets nothing that he hath made, but his special eye is over his elect: as the master of a family hath an eye over his meanest servant, yea, over his very cattle, but his care night and day is for his children. They are beset with no danger of water or fire, but there is one among them, in the form of the Son of God, Dan. iii. 25, to deliver them. When Israel was in so hard a strait, as either to be drowned in the sea, or slain by the sword, how miraculously did God provide an evasion! When Noah was to enter the ark, and to have the door shut after him, here was a hard exigent. It was so large that camels and elephants might enter into it; therefore shut it himself he could not, or at least not sufficiently close it up against the waters. Nor would any of the world do it for him, they did not owe him so much love and service, but rather laughed at his vain endeavours. Himself could not, others would not, the Lord with his own hand shut it for him. Being thus closed up, he was in danger to be thrown upon the rocks, having no anchor, no stern, no pilot: lo, God was all these unto him.

In the deepest destitution of all earthly comforts, so powerful is his hand, so loving his eye, to those that serve him! Elisha had a host of men sent against him. How should one man escape from a whole army? His man cried, the master believed, the Lord protected, 2 Kings vi. 17. When men refuse to help Noah, the angels are ready. When the whole world expected him to perish with themselves, then the Lord is his Pilot, and the last thing their eyes must see, is Noah safe. "The Lord is my light and my salvation; whom shall I fear?" Psal. xxvii. 1. David found God to be his Vice-Admiral, and to carry the light before him, in the darkest storms and most violent waves of his trouble. There is no calamity so potent as is our Deliverer. Therefore as the legend moralizeth of St. Christopher, that he would serve none but the greatest that was, and still as he found one more powerful he would change his master; till at last from man to man, and from man to the devil, he came from the devil to Christ, who was the strongest of all. So if any thing in the world, yea, the whole world, were more potent than God, there were some colour for demurring upon our choice. But seeing that he only doth what he pleaseth, in heaven, earth, sea, all places, Psal. cxxxv. 6; and what he will do, all the rest must do; and that his majesty is not more infinite than his mercy, that he is not so ready to strike the obstinate as to spare the prostrate; Lord, let us love thee above all things that be, that thou mayst deliver us from all things that be hurtful.

In that the Lord was here Master and Pilot of the ark, we may observe the antiquity and dignity of mariners and sailors. For antiquity; it is as old as Noah, older than the second world. The dignity is great; for God himself was the first author and first practiser of it. First author; for Noah made not this ark of his own head, but the Lord instructed him. First practiser; for he performed all those offices unto Noah, else it had not saved him. This is one of those few callings, which may say, God himself was the first deviser and exerciser of it: all callings cannot say so. Why then do seafarers forget that Master whom they succeed? There is now no vocation so abased and abused as it is, lighting into the hands of the most lewd and licentious persons; no generation of men more notoriously dissolute. How little do they remember that God made the first ship, that he was the first Master, the first Mariner, the first Pilot of it; that their dispositions are so utterly unlike to his! The strange things of the sea they behold; but those monsters are rather their play-fellows, than occasions of their fear and piety. Although their very sleeps be but so many reprieves of their dangers, and when they awake they know not whether they shall ever sleep again, save in death, yet they are not mortified. There is nothing but extreme danger, or extreme hunger, can soften them. That tottering vessel is more safe at sea, than many of them are on land; for that hath a helm to guide her, but these have cast off not only religion, that makes them good men, but even reason, that makes them men; and saving only on the sea, they live without all compass. As their ship on the water, so they on the land, "reel to and fro, and stagger like a drunken man," Psal. cvii. 27. One would think, that the terrors of the ocean, the wonders of God in the deep, should melt their very soul, and humble them, ver. 26: where the winds domineer, and the waves roar, voluntur ut æquora montes; where they lie, where no mercy is to be hoped. He that hath not learned to pray, let him learn to sail. Yes, haply they will pray and cry too, while the tempest beats; cast up their eyes, and send their prayers to the offended heavens: but is not their piety blown over with their misery? Yes, the God of their supplications is on land become the object of their blasphemies; and they seldom think of him, but when they borrow his name to swear by. The Lord is our preserver by sea and land, there be dangers enough in every place; therefore by sea and land, in every place, let us humbly serve, and confidently trust in him.

Thus for God's direction and providence over this vessel; we come to his election of the company for it. The whole world being his, and he absolute Lord of all, made choice according to his divine and inscrutable pleasure. In the most general judgments, those that fear God find deliverance. When Sodom must be destroyed, Lot and his family are singled out; the angels can do nothing till he be safe. When Jerusalem must bleed, the mourners are sealed to redemption. When the destroying angel rides circuit in Egypt, the doors sprinkled with the blood of the lamb are passed over. The deluge of wrath will one day come; what shall we do then? Sprinkle our hearts beforehand with the sacred blood of the Lamb; then thousands shall fall on our left hand, and ten thousands beside us, and the Lord shall provide one way or other an ark of safety and deliverance for us.

The number preserved, consisted both of reasonable and unreasonable creatures; of unreasonable, for man's sake; of reasonable, for God's own sake. First, let us look upon his election in the accessory, the irrational living creatures.

The Lord that would have seed kept alive on the earth, took into his preservation beasts both clean and unclean. Some were even at that time unclean, Gen. vii. 2; for Moses wrote not this by anticipation, as respecting the time wherein he wrote, the law having then distinguished them; but respecting the time when the flood came. Certainly this difference was known to the patriarchs by Divine revelation, and continued to their posterity by tradition; as was the use of sacrifice, offering of tithes, and observation of the sabbath, before the law. Now they were not unclean by their own nature and creation, for God made all good; nor in respect of man's use only, some being more fit for food; but by God's institution, some being more fit for sacrifice, therefore called clean. Of the clean God chose seven; of the unclean but two: he would have the former to multiply, and replenish the earth by a speedy increase; that man might have sustenance, and himself sacrifice. The other, he knew, would annoy them with their multitude: and albeit he would have the kind of hurtful beasts preserved, even for the punishment of sinful man, for the noisome beast is one of his four great plagues, Ezek. xiv. 21; yet would he have their number abridged, that they might not grow too fast upon him. These would hurt him, the other enrich him; therefore the merciful God provides most of them whereof we have most use.

But why seven? Three male, three female, and the odd one for sacrifice. Not that we conclude with their canon, that the double number is not good, because the unclean came in by two; and that the odd number is good, because the odd was for sacrifice. For this is false. First, because both clean and unclean came in by pairs and couples; how many or how few soever, every male had his female, Gen. vii. 9. Secondly, they are not said to be unclean for their number, but for their kind. Thirdly, then Noah and his sons had been unclean, because they and their wives went into the ark by couples. But seven, that God, who created seven days in the week, and chose one of them for himself, did here preserve of seven clean beasts one for himself, for sacrifice. He gives us six for one in worldly things, in spiritual things let us give him all. Here are two things observable.

1. God is pleased that some noxious creatures should be reserved, for the correction and exercise of man. He hath use even of those fierce and cruel beasts, and glory by them. They being created for man, must live by him, though to his castigation and punishment. The Manichees object against God's goodness, that he made many things pernicious, as some evil weeds and venomous serpents; and many things superfluous, whereof we have no use; how then were all good? (August.) It is answered: First, God made nothing superfluous, though we know not the use thereof: as in an artificer's shop, we being ignorant of the tools and instruments, condemn them not, though by our meddling they cut our fingers. Secondly, we have no cause to complain; for whether they be profitable, they do us good; or superfluous, they do us no hurt, if we let them alone. Thirdly, the harm of any creature ariseth from ourselves; if man had not offended God, nothing should have offended him. Fourthly, they are not altogether fruitless, for even those things that are not fit for food, have their use for medicine. Venom itself, well qualified, hath been physical to our recovery. Fifthly, even by those that are hurtful, we are either corrected to humble us, or exercised to try us, or terrified to work in us the fear of God. Therefore use the creatures commodious, beware the pernicious, forbear those thou thinkest superfluous. In all things where our knowledge ends, let our admiration begin: though we cannot understand the creature, let us glorify the Creator.

2. Though man's sovereignty be abridged, yet he exerciseth still a lordship over the creatures. For, first, there is a natural instinct of obedience in them, especially those that are for man's use, as ox and horse. Though his authority extend not to the absolute command over those wild and savage creatures, lions and tigers; yet the more necessary and serviceable ones stoop to his yoke. Secondly, man sometimes by his strength subdueth the fiercest beast, as Samson the lion, and David the bear. And when strength faileth, his wit and policy often prevailleth. Every kind of beasts, birds, serpents, sea-inhabitants, hath been tamed of mankind, Jam. iii. 7. All other have been tamed of man, himself is tamed of none but God. (August.)

3. Though this dominion be lost by Adam, it is restored by Christ: Thou shalt be at peace with the beasts of the field, Job v. 23. But lastly and especially, this is done by the miraculous power of God: for besides the strange reports of Plutarch and Herodotus, concerning their Hesiod and Arion, Evalus and the virgin, borne upon dolphins' backs, and brought safe to shore; and Hierome relates, or some one under his name, how a Christian, being pursued by his heathen master, fled into a cave where was hid a lioness and her whelps, which never harmed him; but when the pagan came in with his other servant, she devoured them both; we know that Daniel was preserved in the lion's den, Jonah in the belly of a fish, and the viper had no power to hurt Paul. So here, the cruellest beasts come tame unto Noah: they offer and submit themselves to their preserver, renewing that obedience to the repairer of the world, which before sin they yielded to the first storer of the world. He that shut them into the ark when they were entered, did also shut their mouths while they were entering. The fierce lions fawn upon Noah and Daniel: what heart cannot the Maker of them mollify! Let us fear him that commands all, and no created power shall be ever able to harm us. "Fear not; the very hairs of your head are all numbered," Luke xii. 7. They were solicitous about their souls, Christ secures them of the very hairs of their head. Lord, we will fear no danger so long as thou undertakest to be our Keeper. Now to him that keepeth us from evil, and evil from us; that keepeth heaven for us, and us for himself; be praise for ever.

In the next place, let us meditate further of God's election, and the freight of souls preserved in the ark; eight persons. It was a family of four men and four women; not men alone, nor women alone, but both, and consisting of as many women as men. The beginning of the first world was by one man and one woman; of the second world, by four men and four women; but always equal. This is the fundamental term of all mankind, hence began the world; man was made of dust, the woman of his rib, the world of this woman. Woman takes her being from man, man takes his well-being from woman: therefore Eve was at the first created a wife; no sooner a woman, but presently a wife; and the first vocation of man was to be a husband. Therefore the Hebrews have a proverb, He who has not a wife is not a man. And for woman, as at first she took her essence, so she takes the perfection of her essence, from man.

But to reduce the manifold observations here offering themselves unto some head, we must consider two things; the quality of the persons, and the quantity of the number. For quality of the persons, they were all male and female, husband and wife: and God so disposed it for three causes; society, propriety, parity.

1. For society. It had been uncomfortable for man to have lived there alone: "It is not good that man should be alone; I will make him an help meet for him," Gen. ii. 18. Marriage is called a yoke, too heavy for one alone to bear; therefore each had a mutual help, a wife. In the participation of good, compassion of evil, in health the best delight, in sickness the best comfort; the sole companion to whom we may communicate our joys, and into whose bosom we unload our sorrows: thus are our griefs lessened, our joys enlarged, our hearts solaced. "A friend and companion never meet amiss; but above both is a wife with her husband," Eccclus. xl. 23. One in body and soul, as the stock and the grass are but one tree. God when he made man, made but one; when woman out of him, he made two of one; when marriage, he made one of two. Two parties and but one love, two souls compacted into one body; both one in affection while they live, both one in their posterity when they die. Where is conjugal faith, an indissoluble covenant, an unalterable affection; here is a blessed match, not to be matched by all the treasures of nature. The fair take no pleasure in the beauty of their own face, but by the reflection of that which others derive from it. Our eyes are not set to behold our own countenances, nor can our lips take delight in their own kisses, nor our arms in their own embraces; but in the society of a wife, by exchange, they have their use and perfection. She is man's similitude; so like him, as bone to bone, flesh to flesh, isha to ish: where face answereth face, as did the cherubim, both looking to the mercy-seat; and heart answereth heart, as a glass that returns upon a man his own image. Himself before himself, another that is himself, his adopted self; that loves what he loves, wills what he wills; that, as she wills his love, so loves his will: there is no society on earth that affords the like comfort.

2. The propriety; Noah and his wife. Every man had his own wife. Not one woman for many men, nor many women for one man; as wicked Lamech had before. This is the Lord's combination, Take thy wife: not, to take and leave, contract and divorce, put on and off like a garment; but one woman for one man, no more, no fewer, no other. In the creation, God made them male and female: not both males, or both females; then had they been unfit for generation: not male and females, nor female and males, much less adulterer and harlot; but two in one flesh; two, not three our four. Every wife should be to her husband, as Eve was to Adam, the whole world of women. For this cause God gave her to man, as the centre wherein his desires might rest. Lust is a runaway, as if it had Cain's curse to be a vagabond upon earth: it runs like a mathematical line, ad infinitum; still covets, and still remains unsatisfied. Nor is it confined within the bounds of wife, but of womankind; that which should be for physic to cure it, increaseth the disease. The delight is transient, the guilt everlasting: before the sense can sit down, and say, it is pleased; the conscience riseth up, and says, it is afflicted. Marriage is therefore ordained to qualify desire; as fire is appeased with fuel, a medicine of the same doth mitigate; nor doth it forbid, but rectify man's affection. But lust, because it cannot be stinted on earth, the justice of God confineth to hell.

3. The equality or parity. That men may learn to forbear despising of that weaker sex, behold here as many women saved as men. Not one man more, not one woman less; of the eight, women make up the just half: yea, whereas one of the four men was a hypocrite, and after cursed, the Scripture speaks no such matter of any woman among them. Howsoever poets in their satires, songsters in their drunken rhymes, and too many men in their unrelishing jests, spend their wits in invectives against that sex; yet the Lord loveth them equally with men, and Jesus Christ shed his blood, and by his blood (I am persuaded) saveth as many women as men. As she is "the wife of thy covenant," Mal. ii. 14, so she is the child of God's covenant; the daughter of Sarah, as well as thou art a son of Abraham. St. Peter says, they are co-heirs of the same grace, 1 Pet. iii. 7; and St. Paul, they are co-heirs of the same glory.

If the body of either sex be made of the better material, it is the woman's; Adam's was made of dead dust, Eve's of living flesh. She came out of man's side, and God hath made her cleave to his side, Gen. ii. 24. By such a derivation, he fitted such an adhesion; that she might not be a movable, to be departed from. From taking a bone from man, who had a bone too much, he closed it up with flesh, to mollify his nature. And this bone he added to the woman, to strengthen her that was too soft. Thus he made a sweet temper between them, like harmony in music, fit for concord. This bone was taken out of the midst of man, a rib, a bone of his side. Not a superior part, as the head; the wife is not made to govern: not of an inferior part, the foot; she is not a servant to be trod upon: not of an anterior part, as the breast; she is not to be preferred before the man: not of a posterior part, the back; she is not to beset behind in contempt: but of the side, a middle and indifferent part, ordained to be his companion and equal; they that walk side to side, are fellows. She was fetched from under his arm, that he should love her; not far from his heart, that he should defend her. A vine by the sides of his house, Psal. cxxviii. 3. Not on the roof, nor on the floor; the one is too high, she is no ruler; the other too low, she is no slave: but in the sides, an equal place between both.

Neither must this imbolden the wife to usurp: she was taken from the left side, showing that she stands in need of both protection and direction from her husband. By God's ordinance, man hath the pre-eminence. Thy very desire shall be subject to him, Gen. iii. 16. The husband is the head, 1 Cor. xi. 3: therefore if a woman murder her husband, she is judged by the civil law a parricide; by the statutes of the land, a traitor. The man had power to allow or disannul his wife's vows, Numb. xxx. 13. The edict of Ahasuerus differs not from the law of nature; "That every man should bear rule in his own house," Esth. i. 20, 22. Ubi tu Caius, ego Caia, was some equality among the Gentiles: but, I am mistress, and will rule all, is posterous among Christians. Cardinal Wolsey's style, "I and my king," was intolerable in the politics; so the wife's, I and my husband, is insufferable in the economics. The blessed Virgin had a more humble carriage towards her husband Joseph; as St. Augustine notes from the order of the words, "Thy father and I have sought thee sorrowing," Luke ii. 48. Not, I and thy father; but, thy father and I. The wife must give place to her Joseph on earth that will have place with Mary in heaven.

"Eight persons." Thus much for the quality of the persons, now for the quantity of the number, eight. Wherein we must consider, first, why so many as eight, then, why so few as eight. Why so many? for the speedier increase of mankind. Why so few? because this was the whole number of the righteous and believers.

"Eight." This was one cause why God reserved so many, that they might fructify to the multiplication of mankind. But why were not Noah and his wife sufficient for that end? No, they were old, for Noah was six hundred years old when the flood came; and though he lived three hundred years after, yet we read not of any more children he had. But the first world was begun and peopled by two and no more; why then were so many to begin the second world? I answer, 1. God did so at the first, to show that all mankind came of one blood, Acts xvii. 26, and that there was no original difference betwixt man and man. Neither is this unobserved in the second beginning; for though the world was multiplied by three men, yet were they all brethren, and the sons of one man. In effect, as at first by Adam and Eve, so by Noah and his wife, came all men in the world. 2. To begin the second world there were requisite more lines than one; because now the blessed Seed was promised, and his line and kindred must be kept distinct from all other till his incarnation. 3. There was more cause why the world should be more speedily replenished, than at first. For the earth had some beauty and glory left it after the former curse, so that (though far short of Paradise, yet) it was still to Adam a delightful and pleasant habitation. But this second curse in the flood washed off all the remaining beauty, and made it a rude and unpolished desert. Nor was only the surface of it thus maimed, but the virtue almost quite perished, as land by long sugging under the waters hath the heart of it eaten out. Therefore it is said, that the earth was divided among the three sons of Noah: they lived not all together, but overspread the earth, Gen. ix. 19; for it required many hands and much labour to the recovery of it. 4. Otherwise the beasts, which were then many, would have overgrown the world, if it had not been speedily replenished by their lords.

For this cause were four pairs admitted into the ark: not that Noah and his wife did there company together. Ambrose notes that they were not noted together in the going in, but in their coming out. But indeed, that was a time of sorrow and abstinence: as the Hebrews note, that Joseph in Egypt had not his children in the years of famine, but before.

Here then we see the end of marriage, which is issue, to people the earth, which is the means to people heaven. Therefore it is called matrimony, because the married proposed to themselves the titles of father and mother. Man is but a part of time, and therefore should not die till he hath left the world some in his room. He who has no children is as good as dead in the Hebrew proverb. Man's best art can only make dead things; there is no work of his head or hand, whereinto he can put a life, saving only in this, when he begets a son in his own image, he is then said to make a living creature. Herein he doth not only supply a place in God's church militant while he lives, but he also provides a soldier for the same field against he dies. Our bodies have no eternity on this earth, but only in respect of those fruits they produce. The Thracians used to rejoice at the death, and to weep at the birth, of their children; but God teacheth us to rejoice when a child is born, John xvi. 21; Gen. v. 29; xxi. 6. Leah bare one son, and called his name Reuben; a second, and called him Simeon; a third, and called him Levi; but when above expectation she bare the fourth, she purposefully calls his name Judah, and expressly protesteth, "Now will I praise the Lord," Gen. xxix. 32—35.

It is the most perfect work of all living things, to bring forth their like; to leave a seed behind, to preserve their species, to continue their name and posterity upon earth, and to shadow out in some sort immortality itself, by perpetuating life from the father to the son, and son's son, for many generations to come. We can scarce say that man is dead, that hath left his image behind him. A reverend divine compares those two trees in the 128th Psalm, the vine and olive, to the two trees in Paradise; the vine is the wife, the olive-plants the children. The one as the tree of knowledge of good and evil, for both these be in marriage; the other as the tree of life, for a man liveth in his children. Quid dulcius in humanis quam gignere sibi similem, quid beatius in terris quam natos videre natorum? (Æn. Sylv.) A wreath of children about the board, like a round of stars about the north pole, or a garland of courtiers about the throne. They are the walking pictures and speaking images of their parents; the wealth of the poor man, the honour of the rich. It is said of the ostrich, "She is hardened against her young ones, as though they were not hers," Job xxxix. 16. Parents unnatural to their children, want the mercy of sea-monsters, who draw their breasts, and give suck to their young ones, Lam. iv. 3. Grant it true, that children be certain cares, uncertain comforts; and that the poor man calls them his bills of expenses: yet the trouble of infants are sweet injuries to the mother; injuries, but sweet. Deo et parenti non redditur æquivalens. (Hierome.) They are vincula, the bonds and pledges to ratify and confirm love betwixt man and woman. Alcibiades asked Socrates, how he could endure the scolding of his wife Xantippe. Socrates asked him, how he could endure the cackling of his hens. Because, saith Alcibiades, mine hens bring me forth chickens. But, saith Socrates, my wife brings me forth children: this makes amends for all.

"Eight persons." We have heard the reason why so many as eight were preserved; now consider why so few. Even all Noah's family, for Noah's sake. The righteous man procureth blessings, not only to himself, but on all that belong to him. In the destruction of Sodom, ten had saved ten thousand, Gen. xviii. 32. Potiphar was a heathen, yet his house shall be blessed, because Joseph is there, Gen. xxxix. 5. The angels promise Lot, whomsoever he brought out should escape for his sake. Among two hundred threescore and sixteen souls there was but one Paul; yet, lo, "God hath given thee all that sail with thee," Acts xxvii. 24. Zaccheus alone believed, yet this brought salvation to his whole house, Luke xix. 9.

I make no doubt, but Noah's family were more orderly and religious than the common inhabitants of the world. For he that was a preacher to the whole earth, would not omit this duty to his own house: and they that come into the perfumer's shop, shall (though against their wills) bear away some of the scent on their clothes. He that was careful to provide an ark for the preserving of their bodies, would not neglect the provision of grace for the saving of their souls. Indeed carnal parents, to show that they begat not their children's souls, but their bodies, provide usually for their bodies, not for their souls. But as he that provides not for their temporal estate, is worse than any infidel, 1 Tim. v. 8; so he that provides not for their eternal state, is little better than a devil. When a great portion is readied for them, divers parents think they have done enough, and so they may turn them off. Indeed the world may take them thus, but the Lord will not take them thus, at their hands. Joseph and Mary brought Christ to the temple when he was but a little one. Augustine professeth of his mother Monica, that with greater pangs of care she had laboured of him in her spirit, than in her body. She travailed of him in her flesh, to bring him unto this light temporal; in her soul, to bring him unto the light eternal. Such mothers as Monica will make such sons as Augustine. The Africans did present their children, in their early years, before serpents: if with their sight they scared away the serpents, they held them legitimate; if not, bastards. Too many parents trust their children with such impious society, that, like serpents, suck out their souls without scarring their skins. Zeuxis having artfully painted a boy carrying grapes in a hand-basket, and set it abroad; the birds came and pecked at them, as if they had been true grapes. Whereat he being angry with himself and his art, said, If I had drawn the boy, which was the principal of my work, as well as the grapes, which were but a by-accident, the birds durst not have been so bold with them. Were parents as careful to form their children's manners, as to fill their purses, those ravenous harpies, the foul spirits of the air, could not so violently seize on them. I say to every father, as Paul to Timothy, Look to thy child, the pledge of God's goodness, thy comfortablest image in life, and best monument after death. I commend guarding their persons, and regarding their estates; but howsoever those things succeed, let me so love my children's bodies on earth, that I may one day meet their souls in heaven.

"Eight." Among all these there was not one servant. What, none of Noah's servants? Some think he had none; and that the simplicity of those times required no attendance, but every man waited on himself. This they collect from God's charge to Noah, "Come thou and all thy house into the ark," Gen. vii. 1; and because not a servant entered, therefore conclude, that he had none in his house. But here is the wonder, that Noah's own servants would not believe his preaching. They will rather sin and die with the world, than repent and be saved with their master. Perhaps they did Noah service, and he might think well of them, because he could not discern the heart; but they served not God, and were therefore lost. It is the good man's will, that all which serve him should truly serve the Lord. The faithful shall dwell with me, and the upright shall serve me. He that worketh deceit shall not dwell in my house, Psal. ci. 6, 7. It is an ill mixture in a family, when God shall have the parlour, and Satan the hall; when saints pray in the chamber, and ruffians swear in the cellar; when Noah is calling upon God, and his family doing sacrifice to Bacchus. I confess, that governors are but men; they have but two eyes, and cannot see into all places. But when their care is that God be honoured, their houses well ordered, and all Christian offices solemnly performed; though the success answer not their endeavours, in bringing their servants to heaven, yet their own souls shall be saved in the day of Jesus Christ.

"Eight." What then became of those that built this vessel? Certainly, as Noah was no sailor to guide it, so no carpenter to build it. The smith, the carpenter, and many cunning workmen, were hired to frame it: nor smith, nor carpenter, nor any other workman was saved by it. It must be exceeding labour to bring in sufficient provision for the innumerable kinds of creatures there reserved, Gen. vi. 21; and not a few were employed in this service; not one of them tasted this provision. More hands went to this work than Noah's: many wrought on the ark, that found no safety by the ark. Outward works cannot deliver us, without our faith: men may help to save others, and perish themselves. And as divers hearers are like the pinnacles on the belfry; when men begin to ring, they begin to quake; but continue ringing, they stand as still as stones, their fear is past. So some preachers may be like the bells, that ring others to church, and come themselves no nearer than the steeple. Or like high spires and pinnacles, that point upward, and poise downward. God will shut up believing Noahs in that ark which others have built; who are like foolish porters, that have the keys, and open the gates to let in others, and never mind going in themselves. It is happy so to build up Zion, that we may dwell in Zion; so to set others forward to heaven, that we be not behind ourselves. As Theodosius said, he had rather be a true member of the church, than head of the empire; it is better to be one of the eight saved in the ark, than one of the hundreds commended for their admirable skill in building it.

"Eight." Among these few there was one hypocrite, Ham; yet was he preserved with the rest for Noah's sake. Such is the mercy of God, that not one good man shall perish with the bad, yet one bad man shall be spared with the good. The righteous shall never be swept away for company, yet the unrighteous are often forborne for company. The ship may be in danger because Judas is there, but Judas shall escape because Jesus is there. Oh that of a perishing world but eight should be selected, and that one of those eight should prove a wicked man! that Ham after all this should so profanely offend! that neither the wrath of God in destroying the world should humble him, nor the mercy of God in his deliverance should better him! There is nothing to be said, but the Lord chooseth whom he will; and when the unrighteous perish, yet Thou remainest holy, O thou worship of Israel.

"Eight." Of the whole world, no more saved? a miserable spectacle! See what sin can do; bring many millions to eight persons in a short time. Though Israel were as the stars in Solomon's days, yet brought to a tenth, Isa. vi. 13. David would number them, but the Lord soon decreased them. Let us never glory in our multitudes, for if our sins provoke him, God can easily make us few enough. Though our streets were sown with men, and our children grew up like young plants, or grapes in unnumbered clusters; yet the Lord can melt them as snow in the sun, mow down the flowers, empty the land of fathers, and leave no widows to make lamentation for them; so that a man shall be more precious than the gold of Ophir, Isa. xiii. 12. But if we fail in our numbers, yet we hope for supply from our neighbours? No, let not our adherence with man endanger our conjunction with God. He can reduce many thousands to few, as he did to Gideon, Judg. vii. 4, that the glory might be his. He that could narrow up a whole world to eight, can bring a kingdom to two, to one, to none. If thousands run on the course of disobedience, they shall quickly enough be diminished.

"Eight." Lastly, here is figured out to us the paucity of souls that shall be saved. Many are called, few chosen. The gate of bliss is narrow, and few enter into it. My flock is a little flock; little in respect of the number drowned in the deluge of sin.

Questionless, as small as it is, every one hopes well of himself; and if Noah had foretold this definite number to that world, all would have presumed, I am one of the eight. When black and ravenous ruin spreads her dismal wings to sweep away the wicked, few tremble; for they conceit themselves to be none of the forlorn crew. Yet what is the common religion of the world? To say the creed is all their faith; to pay what they must needs, all their equity; to say Be filled, all their charity; to take their own, all their mercy; to give fair words, all their bounty; to carry a formal profession, all their piety; to cry God mercy, all their penitence; and to come to church, all their conscience: but will all this bring them unto the number of eight? None belong to the ark, but the members of Christ; none are his members, but they be in the body of his church; none are of his body, but they live by his Spirit; none have that life, but they walk after the Spirit; none so walk, but their consciences be cleansed; none are thus pure, but they have repented; none have repented, unless they forsake their sins; and none forsake their sins, but they must needs have amended lives.

Haply each thinks, I am in as good case as others, I shall speed as well as my neighbours: so might the old world tell their fellows; and they all sped alike indeed, in one common destruction. But it is not good to venture all our estate in one uncertain bottom, to hazard our eternal being upon the exemplary practice of the multitude. Noah believed alone, when all the world contested against him; and Noah was saved alone, when all the world perished without him. Who would not rather affy God's word with one singular Noah, than be incredulous with the whole world, and perish? Sinners so swarm, that there is scarce elbow-room for the righteous. But "if the righteous scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly and the sinner appear?" 1 Pet. iv. 18. The righteous are scarce, and even their salvation is scarce; and shall not sinners tremble? Strive to enter in at the strait gate, Matt. vii. 13. There is a difficulty, it is strait; but a possibility, it is a gate; and a gate was made for entrance. O then let us get assurance to our consciences, that we are some of those few. Do we groan and bleed for our errors? do we strive to rectify our lives? do we resolutely detest our sins? do we implore grace by our prayers? do we consecrate to God our hearts? do we rest upon Christ by our faiths? do we follow after holiness with our endeavours, and love the Lord with all our souls? We shall then feel, what no tongue of man can express, the sweet testimony of the Holy Ghost to our consciences, that we are wrapped up in the bundle of life, sealed to the day of redemption; and how few soever escape destruction, we are of the number that shall find salvation, through the mercies and merits of Jesus Christ.

THE MYSTERY OF NOAH'S ARK.

THIS miraculous preservation hath also a mystical sense, and serves for the instruction and consolation of the militant church unto the world's end. There is in a text, as in a tree, the bud, blossom, fruit; a literal, a spiritual, and a moral sense. "Awake, O north wind, and come, thou south; blow upon my garden, that the spices thereof may flow out. Let my beloved come into his garden, and eat his pleasant fruits," Cant. iv. 16. In a literal sense, Solomon's queen desires a pleasant garden to delight her husband. In a spiritual sense, the church entreats the Holy Ghost, that wind which blows where he pleaseth, to blow upon and enlarge her graces, that Christ, or Husband, may take pleasure in her. In a moral sense, she would have all her children bring forth store of fruits, good works, that they might be blessed of their Father. "O daughter, forget thine own people, and thy father's house," Psal. xlv. 10. Literally, it is spoken to Pharaoh's daughter, to forget Egypt wherein she was bred and born, and to adhere to her husband Solomon. Mystically, it speaks to the church, to forget this world, wherein she was born an Egyptian, black with sins; and cleave faithfully to her beloved Christ, who had now with his own blood washed her fair, and greatly desired her beauty. So that under the title of Pharaoh's daughter, hear what the Spirit speaketh to the church. "Thou hast ravished my heart with one of thine eyes, with one chain of thy neck," Cant. iv. 9. Literally, corporeal beauty is commended; chains, jewels, ornaments allowed: spiritually, graces, the beauties of the soul, and good works, the beauty of graces, are required. Only here is the difference between other trees and the tree of life. They first bud, then blossom, then send forth fruit; but the tree of life hath all these at once, Rev. xxii. 2. Yea, further, as in a tree there is the bark and the pith; so in a text are some things that lie on the upper face, and some things in the bowels of it. Thus Noah's ark literally served for the temporal deliverance of their bodies; spiritually it taught them the eternal deliverance of their souls; mystically it pre-signifies to us the deliverance of both our bodies and souls from the vengeance due to our sins. As a musician, therefore, first tries the sound of his instrument, before he plays the lesson; so now having delivered the literal sound, I come to the mystical sense.

Herein let us observe first what it taught them, next what it must teach us. It instructed them in two things.

First, it was a pledge of God's love to their souls; for he that was so careful to save their bodies from the flood of water, gave them certain hope that he would save their souls from the fire of hell. The preservation of that which was mortal and inferior, was a strong argument that the other should be safe, which was immortal and far more precious. When a house is on fire, he that redeemeth the cabinet, will not lose the jewel in it. Let it be granted, that God doth sometimes relieve the wicked from temporal plagues, and binds them over to the general session; yet is David's inference good, "By this I know that thou favourest me, because mine enemy doth not triumph over me," Psal. xli. 11: from mercy to his body, he argues grace to his soul. We cannot conclude by inversion, that whom God doth not free from temporal judgments, he will not free from eternal: none are to be judged for outward misery. "Let her alone, for her soul is troubled, and the Lord hath hid it from me," 2 Kings iv. 27. The cause of their troubles is hid from us. "If your soul were in my soul's stead, I could heap up words against you, and shake my head at you," Job xvi. 4. I could, but I would not. But from a less benefit to a greater, is a good collection of faith. When the faithful of Israel saw the Lord's arm in delivering them from Egypt, they believed that he would bring them into Canaan. He that hath freed us from superstition, certainly means us to salvation.

Secondly, it was a confirmation of their faith and obedience. Without obedience in building the vessel, without faith in believing the promise, they saw no hope of preservation. This taught them for afterwards, what precept soever was imposed, to obey it; what promise soever was made, to trust upon it. And what could be strange to their confidence, that had of miraculous mercy so late an experience? Some profess they believe the pardon of their sins; yet fear the want of bread, or sink under some light burden of sorrow. Is any load so heavy as the pressure of sin? Oh the weight of one sin is too much for the supportation of one man. Now hath Christ borne the talent, and can he not bear the dram? Shall we trust him with our wounds, and not with our medicines? Hath he given us the bread of life, and can he not give us the bread of earth? Shall we say with the lusting Jews, He gave us streams from the rock, but can he give flesh to his people? Psal. lxxviii. 20. Consider, will Christ deny flesh to our bodies, that hath given his own flesh to our souls? Hath he performed such sovereign pieces of gold, and will he stick at farthing tokens? He that spared not his own Son for us, what good thing will he deny us? Rom. viii. 32. Do we trust in the Lord for the remission of our sins, the resurrection of our bodies, and the everlasting salvation of our souls; and distrust him in a fever, in a scandal, in a fit of want? Certainly if he have vouchsafed us that great mercy to make us his own, he hath given the whole army of afflictions more inviolable charge concerning us, than David gave his host concerning Absalom; See ye do the young man, my son Absalom, no harm; look you never hurt them whom I have adopted.

Thus for them, now for ourselves. This ark hath also a symbolical sense, a spiritual use. It was a type and figure of Christ's church; out of which there is no hope of salvation, as out of the ark was inevitable destruction. Examine we the resemblances.

1. All that were preserved, were within the ark: all that shall be saved, must be of the church. In that great deluge, when Omnia pontus erat, deerant quoque littora ponto, there was no other possibility of escaping: in the huge pond and vast sea of this world, there is no hope of redemption but by Jesus Christ. Either we must be incorporate into Christ, or reprobate with the world. "The Lord adds to the church daily such as shall be saved," Acts ii. 47; to the church militant, all souls that shall be crowned in the church triumphant. As for them that were out of the ark, no gold could buy their preservation; no holes could hide them, no hills help them, no houses hold them, nothing in the world, not the world itself, could save them. So for them that be out of Christ, no riches can bestead them, no honours secure them, no policy can deliver them, no refuges can shelter them, no friends, no favour can do them good; but they must perish in the flood of God's eternal vengeance. What succour had they by the mountains, or by taking hold on the highest cedars, whom the ark received not? Such help shall men find in those worldly things wherein they have trusted, when God shall find them out of his church. What relief in their honours, upon whose foreheads the sun of promotion wantonly plays? as if that arm should never ache, that wears a silken sleeve; nay, as if the highest hills were not most subject to the lightning flashes. For the covetous, that like a spider eviscerates herself, spends her own bowels in making a web to catch a fly; how foolish is his confidence in that, which he knows will never fail him but when he hath most need! Alas, he cannot buy Christ with it; and therefore must expect Simon Magus's doom, Thou and thy money perish together. There is no other name given to men under heaven, to be saved by, but the name of Jesus, Acts iv. 12: nothing in nature, nothing in art, nothing in the world, no other creature, no other name. In vain they think to sail in their cock-boats, or swim with their windy bladders: every heresy is a little bark by itself, and while it is not troubled, it goes on with proud sails like a merchant's ship; but vexed, you shall find it a man of war. Every factious and discontented humour is like a bladder, which the peevish refractory puts under his arm, and he will not be beholden to the ark for passage, he can swim to shore. Let such sullen spirits hear and fear: as a man will not admit that person to his house who loves not his family, so they that forsake the church must be forsaken of Christ.

2. As God was the Pilot of the ark, so Christ is the Governor of the church. The superstitious Romanists have their several saints for several services; for the teeth, Apollonia; for soldiers, St. Maurice; for seamen, St. Nicholas. As those gross idolaters in heathen times marshalled their gods into several ranks; allotting heaven for Jupiter, hell for Pluto, and the sea for Neptune. But the Lord is all in all to us, our Pilot on the sea, our Captain on the land. We tender not our petitions to the no gods of the Gentiles, or to the moe gods of the papists; we do not trouble the blessed virgin for every thing, as if her Son Jesus were still a babe, and not able to help us; but we go to Christ for all. That same ship in the prophet, every man calling upon his god, Jonah i. 5, is a map or model of Rome; one calling on St. Francis, another on St. Anthony, &c. But if we love learning, the Lord is our Gregory, the God of wisdom; if soldiers, he is our Mars and Maurice, the Lord of hosts; if mariners, he is our Neptune and Nicholas, that commands the winds and seas, and they obey him, Matt. viii. 27. As Cæsar said to the trembling mariner, Confide nauta, Cæsarem vehis, Be not afraid, thou carriest Cæsar: so, O church, be comforted; he that is in thee, for thee, with thee, that guides thee, that will save thee, is the invincible King, Jesus Christ.

3. The matter of the ark was not every kind of wood, but the pine: nor is every one admitted into the church, but such as the Lord hath chosen; which are not born of blood, nor will of the flesh, but of the will of God, John i. 13. The Lord often leaves the lofty cedar, that overlooks the rest with an imperious top; and the sturdy oak, him that will not stoop to his word; the melancholy yew, the hollow-hearted elder, the intractable thorn, the hypocritical ivy, that by embracing the tree sucks out the heart of it. He chooseth the vine for his orchard, the pine for his ark: he first hews us out of the wilderness of sin, takes away the ruggedness of our nature, and having planed us by grace, puts us into his church, where we fit with the rest in unanimous obedience. (Epiph.)

4. The ark consisted of many pieces of wood joined together: and the church doth not consist of one man, or one sort of men; but of every nation and kindred, language and people, Rev. vii. 9. Many souls compacted into one body, many Christians into one communion of saints. And all these make but one ark, one church. One world shows that there is but one God; one God, that there is but one church; one church, that there is but one truth. Therefore is it called columna veritatis, and columba unitatis: The sweetest music consists of many well-tuned voices: if there be any jarring and contentious spirit, he is out of tune, none of the Christian concert. Let us live as we sing, and our hearts go with our voices; this is the consent of the church. God doth seldom divide his graces among divided spirits; if we will not be at one with ourselves, he will not be at one with us. A shevelled thread is hardly got through the needle's eye. The Spirit is one, and said to speak by the mouth of all the prophets, Luke i. 70; not per ora, sed per os: as if all the prophets had but one mouth; to show the singular harmony of their concord. That Spirit which came in a dove will not come but upon a dove. When we delight in discord, our assemblings are dissemblings, our convocations provocations, every man vultuous, wedded to a wife that fools him, self-will: here is as little argument of a Christian congregation, as the confusion of Babel was like the harmony of the temple. An unsquared stone, a warping board, a jarring spirit, must not be put into the building of Christ.

5. The ark was pitched within and without, the better to keep out the water. So must every Christian be joined into the body, with profession and sincerity; sound-habited without, sound-hearted within. Nor profession, nor sincerity, are sufficient asunder; both do well together. Jericho was pleasant of situation, but the springs were naught, 2 Kings ii. 19: many men's profession is fair, but the fountain, the heart, is infected. Laish was a barren turf, but the heart of the ground was good, had it been tilled: so some have a little religion hid in their consciences, but for want of husbanding their graces it perisheth. But God cannot abide a wanton Christian: a wanton Jew, Turk, pagan, is bad enough; but none so intolerable as a wanton Christian. As in many things we sin all, so in some things we may obey all; but one line makes no geometry, nor doth one act put Christianity. Neither the timber rotten at the heart, how fair soever to the eye, nor the timber crooked and ill-favoured to the eye, how sound soever at the heart, shall be put into Christ's ark. To be good, and not to appear; to appear good, and not to be; is not the way to glorify God, or for him to glorify us.

6. In the ark were divers rooms, so in the church are divers places and gifts, as in heaven there be divers mansions. Many distinct offices in a ship, the pilot, captain, boatswain, mariners, concur all in one care for the preservation of the vessel. In the church be apostles, prophets, pastors, teachers; yet all tend to the edification of the body of Christ, 1 Cor. xii. 28; Eph. iv. 11, 12. There is nothing more endangers confusion, than for one to intrude into another's room; displacing the members from their proper faculties and functions: when the rude hind will be a counsellor of state, the ignorant secretary be made a bishop, and Jack Cade a justice of peace. It is no easy wisdom, rightly to distinguish our own office: all parts have their several functions; and tractent fabrilis fabri. The foot must not usurp the office of the hand, nor the hand intrude upon the office of the head. Aliud plectrum, aliud sceptrum. So look to others' vineyards, that thou be sure to keep thine own, Cant. i. 6. If we be Christ's faithful soldiers, let us keep our station, and fight it out with victorious courage. What room in the ship soever is assigned us, let us make that good. In God's arithmetic there be no ciphers: we must be something on earth, or we shall be nothing in heaven.

7. In the ark were beasts clean and unclean; in the church are sinners blended among the righteous. The Lord did sow good seed in his field, whence then hath it tares? Matt. xiii. 27. The devil hath no ground of his own, but he soweth in God's field, and upon God's seed: so the corruption of the good is the generation of the bad. These tares are not of God's sowing; it is none of his fault; all that he made was exceeding good, Gen. i. 31. The church militant is a heaven, but on earth; therefore not without the firebrands of hell. Let no man leave God's floor because there is some chaff, nor break his net because there is some baggage, nor run out of his field because there is some cockle, nor depart from his house because there be some vessels of dishonour. God would have spared a city for ten good ones, Gen. xviii. 32, and shall we refuse a church for ten bad ones? I avoid the chaff, lest I become chaff: I keep the floor, lest I become nothing. (August.) This their accusation of the church is vain: if men cannot prove it, they shame themselves; if they do prove it, they deny Christ; for his clear answer was, "Let both grow together until the harvest." Either because the bad may turn good; God can make a Luther of a monk, a St. Augustine of a Manichee; or because the good are exercised and tried by the bad. If Arius had not held a trinity of substances with a trinity of persons; and Sabellius, a unity of persons with a unity of essence; the mysteries of the Trinity had not been so clearly explained by those great lights of the church. If Rome had not so violently obtruded her merits, the doctrine of justification by faith in Christ only might have been less digested in men's hearts. We may say here, as Augustine doth of Carthage and Rome, Magis nocuit Romanis Carthago tam cito eversa, quam prius nocuerat tam diu adversa. If some enemies had not contested against the church, it might have gone worse with the church. But let them bear the rack of their own fancies, whose schismatical torn opinions are stitched together with a skein of sisters' thread, and rounded with the bobbin-lace and salvage of reformation. Critical quarrels argue hypocritical hearts; and if they prevent it not by humility and unity, the ark holds none so unclean as themselves.

8. The ark was tossed of the waves, and all the storms of the world spent their furies upon it, yet could it not be overwhelmed. When the winds, waters, weathers, had done their worst, still Noah's preservation was sure. The more the water rose against it, the more the ark rose above it; and the higher it was raised by the flood, the safer it was from the danger of hills and rocks. In the midst of water it was saved from water, and the danger itself was made a defence against the danger. Thus sure of salvation is every one in Christ, nothing can cross it. The deluge of calamities may assault us, but they shall exalt us. The more they seek to press us down, the more they shall lift us up; the nearer they would sink us to hell, the higher they shall advance us to heaven. Through all the gusts of temptations, and floods of afflictions, we shall be borne safe in Christ's ark. Nothing shall pluck them out of my hand, John x. 28. Satan cannot, he is cast out: tyrants cannot, for if we suffer, we conquer: sin cannot, for grace abounds above sin: sickness cannot, God is strongest when we are weakest: death cannot, that serpent hath lost the sting. Indeed all our voyage is a tempestuous navigation: the shore from which we launch, is our nativity; the port whither we are bound, supernal felicity; the sea we must pass, full of raging calamity; the ship wherein we sail, full of sweet security. There will be cross winds, but let us rest in the ark, the church, and trust in the Pilot, Christ, and our danger is not half so sure as our deliverance: we may fail of grievous afflictions upon earth, we shall not fail of glorious salvation in heaven.

9. Noah's body being entered into the ark, seemed there a dead man; that vessel being a grave or tomb unto him, wherein he was buried. Yet was that, by God's appointment, the means to save him, which in all reason seemed to bury him. And if Noah will be safe, he must go into this sepulchre, and be buried in the ark, as the ark in the water. So must there be in us a mortification of lusts, and burial of our corruptions; and there is no way to everlasting life but this. The soul cannot live while the sin doth live: one of the two must die, the corruption or the person. Thus is death the way to life; and mortification of lust, to the resurrection of bliss. He that thus dieth not, never lives; and he that is not thus buried, never riseth again with comfort.

In how wretched an estate then are many, that scarce know what mortification means; unless it be to mortify grace, and to bury all holiness! The old man reigns, and the new man serves: corruption lives, and grace is dead. To mortify goodness by our sins, this is common; but to mortify our sins by goodness, this is rare. What a preposterous change is this! Christ should live in us, and we crucify him again; sin should be crucified in us, and that liveth. But this is a true saying, He that will live when he is dead, must die while he is alive. Proceed we then, after this spiritual death, to the burial of our sins. It was the manner of the Jews, to bury their dead with odours: bury we sin with the incense of our prayers against it, that it may never return upon us. Only two things let us avoid in the burial of our sins, which we observe in the burial of our friends. 1. When we bury our friends, we do it with mourning, to testify our loves, that we are loth to part with them. Our sins must not be so buried; no sorrow at their departure: no man weeps to lose an enemy, nor grieves to be rid of a tyrant. Shall we sorrow to lose the proper cause of our sorrow? It was good news for Israel, that Sisera was dead in the tent of Jael; and Deborah sings, So perish all thine enemies, O Lord. Let them be buried with joy, that cannot be kept without danger. 2. When we inter the bodies of our friends, it is done in hope that they shall rise again: by no means so bury we our sins; let there be no desire of their resurrection; wrong not the sepulchres of the dead, let them sleep for ever. Otherwise, like Judas, and Demas, and such hypocrites, they bury them not in their forgotten graves, but in their own hearts. And so their sins shall rise with their bodies, and go with them to judgment.

Lastly, the apostle compares it to baptism: that which was Noah's ark to them, the same is baptism to us; the ark saved them, baptism saveth us. "The like figure whereunto," &c. I Pet. iii. 21. The particular instance, or point of reference, is baptism; the general, is the church. For baptism no otherwise saveth us, than as it is a seal of our admission into the church, and incorporating into Christ. Therefore it is a synecdochical speech, the part for the whole, the door for the house, baptism for the church.

Baptism is the door of entrance into this ark; therefore the sacred font is commonly placed near the temple door. As in Solomon's temple were three rooms, the porch, the body, and the holy of holies; and they must pass through the one into the other: so in Christianity, we cannot enter the holiest of all, but by the church; nor into the church, but by the porch of baptism. There must first be shipping, then sailing, last of all arriving: we must be shipped with Christ by baptism, sail with him in the pinnacle of the church, or else not arrive at the coast of eternal blessedness.

The end of baptism is double; principal, and less principal. The principal is to assure us of two things. First, the remission of our sins; "Be baptized in the name of Jesus, for the remission of sins," Acts ii. 38. And next, that we are within God's covenant, partakers of his grace here, and of his glory hereafter. The less principal consists in three things. 1. To note a distinction between Christians and infidels; a cognizance or livery, to tell the world whose servants we are; the colours of that General under whom we fight. 2. To be the bond of Christian society. "Keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace." Why? Because there is "one faith, one baptism," Eph. iv. 3, 5. We are all baptized into one Christ: the remembrance of our baptism is enough to stay contention. 3. It is a profession of homage to that God, even those three Persons, in whose name we are baptized. And it is a holy memorial of Christ's baptizing in the sea of his Father's wrath for us.

Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into heaven, John iii. 5. As the Spirit is an inward necessary cause, so baptismal water is an outward necessary means, of our regeneration. It incorporates us to Christ; so that the body of the baptized is become the flesh of him that was crucified. The day of the infant's baptizing, is the day of his marriage, wherein he is made the spouse of Christ by the union of the Spirit. As Christ was made our flesh by being born, so we are made his flesh by being new-born: the Spirit being in the new birth instead of a father, and water instead of a mother.

As there is a long antiquity of sacraments, so a special necessity. For antiquity: in Paradise was a tree of knowledge and a tree of life; both sacramental trees. For necessity: as a man consists of two parts, one visible, the other invisible; so respondent be the means to draw him to heaven, the word and sacraments: and a father calls the sacrament, a visible word. (August.) We fell from God to Satan by visible things; God brings us back from Satan to himself by visible things. Wherein we may see the infirmity of our natures; the Lord is fain to stay us up by many helps, the word for our ears, the sacraments for our eyes. If we see a house held up by props, pins, columns, and supporters, we say, it is certainly old, sere, and weak of itself.

I do not enforce an absolute necessity of this, as if God could not save us without it. Of its own virtue it hath no such power to salvation; water of itself being readier to drown than to save; especially the infant being dipped into it. No man concludes the innocents out of the ark to be damned and cast into hell; so nor the infants of Christians that die unbaptized. It pleaseth the Lord to admit infants to baptism, though they be not able to answer for themselves. And as it was in his justice to impute my sin to my child, to make it guilty; so it pleaseth his mercy to take my faith for my child, to make it holy.

"Open thy mouth for the dumb in the cause of all such as are appointed to destruction," Prov. xxxi. 8. Still the Lord requires our speech for those speechless little ones, whom the bloody papists appoint to destruction. They cannot answer for themselves; but the Lord Jesus, when he was on earth, spake for them; and he hath sent us to plead their cause. They have those great dukes and peers of heaven for their patrons, the angels, Matt. xviii. 10; and shall we be silent?

Parents love to hear well of their children's states in this life, much more should they inquire of their state to come. The greater their joy in them, the greater their sorrow for them; especially when they fall sick in the field, and die at home, as the Shunammite's son, 2 Kings iv. 20: but more especially if, like David's son, 2 Sam. xii. 18, they die without the sacrament. Then their ignorance and distrust put them into a hopeless grief; as if they were of the stock of Ishmael, and not the seed of Israel. And even those that will not keep their hours with God and the church, in respect of state and outward compliment; yet take on with God and man if their children miss baptism. I would they did think of that woman's speech to Elijah, "Art thou come to call my sin to remembrance, and to slay my son?"

1 Kings xvii. 18; that God in slaying their sons, brings to remembrance their sins. But that good Lord, who punisheth our neglect, shows mercy to those little ones. They often vanish from us in a night, before we have scarce looked on their faces; but the God of compassion, who pities them in Ashur and Nineveh, will he forget the seed of Christians? We miss them in our arms; behold, they are in the arms of God. They are plucked from the mother's bosom, but unto Abraham's bosom; translated from a cradle below, to a throne of immortality above. How oft doth a friend among men, take a babe from the poor feeble mother, and bring it up as his own; as Pharaoh's daughter did Moses! And shall not God take a child from the womb, or wean it from the breast, to have it nursed in heaven, lest it should find ill bringing up here?

Let this comfort parents against that unmerciful doctrine of Rome; teaching that if children die on earth without baptism, they must die hereafter without mercy. That infants who cannot speak or do ill, whose flesh is but new-quickened in the womb, or bones scarce gristled out of the womb, should pass from the darkness of the womb, to outer darkness for ever; this is the voice of the dragon gored with blood. The Lamb of God speaks better things, and gives his blood to these little lambs. David grieved for the child sick, but desired not respite of life for circumcision; and though the child died on the seventh day, (which had been terrible, if the want of a day had lost it for ever,) yet he then ceased mourning.

The children of Israel forbore circumcision forty years, during all their journey in the wilderness, Josh. v. 5: will they pronounce damnable sentence on all them? If not, why then on ours? Hath the state of the gospel less mercy and pity than the law? Goes it harder with the infants under Christ, than under Moses? They had a set day for circumcision, the eighth: we have none defined: hath not the Lord in this left it freer? Those infant martyrs, to whose memory they observe a feast as to saints, desired nor baptism, nor their friends for them; much less that baptism of blood; but their hearts rather bled for it; yet are they glorious in heaven. John Baptist seems not to have been baptized himself, by his answer to Christ, "I have need to be baptized of thee, and comest thou to me?" Matt. iii. 14. God's love is no fancy that the want of baptism may break off. It were heavy for the poor child to be lost for the parent's or minister's negligence.

To say that baptism, even the most ritually and formally administered, saveth of itself, is to deify it, and to make a god of the water, with the Gentiles. But the Lord saveth, and when he pleaseth, without that. "This day is salvation come to this house; he also is a son of Abraham," saith Christ of Zaccheus, Luke xix. 9. This day, and yet that was not the day of his baptism: he was made the son of Abraham, yet was not washed in Jordan. The eunuch by faith, Cornelius by devotion, Lydia by obedience, received grace before baptism. Mary Magdalene, that scoured on to sin as if seven devils drove her, with tide, wind, and sail, found mercy before baptism; "Thy faith hath saved thee; go in peace," Luke vii. 50: thy faith, not thy baptism.

True sanctification may be without the visible sign, as the visible sign may be without true sanctification. One of their side saith, necessity is twofold. 1. Absolute, as meat is for life. 2. Or convenient, as a horse is for a journey. (Alzim.) Baptism is necessary this last way. Yea, a great peal of their own voices doth repeal that merciless sentence, which, like Herod, hath sent out a decree against young infants, who because they enjoy but a little of this life, must lose all the next. Indeed, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved;" but it is added withal, "He that believeth not," whether baptized or no, "shall be damned," Mark xvi. 16.

To conclude, let us make a double use of this; the one for obedience, the other for faith. The former is a direction for our obedience, that we use the appointed means, baptism. The other for our faith, that we build not our salvation upon baptism, but upon God's election and grace.

1. For obedience. Baptism cannot be wilfully neglected without great sin. Let us neither with the papists make it absolutely necessary; nor with the Manichees, wholly unnecessary; nor inconvenient with the Anabaptists, because they are children and cannot profess. But seeing children have sin, they ought to be washed; and seeing they belong to God, they ought to be sealed. Seeing the Lord hath commanded it, let us perform it. Seeing he hath promised the washing away of sin, by pouring on of water; let us pour on water for the washing away of sin. Otherwise we despise not the minister of the sign, but the God of both sign and minister: and for those that refuse the sign, it is a sign they refuse the grace; and deserve the reproof of Ahaz, Is it a small thing to grieve men, but will you grieve God also? Isa. vii. 13. This was the condemnation of the Pharisees and lawyers; they "rejected the counsel of God against themselves," in this very point of not being baptized of John, Luke vii. 30. It is not only the bare element, but the power of God with it, his wisdom to establish it, his constancy to maintain it, his holiness to sanctify it, and his mercy to bless it.

When time, place, minister, all things concur, let not us be wanting. They are young flowers, soon nipped by death's cold hand. Perhaps some human additions we dislike, yet know that this overthrows not the ordinance of God. The foundation is sure, what stubble soever be built upon it: fire shall purge that, God's institution shall save thee. If thou mayest have it pure and uncompounded, so take it; if otherwise, do not refuse it: let no ceremony of man prejudice the ordinance of God.

And as we honour the sacrament, so let us honour the word; for that must go with the element, to make a sacrament. The word hath saved some without baptism; what men hath baptism saved without the word? The promise of the gospel is the writing, baptism the seal. The certainty of the writing is from the seal, but the validity of the seal is from the writing. Indeed, neither writing nor seal can save, without the Holy Ghost to apply them. In baptism, as in Bethesda, if the Spirit move on the face of the waters, then there is healing, John v. 4. The serpent prevaileth against us in sicco, in the dry ground; but in aqua, in the water, he loseth all his venom. (Cyprian.) Satan's malicious power is lost in the sacramental waters.

2. For faith, depend we upon the election of God, which shall stand with means, if he afford it; without means, if he deny it. Among men, first the conditions are agreed upon, then the seal is annexed; so God first receiveth into covenant, and then sealeth. Men first possess their sheep, then mark them: first we muster up soldiers, then levy out some, and give them press-money. The father being a good landlord, after the grant of a tenement to a poor man, dies without sealing it. Yet the right dies not, seeing an honest son cometh in place, who will be a confirmation to his father's promise, a seal to his grant. God the Father hath granted a covenant of grace to the believer and his seed, promised them an estate of life in his Son Jesus: though haply the young seed be prevented of this outward seal, baptism; yet the good Son Christ will perform to them his Father's promise, and seal them up to eternal life. The claim of the proprietary is good, albeit no actual mark be set upon his goods. The mark of God is invisible; "The Lord knoweth them that are his," 2 Tim. ii. 19; and, "My sheep shall never perish, neither shall any man pluck them out of my hand," John x. 28. Not a sheep, not the least lamb of a day old, yea, not that which is scarce yeaned and brought into the world. "The dragon stood before the woman which was ready to be delivered, for to devour her child as soon as it was born;" he watched upon the very birth, yet the "child was caught up unto God, and to his throne," Rev. xii. 4, 5. If the sin of the first Adam could bring an everlasting taint upon them, why cannot the blood of the Second Adam wipe it out for ever? The infant cannot reason, yet hath it the seed of reason; it hath a soul, though it know not so much; why then may it not have faith? Children must come to Christ. What children? Little ones, that have but little reason; yet theirs is the kingdom of heaven, Matt. xix. 14. If so, then are they clean, for no unclean thing shall enter that holy city, Rev. xxi. 27: now what cleanseth but faith? This faith then they have after a miraculous inspiration, by that blessed wind that bloweth itself pleaseth where, and gets in no man knows how, John iii. 8. Draco's laws altogether concluded in death; death for this, death for that, nothing but the fatal noise of death. But Christ is no dragon, he is rather a Lamb that takes away the sins of the world, a world of sins; much more will he heal these little lambs of his flock. The blood of Abel crieth for vengeance, but Christ crieth with a stronger and more gracious voice, Heb. xii. 24; My blood for all blood, my body for all sin, even of mine enemies. If he were a Herod in his butcherly doom, Rachel might weep and make lamentation for her little ones, and refuse comfort, because they are not. If the grave and hell, those ministers of vengeance, were to devour those unbaptized little ones; then every mother and father, sister and friend, might howl and mourn, answering one another with doleful plaints and remediless moanings, and have no comfort, because they are not; yea, which is worse, because they are, that is, they are in endless sorrow. But blessed be God, that hath sealed us a better covenant; praised be he, that hath given us better assurance and comfort, through the Son of his love, Jesus Christ.

And turning the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah into ashes condemned them with an overthrow, making them an ensample unto those that after should live ungodly.

THIS is the third instance of God's severity and mercy; severity to the obstinate, mercy to the penitent. First, he confounded the apostate angels, and preserved the obedient. Secondly, he drowned the secure world, and saved the faithful Noah. Here he burned the ungodly cities, and delivered the just Lot. He begun with honour and sublimity, casting down angels; to show that no celsitude can privilege rebellion against his will. He went on with multitude and universality, drowning a whole world; to show that no numbers, legions, or armies of sinners can prevail against his justice. He concludes with opulency and worldly estate, in this overthrow of Sodom; to show that no riches and prosperity can avail in the day of wrath.

Sodom was a second Eden, the garden of the world; yet he that for transgression did throw Adam out of Paradise, did also for the same reason overthrow Sodom with all her pleasures. There only eight were saved out of the whole world, and here are but half eight delivered from this ruin. And as one of those eight was after cursed by his father, and became a precedent for all rebellious children; so one of these four was punished by the Father of all, and for her tergiversation, or retro-spection rather, was turned into a pillar of salt, and became a monument of apostacy to all succeeding ages: this was Lot's wife.

Only this latter exceeded the former destruction in some things. 1. For generality; it was more universal and impartial: eight there escaped, here but four. 2. In regard of the instrument; that was by water, this by fire, an element of greater fury and torment. 3. For the suddenness; the water drowned them by degrees, so that by the continued ascending it might soften them to repentance. The fire consumed all those quickly, without giving them leisure to think of their sins, save with a desperate consideration. 4. The water choked their corporeal lives, and killed only that was mortal; there is hope that some of their souls escaped. But here the elementary fire sent them to eternal fire, and their destruction was followed with damnation.

Two principals in the verse:

The punishment, Turning the cities, &c.

The monument, Made them an ensample.

The punishment is described by three terms, which are,

Condemning.

Some would have them all signify one thing, as if they were divers characters of the same destruction; but this doth not sufficiently honour the pen of the Holy Ghost. We may better resolve it thus; referring the burning to the devastation of their cities, the overthrowing to the spilling of their lives, and the condemning to the perdition of their souls. Their cities were burned, their bodies subverted, their souls condemned. Wherein the Lord, like some angry warrior, not only contents himself to ransack the houses of their goods, but fires their cities; nor is so pacified, but puts all to the sword: as Saul had a charge for Amalek, Utterly destroy all they have, slay man and woman, infant and beast, 1 Sam. xv. 3. Yea, he goes further than any mortal conqueror; for they can punish but temporally and corporally, but the Lord eternally; they suffer "the vengeance of eternal fire," Jude 7.

The monument hath two things in it:

What, An ensample,

To whom, To those, &c.

So that if we avoid their sins, we shall escape their plagues. Here are various observations deducible.

First, the number of the cities; but two are mentioned in the text, but certainly more were involved in the ruin. "All the plain," Gen. xix. 25; likely that more cities on that plain than two. It was a great circuit of ground, as appeareth by the Dead Sea there, which Josephus, who was brought up in the country, gives to be threescore and twelve miles in length, and nineteen miles broad. The number of them is most like to be four, so many rehearsed by Moses, "Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, and Zeboim," Deut. xxix. 23. But it is objected, that the fire fell down upon the five cities, Wisd. x. 6: therefore five. Some think that Zoar also perished, though for a time it was preserved by the intercession of Lot. But this supposition is false, for it was known by the name of Zoar in Isaiah's time; "His fugitives shall flee unto Zoar," Isa. xv. 5. Before it was called Bela; now, as Lot changed the name, so God changed the condition; little in quantity, great in the favour of mercy. And for that of the five cities, the word is Pentapolis, that is the place where those five cities stood. Two more cities perished, but Sodom and Gomorrah are only mentioned, because they were the capital cities, and metropolises both in the sin and punishment. Where observe,

The force of example prevaileth strongly to produce the likeness of manners. The authority of greatness doth often corrupt the integrity of goodness. The bad conditions of popular persons are like Jacob's speckled rods, which make he sheep, the beasts of the people, bring forth the party-coloured actions. The ill custom of an eminent place is drawn up like some pestilent exhalation, and corrupteth the air round about. The proverb speaks of bad customs, bad opinions, and bad servants; that they are better to hang than to hold. If Jeroboam worship calves, how easily will most Israelites become such beasts! We may say of an exemplary sin, as Joab of Rabbah, it will be called after the founder's own name. A stone thrown into the water, makes of itself but one circle, but that one begets a hundred. Though few men will confess their sins, yet many men's sins will confess their masters. To beget a precedent of vice, is like the setting a man's own house on fire; it burns many of his neighbours', and he shall answer for all the ruins. A sick head makes a disordered body, a blind eye endangers all the members. A ruler's unrighteousness, like the late blazing star, it hath a long tail, draws a train of mischiefs after it, and is ominous to the whole land. Whereas piety in a prince, like Aaron's ointment, runs down to the skirts of his garments, blesseth all his subjects.

An exemplary offender is like a malicious man sick of the plague, that runs into the throng to disperse his infection. Sodom's filthiness is not confined at home, but runs, like Nilus, over all the plain; not a village but glories in the imitation. When a public person is tempted to sin, he should answer as Nehemiah, when he was tempted to flee: "Should such a man as I flee?" Neh. vi. 11. Should such a man as I thus grossly offend? To sin before the face of God, is to dishonour him; but withal to sin before the face of men, is doubly to dishonour him. Many an Israelite committed fornication, and yet upon repentance got pardon; but Zimri, that would wilfully do it in the face of God and man, was sure to perish. This aggravated David's error, that it made the enemies of God to blaspheme.

Such a bitter root shall answer for itself, and for all the corrupt branches; as sin that is done abroad, ceaseth to be single, it is many sins in one. Let us therefore give good example: when Christ told that noble petitioner, Thy son liveth, at the first hearing he believed; but when he came home, and weighed the matter, not only himself, but, by his means, the whole household believed, John iv. 50, 53. And for those that take advantage to sin by precedent, Tutum est peccare auctoribus illis, let this be their terror. Other cities followed Sodom's lust, and they were all consumed with Sodom's fire. It is a common plea, Our fathers did thus before us, and the whole world doth thus about us. But what comfort is it, to fulfil the measure of our forefathers, or to perish with our neighbours? The high priest's servants can make Peter deny his Master. Let Korah kindle a fire of conspiracy, two hundred and fifty captains will bring wood to increase it. A lewd man draws vengeance on others, by the punishment of his sin, or by the infection of it.

Secondly, the matter: they were cities; not hamlets or villages, but populous and walled cities. Famous cities, not less than kingdoms: "The king of Sodom," &c. Gen. xiv. 8. Fruitful cities, as the garden of God, Gen. xiii. 10. Cities lent to men, but better beseming the majesty of God: so glorious that they tempted a saint. Lot seeing the goodly plains of Jordan, the commodious springs, delightful rivers, richness of the soil, situation of the towns, without inquiring further, is in love with Sodom. Observe,

1. That the strongest cities are not shot-proof against the arrows of God; but even things ordained for refuge, are by his justice made destructive. There is nothing peaceable where God is an enemy. The wind is a meteor whereby in some sort we live, a fan in the Lord's hand to purge the air: yet how often does he make it carry infection on the wings, and ruin buildings with violence! Children are comfortable fruits; yet was David scourged, and Sennacherib butchered, by their own bowels. Samson is betrayed by the wife of his bosom: and the Israelites die of quails provided for their sustenance. In vain we build, unless the Lord lay the first stone; or plant, unless he say, Let it grow. Blessed is the city whose gates God barreth up with his power, and openeth again with his mercy, Psal. cxlvii. 13. There is nothing can defend where his justice will strike; and there is nothing can offend where his goodness will preserve.

2. Sin can bring down the most magnificent cities, and lay them even with the ground. Can Sodom's pomp of state, confluence of pleasures, abundance of riches, pride of inhabitants, secure her life? It was God's challenge to Nineveh, "Art thou better than No?" Nah. iii. 8. Let it be a challenge to London, Art thou richer than Sodom? It is written of Tyrus, that her merchants were princes, and her traffickers the honourable men of the earth; yet God makes disport at her overthrow, "Is this your joyous city," &c.? Isa. xxiii. 7. Babylon, a little world in itself; Jerusalem, the pride of the whole earth; both found wickedness to undo their composition. Rome, styled that eternal city, shall feel the immortality of her soul, supremacy over kings, trodden under feet. Greatness of sin will shake the foundation of the greatest cities, though their heads stood among the clouds, and lay their honour in the dust.

3. None of these wicked cities escaped. Strabo thinks that some fled away; but men, women, children, houses, plants, monuments, all that grew on the earth, were destroyed, Gen. xix. 25. And who will wonder that their ungodliness brought destruction upon the harmless creatures, that considers, how we nocent wretches caused innocence itself to be crucified for us? Not only were the plants and herbs smitten for the time, but cursed into everlasting barrenness, Psal. cvii. 34: see Isa. xxxiv. 9, and Wisd. x. 7. There now runs the Salt and Dead Sea, whose bitterness is such, that no fish can live in it. (Arist.) Others that have viewed the country affirm, that no grass groweth there, and that it still smoketh: that the fruit appeareth fair; but within, it is nothing but embers and rottenness. (Joseph.) Insomuch, that the proverb makes a Sodom apple the emblem of a hypocrite. So universal was their corruption, that some think they brought up their children to their own beastly conditions. Young and old, a concourse of all the city, Gen. xix. 4. With fury, envy, and lust provoked, they dare attempt that in troops, which to act single had been too detestable; to imagine, unnatural. Continuance in evil makes wicked men worse; but company in evil, worst of all.

Therefore God destroyed them all; the community of their sin preceded the universality of their ruin. Here is the difference betwixt God's people and idolaters; the latter are destroyed utterly, but of his church the Lord always leaves a number, some seeds to increase his harvest. "Except the Lord had left us a seed, we should have been as Sodom, and like unto Gomorrah," Isa. i. 9. In this we shall not be like Sodom; which is our special comfort: though this whole land groan under sins, and all the foundations be out of course; yet there are some that fear God in sincerity of heart, and Christ hath his number of elect among us. And so long as that number remains, we shall not be made as Sodom, the matter of fire and brimstone, a stink to our neighbours about us, and a scorn to all succeeding generations. But disclaim we our own merits, and honour the true cause of all our happiness, the mercy of God, whose compassions fail not, Lam. iii. 22.

5. Great is the danger of living in opulent and delightful places. That Sodom abounded with all variety of pleasures, it is plain; being watered with the river Jordan, as Paradise with Euphrates, and Egypt with Nilus: yea, Egypt was watered with more difficulty; as appears, Deut. xi. 10. Jordan was the noblest of all rivers, rising out of two fountains, Jor, and Dan: from both the heads, united in the valley, it was called Jordan. It was famous for four occasions. 1. For the passing of the Israelites over it, the waters being miraculously divided, and a monument set up in the midst of it, Josh. iv. 18. 2. For the parting of the stream again by Elisha, after that Elijah was by the same river taken up in a fiery chariot, 2 Kings ii. 14. 3. For the healing of Naaman the Syrian of his leprosy: he thought as well of Abana and Pharpar; but the Lord was with Jordan, 2 Kings v. 12. 4. For the baptizing of our blessed Saviour, Matt. iii. 13: above all other waters he seemed to honour Jordan.

This noble river serving so ignoble a country, made it fruitful, that Lot's heart was fixed on it. Outward appearances are deceitful guides, and it is no hard thing for the affection to cozen the judgment. He is worthy to be deceived, that values things as they seem. He pays dear for his rashness; war spoileth Sodom, and Lot is taken prisoner with all his substance. Now that Abraham, whom he forsook, must rescue him; and that wealth which made him leave his uncle, is become a prey to merciless heathens. The place which his eye covetously chose, betrays his life and goods. How easy is it for men, while they look at gain, to lose themselves!

Such was the richness of Sodom, full of magnificent buildings, gardens, vineyards, pastures, a concurrence of all earthly commodities; therefore the more likely to run into all licentiousness. The people of Laish, because they wanted nothing, would have business with no man, Judg. xviii. 7. Where is no want is much wantonness; and to be rich in temporals hastens poverty in spirituals. What should humble them, that do not find themselves to stand in need of God? Cyrus would not suffer his Persians to change a barren soil for a fruitful; because dainty habitations make dainty inhabitants. If we consider Sibaris, and Campania; the storehouse of Rome, Sicily; the stove of luxury, Capua; where can we look, that the rankness of the soil hath not betrayed itself in the rankness of sin? Men have natural inclinations according to the genius of their country; and it is rare to find God's piety where is God's plenty. In a scantiness, the things themselves do stint and restrain our appetites; but where is abundance, and the measure is left to our own discretion, our discretion is too often deceived. "The fat valleys of them that are overcome with wine," Isa. xxviii. 1. They that live in fat valleys are soon overcome with wine. To apply it.

Islands are the richest soils, therefore islanders are held the most riotous people. We lie at the dugs of a most fruitful mother, repose ourselves in her indulgent bosom; we live in as dangerous a place for prosperity as Sodom: and as the fattest earth is most slippery for footing, we had need of special grace at every turn, and urgent cause to pray for that grace, that in the midst of all abundance we may not want temperance. Agur's prayer is no paradox, "Give me neither poverty nor riches," Prov. xxx. 8: both extremes are dangerous, but the greater peril is in the excess than defect. Let us pray with St. Paul, that we may know how to want; but especially that we may know how to be full and abound in all things, Phil. iv. 12. The prayers of our church have it, let our understandings mark it, and our hearts implore it; "In all time of our wealth, good Lord, deliver us." When God himself tells us, how hard it is to be made happy by being made wealthy; and we see by experience, how common a precipice it is to destruction; we find cause to redouble that petition, "In all time of our wealth, good Lord, deliver us."

The pride of apparel, excess of cheer, and superabundance of ebriety, are the effects of an opulent kingdom. Have we not seen them that make artificial conveyances of sin to posterity, that labour to purchase vice a perpetuity, that have leisure to study arguments for the justification of evil? Thrice happy he that can be chaste in Sodom, that can be temperate in England. Thus high are we grown in prosperity and iniquity. Let us all look back upon Sodom: methinks we should rather wish to learn at the charges and by the stripes of others, than that the doctrine of destruction should come to our own doors. We see great cities, mighty kingdoms, and the fairest flowers of all histories, trampled under foot: they should learn us to beware. Peace we have, and the God of peace continue it, to his glory and our good. The bees may hive themselves in our helmets, and our horses of war have little use, save to draw our coaches up and down the streets. It is the eyesore of our enemies, and let envy look herself blind. Yet let not all this secure us, lest we be forced unto that forlorn cry, Oh that our fear had looked forward to the prevention, before our sorrow constrains us to look backward upon this desolation! Let repentance cure our sins, and procure mercy to our souls, and bring us to that city above; where is plenty of riches, plenty of honours, plenty of pleasures, plenty of knowledge, love, joy; plenty of all blessings, without all abuse of plenty.

5. We are sent to the Author of this dire overthrow, the Lord, He turned the cities, &c. "The Lord rained brimstone and fire from the Lord out of heaven," Gen. xix. 24. It is not enough to say, the Lord rained from himself; nor doth it only signify a miraculous rain, beside the course of nature: but well have the fathers urged this place to prove the eternity of Christ, to whom the Father hath committed all judgment: the Lord Christ did rain, from Jehovah the Lord his Father.

Those wonderful events, which the ignorant ascribe to fortune, the atheist to nature, the superstitious to their idols, the politician to his plots, the proud to his own power, too many to second causes; in all these the servants of God look higher, resolving all such effects to their first principle, the finger of God. The fame of Alexander, the renown of Cæsar, have been much applauded for their victorious triumphs; Ulysses for policy, Hector for valour. The best of them have their matches in the book of God. Joshua fought as magnanimously, as successfully; yet (when he had conquered five kings and kingdoms) the glory is the Lord's, "God fought for Israel," Josh. x. 42. The Ethiopian army was a thousand thousand; Asa vanquished them; yet said, "The Lord smote the Ethiopians," 2 Chron. xiv. 12. Hushai was politic, and taught the traitor a trick to overthrow himself; yet is it said, The Lord destroyed the counsel of Ahithophel, 2 Sam. xvii. 14. Solomon was magnified for his wisdom; yet in that admirable proof, the decision betwixt the two harlots, it is called "the wisdom of God," 1 Kings iii. 28. It will suffer no glory to cleave unto earthen vessels: let the principal and first mover have it; The Lord did it.

The Lord is known by executing judgment, Psal. ix. 16; upon Sodom and all the world. If Pharaoh will not know him at Moses' mouth, he shall feel him to his cost in the bottom of the sea. If Herod will not know to honour him, he shall be loathed of his flatterers: they ran to him as a deity, they shall run from him as carrion. If Sodom will not know God by Lot's preaching, they shall know him by the fire about their ears. God is known by his judgments: his almightiness is known by the creation, his mercy by our redemption, his wisdom and goodness by the world's conservation; so his justice is known by the wicked's destruction.

That this is the Lord's doing appears, in that he spares others that have been as guilty; for his mercy every where matcheth his justice. He confounded Sodom, yet he hath converted many as wicked as they; his free grace hath brought those to heaven, who have deserved as deep a place in hell. Manasseh broke his covenant with God, yet his repentance found mercy. As therefore we should fear to sin, lest we perish as Sodom; so turn we to God in hope of favour, for he hath spared some as sinful as Sodom. Hear the word, ye princes of Sodom, and people of Gomorrah, Isa. i. 10. They are compared to Sodom, yet mercy is offered, if it be penitently and faithfully accepted, ver. 18.

6. Lastly, yet more to justify this judgment of God, that is, to make it appear just; as sinful as Sodom was, yet the Lord destroyed it not without premonition. First, he sent among them a bloody war; which, whom it left not dead on the earth, it took alive into bondage. Here was one warning; yet in how few years hath Sodom forgot that she was spoiled and led captive! Had she been warned by the sword, she had escaped the fire. Yet did not that ill success either make Lot leave Sodom, or Sodom leave sin; he still loves his commodity, and she her impiety. Wicked men grow worse after afflictions, as water grows more cold after a heat.

This was not all, but according to the stinless vicissitude of their sins, God follows them with a succession of plagues. Yet after all these warnings, they become worse; so bad, that there were not ten good men to be found in five cities. This heap must needs be fit for the fire, that was all chaff. Besides, God is said to come down from heaven about this examination, Gen. xviii. 21. Which is a figurative speech; for he that filleth all things, neither goeth nor cometh; and he that knoweth all things, needs not inquire: but to show that he does not proceed in the extremity of justice, without such a precedent scrutiny as may leave them without excuse.

Lot continually preached to them, by his persuasion to holiness, by his regular and exemplary life: here was still further warning. He had fire in his tongue, but they had a sea of water in their hearts to quench it. His conversation was as great a vexation to them, as theirs was to him. He re-proved them the very night before their ruin : but such as be bent upon villany, are more exasperated by dissuasions ; like violent streams, that, when they are resisted by flood-gates, swell over the banks. Not being able to reclaim the multitude, he singles out some ; and when the rest of the night was short and dangerous, he being sought for by the Sodomites, and newly pulled in by the angels, yet he ventures abroad to seek his sons-in-law. They were but betrothed to his daughters, yet such was his charity, that he hazards his own safety to preserve theirs. Faith would never be saved alone, but win all she can. He did admonish them like a prophet, and advise them like a father ; but both in vain. He seemed to them as one that mocked, and they did more than seem to mock him again. Why should to-morrow differ from other days ? Who ever saw it rain fire ? No almanac ever spake of such weather. Or how should brimstone be engendered, or exhaled into the air ? The clouds are bottles of waters, not of flames. Or if such a shower should fall, why must it not burn all the earth, as well as the valley ? Why not as universal as was the deluge ? Or grant it do come, yet it cannot be so sudden, but we shall have time to call for mercy ; it will be as long a despatching us, as the flood was a drowning them. Thus carnal men count preaching foolishness, devotion idleness, and prophets madmen. Certainly these men's unbelief was as worthy of the fire, as the others' uncleanness : " He that believeth not is condemned already," John iii. 18.

Lastly, in the attempt of that horrid impiety, the angels smote them with blindness, Gen. xix. 11 : now this being so miraculous and immediate a work, might have warned them enough, that the business they undertook was damnable. They smote not the medium, which was the air ; nor the object, which was the door ; but their sight with such a blindness, that they could not discern one thing from another : as the Aramites, that they could not descry the prophet, nor the way, nor the city. Both their outward and inward discerning faculty was dazzled. Yet doth not this sensible warning better them : they go groping up and down the streets, cursing those men whom they could not find ; and yet they bethink not themselves, that vengeance must needs be near them. All this while Lot and the angels be in light, and see them stumbling, and foresee them burning. God first struck them with blindness, whom he will after consume with fire ; it is his use to besot them he means to destroy. This darkness was a forerunner of eternal darkness, as the next morning's flame was an entrance to their ever-burning fire in hell.

Let this teach us to admire God's patience, that will not destroy a Sodom without some warning and forbearance. If we worms and dust should be so used of men, as God is used of us, we should quickly show our corrupted stomachs. We have vengeance in our will, but not in our power : God hath vengeance in his power, but forbears it in his will. We are commanded while we breathe to pray the Lord's prayer, " Forgive us our trespasses ;" which teacheth us that there is mercy in God without weariness. Sodom cracked the earth with the weight of her sins, and made the air stink with her loathsomeness ; yet the Lord was long patient. And will that God be furious and hasty against that soul that groans, weeps, bleeds for her offences ? If it were not for this, how could we escape being sacrificed to destruction, to expiate his justice ?

God chargeth Israel, that they had seen his glory, yet provoked him ten times, Numb. xiv. 22. How often would I have gathered you ! Luke xiii. 34 : his mercies exceed all numeration. We have been a provocation to him ever since we were made, as Jerusalem was ever since it was built, Jer. xxxii. 31. But though the Lord be pleased at some times, and to some sinners, to enlarge his patience ; let not us be bold to enlarge our disobedience. He punished the angels in heaven for one fault, Achan for one sacrilege, Miriam for one slander, Moses for one unbelief, Ananias for one lie : he may be as quick against our offences. How often soever he knocks, our safest course is to rise at the first call. Many are prevented by his justice, their spirits departing from them, as Jacob from Laban, or Israel from the Egyptians, without taking leave, carrying away their jewels and dearest treasures. Let us fear the price of angering so dreadful a Majesty, and abusing so rich a patience : he now looks for our fruit, or we must look for his fire.

Next, be we taught here to take the hint of God's warning ; and not to let him that is the breath of the Father and the Son, spend his breath upon us in vain. He deals with sinners, as David with Saul, who took away his spear, and his water-pot, and sometimes a piece of his cloak ; as it were snatches and remembrances, to let us understand that we are in his hands, and, if we take not warning, he will further punish us. We call, and he hears ; we ask, and he grants ; we knock, and he opens : cannot all this prevail with us to deal so with him ? Which of us can say, he hath not been warned ? It is God's charge to his prophets, Tell my people, Matt. xxi. 5. We have told them ; we have showed his people their transgressions, and the house of Jacob their sins, Isa. lviii. 1. Hath death given us no warning ? did we never find stitch and convulsion ? did the head never ache, the stomach never refuse nourishment ? All these are warnings of death, as death is a citation to judgment.

There is scarce any thing in the world, but it may serve for a monitor to us : as the messengers of Job came one after another, to inform him of his unhappiness ; every one saying, " I only am escaped." To what purpose ? " To tell thee." Some of the Jews are delivered from that raging destruction. To what end ? To declare their abominations among the heathen, that they may know the Lord, Ezek. xii. 16. But many are like the Sodomites, hardened by the warnings of God. Instead of embracing the counsel, they rage at the counsellor. But when men are grown to that pass, that they are not better by afflictions, yea, worse with admonitions, God finds it high time to strike. Now they have done sinning God begins to plague. Wickedness hath but a time ; the punishment of wickedness is beyond all time. Even the good angels shall be the executioners of this judgment ; and having first delivered Lot in Sodom, then from Sodom, they let drive at Sodom. There cannot be a more noble act, than to do justice upon obstinate malefactors. God doth not often punish for impurity, but impenitency.

Thus far we have walked in generals, such useful observations as the story affords us : now to the particulars, wherein consider principally two things ; the measure, and the manner. The measure was a total ruin ; the manner, by fire. First, for the measure.

Overthrew them. It was a plenary and universal destruction. Their outward happiness was so great, that like rotten fruit they could no longer cleave to the tree. It is said of the wicked, " They are not in trouble as other men," Psal. lxxiii. 5. No misfortune ? now therefore all at once. It is not good to be too happy for this world ; there is danger in being without dangers. The very heathen were loth to surfeit on pleasures, and took it an introduction to further mischiefs. When Philip heard that his army had got the conquest, that his son Alexander was born, and that his chariots won the prize at Olympus, all in one day, he called on fortune to spice his joys with a little bitterness, lest he should forget himself. The Egyptian king blest himself from Policrates, because he was over-fortunate; when he would try an experiment in despite of fortune, throwing a rich jewel into the sea, and finding it at his house in the bowels of a fish. It was a heathen curse, to wish all good luck to their very enemies. It is not good for a man to engross prosperity, lest, like a wasted candle, Extremum occupet fumus, fœtor, et caligo. Belshazzar had no sooner drunk his voluptuous health in the cup of the temple, but a new cup was reached unto him, the cup of vengeance, and he must drink off that too.

Here was a sudden alteration: this hour a land flowing with all delights and riches, whithersoever they look beholding nothing but pleasures; and a few minutes have determined all this. Now nothing is visible but ruin, not a house, not a tree, not a plant, not a pile of grass standing; smoke and sulphur, and stench and barrenness, possessing all the plain. When Amalek was destroyed, the trees stood; when Jericho was burnt, the gold was preserved; though the foundations of Troy cannot be seen, yet grass grows in the streets: but here, silver and gold, plants and trees, grass and beasts, houses and monuments, all consumed. This is such an overthrow, as the like never went before it, nor shall ever any match come after it, but that one universal combustion of heaven and earth. Therefore the Scripture, when it speaks of an utter overthrow, points at Sodom, Amos iv. 11. She might have endured many plagues, yet still stood upon her foundations; but this is such a ruin as admits of no reparation; such a one, as Sodom did only bear it, and may it please God that none but Sodom may ever feel it.

"Condemned them." The spoiling of their houses was much; yet, had only their cities been demolished, they might have built others, or lived in caves, or fled into foreign countries. The spoil of their goods was more: yet grass that is trodden down may grow again; the world hath more wealth. The maiming of their limbs had been greater: yet life is sweet, and their coaches, and couches, and crutches, artificial legs, and hospitals; charity is not quite dead. The killing of their bodies, and consuming their lives, yet nearer; the merchant will lose his provision, lose his wards, lose his vessel, to save his life: yet if life be lost, is there not a day of reviving? Let death crumble the body to dust, shall not the resurrection restore it whole? Or if they must perish, yet let it not be by fire, the extremest of all torments: but what if fire turn the body to ashes, may not the soul ascend the heavens, and live in peace? O but what ransom shall a man give for his soul? He "condemned them;" this is the most insupportable burden.

To turn such goodly buildings into ashes; will not this satisfy his justice? To slay the beasts, wither the plants; not this? To sluice out the bloods and lives of so many thousands; mothers having no leisure to cry for their infants, because it is their own turns to suffer: not all this? No, the soul must answer for the soul's offences; he "condemned them." The traveller yields to the thief; Take my purse, my horse, my garments; only spare my life. And man beseecheth God; Take goods, and pleasures, and honours, and liberty, and life; only spare my soul; let not that be a prey to Satan. Miserable wretches! if they knew the worth of their souls, they would bespeak destruction, as the king of Sodom did Abraham, Give us our souls, take all the rest, Gen. xiv. 21. Let us save our houses, if we can, and save our goods, and save our lives; but howsoever, let us save our souls, though we lose houses, and goods, and lives.

All was sharp enough; but, as our Saviour said to the man sick eight and thirty years, (a long and hopeless torment,) "Sin no more, lest a worse thing come unto thee," John v. 14, there is a worse behind: all extremities are light and slight to condemnation. Innumerable are the curses of God against sinners; but the last is the worst, comprehending and transcending all the rest; a condemning sentence. The Sodomites felt a dismal judgment; fire and brimstone scalding their bloods to death; but what a slight spark do they judge it to that they now feel in the furnace of hell! This is the Lord's final sword, when all his rods be worn out, and the wicked never the better. A smart blow comes, and the sinner is sensible, cries out for ease, and hath it granted: now he thinks this punishment hath pacified God's wrath, and he hath paid his own debt. Another judgment comes, and he bears it with impatient sorrow, humbles himself, like Ahab: that once removed, he hopes now God hath done with him. A third succeeds: now he grumbles under the load, thinks that God doth him wrong; that he takes more than he should, and plagues him beyond his desert: but all this doth not better him. At last the Lord comes with his Condemn him: and then if all his riches, all his pleasures, the oblation of his son for his sin, the racking of his joints, tearing of his flesh, the burning of his body for the ransom of his soul, could serve, he would make a joyful tender of them all; but then they will not be accepted. If any thing but damnation could excuse the reprobates, their condition were not so fearful: but this condemning to hell, is the perfection of all wretchedness.

Let us prevent God's justice, by doing to ourselves what he threatens to do unto sinners. Let us overthrow our sins, that he may not overthrow our houses; condemn ourselves, that he may not condemn our souls; turn our iniquities to ashes, that his fire may spare our cities. As Nineveh, by taking to heart the message of their overthrow, did overthrow the message. Their walls and buildings stood, by letting their transgressions fall. They turned to deprecation and repentance, and God turned to commiseration and forbearance. The subversion was threatened, the conversion effected. Thus let us save God a labour, that when he comes to correct us, he may find it done to his hand. Let us be self-afflictors, as we have been self-tempters; and set repentance to do what God threateneth. Have we sinned in intemperance, let us punish ourselves with abstinence; then God will not inflict on us famine. If in uncleanness, chastise we the flesh by contrition, and cleanse it with resolution against all unchastity; so may we escape the diseases both of body and conscience. Let us break off our covetousness by mercy to the poor; so, instead of being impoverished on earth, we shall find riches in heaven. If in anger, let us return to patience; so when the Lord comes in anger against us, we shall move him to be patient toward us. If in pride, come we down to humility; when he looks to find us in the chair of presumption, let him see us in the humble dust; then instead of casting us down to hell, he will lift us up to heaven. Thus with the fire of grace from God's altar, let us consume our natural, unnatural corruptions; that the fire of vengeance may never touch our houses, nor bodies, nor souls. Lord, overthrow our sins, and let ourselves stand: teach us to condemn our errors, that thou mayst never condemn us. That so serving thee with pureness of heart, we may be brought to the brightness of thy glory, through the greatness of thy mercy.

"Turning the cities into ashes." I come to the manner of their destruction, which was by fire: wherein consider four circumstances; the strangeness, the sharpness, the suddenness, the destructiveness.

1. The strangeness. It was a miraculous rain; brimstone mingled with the fire, as a fit matter to disperse it: and, it is very likely, salt too; it shall burn with brimstone and salt, Deut. xxix. 23. Yea, and that water was poured down also, from which was gathered the Dead Sea remaining to this day. This rain came from heaven, the upper region of the air, the place for fiery meteors. And haply the nature of the soil being full of pitch, slime, and other combustible matter, did much increase the burning. "The vale of Siddim was full of slime-pits, and the kings of Sodom and Gomorrah fell there," Gen. xiv. 10. This was strange indeed, that fire and brimstone, the materials of hell, should come down from heaven; or that floods of water should grapple with streams of fire; and that all, as water does set lime a burning, should help rather to inflame. Upon the wicked shall the Lord rain fire and brimstone, and stormy tempest, Psal. xi. 6. That brimstone, a mineral of the earth, should be found in the air, drawn up by an extraordinary exhalation, to be sent down after an unexampled confusion! But this was the Lord's doing, and it is marvellous to our thoughts.

2. The sharpness. It is said of fire, that it is the best friend, the worst enemy: no element is more noble when it is our friend, none more terrible when our foe. God himself is a consuming fire; and he maketh his angels a flame of fire. As the fire lies hid in the hard flint, so God is in every thing: it is quick and shining, like the Trinity. Fire consumeth wood, and purgeth gold: so doth the Lord's grace consume our creature, and refine his own creature. We desire not to be too far off from the fire, lest we be too cold; nor too near, lest it burn us. If we be too far off from God by our apostacy, we soon perish with cold death. If we dare come too near him by our presumption, we are swallowed up with his infinite and inaccessible glory.

There was holy fire in the temple: that holy fire went out in the captivity; but some of the Jews say, it was hid in a pit. The Holy Ghost came down upon the apostles in the shape of fire. The fire concurs to the generation of things with the other elements, yet is itself childless, it hath no fruit of its own. So doth the Spirit work with the other Persons in our redemption, yet hath no person proceeding from him.

Thus excellent is fire while at peace with us; it heats, purges, enlightens, consumes: so doth grace heat our hearts, enlighten our minds, purge our affections, consume our corruptions. But when it is at war with us, the rage is terrible: things most beneficial in their use, are most pestilent in their enmity. There is a grave to swallow Korah, water to drown the old world, a sword to fall upon Joab, a plague to slay Israel, a scourge for the back of fools; but nothing so sharp as fire. The heathen have worshipped it for a god: for which choice being reproved, they demanded any thing that could overcome fire, and they would adore that. An image was made by a cunning artist, the substance whereof was clay, full of holes, which were so done up with some liquid matter that they were not seen. The invincible god of fire was put under this image; which quickly hardened the clay, and was put out by the melting liquor. But here was a stupid ignorance, to slip out of one idolatry to another: and instead of a natural element, to give over themselves to an artificial idol. Fire hath over-mastered stronger images than ever were made of clay, and left their ruins shameful reproaches to all their superstitious idolaters.

There is no element in the extremest fury more afflictive to the sense, than fire. Water doth only drown, and soon choke the breath by stopping the passages of respiration; so Pharaoh's destruction was in this respect far short of Sodom's. The air doth only stifle the spirits, and by infecting the blood doth no more than a pleurisy or plague, despatching if not with like speed, yet with less torture: thus the Israelites in the plains of Midian sped not so ill as the Sodomites in the plain of Jordan. The swallowing earth that opens her jaws with a quaking motion devours men alive, but it soon with a falling closure makes them dead: thus Korah and his confederates suffered easier than Sodom and her inhabitants. But fire killeth not only with the rest, but tormenteth above them all; scorching the limbs, puckering the skin, inflaming the blood, enraging the sense, torturing the whole man. The sword is a sharp executioner armed with hostility, it hath unpriisoned millions of souls. The teeth of wild beasts roaring for their prey are merciless; as the enemies of Daniel felt. The nearest of all plagues that comes to the torment of fire, is famine; and the very anguish of famine ends in a kind of fire; when for want of vivid moisture the radical heat is inflamed, and burns up the vital spirits. Gunpowder, the most damnable mineral that ever hell begat, or Rome made use of, (for those worshippers of the successor of St. Peter found much employment for saltpetre, Nov. 5,) yet can do nothing without fire: it is but a speeding messenger that finiseth.

All manner of death's murders have in them some more mercy, or at least less cruelty, than his fiery massacres. It is reserved in human justice for the most horrible offenders; murderers, witches, deniers of Christ, atheists; of which last number we have too many, but that the cunning devil dares not be so bold as to profess it. But there is another fire for them, which shall quickly burn out atheism; for they shall feel eternally that there is a God; and their flame must be so much the hotter, because they would not believe in their offered Saviour. This is the incomparable torture of fire, so powerful, that no other element shall have the honour of purging heaven and earth, but fire; none able to burn this universal machine, but fire; none other ordained to be the special matter of the reprobate's torment in hell, but fire: whether in figure to shadow, or in reality to perform, the extremest tortures, fire must do it. That hath the most searching property, and can only refine what is substantially good, and consume what is qualitatively evil.

Beside all these expressions comparatively, the sharpness of this punishment by fire, is aggravated by three gradations.

(1.) By the quality: it was not only fire, but a deluge of fire. The Lord rained fire, Gen. xix. 24: not sprinkled by drops, like a gentle shower, but rained, as it were whole sheets of fire: the flashes of lightning are nothing to it; but flakes and streams of fire; "The Highest gave his thunder; hailstones and coals of fire," Psal. xviii. 13. Not a little kindled, as fire in a house, that gathers force by degrees, and from small sparks riseth to a violent combustion; but the very beginning was a rain of fire. They had rained on the earth great cataracts of sins, and heaven rained on them great catclysms of flames.

(2.) By their indisposedness to bear it: men quite destitute of the grace of God, and forfeited to all discomfort. Flesh and blood, in either valour or despe-rateness, have endured many strange torments in this world; lancements, searings, rackings, all to protract a miserable life. Divers martyrs have leaped into their beds of flames, as beds of down. But the sense of the torment hath been qualified by God's assistance and their patience. But he that could cool the burning furnace by the will of his mercy, Dan. iii. 27, did inflame this fire by the breath of his fury. There was fire for doing well, here is fire for doing ill. There was the fire of man against the love of God, here the fire of God against the lust of man. There was grace to allay it, here was sin to enrage it. The punishment was the more sensible, as the patients were more sensual.

(3.) By the addition and mixture of it: not fire alone, but fire mingled with brimstone; a matter fit not to allay it, but increase it. The perplexing properties of brimstone are three; to burn darkly, sharply, loathsomely. Darkly, to grieve the sight; sharply, to afflict the sense; loathsomely, to offend the smell. The Scripture, to describe the extreme tortures of fire, adds often brimstone, Ezek. xxxviii. 22; Psal. xi. 6; Rev. xix. 20. "Fire and much wood; the breath of the Lord, like a stream of brimstone, doth kindle it," Isa. xxx. 33. Where is both a prospopœia in the "breath," and a topographia in the "brimstone:" both figures to express the furious indignation of the author, and fierce severity of the act. For the allegory of breath; to denote the rage of Saul against the lambs of Christ, he is said to breathe out slaughter, Acts ix. 1. To signify the Lord's wrath against sinners, he is said to breathe out fire. For brimstone, it makes fire more terrible; darkening the splendour of it to the sight, sharpening the fervour of it to the sense, and augmenting the stench of it to the smell.

This discovers to us the nature of sin, how stinking and loathsome it is to God, that burning brimstone is not more offensive to us. No perfumes are more pleasant to the sinner, no dunghills more noisome to the Lord. Absalom thought his pride sweet, Zimri his adultery, Nabal his wealth sweet: the usurer's gold, the lascivious man's harlot, the defrauder's gain, all fragrant smells to them, because they breathe no other air but such pestilent corruptions. And the very scent of goodness would set them hard, as fen-men are sick with a subtle air, or the soil-man swooned when he passed through Bucklersbury. But if their hearts were unstopped, and cleared from the cold and congealed catarrhs of sin, they would be sensible of the stench; and there is no work of darkness but they would smell brimstone in it. Our blessed Saviour feedeth among the lilies, lodgeth in the beds of spices, the sweet graces of his church: let not us, like dorrs, love the dunghills; or, like scarabees, pass over all beauties, to light upon sores and ulcers. Oh that we could but discern sin as it is in itself! how should we then hate our lusts, our lies, our oaths, our covetous desires and practices, smelling the stink of brimstone in them all! Indeed we are all unsavoury of ourselves, odious to that God, who hath pure eyes and pure nostrils; only our hope and comfort is, to be sweetened with the perfume of Jesus Christ, Eph. v. 2.

3. The suddenness. The fire was not long a despatching them; but as it fell before their expectation, so it destroyed them before their recollection. When the sun did rise, then began the rain to fall; now this was just at Lot's entering into Zoar: at break of day he went out of Sodom, at sun-rising he came into Zoar, Gen. xix. 15, 23; between which spaces a man may go four miles, say the Hebrews. Now Abraham rose up early in the morning, yet he saw not the falling of the fire, but the rising up of the smoke only, Gen. xix. 27, 28. This must needs be done suddenly: in all likelihood, less than half an hour determined all the glory of Sodom. The prophet says, in a moment; Sodom was destroyed in a moment, Lam. iv. 6. Why then should not men believe the same power of the last fire to consume the world, and our changing even in a moment? "In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump," 1 Cor. xv. 52. That fire gave the Sodomites no time of remembrance, nor shall the last fire give the world any time of repentance: that may come suddenly, which we know will come certainly. We have no more patent of forbearance than had Sodom: it is said of the wicked, In a moment they go down to hell. Death doth not always creep upon a man by degrees, like Ezekiel's waters; from the ancles to the knees, from the knees to the loins, and so to the heart, Ezek. xlvii. 3, 4; but swallows some ere they can swallow their spittle. "The Judge standeth before the door," Jam. v. 9. Would the thief break into the house, if he knew the judge stood at the door? We may say of our sinning and dying, as physicians of their critical days; the first is an index, the second a judge. Our sin shows we shall die, our death judgeth us for our sin. But betwixt both these there is a gracious help, the intervention of our seasonable amendment, and applying the satisfaction of Jesus Christ.

4. The destructiveness; Turned them to ashes. It is a fearful degree in punishment, to be reduced to ashes. God went far with Israel, when they were a brand snatched out of the burning, Amos iv. 11. He proceeded farther, when he set the whole forest of his people on fire; yet still a remnant was preserved; some did escape, even through the fire. The prophet, by the dry bones, Ezek. xxxvii., shadows out a desperate estate. A man is sick, there is danger; panting for life, great fear; dead, no hope; buried, despair; the flesh consumed, nothing but bones left, here is the utmost extent, saving only his wholly mouldering to ashes. "There is hope of a tree if it be cut down, that it will sprout again," Job xiv. 7; but cut down, cast into the fire, and converted to ashes, no hope.

Yet is this the end of all flesh. The innumerable army of Xerxes, all become ashes. Herod, that was honoured as a god by men, was proved to be a man by worms; turned to ashes. The Roman palace, the Spanish Escorial, all the glorious cities and buildings of the earth, shall meet in this catastrophe; be turned to ashes. Solomon from his royalty, Ahithophel from his policy, Cæsar from his monarchy, Plato from his philosophy, even Moses from his humility, all good men from their sanctity, all bad men from their impiety, must descend to make ashes. Death is that impartial metamorphoser, that turneth all secular glory into ashes. Where are they that erected this temple wherein we pray, that built those houses wherein we dwell, that founded the city wherein we live, that begun those societies whereof we are? Ye know; all turned to ashes. Not turned to birds and beasts, as the poets feigned, much less to stars; neither to plants nor planets; least of all to celestial angels; but to dust and ashes.

There is difference of estates while we live, in the grave there is none. "Ye are gods," Psal. lxxxii. 6; there he considered their pomp and dignity: "but ye shall die like men," ver. 7; there he minds their end, that with the change of his note they might also change countenance. He tells them their honour, but withal their lot. In power, wealth, train, titles, friends, they differ from others; in death they differ not from others. They are cold when winter comes, withered with age, weak with sickness, and melt away with death, as the meanest: all to ashes. "All flesh is as grass, and all the glory of man as the flower," 1 Pet. i. 24: the glory, that is, the best of it, but a flower. No great difference, the flower shows fairer, the grass stands longer, one scythe cuts down both. Beasts fat and lean fed in several pasture, killed in one slaughter. The prince in his lofty palace, the beggar in his humble cottage, have double difference, local and ceremonial height and lowness; yet meet at the grave, and be mingled in ashes. We walk in this world, as a man in a field of snow; all the way appears smooth, yet cannot we be sure of any step. All are like actors on a stage, some have one part and some another, death is still busy amongst us: here drops one of the players, we bury him with sorrow, and to our scene again: then falls another, yea all, one after another, till death be left alone upon the stage. Death is that damp, which puts out all the dim lights of vanity. Yet man is easier to believe that all the world shall die, than to suspect himself. Though we be older than those we follow to the grave, yet still we hope for a longer reprieve. If any thing could have hired death to spare, our forefathers would have kept our possessions from us. But ashes must to ashes; dust was our composition, and to dust must be our dissolution; only we look for a better resurrection.

From all this observe the fit proportion of the punishment to the sin. They which burned with the fire of lust, are consumed with the fire of vengeance. They sinned against the rule of nature, and they perish against the course of nature. They had conjured up hell to earth, and God sent hell out of heaven. For their unnatural lust, unnatural fire: there is a loathsome stench in their wickedness, and there was the stink of brimstone in their confusion. Such is the justice of God, not only to strike for offending; but also the wisdom of God, to strike according to the manner of offending. The Lord is known by executing judgment, Psal. ix. 16; making their sword enter into their own heart, Psal. xxxvii. 15. The gibbet which Haman built for Mordecai, shall hang himself. Pharaoh made away the Hebrew males, and was requited with the death of his first-born. Herod slew the infants of Bethlehem, and was punished by the murder of his own children. Hildebrand suborned a villain, with a great stone on the church's roof to brain Frederick the emperor doing his devotions after his wonted manner; and the same traitor tumbled down, and was quashed in pieces with the same stone. Thus was Alexander the Sixth poisoned with the same liquor which he had ordained to make away some of his cardinals. Three of those fiery conspirators were maimed and disfigured by the firing of powder at Holbeck in Worcestershire, who had meant by powder to blow up a whole state. Let all these examples terrify the wicked: God will meet with them in their own kinds, and fill them a cup with their own tempering. As their tongues have walked against heaven, so they shall be confined to hell: for drunkenness, want of a drop of water; for covetousness, everlasting poverty of comfort.

Two things are yet further to be looked into. 1. How the justice of God may be justified in this universal confusion of the Sodomites. 2. What was the utmost extent, or what followed the ruin.

For the former; it is the atheist's exception against the justice of God, that he confounded the innocent with the guilty. The men indeed were given over to licentiousness, but no such thing is testified of the women; and if the women were also sinful, yet the infants were not capable nor culpable of such faults. For answer, first let us hold this undeniable tenet, The judgments of God are often secret, always just.

He will show mercy to whom he will, and he does us undeserved favour. He will execute judgment on whom he will, and he does us no wrong. That he saves any, the cause is in himself; that he condemns many, the cause is in them.

God is absolute Lord over all his creatures; and as it was his only pleasure to give life, so also to take it away. Neither are we more to demand a reason of the latter, than we are able to conceive a reason of the former. Whether he gives, or he takes, still blessed be the name of the Lord.

Children are parts of their parents, and therefore may be justly infolded in their fathers' punishments. They are guilty of original sin, a filthiness that they have by propagation from their parents; for their souls were infected as soon as ever they were infused. Before the justice of God there are none innocent. They that have sinned from their parents, may justly be enrolled with their parents. Though they be not guilty of their fathers' actuals, yet they have by nature so much corruption, as may deserve sharp correction. How frequently hath God chastised the children for the father's offences! David's child begotten in adultery must die. "Who did sin, this man, or his parents, that he was born blind?" John ix. 2. This the apostles could easily see, howsoever they indiscreetly asked. But "the son shall not bear the iniquity of the father," Ezek. xviii. 20; a good son shall not answer for a bad father. But the child is a sinner, even an infant; and when it hath the father's sin with its own, it is punished for its own sin, not for the father's.

Thus do many children suffer for their parents, being conceived in offence, and deriving their diseases from their birth: there is hereditary disease, as physicians speak. "Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean?" Job xiv. 4. Both the trees and fruit were corrupt, the spring and channels unclean, therefore involved in one general ruin. So fully did the justice of God triumph over them, that he left none remaining, but even the very seed and offspring of the Sodomites perished. Unless the Lord had left us a remnant, we had been as Sodom, Isa. i. 9: they had no remnant left; the very little ones, infected with their parents' sins, were wrapped up in their parents' flames.

Nor only fell those Sodomites for the present, but for ever; "suffering the vengeance of eternal fire." Jude 7: a judgment so fearful and singular, that it is able to strike a horror into our hearts with the very thought. This God did, 1. To show his perfect detestation of that wicked people; so apostate from all goodness, that their very seed was accursed. Because the fathers blaspheme against heaven, the children go to hell. 2. To increase their sorrow and torment in seeing the destruction of their children: for if nature were not quite extinct, and they had but as much affection as beasts to their young, it must needs wound their hearts to see the lamentable ruin of their children. Who can hear the confused cry of so many infants, and not cry for company? To see their tender and ungrown limbs wrapped up in flames of fire, as swathe-bands; the shrinking of their soft nerves at every pull of grief, their flesh scorched like a scroll of parchment; sprawling on the ground, and rocked asleep with dire destruction; would melt a heart of adamant.

God himself, at other times, had a special regard to infants; excepting only some places that were execrable in his sight, Deut. xx. 17, as Jericho, Josh. vi. 21, Edom, and Babylon, Psal. cxxxvii. 9, and here Sodom. Now the sight of such a judgment among the little ones, that knew not the right hand from the left, that cleaved to their mothers' breasts as apples to the tree; to be snatched away with death, and death in the frightfullest visage, burning and tormenting death; this did aggravate their plague, and it had been much easier for them to have suffered alone. There is nothing more natural to us, than to love our children; those living monuments of ourselves, that piece out mortality with succession, continue our names and images upon the earth. These if we do affect with our loves, let us not infect with our lives: let us hate our sins, lest they also perish with ourselves. Why should we destroy those whom we have in a manner made? We brought them into the world with pain, up in the world with care; let us not send them out of the world with sorrow. Repentance and amendment of life help us to prevent such an unhappiness; that we may neither smart for the wickedness of our forefathers, nor make our children everlastingly smart for us. Let us obey our Father in heaven, that he may bless our children upon earth.

For the other consideration; the extremity of their punishment was not only temporal death, but everlasting torment; "eternal fire," Jude 7. Their present fire could not buy out the future. Run they into the fields, it rains fire; into the houses, they flame with fire; into holes and caves, all places burn with brimstone. Miserable men! whether they flee or stay, struggle or lie still, fire possesseth them; scalding sulphur and burning stench universally racking them. Yet is not all this enough to purge out their corruption, but a worse torment succeeds, and the judgment on earth doth but deliver them over to the condemnation of hell; which continually burns their souls, and shall never turn them to ashes; a fire neither tolerable nor terminable. The breath of the Lord, like a river of brimstone, doth inflame it, and the breath of ten thousand reprobates shall never be able to blow it out: when a drop of water shall not be allowed, to cool the tongue that boils with unsufferable flames: where heat doth follow smoke, and fire heat, and stench fire, and torment stench, and burning shall be added to burning. Thus are they cast into utter darkness, where neither light of sun nor moon, much less the light of heaven, and God's glorious face, shall ever appear; where their eyes must distil like fountains, and their teeth clatter like armed men.

These are those fearful vials of wrath, when God gives blood to drink unto them that boil with heat. Who can express their horrors, nay, what horrors cannot they express? Sorrows are met on their souls as at a feast; fear, despair, and anguish leap upon their hearts as a stag, and the furies of hell divide their spirits among them. Torment calls to desperation, horror to pain, Come and help us to torture these wretches. Lust sends one plague, and pride another, and covetousness a third; till they run through a thousand deaths, and yet cannot die. All their lights are put out at once, they have no souls fit to be comforted. Thus they lie, as if they bore the weight of the whole earth; and so let them lie, saith the Lord, for ever.

Hear him that spake by experience. Being in hell, in torments, he lifts up his eyes, &c. Luke xvi. 23. He looked upward, for he was low enough: he lift up his eyes, that could not lift up himself. He would not look down to Lazarus in his misery, he must now look up to Lazarus in his felicity. His eyes which were closed in luxury, he opens in misery. Where remembering his pleasures past, considering his joys lost, sensible of pains present, and fearful of greater tortures to come, he sees Lazarus in Abraham's bosom. (Every believer is a child of Abraham; and whither should the child go but to the bosom of his father?) Now he begs with more floods of scald-ing tears than ever Esau sought the blessing, to have some comfort from Lazarus; Send Lazarus, &c. His envious pride doth not yet forsake him. He would have Lazarus come from the rest of heaven, to the terrors of hell. And what craves he? not an ocean, not a river, not a pond or some small fountain, not a bucket or spoonful; but a drop. And what if all the rivers in the south had been granted him, his tongue would still have withered, and he never have cried in the language of hell, It is enough. Or had his tongue been eased, the rest of his parts would still have dried. Water might be by him, but he hath no hand to reach it. Oh bitter day! when not the least finger (I say not, of God, but) of the meanest saint in heaven, shall bring the least drop (I say not, of the waters of life, but) of the waters of the brook to give him comfort. He fared as delicately as the Sodomites, in the fulness of all rare viands: he went not in sackcloth, or common garments, nor with a diseased body as Lazarus, but in purple and fine linen; not on the best day of the seven, or when he went to the court, where it is somewhat tolerable, but every day. But now, like the Sodomites, he is snatched from his libertine surfeit to famine, from a table of viands to a table of vengeance, from bowls of the lustiest wines to drink sulphur, from beds of down to beds of flames, from bravery to misery. O here is the emblem of wretchedness! He would have one sent to his brethren; let this calamity give warning to us all. Flame torments him, not a moderate fire. In a flame there is burning and light; but in hell there is burning without light, as in the empyreal heaven there is light without burning.

Thus had the Sodomites their portion on earth, and from the want of all miseries were driven to the misery of all wants. God does not damn men because they be rich; for himself is infinitely rich; and Abraham, that rejected the rich man, was on earth richer than he. Nor because they are great; for himself is the greatest of all. But because they abuse these to the dishonour of his glorious name. And to conclude; their torments are eternal. As our short affliction causeth to us an excellent and eternal glory, 2 Cor. iv. 17, so their short pleasure causeth to them an exceeding and eternal pain. Their sorrows are infinite: they lie pressed under an unsupportable load, and still call for more weight to despatch them, but cannot have it. What the psalmist sings of God's mercy, is true also of his justice, that it endureth for ever. If after so many millions of years as there be drops in the sea, there might be deliverance, they had some hope. Men may comfort themselves in temporal sufferings, to them God has set a limit; but there is no limitation in hell: when the Lord shall give over his being, they shall have ease, and not before; which is never. An infinite Majesty is offended, therefore an infinite penalty imposed. In hell they shall ever remain sinners, therefore in hell they shall ever remain sufferers. Sin is like oil, and torment like fire; so long as the oil lasteth the fire burneth, and that is for ever. This is a long confusion, and therefore not to be passed over with a short meditation. Let us think again and again of it, and so fear it, that we may never feel it. It is a desperate madness, for the pleasure that one hour determines, to incur those pains that are capable neither of ease nor end. Thus I have insisted on the Sodomites' punishment, that we being terrified with it, might learn by their example to prevent it. Which is the next point considerable, the monument.

"Making them an ensample unto those that after should live ungodly." This example of God's judgment is one of the most conspicuous and remarkable in all the sacred history, and set out for a special precedent by the pen of the Holy Ghost; with a note of recordation, like a hand in the margin that directs to some observable thing in the text; with a Mark this, as a thing of great consequence. Where collect four observations.

1. The right use of all God's mighty wonders, is when we take them for wonders; trembling at the sight of the works, and fearing the omnipotence of him that wrought them. When Israel saw that mighty work upon the Egyptians, they feared the Lord, Exod. xiv. 31. They are drowned in a sea of water, and the other do not drown it in a sea of forgetfulness. The sea was troublous, and the mariners feared; the sea was quiet, and yet they feared, Jonah i. 5, 16: this may seem strange; but the first was the fear of nature, the second of grace; then they feared the creature, now the Creator. When Ananias and his wife fell suddenly dead, fear came upon all the church, Acts v. 11. The judgment was upon some, the fear came upon all. When the earth opened her jaws to swallow Korah, the people opened their mouth to cry, Let us flee, Numb. xvi. 34. These things came unto them for ensamples, and are written to admonish us, 1 Cor. x. 11. These things they might have suffered, and their calamities have died with themselves, never been known to posterity; but they are written for us. God made a record of them, and if there be any faith in us, they be as present to us as if they were done before our eyes. If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they believe one from the dead, Luke xvi. 31. Where faith makes a doubt, there sense will never be satisfied.

But if we trust not our ears, in all this ample theatre of God's judgments, did we never see any fetched away from a prosperous estate by strange accidents? were not they precedents for us? Cannot all make us afraid of overlaying God's patience? Did the blasphemer never hear how Rabshakeh sped? Did they that blush not to be called the roaring crew, (therein sentencing themselves,) never read what became of the sons of Belial? Did the secure worldlings never hear of the general deluge? nor murmurers, of those fiery serpents? nor unclean persons with their catamites, of the condemnation of the Sodomites? Shall not all this make us to break forth into those acclamations, This was the Lord's doing, and it is marvellous in our eyes, Psal. cxviii. 23.

Indeed these may work with the wicked to admiration, not to repentance. The very Jews beholding the wonders of Christ, could say, "We never saw it on this fashion," Mark ii. 12; and, "It was never so seen in Israel," Matt. ix. 33. Herod desired to see Christ for a miracle, as Felix to talk with Paul for a bribe. But God doth not work miracles for miracles, but for us. The gracious Lord hath so done his marvellous works, that they ought to be had in remembrance. I will live; to what end? to declare the works of the Lord, Psal. cxviii. 17; hitting the right end and use. The works of his providence are to be admired; of his justice, to be admired and feared; of his mercy, to be admired and loved. The thunder should waken our secure hearts, the rain soften our stony bowels, the lightning mind us of the coming of Christ to judgment: see 1 Sam. xii. 18.

These things hath God left as memorials to the world, to be read and preached. We have the books, let us not be strangers to their contents. Our forefathers could once have said, We see not our signs; there is not one prophet among us, nor any that divineth, Psal. lxxiv. 9: or if any did divine, they divined lies. Though this sacred book was not hid in a corner, as when Josiah began to reign, 2 Kings xxii. 8; nor cut with a penknife, and thrown into the fire, as in the days of Jehoiakim, Jer. xxxvi. 23; yet the comfortable use was interdicted, the known language concealed, and men bound with a curse not to read it. It now lies open in our churches, in our windows; God grant we shut it not to our own hearts. Preaching applies it, and this help we have also: may we never know the want of it: yea, we shall not, unless we voluntarily put it from us, as a matter not worthy the keeping, and (with the Jews) judge ourselves unworthy of the kingdom of heaven. Divers fearful calamities are threatened to the Jews, such as shall turn their feasts into mourning, &c.: but if their eyes do not yet dazzle, nor their ears tingle, behind is a woe, that is beyond all woes, the famine of the word of God, Amos viii. 11. Famine of bread is a sore plague, when a woeful mother for herself and son is dressing their last provision, 1 Kings xvii. 12. The extremity harder, when mothers by turns eat up their own children, 2 Kings vi. 28. But this is nothing to a dearth of holy knowledge. It is better not to be, than not to know: better unborn, than untaught. (Sen.)

2. God, without all exception to the honour of his justice, might enrol all the wicked at once in universal confusion; but so it pleaseth his goodness to single out some, and propose them as bleeding witnesses to the world, that their vengeance might bring many to repentance. Such an execution of his justice doth more magnify his mercy, when he punisheth some, that he may spare many. As when many soldiers have faulted in a mutiny, the general executes martial law upon some, to strike a terror into the whole army. So doth the Lord. We have deserved what they have suffered; they have suffered that we might be delivered. If we make not use of this mercy, we deserve the greater penalty.

3. There is no sin which man can now commit, but God hath declared his wrath against it, in his punishments for it: we can do nothing without a precedent. Is any sacrilegious? there be precedents to forewarn him; Gehazi, Judas, and they that kept a market in the temple. But these men fear not their punishments. Will the Jesuit be a traitor? there is precedent. Absalom rebels; what was the end? His huge army defeated by a few, the wood devouring that day more than the sword; twenty thousand lost. A senseless oak performs the part of a good subject, and apprehends the traitor: his beast left him to the gallows, who was turned beast in renouncing his allegiance. The earth refused to receive him, heaven was shut against him, none of his troops left to guard him, who had so unnaturally wronged the Maker of all in his anointed vicegerent. The king gave charge for his reprieve, but the King of heaven had otherwise determined of him. And he that had ambitiously provided a stately monument for his corpse, a pyramid or pillar in the king's dale, was tumbled with infamy into a ditch, like carrion under a heap of stones.

Can any be covetous without precedent? did he never read of Nabal's base penuriousness and accursed end? Hath not the adulterer Zimri for his example? can he think of his sudden end, and not tremble to embrace his harlot? And for the factious, that are subject to their own lusts, but will be subject to no laws, observe they not the conspiracy of Korah against Moses; whom the earth buried alive, and stayed for neither executioner to despatch them, nor sexton to make a grave for them? Can a man exact upon his brother by a biting interest, without a Jewish example? or throw his unable debtor into prison without a precedent? The usurer is a legal thief, the unmerciful creditor a legal murderer: they do nothing but by law, and by law they may go to the devil together. The fraudulent trafficker cannot abuse his simple customer, but there is precedent for him in Ananias. Did you sell the land for so much? cost your commodity so much? Yes. What followed? The lie he told before men, he was suddenly sent to answer before the God of truth. Do tyrants now persecute the church without example? So Julian sent his subjects to heaven in earnest, himself went to hell merrily and in jest. Homicides have the example of Joab, whose grey hairs went not to the grave in peace, 1 Kings ii. 6. There is no profane libertine but had the example of Esau before him, who lost the blessing of heaven for the pleasures of earth. They cannot tell a lie but by precedent; not swear an oath, not break a sabbath, nor worship an image, but by example. All these sins, and what other we can imagine, have been committed in former ages, and plagued by former judgments. These iniquities if we admit, they retain not in so mean a quality as before. Fratricide is now worse than in Cain, because it hath Cain's ensample. Apostasy now worse than in Lot's wife, because her example hath forewarned us, Luke xvii. 32. Adulterous painting worse now than in Jezebel, because we understand her fearful end. Uncleanness now worse than in Sodom, because the Lord hath made them ensamples to those that after should live ungodly, Jude 7.

4. God's judgments are so many real sermons against the sins of men. He doth not only preach vocally by the ministry of his servants, but also actually by the execution of his judgments. "Once hath God spoken, twice have I heard it," Psal. lxii. 11: once in his word written, a second time in his work done; his actions being so many declarations of his will. So Elihu in Job. These things will God work twice or thrice with a man, to bring his soul back from the pit, Job xxxiii. 29, 30. Once he spake it, another time performed it, a third time redoubled it. There is no people can plead ignorance, or excuse themselves by wanting means of instruction; for the whole earth is filled with the judgments of God. When the fire devours a man's estate, or the sea wrecks the merchant's hopes, or sudden death takes away our neighbour's life, God preacheth visibly to us. Though we pronounce nothing by a peremptory rashness, for fear of Christ's oburgation, Do you think they were greater sinners? Luke xiii. 4; for the cause is not revealed to us, as the prophet spake of the troubled Shunammite, "Her soul is vexed, and the Lord hath hid it from me," 2 Kings iv. 27; yet let us take them to heart: we cannot discern them, they all concern us.

Let us be the better for all this, lest we become the worse. It had been easier for us never to have heard of Sodom's ruin, than not to mend our lives by the ensample. God's hand would have been lighter upon impenitent souls, if such precedents of his justice had never been set before them. Let us raise ourselves out of their fall, and make their subversion the matter and means of our conversion. Let us be warned by examples, lest we be made examples. If we will not learn by others, others shall learn by us. There is no learning so cheap, as that which comes at another's cost. If their poison, by good allaying, be made our physic; if the sword of vengeance that devoured them, amend us with the very sight and shaking of it; we shall escape God's fury, and become the blessed examples of his mercy.

Now there are three impediments which frustrate the good use of this doctrine; contempt, neglect, and misinterpretation.

1. Contempt, which is a proud and presumptuous humour in men; whom the most palpable judgments, and evident executions, shall never deter from their damnable projects. The judgments of God are high above his sight, Psal. x. 5: tell him how others have perished, he answers, Tut, I shall never be moved. But this is the greatest judgment of all; not to understand their errors, lest they should be brought to repentance.

2. Neglect and a forgetful slighting of such terrible things. It is to them but a pang, or a transient stitch, a nine-days' wonder, or news that is quickly out of date. Pharaoh was no sooner quitted of the plague, but presently his heart was hardened. While God thundered, he trembled; but then, as if the Lord had spent all his powder and shot, he is the same man he was. Like Ephraim's goodness, a morning dew, Hos. vi. 4. While the weather is cloudy, they are melancholy; but when the sun of prosperity rises, and the storm of affliction clears up, their moisture is dried. Such a dew you shall have stand upon the stones of the church against rain, but the stones are never the softer for it. Ahab hearing the denunciation of wrath, was humbled, 1 Kings xxi. 27: the hand of judgment did but crush his heart like a piece of clay, till the moisture was pressed out, leaving it then but more hardened earth. All Israel was affrighted at the fearful end of Korah; yet even the very morrow after they fell upon Moses and Aaron, murmuring, "Ye have killed the people of the Lord," Numb. xvi. 41. Such small impression doth the misery of others leave in us; as if we had a protection from all arrest, a supersedeas against all suits. And what plagues soever we see inflicted on others, we think they have deserved them, never reflecting upon our own merits and mutable conditions. We come short of the circumspection that is in birds and beasts; for they can avoid the places where they see their fellows have miscarried, and are sensible by that token to remove.

3. Misinterpretation, by soothing ourselves in our own courses, and turning the stream of God's judgments another way. Some sport with these examples; and being set forth as crocodiles in terrorem, they make them their play-fellows, and the subjects for the exercise of their wits. As to respect the conversion of Lot's wife no better than one of Ovid's Metamorphoses; Niobe into a stone: as if there was no difference betwixt God's actions and poets' fictions. So they ascribe Noah's flood to some extraordinary aspect of the moon, or concourse of watery planets; and think not that God opened the windows of heaven and fountains of earth. The drowning of Pharaoh's host, to the inconsiderate venturing over upon a high tide. It shall be imputed to any thing rather than the true cause, God's anger; these ensamples working no more upon them than mere casualties. But woe to those that shall not so understand them as God meant them!

Here I have just cause to declare against three sorts of mistakers; with whose errors I will deal, as the venerable judges do with seditious attorneys, call them to the bench, pitch them over the bar, put out their names from the roll, and let them go.

1. The impeachers of God's providence, among whom there are six errors. 1. Of the Stoics, who call providence by the name of fate or destiny; which runs through a rank of causes, so bringing in absolute and inevitable necessity, that pinions the arms of God and men. Theodoret beats the nose of this error flat to the deviser's face. 2. Of such as tie God's providence only to celestial things, exempting all sublunary and corrupt matters. Hierome says, this error was crept into the hearts of the Jews; as he collects from Ezek. ix. 9, "The Lord hath forsaken the earth, and the Lord seeth not." Therefore the Lord answers, "Mine eye shall not spare them;" to show that his power is also upon the earth. 3. Nicenus, with others, held that God's providence extends itself to corruptible things only in a general manner. But our Saviour comprehends under it not only the hairs of men, but even the feathers of birds. 4. Aquinas speaks of the error of Rabbi Moses the Jew; that among corruptible things, man only appertaineth to the Divine providence. This Jeremiah confutes; "I am the God of all flesh," Jer. xxxii. 27; both of men and beasts. 5. Of the Platonists, that distinguish three kinds of providence. First, of the supreme God, that stretcheth primarily to spiritual things, in a second degree to all the world. The second, of separated substances, that move the heavens in a circle; intelligences. The last, of certain dæmones, powers, which they place in the middle betwixt God and man. Such are those that worship devils for a ne noceant. 6. Of atheists, that deny all providence, and admit only fortune. Lactantius hath confuted it by many arguments; but David's conviction is the best disgrace to it, who sets a cockscorn on the head of it; "The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God," Psal. xiv. 1. In his heart he hath said it, but in his heart he never believed it. Look upon all creatures; they make one glorious army, marshalled into their several ranks, and marching to the will of their great General. Why do stones, plants, and insensible things, tend to the end for which they were created, when as yet they have no knowledge of it, but that they are directed by God? Young ones are no sooner born, but they turn their mouths to the breast of their mothers; yet man, against nature, reason, religion, doth not turn his mouth of confession, to acknowledge that God who made him. We see birds to come of eggs, and living things engendered of dead seed: why should we not as well believe the resurrection of our bodies, and the last account of all our actions?

2. All misconstruing perversers of God's judgments. That the Jews after a curse of fifteen hundred years, and a vagabond dispersion like Cain, should not be-think themselves of their murder of the Lamb of God, is the stupifying spirit of error. One of them is driven to confess, that as this plague so far exceeds all their former captivity, so the sin that caused it must exceed all their former sins. As much may justly be said of our Italianated fugitives; who seeing the terrible judgments of God upon them, will not yet know the Lord. The powder plot is passed over with "An unfortunate attempt," and the instruments no further blamed than for their rash and ill luck; as if they confessed that it wanted nothing but success to make it lawful: worse than the sorcerers of Egypt; they could cry out, "This is the finger of God," Exod. viii. 19.

They call for a judge of controversies betwixt us, yet will not see that God himself is the Judge; declaring his sentence and decision by helping the side which he favoureth. All his judgments upon the conspirators, cannot learn them how much he detesteth such practices. Still they will not gather the unwarrantableness of their designs, though they have been forced in indignation to blunder out, that the Judge of all the world is become a Lutheran. Still they are mad to be made the wretched engines of his ambition, that sells the souls of men to buy himself reputation. Cannot the catholicness of their doctrine, and the infallibility of their director, make their plots successful, and still are they blind? Such palpable demonstrations of God's wrath so directly against their proceedings, might at least make them suspect that something is amiss, and examine where the fault resteth. To have their infallibility so deceived, might cause them to recollect themselves, if they were not drunk with the wine of Sodom. Though they smart with the vials of fury, yet they will not leave their sorcery, according to the prophecy of them, Rev. ix. 20. They will rather gnaw their tongues for pain, Rev. xvi. 10, than acknowledge God's judgments for sin. If we were such damnable heretics as they would make us, how comes it to pass that the Lord so takes our part? that they so often tempting us by flattery, and attempting us by fury, have not yet prevailed against us? that neither the pope's bulls nor curses have wrought the intended effects? Certainly if the Lord did not favour our cause, he would never so protect our state. Yet all these ensamples work not upon their consciences, nor will they confess their pernicious courses. Though many hundred of their treacherous emissaries have miscarried, yet still more follow on, as if no precedent had bid them take heed. But antichrist deals with them, as Amnon did with Tamar; first ravisheth them, and then turns them out of doors. But because they would not take example by whom they should, they shall be made examples to whom they would not; even a reproach to all posterity, and a stink to the succeeding generations.

3. All profane persons that misapply these ensamples. What plagues soever come to others, they conceit of themselves no such desert: if he will perish, let him; and no further mind it. Instead of a serious application, to make a jest upon others' misery, this is common. We should "weep with them that weep," Rom. xii. 15. Woe to such as laugh at their brother's tears! whereas, He to-day, and I to-morrow, was St. Bernard's use: and, We are, have been, or may be, as miserable as they, was St. Augustine's. The seaman that sees another ship split on a rock, will avoid it. Passengers fear to travel that way, where they hear of continual robberies. Yet cannot these judicial precedents humble them; as if they had their salvation by patent. Yea, they are but temporally sensible of their own plagues: nor doth the thought outlast the smart. As that father speaks of the afflicted pagans; They lose the benefit of affliction, are confirmed in wretchedness and sin: (August.) worse in body, and no better in soul. Either they think they need no affliction, or so sure that they are above affliction. As if God, like some skillless chirurgeon, when he comes to let blood, could not find a vein; or were not wise enough to choose that vein which is fittest to bleed.

They are lethargically secure, no ruin but their own can stir them. But that which could not instruct must destroy; if they be not deterred by others they must be destroyed themselves. Thunder proceeds from a vapour lifted up from the earth, and compassed with a cold cloud: in the agitation or struggling it takes fire, and then breaks out where the cloud is thinnest: and being out, sometimes it strikes the clothes, not the body; sometimes the body, not the clothes. So doth preaching; it is the vapour or breath of the Spirit, surrounded with the cold and watrish humours of our sins: it struggles with them, and in the strife catcheth fire; and so vents itself to the terror of the world. Sometimes by menaces and examples, it strikes our garments, not ourselves: sometimes it goes further, and strikes also our own hearts. Oh then let us fear God's judgments upon others, that we may never feel them ourselves.

To conclude with application, albeit indeed the whole discourse is but a doctrine of application; for wherefore is an example propounded, but to be applied? Hypocrites are sick, and will not be known to stand in need of physic; they can have no remedy. Profane ones are sick, and will accept of no physic; they will have no remedy. It is hard to say which case is worst: now God have mercy on them both! Can we think God will not deal with us as he hath dealt with others before us? Jezebel suborned false witnesses, and had her neck burst for it: is there no judgment for such offenders? Achan for sacrilege is stoned: our church robbers hope to escape. Miriam was proud, and became leprous: our plastered popinjays fear not. Israelites distrusting in the Lord, die by a plague: how many want faith, and yet look not to want mercy! Esau seems to say unto all profane wretches, Take warning by me; Ahab to all superstitious idolaters, Saul to all malicious persecutors, Absalom to all unnatural sons, Gehazi to all false servants, Nabal to all covetous churls, Shimei to all blasphemous railers, Take warning by us. And the Sodomites here are made to speak in the language of sorrow, to all secure wantons, Take warning by us.

Such measure is to be expected from God's hands, if such wickedness be found in ours. If men like it well, to have their buildings on fire about their ears, to see their infants dashed against the stones, or scorched with flames, to feel a bloody enemy triumphing in their streets, to have their names a derision, their cities a desolation, their carcasses exposed to fowls, and perhaps their souls to furies and torments; they may then run on their impious courses without any repentance or deprecation. It is God's mercy, that we were not made the first-fruits of his wrath, and examples to all the world; but how great is our unthankfulness, if having thus escaped, we are not bettered! Or if we escape all this, yet the Lord will strike when he sees his time, perhaps when we are in worse case to bear it. He can make our deathbeds smart for this; he may reserve all horror and amazement to that desperate hour, and then lay on us the burden of all our sins. There is one thing, if we hear it, and heart it, enough to fright us all: "It shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom in the day of judgment, than for thee," Matt. xi. 24: and yet the Sodomites are now in hell. If we receive not the blessed gospel with faith and fear, Sodom and Gomorrah never sinned as we sin, and Sodom and Gomorrah were never plagued as we shall be.

But as it is a happy alarm that brings in the straggling soldier to his colours; and a good chance for the wandering sheep, by seeing the wolf prey on a goat, to be gathered home to the fold: so let the destruction of Sodom be the instruction of England; let their curse become our blessing. It is a good compassion of nature, that shall bring us to the compunction of grace. So instead of fire and brimstone from heaven, or in hell; the angels shall lift us up from the vale of mortality, and the brightness of glory receive us in the paradise of joy; through the mercy of God that hath promised it, and the merits of Christ that hath purchased it for us.

"Unto those that after should live ungodly." What St. Paul says, "The law is not made for the righteous man," 1 Tim. i. 9; so nor here is the example set for the holy. But the law is for the lawless, and the example of the ungodly is for the ungodly. He that freely obeys the truth, finds no adversary of the law; it serves to chastise the bad and backward, not to restrain the good and forward. The horse that reineth well, needs no bit; nor he that runneth freely, a spur. Against the righteous there is no law, Gal. v. 23. There is no condemning law, for they are in Christ: there is no compelling law, for the Spirit is in them; and they do as willingly obey God, as if there was no law. Were there no hell, and God would not punish transgression with eternal death; yet would they avoid all sin because it displeaseth Christ. Yea further, if Christ would not give them eternal life, yet would they love him, and desire the advancement of his kingdom. So these examples are not for the righteous, but for the ungodly.

1. Let us consider what this ungodliness is in the proper nature of it: for it seems to consist both in the privative or negative, excluding somewhat, and coming short of what is required; and in the positive, committing somewhat that is prohibited. Ungodliness is a sin, which many defy in their mouths, and embrace in their hearts; so much greater than the seven popish deadly sins, as it is indeed the ground of them all. More dangerous; because being rooted in the heart, it is not so visible to the eye, nor discernible to his reason that owes it. More heinous, because it is more spiritual, immediately directed against God himself; being a breach of the first commandment of the first table, robbing him of his due honour. It consists, either in the true worship of a false god, or in a false worship of the true God, or in the true worship of the true God with a false heart. Whereas godliness is a true service of the true God, in a true religion, with a true heart.

First, it gives him not his honour: secondly, it gives it to another: thirdly, if it do give him due honour, yet not after a due manner. The fool says in his heart, There is no God, Psal. xiv. 1: not but that his conscience is convinced of the contrary; but on the least temptation his heart is willing to acknowledge none. Said, not believed: examine him according to his creed, and never fool believed in his heart, there is no God. If he must confess his being, yet he renounceth all subjection. "They say unto God, Depart from us," &c. Job xxi. 14. This is too outrageous to be the speech of the tongue, it is the rebellion of the heart; not vocal, but actual. They will not have him reign over them, Luke xix. 27. They scorn to beg a blessing of him; they "call not upon the Lord," Psal. xiv. 4. They that will crouch and attend the court for a lordship on earth, will not so much as be petitioners for the kingdom of heaven. They say, The Lord will do neither good nor evil, Zeph. i. 12: they sleep, and dream that the Lord sleeps too. Or they not only deny this tribute to their Creator, but give it to some creature; as David took the land from honest Mephibosheth, and gave it to Ziba a varlet. Or else they resolve to honour him, with that he hath declared to offend him; as Paul in persecuting, and the Jews in executing Christ, thought they did God service. Lastly, even in their best works, that may carry some show of devotion, they have a false heart; halting betwixt God and Baal; a mixed service. So Demas, though he forsook Paul, yet turned not to his idols again.

But he that will admit the service of God no way but his own, shall find the mercy of God no way at all. There may be a denial of God in real faith, even when there is a confession of God in verbal faith. A disease which this age labours of: in great ones it is a Noli me tangere; physicians and divines call it incurable. Yea, our vulgars are not exempted, and the pulpit can prove nothing so appositely and directly by Scripture, but if it displease the people, it shall never come in their creed. Let religion and the gospel fly away, if they speak not as this people would have them. When God's word and this ungodliness meet, you shall hear a rattling and hissing, as in the encounter of fire and water. Paul casts fire at Ephesus; Demetrius roars; in comes the town-clerk with the magnificence of Diana: alas, that was a painted fire, no noise nor tumult at it. If we stroke your spleen, and tell you that you are predestinated to go to heaven in a coach, or that a wherry shall gently waft you to Canaan; this is a painted fire that never troubles you. But when we speak of denying your covetous lusts, abjuring your sacrilege, bleeding for malicious lies and slanders; here is presently a hissing, a mutinous, mad rebellion.

The word in us labours to destroy ungodliness in you, and ungodliness in you labours to destroy the word in us. But consider what the prophet told Amaziah, Because thou hast not obeyed my counsel, I know that God hath determined to destroy thee, 2 Chron. xxv. 16. The sons of Eli would not hearken, because the Lord meant to slay them, 1 Sam. ii. 25; their hearts must be hardened, that they may be destroyed. Alas, the scholar is but the pattern of his master, and our knowledge but a beam of God's knowledge: while ungodly men refuse us, (Truth hath said it,) they reject God himself. They got Zechariah to be made away by the king's command: he said no more at his death, but "The Lord look upon it," 2 Chron. xxiv. 21, 22: what followed? While ungodly men are whetting a knife to cut our throats, God is whetting a sword to cut their throats. One singular proof of ungodliness, is a contesting against the preachers of Jesus Christ.

2. This example is set down for the ungodly; but it is rare to find any that will confess themselves ungodly: now men that have no sense of being ill, will never care for any medicines to make them well. And though the fruits of it were never more visible and notorious, yet the root lies buried in the ground, and boasts of a concealment. We have some to whom the very church is a shadow of death, and they have earnest business, which they love above God and their own souls. Examine your fields, streets, waters, in the times of devotion; is not this ungodliness? And for them that make as though they would be saved, do they not sue for their inheritance in heaven, forma pauperis; refusing to give the least scrap of their superfluity for eternal life? Yea, do not they even pull down that kingdom, which they seem to crave? Is not this ungodliness? If they hear, is it not with contempt, spleen, censure, and (if they durst) with controlment? How few, when the sermon is done, think either the worse of themselves for the present, or become the better afterward! How many brutish men find we, Psal. xciv. 8, that continually mistake the soul for the body! "Soul, eat, drink," &c. Luke. xii. 19; his meaning was, Body, eat. He thought his soul was delighted with sensuality, whereas it is the lay-part, the very least of man, that is thus pleased.

Lust is with the affections, as Jezebel with her chamberlains; she paints and pleases: grace comes like Jehu, "Who is on my side?" 2 Kings ix. 32; oh that she were hurled down! If wealth increase, there is a dish added to the table, a set to the ruff, a tie to the shoes; but not a dram to devotion, not a mite to the church, not a scrap to the poor, not a grace to the soul. Not to speak of the professed enemies to all goodness, the engines of hell, and deputies of the devil, whose souls are nothing else but moving anatomies: such as are yet to choose their faith, and think religion a humour or fancy following the complexion. Like a condemned wretch, that jests away his soul. (Pardon all holy impatience: unruly patients make sharp physicians.) Men that think all we preach to be but fables; yet on their death-beds, if their lethargized conscience be suffered to wake ere it go to hell, they would give all the world to be sure what we say were not true: are not these ungodly?

To omit those hypocrites, that are shuffled among professors, as Saul was among the prophets; for there is no cure of an unknown grief. To omit those swearers and adulterers, who are out of the reach of civil justice, but God puts them in his own calendar; judging the one, Heb. xiii. 4, and not holding guiltless the other, Exod. xx. 7. And those toes of the land that rot with idleness; lazy beggars: as it hath been observed, Great men make thieves, and then hang them up: (Sir Thomas More's Utop.) make them, by suffering sloth to slide into villany. And all those capital oppressors, that, like Felix, when they can get no money, will bind Paul, if it be but to curry favour with the Jews. They grew rich by the undoings of men, yet under the shadow of power and authority, "they wrap it up," Micah vii. 3. Wrap it up, as mud in crystal, or a foul thing in a fair cloth. Which was detested by a very Tiberius, chiding his polling officer, Tonderi volo pecus, non deglubi. This is rank impiety: but to come closer home, and happy is the bosom which is not conscious of these evils,

Have we any more than a mere form of godliness, reserving the pride and choice allowance to our own lusts? As our treacherous Romists, that give their liege their compliments, but to a foreign prince their hearts. Do not men spend ten hours about mammon, before one minute about devotion? do they not think of their last account, as the last thing to be thought of? Is not covetousness chief commander of the fort, and nothing done without her permission? Where did the bad servant bury his talent, but in the earth? earthy affections, covetousness, bury all. This is that which eats out the heart of grace, by eating grace out of the heart. Is not this ungodliness got into the midst of that execrable rabble? Rom. i. 29; 1 Cor. vi. 9. The devil may seem to take example by covetous worldlings, to chide his spirits, and upbraid their sloth: Mortal men in so few years can heap up so many thousands, and get abundance into their hands; and you that should in quickness outstart them, lie sleeping like drones by the hearth of hell, and seek not to people our kingdom.

And who can wonder that those men disregard their ministers, that have cast away all respect of their own souls? Or what marvel that St. Anthony's vision, which is said to be two years before the Arian heresy arose, should now be palpable: beasts about the altar, kicking it with their heels, dashing it with their horns, and trampling on it with their foul hoofs; till like Job, it be made poor to a proverb. Covetousness makes ungodliness flourish. Yet is not this all; for where is the subjection of heart to the will of God? Who suffers that supreme law to rule his actions and affections? who trembles at that thing which may offend his Maker? Men little think of their conscience, when they are going about to please their concupiscence: they study their ends, not their end. And how hardly will they prefer God's glory before their own souls, that will not prefer it to a piece of artificial clay! Is not this ungodliness? Innumerable be the fruits of an ungodly heart, whereof the fewer we see in ourselves, the more they be, and the more to be lamented. If we be not evil, why do we pray, "Deliver us from evil?" Wretched are they that flatter themselves, and blessed are they that can prove themselves, to be out of the rank of the ungodly. The Omniscient eye can find ungodliness enough in the best. To us then is this ensample applicable: let it make us confess that we are as they were, and repent, that we may never be as they are. Lord, take away our ungodliness, and thou shalt find none.

3. Lastly, consider the state of ungodliness. To be ungodly implies two things, wickedness and wretchedness. He is mortal, yet covetous; poor, yet proud; foolish, yet headstrong. He takes great pains to build a house on another man's ground: he seeks for sweet water in the midst of the salt sea. He studies more to be advanced, than to be worthy of that advancement. He hath lost himself, and desperately cares not what he does, to find his will. Nor his goods, nor his honours, nor his friends go with him, but his sins: so he departs to torments boundless, endless.

The Scripture says of him, that he is in sin, I Cor. xv. 17. It is one thing to have sin in us, another thing for us to be in sin. Sin is in us all; St. Paul confesseth it of himself; "Sin dwelleth in me," Rom. vii. 20. But all are not in sin, drowned, captivated, dungeoned. We say, such a man is in drink: drink may be in him, and yet he sober; but for him to be in drink, argues him drunken. The ungodly doth hunt after sin; the eye and the ear being a couple of beagles to put up the game, and the whole man turned into a beast to follow the course. Only here is the difference: there the hart or hare that is chased dies, and the hound lives; here the sin survives, and the hunter perishes. He is slaved to sin; whatsoever lust dictates, he subscribes to: there is no base officer in his family of wickedness, but let him come with the most unnatural suit, he writes Fiat. He is "holden with the cords of his sins," Prov. v. 22. God help the man thus manacled: this is a case wherein a king may be pitied by a galley-slave. Here is no flying, no changing his master: he may change his place, estate, repose, lodging, repast; he cannot change himself. Whithersoever he goes, he takes himself along with him.

He hath a broad conscience; which is like a barn-door, it can take in a whole load of corn: he can swallow a camel. All ravenous fishes have large and wide mouths. The devil will never mince this man's meat, he is able to swallow it whole. (Whereas the good conscience is like the little door to the holy of holies, that lets in none but the High Priest, Jesus Christ.) He confirms his heart in evil by voluntary custom, till he can with more ease digest the hardest offence, than the stomach of an ostrich can digest iron. He is pleased with the success, vexed with the prevention of any sinful purpose. If his plot be crossed, and his hand cannot act that wickedness by day which his head hath devised by night, he is taken with a fit of melancholy, sick of the sullens; as was Ahab and Haman. He thinks it a death that he cannot be suffered to die; it is a hell to him that the gates of hell are shut against him.

If he be punished, he can grieve at the smart, not at the cause: in sickness he can cry, My head, my head, or, my heart, my heart; but, my sin, or, my soul, is none of his complaint. To wail some small effects, and never to think of the cause, is to be curious in healing the cliffs of skin at the root of our nails, never minding the corruption that is in our heads or hearts. His whole business is sin, he hath nothing else to do in the world. He may taste of the waters of life by chance, as a dog laps at Nilus; but his voyage is bound for mischief. And like a fire-work on a line, he runs on while his matter lasts, then goes out with stink and a crack.

Though I cannot say to all men, be not sinners; yet let me say, be not ungodly. Though you admit sin, do not intend sin; do not seek it, though it finds you. Would men know what is in their hearts, and distinguish betwixt rebellions and infirmities? Pirates forage on the seas, rob merchants, refuge themselves at Dunkirk or Algiers. They complain to the Spaniard or Turk for redress. No, say they, they are none of ours, we give them no such allowance, we own them not. Well, if yet secretly they receive them to land, help them with fresh water, meat, tackling, provision, and thus underhand relieve them, sure these do allow them. Men profess piety, yet admit of lusts in themselves, injuries to others: whose acts be these? None of ours: alas! against our wills, we cannot but sin, yet we consent not to it. Nay, but if concupiscence be in the mean time fostered, purveyed for by the eye, battered by riot, armed with approbation, justified by dissembling, this is not weakness, but rank ungodliness. It is a habit. Every act doth not make a habit: divers have fallen into incontinence, soon repented, and avoided the sin; this cannot be called ungodliness. Transient escapes do not denominate an ungodly man, because the sins committed are now loathed. But avarice, injustice, malice, &c., these are ungodliness; because here is a continuance of will, and a will of continuance. Now as the orator said, when he had declaimed against drunkenness, it was but to keep men sober; so this discourse of ungodliness is intended to turn men's hearts to piety. But this may be planted by Paul, and watered by Apollos, no increase can be but by the Spirit of Jesus Christ.

This was their ungodliness. God often spareth the wicked for the righteous' sake; such as are either allied in blood, as Ham was in the ark; or by cohabitation and proximity, as Paul had all the souls in the ship given him. The wise man is the fool's salvation: as a physician is an antidote against sickness, and a valiant man a muniment against enemies. When Augustus had conquered Antony, and taken Alexandria, and the citizens expected nothing but present massacre, the emperor proclaimed a general pardon, for Arrius' sake, a philosopher of that city, and his familiar friend. Thus doth God forbear men for men, one for another, but all for Jesus. But where all are apostates, all perish. Noah could deliver but eight out of a world; and Abraham, beginning at fifty, went no lower than ten, lest he should have been too bold with God. He doth stay at ten, not as though God for a less number will not spare a city: for as sometimes for more than fifty he will not suspend his judgments, as Samaria and Israel found, when seven thousand good men were among them; so for fewer than ten he will sometimes show mercy, as he promised to spare Jerusalem for one: Find but one man that seeketh the truth, and I will spare it, Jer. v. 1. But here all were ungodly; only one family shunned their filthy conversation, and so escaped their fiery conflagration.

THE SINS OF SODOM.

To take a short catalogue of their ungodliness, principally their sins were six: four whereof be mentioned, Ezek. xvi. 49; a fifth by St. Jude, ver. 7, following strange flesh; the last, Gen. xix. 9, contempt of all holy admonition.

1. Pride will ever be foremost; it seeks the highest place in preferment, it shall have the uppermost place in torment. "Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but unto thy name give glory," Psal. cxv. 1: this pride contradicts; To us, to us, and to none but us. We may say of humility, as of that good woman, "Many daughters have done virtuously, but thou excellest them all," Prov. xxxi. 29; but of pride, other sins do vilely enough, but that surmounts them all. God resisteth the proud, for the proud resist God: a piece of rotten dust, so soon as it is made, recoileth against its Maker, opposeth that Majesty which the angels adore, the thrones worship, the devils fear, and the heavens obey. But he gets nothing by it, for if God resist him who shall defend him? If against the proud he sent his law with such thunder, how will himself come?

The world is apt to admire pride, her words are held oracles, her works miracles, her garments true ornaments. This so flesheth and flusheth her, that she thinks no more of God, except it be with Saul, Honour me before this people, 1 Sam. xv. 30. As Nebuchadnezzar built much for his own honour, Dan. iv. 30, nothing for the honour of God. Therefore the Lord will grace humility, and give her the glory. When the ambitious promoter of himself shall be fetched down, God will say to her, "Friend, go up higher," Luke xiv. 10. Pride is like smoke. But humility is a substantial grace, so that pride itself is proud of her mantle: as Absalom, so rank with pride, yet put on a show of humbleness, in compliment. And this is the glory of humility, that proud men are glad of her livery. But pride must learn better manners, or if she escape the Sodomites' fire on earth, she must feel the Sodomites' fire in hell.

2. Fulness of bread. But is this a sin? Is not bread the staff of life, and the fulness of it a blessing? Yes, but that good mother brought forth two bad daughters; pride in habit, and excess in diet. It is not the fulness of bread, but our fulness of belly, that is the sin. "Charge the rich that they be not high-minded," 1 Tim. vi. 17: no sooner rich, but presently high-minded. "The fat valleys of them that are overcome with wine," Isa. xxviii. 1: they that dwell in fat valleys will fume with wines. "Let their table become a snare," Psal. lxi. 22: the most riotous table is the most dangerous snare. "I will leave in the midst of thee an afflicted and poor people, and they shall trust in the name of the Lord," Zeph. iii. 12. They that have nothing to trust unto in the world, will sooner be brought to trust only in the Lord. Haman's abundance made him proud, and his pride advanced him fifty cubits higher than the earth, to a stately gibbet. If our gold become our fetters, we had better have lived beggars. The Israelites fared daintily on their quails, fed with meat of princes and bread of angels; but their sauce was too sharp, when that they put into their mouths God fetched back at their nostrils.

It is better to want necessities and iniquities, than to have with the fulness of bread the fulness of pride and riot. "Lest I be full, and deny thee," Prov. xxx. 9. If full, deny thee presently follows. It was the Lord's caveat to Israel; Take heed, "lest when thou hast eaten and art full, thou forget the Lord," Deut. viii. 12, 14. "All they that be fat upon earth shall eat and worship," Psal. xxii. 29: thus it should be. They wax fat, and spurn with their heels, Deut. xxxii. 15: "They were filled, and their heart was exalted; therefore have they forgotten me," Hos. xiii. 6: thus it is. We all desire plenty; but as when one wished the son to be like the father, Cato replied, Is this a blessing or a curse? would our plenty do us good, or harm? The wicked have their desire, yea, "more than their heart could wish." What is the issue? "They set their mouth against the heavens," Psal. lxxiii. 7, 9. Christ did not teach us to beg variety of dishes, nor abundance of wines, but bread; and that but for the day, daily bread. It is emptiness that values God's providence, not fulness: when the Lord deals with us, as Frederic duke of Saxony with his servants, who in hawking had rode over much corn, and carelessly spoiled it; gave charge that their messes of meat should not be abridged, but not one bit of bread should be allowed to their supper.

Plentitude breeds many diseases; I am not physician good enough to number them: not only pride, that worm of riches, which naturally begets another worm that never dieth, the worm of conscience; but surfeit and drunkenness, the sins of this city. Call your wines by what names you will, French, or Greek, or Spanish, it is the Londoners' wine. Where there is such immoderate feasting, the world must needs believe that it is not maintained without sin and deceit: and for such meat you had need of strong wine to help digestion. Here it is, and here it is unmeasurably taken, abused, urged; as if our brother's fall were not the devil's victory. Some have thought that martyrdom and Christ's passion was called by the name of a cup, from the loathsome filling and violating the appetite with drink. The youngest daughter of this fulness, is wantonness: They rose up like fed horses, neighing with lust, Jer. v. 8. But of that anon: this is the dependence of pride and riot. One would think that they had no acquaintance, but they are very near. He that exalts himself above his creation by pride, falls below his creation by drunkenness. It is the voice of pride, All is mine: then riot answers, I may do what I list with mine own. Both are contraries to sobriety, one of the mind, the other of the body. They are often coupled and united: The proud man and he that transgresseth by wine, Hab. ii. 5. Pride turned Nebuchadnezzar into a beast; so doth drunkenness: their union in sin shall find no separation in punishment.

3 Idleness. This is another effect of fulness: they that flow with abundance, never mind any diligence. "As it was in the days of Lot; they did eat, they drank, they bought, they sold, they planted, they builded," Luke xvii. 28. These were all otia, rather than negotia, as they used them: even that labour was idleness. To marry, is honest and honourable; yet was the old world taxed for this. Not because only, as some answer, they married not with any conjugal love, but with a voluptuous lust; for this is a remedy, not an iniquity that God so severely punisheth. They minded their lusts, they minded not God's laws; here was the sin. So, in the days of Lot, as if Lot was only in the day-light, all the rest in night and darkness. They ate and drank: this is nature's necessity, and is not reprehended: not the conveniency, but the superfluity is faulted. They bought and sold: this was a lawful negotiation; therefore not the mutual commercement, but the unjust defraudment, is taxed. They built and planted; both in themselves allowable. Christ blames not their felling of trees, nor building of houses, but the baseness of their desires; who sought eternity upon earth, and had no heart to the God of heaven. In eating and drinking was their saturity; in building and planting, their security; in buying and selling, their covetousness. These were all superfluous to that one necessary thing, and therefore idleness. They feared not the Lord, but lay drowned in their own sensuality; this was their invincible stupidity. Thus rotten were they in their lees of sin, that unless they had animas pro sale, they had been all stinking carcases.

Here we see, it is not enough to forbear evil, but it is damnable not to do well. Christ pretermits the enumeration of their horrible delinquishments, and speaks of their acts lawful in appearance; censuring them. If they were condemned for feeding, what is the wages of surfeiting? If they for necessary trading, what shall be for fraudulent deceiving? If they for building their own houses, what shall become of them that pull down God's house? If such a judgment fell upon marriage, what is the curse of adultery? Christ mentions not the sins of commission, as if they were damnable enough by concession; but the omitted duties: Ye did not feed me, &c.

Matt. xxv. Not that the other shall pass unjudged, but to show that there is damnation enough wrapped up in these to destroy the world.

Thus easily doth fulness degenerate into idleness; and where is no need of gains, there no vouchsafing of pains. To many a man will God say, I made thee a husbandman, who made thee a gentleman? I will make man a helper meet for him, Gen. ii. 18: this intends that neither should be idle. The man is compared to the sun, the wife to the moon, that borrows light of him, yet hath some of her own. But when the sun shall shine only by the moonlight, this is preposterous. He is a Sodomite that will eat none but another's bread, and wear no coat of his own weaving. The slothful will not plough because of winter; therefore shall he beg in summer, and no man shall give him, Prov. xx. 4. He shall beg, that is bad; and no man shall give him, that is worse. But yet a man may be busy enough, and bring labour on himself with a vengeance; when he shall labour in that he hath no thanks for, and be idle in that should do him good: thus a man may go to hell for his pains. Sodom thus laboured in sin, and now labours in torment. Let us so work on our eve, that we may rest on our sabbath; work up our salvation on earth, and reap our salvation in heaven.

4. Contempt of the poor. This is an execrable sin, a thing that hastens before the time. If he be condemned that says no more but, God help thee; how sore is his judgment that says in heart, I despise thee! That omission is culpable, that goes no further than, Be warmed; but that damnable, that says, Be starved. It were fault enough to pass by them, like the Levite, without succour; but horrible, not to pass by them without disdain. "Cast thy bread on the waters," Eccl. xi. 1, that is, on the watery eyes, which do weep for want; but if we cast not our morsels, let us forbear to cast our scorns. How basely soever we esteem them, they are the members of Christ, and such as he honours, and sets near him; taking notice of every benefit, and recording every wrong, that is done them. It will be no light or slight offence, to condemn the brother of the Son of God.

Some think that the Sodomites would admit no strangers to come among them, as they speak now of China; and that this made them so furious against the angels. There be four terms among men: 1. Mine is thine, and thine is thy own. 2. Mine is mine, and thine is thine. 3. Mine is thine, and thine is mine. 4. Thine is mine, and mine is my own. The first is of saints, the second of moralists, the third of populars, and the last is the voice of devils: of this rank were the Sodomites. For this special cause they hated Lot, for his hospitality. When they came in troops to break into his house, he pleads the laws of hospitality. For this cause came they under my roof. And when he sees their headstrong purpose of villany, he chooseth rather to be an ill father to his own children, than an ill host to strangers. Therefore is heaven called Abraham's bosom, because of his hospitality; and thither the saints go: it is fit that hospitable men should go to their Father.

Let us make the poor our friends by our alms, not our enemies by our scorns. We had better have the ears of God full of their prayers, than heaps of money in our own coffers with their curses. Worldly men think themselves wise in getting wealth, and the Scriptures folly; therefore throughout the Scriptures God calls them fools for their labour: "Thou fool." There is a tale of an abbot that gave his fool a painted staff, willing him to bestow it on the veriest fool he could meet. This abbot fell mortally sick; the fool was a visitant among the rest; and hearing him say, I must leave all and be gone, asked him whither he would go. The abbot answers, Into another country. But I hope, replies the fool, you will carry all your gold, and jewels, and treasure with you. No, I must leave all. But sure you have sent great store of preparation, as rich hangings, coverings, beds, plate, and furniture before you. No, I must leave all behind. All? I hope at least you have sent enough to furnish your own room, provision enough for yourself. No, not the least pillow. Hold, saith he, take your staff again, you are the veriest fool that ever I met. It is easily applied: they that of so much under their custody on earth will make no provision for themselves in heaven, by giving to the poor, are well taxed of the extremest folly. Let us relieve them by our good deeds, that they may relieve us by their good prayers; so shall we find mercy in the day of Jesus Christ.

5. Following strange flesh. This was not only fornication or adultery; a man's wife is his own flesh, and she that is not so, is a stranger; but even an offence against nature, for the Sodomites were not content with the common way of sinning, but were mad with a prodigious and preposterous lust. Bring forth the men, that we may know them, Gen. xix. 5. Shall we say, herein the very Sodomites spoke modestly, though their intention were villanous? I do not think they meant any mannerly concealment, but it is the dialect of the Scripture, which by an honest name sets down a most dishonest thing. It hides the sin of Sodom, as the painter hid the scar in Agamemnon's face. Certainly their impudence was monstrous, declaring their sin, Isa. iii. 9. Bring them forth. Wherein they would make Lot, a father, not only a witness to the constupration and ravishment of the angels, but even the very bawd or pander; Do thou bring them out.

Questionless, those heavenly guests were of an excellent form, and most sweet favour, surpassing the sons of men; and the sight of this inflamed their more than beastly lust. Such a natural desire hath wicked man to mar what God made, to corrupt his most admirable workmanship; and where he hath imprinted the most fair characters of his glory, there they have most ambition to fasten; like cankers, that had rather be about one rose, than a thousand weeds. Beauty, meant for a mirror wherein to admire God, they turn into a snare to confound themselves; and so suck poison from the flower that would yield them honey. Happy man, whom the temptation of beauty cannot make to forget his duty!

This was the extremity of Sodom's sins, for whose sake it shall be called sodomy to the world's end. Whether the first excogitation of it begun, or the received practice was infamous, among them, it is still the sin of Sodom. So abominable, that fire from heaven was the reward of it. As against nature was the transgression, so against nature is the destruction. It is natural for fire to ascend upward, but here, contrary to the course of nature, it is forced to come downward. Christ himself is said to rain that deluge from Jehovah his Father. Why he? why not, as in other punishments, the Lord, without any further distinction? Because they had corrupted that nature, which the Son of God was to take. (August.) The Lord seeing this sin in the flesh, had almost forbore to take flesh; or at least so long deferred it before he came. Some have written, that all the sinners in that kind, died the very same night that Christ was incarnate. This sin was infamous among the Gentiles; They burned in lust one toward another, and man with man wrought filthiness, Rom. i. 27. For this horrid uncleanness in masculine venery, Socrates is branded among the philosophers, and Nero among the Roman emperors. As by lawful marriage, two are made one, so by this turpitude, one is divided into two. But let this sin sink into hell with the Sodomites, and never more be remembered on the face of the earth. I now expel it out of my discourse; the Lord banish it out of all our hearts for ever. Yea, not only that, but all manner of uncleanness; lest we be given over, like the Gentiles, to our own lusts, by a just retaliation: who as they had dishonoured God, were suffered to dishonour themselves; and as they had turned beasts into gods, so they turned themselves into beasts.

But this following of strange flesh hath a greater latitude and further extent, and fetcheth in all carnal pollutions; a sin that is a burning, Job xxxi. 12, whosoever it hath a being. The apostle in one chapter hath six invincible arguments to dissuade us from it.

(1.) "The body is for the Lord, and the Lord for the body," 1 Cor. vi. 13. If the body be for the Lord, it is not for uncleanness. If the Lord be for the body to glorify it, then he is for the body to rule and sanctify it. The husband is one with the wife, and the wife with the husband, while both are chaste; but if the bed be defiled, that concorporation dissolves.

(2.) "God hath both raised up the Lord, and will also raise up us by his own power," ver. 14. If we desire our body to be raised with incorruption when we are dead, let us keep it without pollution while we live. Let us sow a gracious body, that we may reap a glorious body. How deformed and ugly will the fairest creatures look, when their bodies shall be raised with the marks of uncleanness upon them! Optimi corruptio pessima: if prostitution, maugre all the art of plastering, can turn beauty into deformity, and make despicable on earth, how loathsome will it appear in the day of vengeance!

(3.) "Shall I take the members of Christ, and make them the members of an harlot? God forbid," ver. 15. Suppose a king sitting in his chair of state, his temples crowned with a golden diadem, his body adorned with royal robes and jewels; how ill-favouredly would a torn shoe or a leprous toe appear! It is our glory, to be parts of him that is the King of glory; let us not dishonour him by defiling ourselves. He is mad that forsakes a saint to admit a devil into his arms; that for the odious connexion with a harlot, leaves the delicious embraces of Jesus Christ.

(4.) "Every sin that a man doeth is without the body; but he that committeth fornication sinneth against his own body," ver. 18. Other sins are without the body, this is against the body. In theft, of all members the hand is principal, and in blasphemy the tongue; but this, above the rest, more or less, leaves a sordid iniquation upon the whole body. If then not for the love of God, whose the body is by creation; nor for desire of perfect beauty at the resurrection; nor for hatred of the highest sacrilege, robbing Christ of his members by a carnal impropriation; yet for love of thyself, and respect to thine own body, flee fornication.

(5.) "Know you not that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost?" ver. 19. It is a great profaneness to abuse the material temple, made with men's hands; much worse to violate the spiritual temple, made by the hand of God. I have heard of some depopulators, that of the quire of saints have made a kennel for their dogs; that was nefarious enough. Yet so far as God loves this corporeal temple better than that, this adulterous profanation exceeds the former. To turn the Holy Ghost out of his chamber, and to make it Satan's unclean dwelling; most fearful! O think at the moment of temptation, It is the temple of God I now profane, defile, abuse: what fire cannot this meditation quench!

(6.) "Ye are bought with a price: therefore glorify God in your body, and in your spirit, which are God's," ver. 20. By this token keep thy body intemperate, saith Christ; I shed my blood to redeem it. What I have been at such cost to cleanse, do not thou carelessly defile. No gold or jewels could ransom our bodies, but the blood of Christ: let us value them according to the price, and we shall not do amiss. Do not for a moment's delight make frustrate an eternal purchase. Most enormities of life proceed from an error in the understanding; We may do what we list with our own. We may speak what we list; why? our tongues are our own, Psal. xii. 4. We may spend what we list; why? our riches are our own. Shall I take my bread and my meat? saith churlish Nabal, 1 Sam. xxv. 11. He is deceived, for even of life itself man is not the master, but the keeper, saith law and case divinity. The Lord is the possessor of heaven and earth, Gen. xiv. 19; man but the farmer. Our bodies are our own, therefore do with them what we please? It is false, they are none of ours; but, in a true propriety, the Lord's. We have but a right of favour from the true Proprietary, and that liable to an account. He lends them us for our use, but his own service. Therefore answer all temptations to lust, This body is not mine own, but his that made it, and bought it: I dare not alienate it from the Owner, and remove the marks he hath set unto it. My body is thine, Lord, keep it, and save it for ever.

6. The last sin of Sodom was contempt of heavenly admonition. Lot charged them from God, and they, like a rusty or ill-wrought piece, recoiled in his face: Who made thee a judge? we will deal worse with thee than with them, Gen. xix. 9. They had all stony hearts, and Lot could do small good in preaching to a heap of stones. Oh that this sin of Sodom did not cleave too fast unto this land and time! They had but one Lot for four cities; we have for one city four hundred Lots. What nation under heaven hath so many learned teachers? Our church looks like the firmament in its glory, when a clear night shows it bespangled with stars of all lustres and diversity of lights. And if in some places they appear thinner, and shine less; as the stars are thin to them that live under the southern pole, and there be little sparkles in the galaxy, scarce discernible; it is only for want of competency, there is no provision to feed them. But to this city the bees come in swarms, to empty their best honey in this glorious hive. This honey you suck, and at last send them down again poor miserable drones. The number of preachers about the city, exceeds some whole country in Christendom. For aught I know, in the benefits of nature, and commodities of life, it may be equal to others; in this it excels the rest. If Rome have the gayer roods, and Spain the richer images, yet certainly we have the happier pulpits.

Thus great is our blessing, but how small is our estimation of it! Formally men come to church, to hear a man talk, but it is no matter to them what he says. We may preach ourselves hoarse and dead, and yet do no good: the reason is, men's hearts are hardened in contempt. When Christ preached, "the eyes of all were fastened on him," Luke iv. 20: our eyes are turned another way. "The time will come when they will not endure sound doctrine," 2 Tim. iv. 3: the event hath sealed this prophecy. To carp at the phrase, method, voice, or gesture, this is nothing; such exceptions be like a flourish before a fight. The world's quarrel is against the substance of preaching: if we threaten, we are cruel; if we promise, we flatter; if mild, we dream; if bold, we rail; if we prove by arguments, it is called sophistry; our affability is held lightness; our austerity, madness: nothing can please them, that resolve they will not be pleased. For our personal disgraces, we armed ourselves for them when we took the profession. We knew that we should be stared on as prodigies, hissed at as ridiculous, shunned as infectious; endure all the reproaches that the devil's scavengers can rake out of the kennels of hell, to throw on our faces. The worst language that hath been dipped in the fire, or tipped at the forge of hell, is as good as Good-morrow, if they meet a minister.

But here it is, though the contempt light upon us, it is meant at the gospel; and Christ is wounded through our sides. To speak truth, here is the very head and heart of the controversy: the word will not let men alone in their sins, therefore they must be revenged on somebody: from hence proceed the sacrilege, robbing, and the aspersions wronging the ministers of Jesus Christ. "They hate him that rebuketh in the gate," Amos v. 10. Alas, what can work upon a hard heart! Take a bar new come out of the fire, and the smith can work it, though it be iron: let him strike on his anvil never so long, there is no impression made, but rather a rebound of the stroke.

"The words of the wise are as goads," Eccl. xii. 11, but men have leviathans' skins; they esteem iron as straw, and brass as rotten bawins. They are nails, but driven upon marble or iron, and so turn again. "This is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, and men love darkness rather," John iii. 19. They excuse themselves from the sins of Sodom, pride, &c.; but there is a sin within them, which makes them as far off from salvation. While you that see the light which Sodom never had, despise it more than Sodom ever did, it shall be more easy for Sodom in the day of judgment than for you, Matt. xi. 24. Let not men flatter themselves from being obnoxious to those execrable enormities: while they do not humbly and obediently honour the gospel, their estate is worse; and Sodom shall be saved sooner than these men.

Let Rome tremble, that hath too truly deserved this name, spiritual Sodom, Rev. xi. 8. It were no slander, to tax Italy of Sodom. By their allowance? God forbid. Yet Jeronizeged Mutius set out books of purpose to defend this filthiness; and (it seems) they were allowed by the bulls of Pope Julius the Third. Casa the archbishop of Beneventum joined himself as a copesmate to second him. They bestow praises on that sin, whereof Sodom itself would have been ashamed. But this must be no imputation to their doctrine, for that teacheth otherwise. And for ourselves, though in this we touch not upon Sodom's filthiness, let us beware lest by other sins we bring ourselves to Sodom's wretchedness. Let us hearken to the gospel and love it, love it and believe it, believe it and obey it, obey it and so honour it, honour it and so be everlastingly saved by it. Amen.

VERSE 7.

And delivered just Lot, vexed with the filthy conversation of the wicked.

THE time is come at once, when Sodom must be burned, and Lot delivered. Zoar is preserved for Lot, as Lot was for Abraham. If Sodom had not been wholly wicked, he had not changed his dwelling; he could have procured mercy to it, as well as to Zoar. Now at once the sun rises upon Zoar, and fire falls down upon Sodom. Abraham stands on the hill, and beholds the cities smoking. Lot is secure in his new habitation, and neither feels nor fears the judgment. It is fair weather with the saints, when it is foulest with the wicked. When swarms of hornets sting and wound the Egyptians, not a fly must touch an Israelite. That such a winged army came not from nature or fortune, it is plain, but from an offended God; because the very flies shall make a difference betwixt Egypt and Goshen. He that gave them a being, sets them a stint; they can no more sting an Israelite, than spare an Egyptian. The wings of those small creatures are directed by a providence, and confess their limits.

The fire can go no further than the plain, not a spark shall reach to Zoar. But when Sodom hath never a Lot left in it, what should hinder the destruction? If God meet with a very good field, he plucks up the weeds, and lets the corn grow; if with an indifferent, he lets the corn and the weeds grow together; if with a very bad one, he gathers the few ears of corn, and sets fire on all the rest. When he turned Sodom into ashes, he "delivered just Lot."

There are two principals in the verse; a freedom, and a thralldom: for Sodom was a gaol to Lot wherein he was tormented, Zoar a refuge wherein he was quieted. There is a prisoner and a Preserver; Lot is the prisoner, God the Preserver.

In the freedom consider four circumstances:

The matter, what, A deliverance.

The manner, how, A violent deliverance.

The time, when, The fire being ready to fall.

The place, where, By sparing Zoar for his sake.

For the thralldom, the prisoner is described by,

His grace, He was a just man.

His case, He was vexed with them.

First, for his freedom; here was a deliverance, and God was the author of it. Indeed, who else can deliver? Deliver me, O God, for vain is the help of man. "Many are the afflictions of the righteous; but the Lord delivereth him out of them all," Psal. xxxiv. 19. Man cannot deliver out of one, God out of all. "The Deliverer shall come out of Zion," Rom. xi. 26: angels or men may be instruments, Christ is the Deliverer. "Deliver Israel, O God, out of all his troubles," Psal. xxv. 22. It was Rabshakeh's blasphemy, What god can deliver out of my hand? Isa. xxxvi. 20. What god? he found it to his cost. Can he deliver on the hills, and not in the valleys, O ye foolish Aramites? 1 Kings xx. 28. "Thou hast delivered my soul from death," &c. Psal. cxvi. 8. To me the mercy, to thee the glory: thou hadst no partner in the design, none shall share with thee in the honour.

Till Lot be delivered, not a spark must kindle. The impartial sword must not touch Rahab, nor the destroying angel offer a blow to the sprinkled doors. Those ministers of justice have an inkhorn as well as a sword: an inkhorn to mark the chosen first, then, Go and smite, Ezek. ix. 4, 5. "Great deliverances giveth He to his king," Psal. xviii. 50: a quantity of both kinds, multitude and magnitude: be they never so many, never so mighty, against us, the Lord will deliver us. St. Paul confesseth a deliverance past, present, future; He hath, he doth, and he will deliver me, 2 Tim. iv. 17, 18. God doth not only deliver his out of the fire, but he puts out the fire too. "The snare is broken, and we are delivered," Psal. cxxiv. 7. He doth not stand to untie it, but breaks it a pieces. One deep calleth another, Psal. xlii. 7; the depth of our misery for the depth of his mercy. Our lowness is God's height: the lower we are humbled, the higher is he exalted; the more grievous our exigent, the more glorious his advancement. We are more sure of our deliverance, than the devil can be sure of our persecution.

Seeing the faithful shall be delivered, and God only doth it, let our confidence know no other refuge. All concur in him that make a perfect Deliverer, power, skill, and will. There may be power and will, where is no skill to use it. If the horse were privy to his own strength, he would not suffer a boy to ride him. The Lord hath wisdom with power, Job xii. 13: the school says that he knows non entia; which they ground upon the apostle's words, "He calleth those things which be not as though they were," Rom. iv. 17. These are of two sorts; either such as are not now in act, but have been in time past, or shall be in time to come; or such as neither are now in being, nor ever were, nor ever shall be. Now seeing foolish man often fears what never was, is, nor shall be; it is best to fear God, that is, that was, and that shall be; who only knows the things we fear shall never happen to us.

There may be power and skill, yet no will to use it. The Levite wanted neither ability nor knowledge to unbind the Samaritan; he wanted will, a heart of pity. Divers have money in their purses, and wit in their pates, when they see poor wretches; it is the want of compassion, that takes no compassion of their want. If this commiseration were not in God, he was less kind to his children, than man and beast to their young.

There may be will and skill, yet a defect of power: no such want can be in the Almighty. Philosophy says, that is most active which is most elevated from matter, separated from earthy parts. The physician distils his simples into waters, thereof he makes extractions and quintessences, which are operatively strong; still the more elevated from matter, the stronger and more active. Water is stronger than earth, air than water, fire more active than air or water, as appeared in Elijah's sacrifice; angels stronger than men, God stronger than all: above earth, above water, above air, fire, men, angels, over all. No weakness can be in him. According to the alteration of the air and climate, our bloods, humours, complexions may change; but the soul is the same still. Cut off a leg or an arm, you cut off no part of the soul. Many professors may be lopped off by martyrdom, yet religion stands; to show that it is maintained by a form and soul that cannot vary. God is unchangeable, all other hopes of deliverance deceive us: men vary, times vary, weapons vary, policies of war vary, advantages and successes vary; therefore it is best trusting to an object that cannot vary, which is only God himself. "Asshur shall not save us, nor will we ride upon horses, nor say to the works of our hands, Ye are our gods: for in thee the fatherless findeth mercy," Hos. xiv. 3.

Many animals act and are acted upon by fancy: so it is fancy in men that makes them fear where no fear is; dreading the danger, not trusting the Deliverer. The sheep at first sight of the wolf, apprehends him for a terrible object, naturally fears and flees him: the lion feels no terror, but passeth by him with an honourable scorn. A malkin frights a child, a man contemns it. Elisha's servant quakes at the Syrian army, no fear invades the prophet. He saw, and caused his man to see, a greater Deliverer above. In the street we see men walk in their equal stature and dimensions; they on a high turret appear little to us. Stand on a promontory, they with you are great, they beneath you seem small: the situation of the eye makes or mars all. So it is with men in the time of trouble; if their eyes be fixed on earth, their enemies appear great, and God that is so high seems little. Let our eyes be in heaven, and from thence look down upon our enemies, God will then appear mighty, our foes weak and contemptible. This was Jehoshaphat's confidence; There is no strength in us to stand against this multitude; "but our eyes are upon thee," 2 Chron. xx. 12. The returning spies brought such bastard news: We saw giants, the sons of Anak, compared with whom we appeared like grasshoppers, Numb. xiii. 33: alas their eyes were fixed upon earth. Caleb had his eye in heaven, fixed on God's power and promise, he apprehends no terror at all. Joshua had a lion's eye, that passed by all these high giants, and their higher walls, with an overlooking disdain: They are bread for us; fear them not, for the Lord is with us, Numb. xiv. 9.

Samaria had a strong enemy without, a sore famine within: a nobleman, the king's own favourite, looking on the present miseries, took them to be greater than God could cure; though he should open the windows of heaven, and rain victuals, 2 Kings vii. 2. But the prophet had his eyes in heaven, and knew that the Lord would do this without windows. The flattering courtier extolled the king, made him the mightiest, Esd. iv. 12: his eyes were upon promotion. The prophet saw no such matter; "Ye shall die like men," Psal. lxxxii. 7. Even when they ride in chariots, millions attending, guards defending, they are but grasshoppers and crickets to the Lord of hosts, Isa. xl. 22: Domini terra, yet but terra Domini. As Moses' serpent devoured the enchanters, so God's power swallows up all men's. We are all weak; in this mighty Deliverer be our confidence. When little children first learn to go, feeling their own feebleness, they thrust out a hand to the wall to stay them. Our strength is but like children's; "Our help is in the name of the Lord," Psal. cxxiv. 8.

2. The manner, how: eripuit. It was not a tradidit, as Judas delivered Jesus to the Jews, the Jews to Pilate, and Pilate to death. Not only a liberavit, as Peter was delivered, his hands falling off, and the prison doors ready for his exit. But eripuit, snatched him away, delivered him by a holy kind of violence. Make haste, for I can do nothing till thou come thither, Gen. xix. 22. Cannot? Is anything impossible to God? So it is said of Christ, He could do there no great works, Mark vi. 5. It is not because he cannot, but because he will not; he had decreed the contrary. Here observe three things.

(1.) Lot would not have hastened out of Sodom, had not the angels pulled him forth by the hand. Thus impossible is it for us, to free ourselves from the bondage of sin, unless the Lord draw us, John vi. 44. Through many gradual motions we are delivered from the wickedness of this world, as Lot was from Sodom. The angels attained their end with one motion, one conversion to God; in the very instant of their creation blessed. But man may be compared to a watch; he hath many gimmals pertaining to him, to move him; like a coach, he runs on many wheels. His head or understanding is one principal wheel; his heart or will another, and that next the spring; his affections are the minutes; his memory the little recollective wheel that winds up the rest; his life is the hand of the dial, which shows how the day goes with him; his conscience is the striking clock: only the spring that sets all a working, and keeps every wheel in due motion, is the grace of Christ. The string that unites the whole watch to the spring's government, is faith. There is a heart in the sinner, a soul in his heart, a mind in his soul, faith in his mind, Christ in his faith. The act of his intellect gives him one motion, his sensitive appetite another, and that contrary; his own will another motion, the eternal object another: so was Eve cozened with the forbidden fruit. God that hath the heart in his hand, and turns it as brooks of waters, gives it another motion. Some of these be regular, some retrograde, some forward, others oblique. Oh what ado there is to keep this watch in tune! It is no hard matter to tune the virginals or organs, though every string and pipe be out of frame; but man is a creature so proud, so subtle, so wedded to his own opinion, and rolling upon so many wheels, that to put all his strings and pipes in tune, to make all his motions concent in goodness, this is a work for the finger of God only. A child can sooner conceive itself, than a man can convert himself; or we may say, This man made himself, as well as, that he made himself good.

We wonder that, after all the warnings by angels, those ministers of Christ, sinners will not leave their Sodom. The citizen will not forbear his sacrilege, nor be afraid to cozen God to his face. The malicious will not cease practising mischief, seducing to perverseness, and overbearing goodness with a blustering authority. The covetous will still love their gain above their salvation. But this is no wonder; God hath not yet taken them by the hand. Till then the politic fool, the proud madman, and he that makes his pew the scorner's chair, deriding Christ in his gospel and ministers, cannot be humbled. The Lord snatch them out of their filthy Sodom.

(2.) How loth even a Lot is to leave Sodom! For all his vexation by their filthiness, their violence against the angels, the prediction of their instant ruin, and his peremptory charge of departure, yet he prolonged the time, Gen. xix. 16. Therefore the angels, that thirsted at once after vengeance on Sodom, and Lot's safety; that knew God would not strike Sodom till Lot was gone out, and that Lot could not be safe within those walls; are fain to break off his tardy neglect with a gracious violence: they caught him by the hand, with his wife and daughters, and brought them forth, and set them without the city. We are so naturally affected to Sodom, and so delightfully linger in it, that without great mercy we should be condemned with the world. Therefore it is added, "the Lord being merciful unto him." "I was upright," saith David, "and kept myself from mine iniquity," Psal. xviii. 23: mine iniquity; it is likely that he had some special sin of his own, whereunto he was most inclined. Oh how gracious a victory is this, I have kept me from mine iniquity!

Many being reprov'd, answer, Alas, you must bear with me in this, it is my fault; as if every man were allowed his own fault. There is a private Sodom within us, we are loth to part with that. Men say of their sins, as Jacob said of his sons, Go all but Benjamin. Other vices we will not so much stick for, but, Oh that Ishmael might live! There is still some worm in the root of the tree, that will spoil the fruit. We extenuate it; Is it not a little one? But a little hair in the pen makes a great blot in the paper. It is said of the Lord, that he weighs the mountains in scales, and the dust of the earth in a balance, Isa. xl. 12. We should not only weigh the mountains, our heinous rebellions, in scales; but even the dust, our smallest escapes, in the balance. Nor let our wits strive to make that good, which our wills have made necessary, grieving to leave what we love. But when God will take away the delight of our eyes, Ezek. xxiv. 16, the pleasant Sodom of our affections, the sin that we most joy in; then say we resolutely, Perish it, lest I perish by it. Let us not higgel and dodge with God, as Pharaoh did to retain the service of the Hebrews; nor linger upon a dis-mission of that he calls for. But without any demur, "prepare to meet thy God, O Israel," Amos iv. 12: save him a labour of fetching, prevent him with a free-will offering. Covetousness, malice, uncleanness is our Sodom: how often hath God called us forth to the Zoar of kindness, charity, chastity! This world is a Sodom, and by death the Lord calls us out; yet how many delays doth mortal life make ere it be willing to go! "O my dove, that art in the clefts of the rock," Cant. ii. 14: where we find a bird's nest; "O my dove," that is the bird; "in the clefts of the rock," there is the nest. The soul may be compared to the dove; the body to the nest or rock, wherein are many clefts, vents, and fissures to let out life. This soul, like Noah's dove, goes out by suspiration, returns in by respiration, at last by expiration departs for altogether. "Oh that I had wings like a dove! for then would I fly away, and be at rest," Psal. lv. 6. If our souls had David's wings, we would not desire to stay in Sodom, but mount up to Zion; they being borne up, as Lot was brought out, by angels.

(3.) Lot's guests were his best friends: he had entertained angels, and they now deliver him; he would have preserved them, and they did preserve him. Where should the angels lodge, but with Lot? The houses of holy men are full of those heavenly spirits, though they be not seen: their protection is comfortable, though not visible. In our tents they pitch their tents; and when devils would mischief us, they turned them out of doors. It is the honour of God's saints, to be attended by angels while they live, and to be exalted by angels when they die. Lazarus was "carried by angels into Abraham's bosom," Luke xvi. 22. As in a family, the greater children carry the less; so God hath charged his elder sons, the angels, to bear up our souls.

Thus was Lot requited for his kindness. Lodge strangers, for thereby some have entertained angels, Heb. xiii. 2. Never did man yet lose by his charity: the unthankful world may fail in due estimation, but God will regard it, and reward it. While Cornelius is doling out his alms on earth, the Lord sends down to him an angel from heaven, Acts x. 3. In charitable succour extendere manum is ostendere humanum. But if in this we be not so good as Lot, to give, let us not be so bad as Sodom, to take away. Now he that turned Sodom to ashes, and delivered Lot, turn our sins to ashes, and deliver us.

3. The time, when: the fire was even a kindling, and that sulphureous deluge prepared in the clouds; for the interim was small betwixt Lot's deliverance and Sodom's vengeance. He was "a firebrand plucked out of the burning," Amos iv. 11; the prophet alluding to Lot, and naming this very overthrow. As when a heap of seditious books are burning, and one good book ready to miscarry with the rest, is snatched by some stander-by out of the fire and saved. So near it came to him, yet did not touch him; that his heart might be sensible, both of a holy fear of the judgment, and a thankful joy for his escaping. Indeed the angels say to him, "Escape for thy life, lest thou be consumed," Gen. xix. 17; not that God meant to hurt him, but to terrify him.

It is God's delight, in the extremity of evil to be a Deliverer. When armies have besieged his servants, and they have no power to defend themselves, then he musters up his angels, 2 Kings vi. 17. Pharaoh pursues the departed Israelites: he had men of war, chariots, and horses; they were weak, unarmed people. Therefore the Egyptians gave themselves the victory beforehand, and the Israelites gave themselves for dead, and are already talking of their graves, Exod. xiv. 11. The sea was before them, their enemies behind them; the wheels rattling, the waves roaring: as the Britons once complained to the Romans; Barbari ad mare nos repellunt, mare ad Barbaros: hinc vel jugulamur, vel obmergitur: (Tacitus.) the sword, or the deep; they knew not which had less mercy. Yea, even they that had seen the wonders past, and the pillar present, do now more fear Egypt than believe God. Their unbelief matured the danger; how could the Lord forbear them? Surely his patience was no less miracle than his deliverance. Yet even then he delivered them; and for assurance of it, he removes the cloud that was first before them, and sets it betwixt Egypt and Israel. As if he should say, They shall first overcome me, before they shall touch thee. Now when they saw the pillar remove behind them, and the sea remove before them, who can tell, whether wonder should not exceed fear? That the deep should become their protection, and the sea be made a gallery or thoroughfare! no mortal eye before it ever beheld such a path. Yet thus did the Lord deliver them.

Take another instance. Consider Joseph cast into a ditch: he looked for brothers, and behold butchers; he came to inquire of their health, and may not return the news of his own misery. Hardly are they restrained from cutting his throat; but stripping him naked, at least they will cast him into a deep hole, as it were alive into his grave, Gen. xxxvii. 24. Thus with less mercy than is found in the savagest robbers, they purpose to torment him with a lingering death; and not only to kill him, but do what they can to kill their father in him. He, like a poor suppliant, bowing his bare knees to them he dreamed should bow to him, with passionate prayers and tears, implores mercy; beseeching them by the dear name of brotherhood, by their profession of one God, for their father's sake, for their own souls' sake, not to take away his life. But what can the nearness of fraternity prevail, where humanity is lost? Who could think of so innocent a youth, naked and desolate, in a dry and deep pit, crying for pity, and not cry for company? But cast down he is, and they sit down to eat his provision unmoved; never thinking by their own hunger, what it was for their poor brother to be famished to death. Here was an extremity; who shall now deliver Joseph? The Lord steps in with a ransom in a strange hand. Ishmael persecuted Isaac, yet the seed of Ishmael shall redeem the seed of Isaac. Money shall buy him to the Midianites, and from the Midianites to the Egyptians. Little did they think, that that Joseph whom they left a poor slave to the Midianites, they should find the same a great lord among the Egyptians. God doth ever raise up some secret favourites of his children, among his most malicious enemies. Reuben saves him from the sword, Judah from the pit. How happily bestowed was this little mercy! If Joseph had died for hunger in the pit, Jacob, Judah, and all had died for hunger in Canaan. How near was his soul unto death! how present and marvellous was God's deliverance!

Take one instance more. Moses is born in the time of Pharaoh's bloody decree, that all the male children of the Hebrews should be cast into the river and drowned, Exod. i. 22. His mother, during all her pregnancy, could not but fear a son. She hath him, sees him, and now thinks of his birth and death at once. To consider that the executioner's hand must succeed the midwife's, makes her second throes more grievous than her first. In other mothers, the very sight of a new-born son works a forgetfulness of the former anguish in travail, John xvi. 21. But their remedy is her sorrow; that which mitigates their pains aggravates hers. Still she fearfully looks when some fierce Egyptian should come in, to snatch the infant from her bosom, and cast it into the river. Therefore when she could no longer conceal in her womb, she hides in her house; afraid, lest every cry of the child should guide the executioner to his cradle. But now his age and hiding being a quarter old, the fearful parents adventure the child's life to save their own. In a reed ark she puts him among the bulrushes by the river's brink, Exod. ii. 3; trusting him to the mercy of the waves, wild beasts, and ravenous fowls, and (which was more merciless than all) an Egyptian passenger. Thus exposed, she sets her daughter to watch her son: the mother cannot forbear to love whom she is forbidden to keep. But how shall the poor babe escape; feeble, forlorn, alone sprawling upon the waves? what, but inevitable death? Yes, there is a God that looks upon him, and in this pinch will deliver him. No flood, no beast, no instrument of Pharaoh's cruelty shall touch him. No friend, not his own mother, dares own him; now steps in his Deliverer, and challengeth his tuition, He is mine. He was not safer in the midst of the tents of Israel, a prince guarded with so many thousands, than now. The tyrant's daughter must come forth to bathe, the ark offers itself to her eye, the cry of the infant to her ear, compassion leaps to her heart; his tears and beauty were a prevailing oratory. But is this all? and hath the Lord done? No, Moses must have a nurse; and the girl is ready to fetch his own mother; and who so fit to be a nurse as a mother? She could not keep him before without danger, now she receives him by authority. She would have given all she was worth to save him, and now she hath wages to nurse him. She doth but change the name of mother into nurse, and she hath her son without fear, not without great reward. Here was a deliverance, and that in season; oh how should it fix our confidence in so gracious a Preserver! The wicked say, "God hath forsaken him: persecute and take him; for there is none to deliver him," Psal. lxxi. 11. None; thus they conclude, but we find the contrary. As Apelles, striving to paint a drop of foam falling from a horse's mouth, after long study how to express it, even despairing lets his pencil fall, and that fall did it. What art could not do, chance accomplished. When we see no means how to be delivered, no hope of extrication, or attaining our wished peace, even ready to despair, the Lord knows how to save us.

4. The place was Zoar: wherein consider three circumstances; his journey to Zoar, his safety in Zoar, and Zoar's safety by him. For howsoever Zoar preserved Lot, yet more properly Lot preserved Zoar.

(1.) For his journey: believing the judgment, he desires a place of refuge; God appoints him one, he makes choice of another. Go to the mountain, saith the Lord: Let me flee to Zoar, saith Lot. Some say, this was done in a mystery: the mountain is not safe, but Zoar in the valley; a low and humble life hath more security than high places. (Greg.) The proud, like Capernaum, lift up themselves to heaven, but God shall depress them to hell, Matt. xi. 23. He refused the mountain, because of the craggy rocks, such as are now to be seen in the hills of Engedi. But more properly he preferreth Zoar for the vicinity; it was nearer to him, and he might with more speed and less danger reach it than the mountain. And such was his charitable heart, that although he could not redeem the rest, yet he would entreat for that. Therefore he useth an argument of the smallness; as being less populous, it might be less impious.

Well, Zoar is granted him, but with this double caution, Tarry not in the plain, look not behind thee.

For the former, the very skirts and suburbs of Sodom, yea, the very smell of Sodom, must not cleave to Lot, nor he to it. If we be departed from Babylon, let not a rag or a relic of superstition abide with us. What matters it, whether a man beslain with a great bullet, or with a small shot? The devil says, like Pharaoh, Go out of Egypt, but not far; be within call. But Moses separates Israel from Korah; "Depart from the tents of these wicked men, and touch nothing of theirs," Numb. xvi. 26: we cannot be too far off from such company. It is sorry comfort, to escape in Sodom and perish in the plain: to the terror and conviction of them, that though they openly profess not love to Rome, yet still have an itch of popery upon them. A man cannot be too earnest of heaven; that kingdom is gotten with violence, not with indifference. He that loves little, shall have little; and he may love so little, as to have never a whit. Many fear to be too hot, but are not sensible of their own coldness. We say commonly, Too much heat annoys, but too much cold destroys. Religion, of all tempers, in these days does not complain of heat. Oh that as the advanced sun heats the air, so our hearts were inflamed with zeal and love by that blessed Sun of righteousness and salvation!

For the other, look not behind thee: not because it was dangerous to look into the infected air; but, 1. To note the indignity of the place, not worthy to be looked on by an honest eye. 2. To avoid curiosity, that Lot might not pry too narrowly into God's judgments. 3. For fear the horror of the sight should have astonished him, or wrung out his commiseration. 4. For the better speed, that there might be no stay in his passage; as the apostles were forbidden the interruption of a salute. 5. That his love might be quite lost to Sodom; no more to think of the wealth and pleasure he found in such an ungracious city. 6. Lastly, to make trial of his faith and obedience, as God proved Adam in the prohibited fruit. Small precepts from God are strong bonds: obedience is as well tied and tried, and disobedience as well punished, in a little as in much. Ananias nimmèd a little, he thought the Holy Ghost had no need of it, or could not miss it. But God credits us first with less things, as men prove vessels with water before they trust them with wine.

The same charge was given to his wife, which she obeyed not; in her flight she must needs turn an eye upon Sodom. Perhaps she believed not that it should be burned, or pitied and lamented in her heart that such a populous city should be burned, or curiously desired to see it burning; or so loved the pleasures of her country, that she could not choose but give it a look, and as it were bid it farewell. But for this she was turned into a monument of disobedience, a pillar of salt. The Hebrews say, because she refused to bring salt to the guests the day before: this is their dream. But that opinion had need of salt, to keep it from stinking. Some make it an allegory: They that divert their affections from spiritual to sensual things, become senseless pillars. Nor is it said to be of salt only in respect of the duration, as an everlasting covenant is called, "a covenant of salt," Numb. xviii. 19; for salt hath a preserving property, to keep things from putrifying, decaying, and corrupting. But she was turned into a material salty pillar. Josephus saith it remained in his time; others, that it is to last unto the day of judgment. (Tharg. Hierosolymit.) Not that her soul was thus metamorphosed, but her body. And though she suffered thus temporally in her flesh, yet her spirit might find mercy and peace for ever.

But the use of this monument is to season the faithful. (August.) "Remember Lot's wife," Luke xvii. 32. Now what did it avail her to escape turning into ashes in Sodom, who is turned into a pillar of salt in the plain? One would think it a small fault to look back, yet even this cannot the Lord endure. To sin in a small thing, is no small sin. Being so far out of that cursed city, she might now think herself safe, and no danger in looking behind. But if we provoke the Lord, he can as well meet with us out of Sodom. There is no place safe to sin, none dangerous to obedience: faith, and observance of God's will, shall secure us even in Sodom.

(2.) Thus for his journey to Zoar, now for his safety in it. Being come thither, he might well wonder at the stay of his wife, for in his flight he durst not look back to call her. Returning to seek her, he finds this alteration with wonder and sorrow. Sodom is turned to a heap of sulphur, and she to a heap of salt. This change he little expected; the loss of his wife touched him nearer than the loss of all Sodom. Yet he finds salt instead of flesh, a pillar instead of a wife. He that saved a whole city, could not save his own spouse. Here was a sharp misery clapped on the heels of a sweet mercy. When God delivers us from destruction, he doth not secure us from all affliction. Though we be not condemned with the world, yet we may be chastened in the world, 1 Cor. xi. 32.

Lot saved himself, yet he lost his allies, lost his flocks and herds, lost his gold and riches, lost his habitation, and now for conclusion lost his wife; all bitter crosses. Without some sauce of sorrow, all worldly delights are but like delicate meat to a man that hath lost his taste. Let us give God leave to scourge us, so long as he doth save us. Our deliverance from the fire of hell is cause enough to make us thankful, though the trifles we delight in be taken from us. Shall Lot say, I was rich, I am now undone; and so be dejected with sullen grief? No; but, I was in danger of fire and brimstone, I am now escaped, I will therefore lift up my heart with thankful joy. If God do not answer us in every thing, shall we take pleasure in nothing? Shall we slight all his favours, because in one thing he crosseth us? whereas his least mercy is beyond our best merit. Lord, take away what thou pleasest, for thy glory and my good, so long as thou savest me from the fire of hell, and thy everlasting wrath.

Zoar shall be honoured with Lot's preservation, a little one, the least of all those opulent cities: as Bethlehem, though "little among the thousands of Judah," honoured with the birth of God's Son, Micah v. 2. This little city was safe, when great Sodom was too hot for him. The city which God keeps, Psal. cxxvii. 1, is strong be it never so small: if he forsake it, the thickest walls and hugest turrets are weaker than paper. The Lord promiseth to be "a wall of fire round about" his elect, Zech. ii. 5: no scalade, no undermining shall blow it up; it shall both protect them, and consume their enemies. The good man sleeps more securely in his tent, than the sinner in his barricadoed fortification. All the springs and rivers of the plain, could not quench Sodom's raging fire: one drop of Lot's faith and holiness in Zoar keeps it from kindling. How poor and slender soever our cottage be, let us set our prayers as a guard without, and our faith as a lock within: the sevenfold walls of Babylon were not so strong. This is, more truly than was said of those giants, Deut. i. 28, to have a city walled up to heaven. Let prayer be the key to open the morning, and prayer the bar to shut up the evening. Let us in every place trust upon God's providence, and every place shall be safer to us than was Paradise. Be our faith upright with Lot, and in the last day, when the whole world shall burn with flames as Sodom once did, we shall find a Zoar, the bosom of Jesus Christ.

(3.) Lastly, Lot was not only delivered in Zoar, but Zoar was delivered for Lot. "I will not overthrow this city, for the which thou hast spoken," Gen. xix. 21. As Lot in the danger of fire, so Paul in the danger of water, Acts xxvii. 24; in the rage of both the elements, God doth not only give his their deliverance, but he also gives others for their sakes into the grant. A wicked man hath the feet of a wolf, whatsoever he treads on never prospers after. But a whole family, a whole kingdom, shall fare the better for one Joseph; his very presence procures a common blessing, wheresoever he goes. Zoar might haply be as bad as Sodom, but here was the difference, it had a Lot within, Sodom had none.

But for God's dear children intermingled with the world, it could not stand. The wicked persecute them, for whose sake they are forbore; they owe their lives to those few Lots whom they condemn. Potiphar was angry with that Joseph who made him prosper. The most contemptible man in the people's opinion, is he that procures their peace and toleration. Ahab's sin brought the famine, Elijah's prayer brought rain, yet Ahab tells Elijah, Thou troublest Israel, 1 Kings xviii. 17. Cease, ye malicious sinners, to vex the religious: you are beholden to them for your very breath: if they were taken away, you should be tormented before your time. As Christ himself was the Day-star to enlighten, not the dog-star to burn; and Paul no pestilent fellow to sow sedition, but an instrument of blessedness and salvation; so the elect are good, not malignant stars. Yet still they speed at the world's hands as did their Master before them: Christ healed their diseases, fed their bodies and souls, every way did them good; yet they crucified him; and in killing him they did offer to sink the only ship that might save them. As the sunbeams shining on the earth do not only heat that solid body, but by reflection also warm the region of the air conterminat to it; so the mercy of God lighting on a Christian's heart, not only heats that with inward comfort, but makes it reflect back consolation to others.

The faithful pray for the pardon of men's sins, for grace and favour to their souls, and no good comes without their procurement; yet the world cannot abide them. Let the rich aldermen thank these, that they have leisure to tell their gold; that the worldling builds houses and takes rents; that the city can feast with the ruins of the church, and miss of Belshazzar's sudden sauce; (for I am persuaded, they get enough from the temples to maintain their halls;) even in this they are forbore, because there be Lots among them. What doth a poor man find before them, but reproach and disdain? He that is not rich, with these men is neither wise nor good: only by their wealth they value themselves, and only by their wealth, as camels by their burdens, be they valued.

London, bless thy Lots, and God for them. Thine honour had long since been laid in the dust, thine oppressions become a hissing to all nations, and nothing had been left of thee but a stinking memory, but for these. The subject of thy derision, hath been the means of thy preservation; and those eyes have often been lifted up to heaven for thee in prayer, upon whom thou wouldst never cast an eye of charity. When thou wast sick, they humbled their soul with fasting, and mourned, as one weepeth for his mother, Psal. xxxv. 13, 14: thus do they for thee. But in their adversity thou rejoicest, and tearest them without ceasing, ver. 15: thus dost thou for them. While the lascivious embraceth his harlot, the luxurious his riot, the covetous his money, the malicious his revenge; the fire of judgment would flash in their faces, and the fire of torment swallow up their souls, but for God's elected, their despised, Lots. His mercy increase the number of them, and our love to them, and our endeavour to be like them, that as we are spared for them, we may be crowned with them in the day of Christ.

"Delivered just Lot." I come to consider his thralldom, and the prisoner, described, first, by his grace, a just man. Wherein three points must be examined. 1. What this justice is. 2. In what respects a man may be called just. 3. The exceptions against his justice.

First, what is justice. There is an uncreated justice, which cannot be in man, for he is finite, and this is infinite. "Righteous art thou, O Lord," Psal. cxix. 137: and, "The Lord is righteous in all his ways," Psal. cxlv. 17. A man is one thing, and his righteousness is another; but God and his righteousness is all one: therefore it is as impossible for man to be thus righteous, as it is for him to be God: this is proper to the Deity. Created justice is either legal or evangelical.

Legal righteousness is of three sorts. 1. Perfect, which consists in an absolute completion of the law: this is lost beyond all recovery. But is it not restored by grace? No, for our sanctification is but in part: as a child is a perfect man, in all the parts of a man, but not in the quantity of every part. But Rome saith, the Virgin was righteous, for she sinned not: her life was free from sin actual, her conception from sin original. This is false, for if she were no sinner she needed no Saviour; and she died: now if she had not sinned, in justice she should not have died. 2. Civil, which consists in an outward deportment conformable to the law: when a man professeth religion, to answer the first table; and refrains from public and visible sins, to answer the second. But in this the Pharisees went beyond us, yet they came short of heaven, Matt. v. 20. Too many content themselves with this rotten and heartless righteousness; but if they have no better, they shall get into heaven when the Pharisees come out of hell. 3. Internal, when a man by repentance after sin, and by endeavour after repentance, doth inwardly serve God. That this righteousness, legally considered, should justify us, is with Rome to abuse God's justice, and to encroach upon his mercy. This may justify our faith, it cannot justify us. Our works deserve nothing; it is only in Christ that they are accepted, and only for Christ that they are rewarded.

Evangelical righteousness is that which is revealed in the gospel; and should never have been revealed, if that of the law could have saved us. But it could not; not through its own defect, but our default. This is to be had in Christ only; which, as he is Mediator, consisted in the purity of his nature, which is separate from sin; and in the perfection of his obedience, which is satisfactory for sin. From so pure a nature proceeded so perfect an obedience: no original sin touching his conception, no actual staining his life. There is none perfectly righteous but he, Rom. iii. 10: not one that is, not one that was, not one that is to come; but only he that is, and that was, and that is to come. This in him was active and passive: for us he suffered, what we should have suffered, and suffered not; for us he did, what we should have done, and performed not.

Thus we have found out the righteousness that makes a man just; now let us see how Lot became just, or we are justified by it. This is done by imputation. "He hath made him to be sin for us, who knew no sin; that we might be made the righteousness of God in him," 2 Cor. v. 21. What can be plainer? Christ was a sinner only by the imputation of our sins, we are just only by the imputation of his righteousness. "Christ is the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth," Rom. x. 4. Not an abrogator of the ceremonial, but a fulfiller of the law moral. A fulfiller, for whom? for all them that believe. So Christ by doing, and we by believing, fulfil the law; therefore are righteous. But can one man be wise by another's wisdom? rich, or strong, or valiant, by the wealth, power, or courage of another? We have no right in another's wisdom or valour, but we have a right and propriety in Christ's justice. One man's wisdom cannot be another's, because they are two distinct persons: but Christ and the believer make but one mystical body; so his righteousness is as truly his members', as the wisdom in the head belongs to the whole body. But it is an abomination to the Lord, to justify the wicked, Prov. xvii. 15. Why, then, will he do it himself? No, but he first makes a man just, and then so accounts him. He is indeed said to justify the ungodly, Rom. iv. 5; that is, the man who was ungodly before, but is not so after. Thus was Christ made a sinner by the reputation of our sins, and we made just by the imputation of his righteousness. And as he that knew no sin in himself, undertaking for us, suffered death; so we that had no justice of our own, apprehending his righteousness, shall enjoy everlasting life.

But how is this justice imputed to us? By our faith. "As many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name," John i. 12. There is a receiving: what is that? It is expressly said, believing. Man finding himself naked, by this hand reacheth that glorious robe, which is held out to him. This doth not justify effectively, working an habitual justice in us, nor materially, as though faith itself were our justification; but objectively, as it apprehendeth Christ, and instrumentally, as it instrumentally applieth his righteousness. Neither is it an opinion, which is an uncertainty in the judgment; nor a suspicion, which is an uncertainty in the will; nor a science, for that is only by the demonstration of reason: neither love, nor hope. Love can extend the passions of the heart to the thing loved, yet cannot apprehend Christ: he must be apprehended before he be loved. The office of hope is to wait: it waits for salvation, but properly it apprehends it not. It is first believed, then expected. It is good both to trust and to wait for the salvation of the Lord, Lam. iii. 26. To trust that it will assuredly come, this is the action of faith; to wait until it do come, this is the action of hope. Faith is a taking hand, and love is a giving hand: faith takes hold on Christ, love gives forth tokens of faith to God and man: hope is the eye, that looks out for the good things promised. As faith is the hand of the soul, so love is the hand of faith, and hope is the eye of both. Of faith, love is the hand whereby it worketh, and hope the eye whereby it waiteth. Thus faith worketh by love, waiteth by hope, but believeth by itself. The point of our justification being thus cleared, let me touch at two useful meditations from it: there is in it matter of humiliation, of consolation.

1. It serves to humble us. How foul was our nature, that all the water in the world could not cleanse it! Not the blood of all the creatures, not the righteousness of men or angels, could cure it. All the men and angels in the world cannot make one sinner righteous; but the Son of God must become man, suffer, die, and rise again, and all to make us just. Vain man, whereof art thou proud? Yet how doth a little polluted dust vaunt itself! Clothe a leper in scarlet, is he not still a leper? Suppose in Christ we be embraced, and even honoured of God himself, shall we therefore be high-looking over others? No, here is matter of exultation and gladness, not of insultation and haughtiness: let us be joyful, let us be thankful, let us not be scornful. The natural Son of God was humbled for our pride; shall we be proud still? Shall man be proud, when God himself is humble? He that is not humbled for his sin, is not yet justified from his sin. In his humility Christ wrought that great work of our redemption. Observe with wonder, that God did more for us in his humility, than ever he did in his glory. In his majesty he only made us, but in his humility he hath saved us. Look we first down with humility upon our own wretchedness, and then look up with faith unto Christ's righteousness.

2. We are just before God by no justice of our own, but by Christ's; and this is so much the better for us, as now we are sure it cannot be lost. God created Adam with a perfect legal righteousness: he received it for himself, and for us; and he lost it for himself, and for us. That being gone, he gives us another, a better; but because he saw man so ill a keeper of his own jewels, he would not trust him with it; but sets it in the person of his Son, charging him to keep it for us. We are dead, and our life is hidden with Christ in God, Col. iii. 3. It is hid past Satan's finding, and locked up past our spending. We, as ignorant of the worth, would quickly exhaust it; but Christ truly values it, dearly paid for it, heartily loves it, and therefore will safely preserve it; and when we come to his Father's presence, will clothe us with it then. It is now in a safe hand, where we are sure to find it, and have it, when we most need it. We may sin, and so lose the present sensible comfort of a good conscience; but we cannot lose our righteousness. That is in our own tenure, this is not.

It is impossible for a believer to be poor: take away all he hath, his wealth, health, friends, liberty, life; this is no more than he hath in his own hands, which he may easily lose. His true riches are in another's custody, no power can meddle with them. His treasure is laid up where no thief nor corruption can enter, Matt. vi. 20; he that is trusted with it, will faithfully keep it, 2 Tim. i. 12. Satan may make Job poor for this world, and take that from him, from which God would one day take him. But Job hath a better stock going in heaven, in the hands of his Redeemer; the devil cannot touch this. Other possessions in death we leave behind; this inheritance by death we begin to possess. Cum corpus resolvitur, anima absolvitur. (Ambr.) Let Ziba take all, so I may come to the Son of David in peace, 2 Sam. xix. 30.

Samson had his strength in himself, and betrayed it; Esau his birthright, and sold it; the prodigal his portion, and spent it; Hezekiah his treasure, and exposed it; Solomon his wisdom, and abused it; Mary Magdalene her beauty, and prostituted it; Nabal his wealth, and lived beside it; Adam his integrity, and an apple bought it. Oh what is in man, that he may not lose! The master of a family gives all his hired servants their wages into their own hands, suffers them to use and dispose it at their own pleasures, without further inquiry; but the portions of his children, and their jewels, he keeps himself. Lord, whatever worldly thing thou take from us, keep our righteousness for us: though sin have left tattered and death send us away naked, do thou cover us with the rich garment of Christ.

2. Thus is a man just before God, but Lot was also just before men : and there is a visible justice, as well as the invisible. We must therefore seek out for a further righteousness, an inseparable effect of the former, and that is, holiness of life. The other is the justice of justification, this is the justice of sanctification. As a sinner is justified by Christ's righteousness inherent in Christ himself, so he is sanctified by Christ's righteousness diffused from Christ into the sinner. His justification is perfect, because that which justifies him is still in Christ; his sanctification is imperfect, because that which sanctifies him is in himself: the one imputed to him, the other infused and inherent in him. Therefore here we are to examine, in what respects a man may be called just. Neither are we bound always to the same distinctions: I conceive a man may be approved righteous, preparative, separative, reparative, operative.

(1.) There is a righteousness of preparation, which is a resolution and full purpose of heart to be righteous. "I have sworn, and I will perform it, that I will keep thy righteous judgments," Psal. cxix. 106. Though he do sometimes admit sin, he doth never intend sin. If the Spirit could totally prevail over the flesh, he would never do ought to dishonour God. My heart is ready, my heart is ready; ready to hear thy will, ready to do it. Give what thou commandest, command what thou pleasest. Perfect my purpose with thy gracious performance, and then I shall be righteous. (August.) By this resolution he is bound for Canaan, and thitherward steers his course; notwithstanding the perilous rocks and pirates, and contrary gusts and storms, that would put him out of the way.

(2.) There is a righteousness of separation, because it is seen to decline the places of temptation. So they are called saints, because separate from the world. He is in a manner guilty, that frequents the occasion of being made guilty. A wise senator, whose coachman had driven him over a dangerous passage, which he might easily have avoided by fetching a little compass about, though he escaped without harm, yet turned him off, as unworthy of future trust. What thanks to us, if precipitating ourselves in the known snares of sin, we are kept by God's preventing grace? "He that is begotten of God keepeth himself, and that wicked one toucheth him not," 1 John v. 18. I do not say that God deals with us on such an advantage, as a furious papist answered, when he was asked by one of his own sect, why in the gunpowder treason they would destroy children with bastards, catholics with heretics: If they were found among heretics, let them perish with heretics. Yet often he makes them smart: as the magistrate inflicting severe punishment on a dissolute crew, one cried out to him, Spare thy son. What, my son among the enemies of peace and goodness? No, as thou hast offended with them, thou shalt smart with them. We will trust no antidote, to go into the house where the plague is: if temptation find us, never let us seek temptation.

(3.) There is a righteousness of reparation; which consists in the reforming of errors, and conforming of manners, salving past defects by a bettered life: and is indeed the righteousness of repentance. Righteous, not because there is no sin committed, but because there is no sin that is not repented. God esteems a fault indeed sorrowed, as if it had never been indeed admitted. It is one thing to sin, another thing to be a sinner. Every one that handles a lute is not a musician; nor every one that doth an unrighteous action, is straight an unrighteous person. "The unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God," 1 Cor. vi. 9: to be unjust damns, not to have done some actions unjustly; the habit, not the act, casts into hell.

O blessed effect of repentance, that can make unrighteous manners cease to denominate an unrighteous man! I will show you a riddle. A foul mother brought forth a fair daughter; the mother bred her laughing, yet the daughter is always weeping. The father that begot the daughter, could never abide the mother, nor ever came near her bed. She was no sooner born, but she was the death of her mother, killing her that bred her; and (which is strange) she is blessed for it. She was begotten in a miracle: no sooner conceived, than born; no sooner born, but she spake: other children are born crying, she also speaking; the first air she breathed, heard her articulately declare her own desires. And ever since she works miracles: she brings light out of darkness, life out of death; she makes the blind to see, the deaf to hear, the dumb to speak, and even casts out devils. She looks backward, and moves forward; is herself a dark cloud, yet brings a fair sunshine. This riddle is expounded in repentance. Sin is the mother, repentance the daughter; the mother is foul, black, ugly, the daughter fair and lovely. Sin was merry and wanton, repentance is always sad and sorrowing. God is the Father of repentance, and he could never endure the mother, sin, but rather perfectly hates her society. Being born, she slew her mother: repentance could not have been born but by sin, and repentance is the only thing that kills sin. Sin breeds sorrow, and sorrow kills sin; (August.) and this matricide makes her blessed. Miraculous is her birth: at her first conception by the Holy Ghost, she looks up and speaks, Open, ye gates of heaven, and let mercy come down upon me; her first breath is, Pardon. Miracles she worketh, turning the darkness of error into the light of knowledge, and making the dead heart live unto grace. The blind eyes by her are made to see the filthiness of sin; the deaf ears now hearken to the word of truth; the dumb lips cry out for compassion and forgiveness; the devil's lust is expelled. She still is looking backward to her sins past, and moving forward to holiness and perfection. To conclude, repentance is herself cloudy, and made up of sadness, yet brings everlasting joy.

Such is God's mercy to repentance: yet let no man, though he trust to this, trust to himself. The promise is to repentance, not of repentance. Nature flatters itself in that one instance of the malefactor on the cross, who in an instant got repentance. But the calling and saving of that one soul at the last, hath by Satan's policy been the loss of many thousands.

(4.) There is a righteousness of comparison; so was Lot just comparatively among the Sodomites. It is Christ's incommunicable privilege, to be The Just: for all other men on earth to pray, Enter not into judgment with thy servants, for in thy sight shall no man living be justified. And, Forgive us our trespasses; and to pray for this daily: perpetual remission argues perpetual aspersion. He that says he hath no sin, I am sure he hath no righteousness, 1 John i. 10. But it is said of Zacharias and Elisabeth, that they were both just before the Lord, walking in all his commandments blameless, Luke i. 16. Before God, without hypocrisy: in his commandments, not the traditions of men, without flattery: in all of them, without reservation and partiality: without reproof; sine querela, non sine macula: not scandalous and culpable in the eyes of men, and worthy of crimination. So, he that is born of God, sinneth not, or committeth not sin, 1 John iii. 9: not the sinning sin, not the reigning sin, not the sin unto death, which cannot be repented, therefore must not be pardoned.

Compared with God there is none righteous: he hates all men, that hates ill men. Yet some may be so, respectively to others. Tamar more righteous than Judah, yet Tamar sinful enough. The publican rather justified than the Pharisee, yet not simply and sufficiently justified. The spouse fair among women, yet she justly complains of her blackness. Some men have less and fewer sins, yet they have sins; though fewer in number, and lighter in measure, yet sins in nature. The moon is glorious to a candle, pale to the sun. The lily white to the wool, short of the snow. The swarthy compared with the black-amoor, thinks himself fair.

Not that I would have men pitch themselves by the pole of the dissolute. As because they are not so drunk as Nabal, therefore to think themselves sober; because not so proud as Haman, therefore humble; because not so treacherous as Judas, therefore loyal. Compare not thyself with the worst, to see how far thou art beyond them; but with the best, to see how far thou art short of them. And the thick-eared hear well to the stark deaf. Among the numerous cloisters of illiterate monks, if one rarely get a smack of learning, he thinks himself a brave fellow, famous among his companions. They compare themselves with themselves, and measure themselves by themselves, 2 Cor. x. 12. He that hath but ferried over to Amsterdam, conceits himself a great traveller, among those that never smelt other than their own smoke. How proud is a vain fool of a strange language! apt to think all the rest idiots, that understand not his Spanish or Italian! none so bold as the blind.

Thou that thinkest thyself charitable and just, compare thyself with Zaccheus: after thy fourfold restitution, hast thou given half thy goods to the poor? Thou that holdest thyself zealous in a cold generation, consider David: "The zeal of thy house hath eaten me up," Psal. lxxix. 9. Thou that art humble, meditate on Paul, yielding to them that hated him: that art sober, think of the Rechabites: that chaste, look upon Joseph in his temptation by so great a lady. The pigmies wonder at his stature, whom we esteem a dwarf. Do not look upon the profane, to admire thy own holiness; but on the just, to condemn thy own unrighteousness. Rural people admire and even adore a lady, that never saw the queen. When the Indians first saw the Spaniards, they held them fair and goodly creatures; but bleeding under their cruelties, and beholding other from more cold and temperate climates, of fairer complexions and kinder dispositions, they took these last for angels. We that have prized ourselves by those below us, let us now value ourselves by those above us: then all our pride will turn into shame, and we shall blush for our idle glory. Lord, if they that had their faults be more righteous than we, what are we in respect of thee that hast none? Give us all grace to be more righteous, and when we have done all we can, pardon our great unrighteousness in Jesus Christ.

(5.) There is an operative righteousness; and this may be taken either strictly or largely.

Strictly, it is equity: he that deals truly withal, without respect of persons, is a just man; and he that is not just in his conversing and commercing with men, will hardly be found righteous with God. This is not only to render what the law requires, but even what a rectified conscience requires. As for instance, to bury the dead, this is not an action of charity only, but of equity. Funerals are called just, because they be as just to the dead, as meat is to the living. So to feed the poor: Paul calls alms, righteousness. Withhold not thy good from the owners thereof, Prov. iii. 27. They are the owners of thy superfluities, and it is just to give every man his own. "When thou doest thine alms," Matt. vi. 3; divers copies read, when thou doest thy righteousness: so Eusebius reports it. Alms is thy justice; if not debitum proprietatis, yet charitatis; and he that denieth this, is an unjust man. That ministers do preach, it is justice, even due debt. "I am debtor both to the Greeks," &c. Rom. i. 14. There is a woe to them that withhold the truth in unrighteousness, ver. 18. Yet thus unrighteous is the church of Rome, to withhold the Scriptures, and obtrude traditions; as men put out the clear candle to light themselves to bed with the stinking snuff.

To help forward the truth is but justice: it is the office, albeit also the honour, of good men to be God's fellow helpers. "Curse ye Meroz," Judg. v. 23. Why? because it did hurt the Lord? No, but because it did not help the Lord in the day of battle. This question will one day be asked, When didst thou help the truth? Every man by prayer helps the hand of Moses. He that does not help forward the building of Christ, is unjust; and they that do help it even in the meanest degree, shall have part of the reward: as David would have the prey shared even among them that kept the stuff, 1 Sam. xxx. 24; they helped.

In contracts to fail willingly, is to be unjust. An oath or solemn promise is no sooner made on earth, than registered in heaven. Indeed bad promises are better broken than kept. As David in breaking of his vow concerning Nabal was not unjust; and if Herod had done so for John Baptist he had been more righteous. Yea, a just man will keep his oath with a very thief, a compelled oath about pecuniary matters; but not when a sin or mischief follows. To give every man his due, this is just. A young merchant being to choose him a partner, by his mother's advice, at convenient time gave to one a pomegranate; the receiver cutting it in two, kept the less moiety to himself, and returned the merchant the greater half. He gave the like to another; and he dividing it, gave him back the less part, keeping the greater to himself. He thus tried a third; and he cutting it into equal halves, took the one himself, and gave him the other. This last was determined by his mother to be the fittest man to make his partner. So young Cyrus being showed by his schoolmaster a great man with a little robe, and a little man with a great robe; and having both the garments put into his hands to distribute, he disposed the greater to the greater, and the less to the less. His master replied, this was just in case of decency, but unjust in case of equity; for he was to have given every man his own.

But if this be an argument of justice, Lord, where shall we find a just man? Help, Lord, for the righteous man faileth, Psal. xii. 1: time to cry, Help, Lord. Take cresset light, and search narrowly all about Jerusalem, I had almost said, London, and find one that doth justice, Jer. v. 1: scarce a just man in this whole city. Is to pay tithes to be just? O that just man is a miracle! Ignorant people on all occasions say of their minister, I wonder he does not preach. They esteem it a matter, before it comes, of no labour; and when it comes, of no thanks. Yet, who challengeth his own heart of known unrighteousness, and confesseth, How unjust have I been in defrauding God and his church! Will the Lord be so liberal to give us the best of things, eternal life, that grudgeth him the worst of things, temporal trash? or, that the gospel should save our souls, which it promiseth, when we withhold from it those trifles it requireth? or, that God will not pinch them of spirituals, that pinch him of temporals? Will a man shut a bird fast into a cage, give her no meat, and yet bid her sing? Yet is this too universal an unrighteousness, and thus unjust are we. But let men read and tremble; if any man (notwithstanding these premonitions) will be unjust, let him be unjust still, Rev. xxii. 11. The Lord with his infinite mercy swallow up this unrighteousness, that this infinite unrighteousness swallow not up this city.

Largely: "He that doeth righteousness, is righteous," 1 John iii. 7; the scope of whose life and actions is devoted to goodness, not without infirmity, but without irregularity. The best traveller may stumble in his journey, yet have his eye observant and his foot constant on his way. The interposition of some clouds doth not frustrate the regular motion of the sun. And trees have more life at the root, than at all times appears in the branches. Notwithstanding some transient distempers, the heart may be sound and upright, Psal. cxix. 80. Some gravel will stick on the feet, even when the bath of justification hath washed our souls. We are not perfectly just except by anticipation, assuming the name before we possess the thing. We are now the sons of God: we are, and we are not: we are in hope, we shall be indeed. (August.)

There may be a time when this justice is not so operative, which yet shall not condemn us for unjust. The world is ever taxing the least fault in the best man: every man is born a Cain, envying that good in another which he wants in himself. They blame some ill in the saints, not because they are evil, but because in respect of themselves they are too good. One imaginary cloud in a just man, shall in their censure darken all the stars of his graces. The smallest spot in his face, shall excuse all the sores and ulcers in their bodies. But it is not so with God: he values men, quomodo semper vadunt, non quomodo semel cadunt; respecting vite communem cursum, rather than involuntarium currentis casum. Nor is his saving grace so fickle a thing, to be lost by every weakness. He goes into his garden, to eat the fruits, and gather the flowers, Cant. vi. 2; not like those buzzing dorrs, that fly over all these to a dunghill.

But now if we will be righteous, let us do it, and show our justice by our practice. The title of righteous is often ill bestowed upon men; as the mistaking woman attributed to the blessed Virgin's womb and dugs that happiness which belonged to her faith, Luke xi. 27; or as silly rural people salute a mean gentlewoman in brave clothes, If it like your ladyship; or flattering pamphleteers ascribe to your looser patrons noble and meriting titles. Truth calls him just that is so. God ordained light for the eyes, language for the ears, the air for respiration, but righteousness for all parts. That the mind should think nothing but righteousness, the tongue speak, the hand do, nothing but righteousness. But alas, The desire of the heart is one thing, the desire of the flesh another. (August.) There be reluctant motions in the heart, yet in the heart of my heart I serve the Lord. Bare theory may come near righteousness, only practice apprehends it. To whom is that euge at the great day, but to the doer? Well done, good servant, that is the form. Not the barren and dead habit, but the living and fruitful exercises of justice, shall have happiness. Rightly, a man knows no more than he practises. It is said of Christ that he knew no sin, 2 Cor. v. 21, because he did no sin: in that sense, he knows no good, that doth no good. One said of the Jesuits, that abroad call themselves apostles, The old apostles left earth to earthly men, showed others, and got heaven themselves: we are more beholden to our new ones, they show us heaven and leave it for us to purchase; and in the mean time copen us of earth and worldly possessions. It is as fearfully true of those that point others the way to heaven by a righteous life, and will not move a foot in that path themselves. The saints are all said to have white garments: the robe of justice that is not white, is not right; it must be visible to men, that it may be acceptable to God.

3. I come to the exceptions against Lot's justice: the Scripture notes six great faults in this good man; three principal, and three less principal.

(1.) His contention with Abraham, his uncle, elder and better, Gen. xiii. 7. Before they grew rich, they dwelt lovingly together; poverty confirmed their society. When neither want, nor weary journeys, nor strange countries could part, wealth divides. How poor a good was their opulency, in respect of their company and fraternal love! Many a one is a loser by his gains; and finds that which multiplies his outward estate, to abate his inward. Who will esteem those things good that make us worse? Abraham is the uncle and worthier, Lot the nephew and younger; yet is Abraham first in the deprecation of strife: "I pray thee," &c. ver. 8. But he holds it no disparagement to begin the treaty of peace. He that is the son of Abraham will seek to win by love, not to force by power.

It had been Lot's duty to offer rather than to choose, to yield than contend; yet Abraham offers the choice to Lot: Take the left hand, or the right, ver. 9. From whence, saith one, the custom grew in parting an inheritance, that the elder should divide, the younger choose. (Rupert.) Lot takes it, but mark the event; Lot was crossed in his election, Abraham blessed in his resignation. Never did man in desire of peace yield of his own right, that God suffered to be a loser by it. Lot, as he thought, chose the best ground, the goodly plains of Jordan; but while he respects the goodness of the soil, and not the badness of the people, he smarts for his choice, and is soon carried away captive. Abraham content with the worse, hath a large amends: Lift up thine eyes, look east, west, north, and south; and all the land thou seest, I will give unto thee and to thy seed for ever, ver. 15. Let us not desire to be our own carvers for this world; it is our surest happiness, without ambition or avarice, to rest at God's finding.

(2.) His incredulity, in doubting to be saved in the mountain; as if the promise and direction of God could have failed. He had no charge to dwell in Sodom, he had a charge to flee to the mountain; yet Sodom he affected, the mountain he refused, and was faulty in both. It is no small sin even to doubt, when we have God's command and warrant to serve us.

(3.) His fear to tarry in Zoar, which the Lord had given his word to spare for his sake. But he that was so hasty to choose it, is now again as hasty to leave it. How variable is man, when he fixeth not his submission to God's ordinance! This fugitive inconstancy is by some thus qualified; that the loss of his wife at the entering of Zoar, put him quite out of heart to stay there. And the sight of the same sins in his less city, which so reigned in the greater, gave him cause to suspect it could not be long forborne.

Here were three of his infirmities, inconstancy, incredulity, ambition; to show, that none is so righteous, but in some things offensive. None were more holy under the law than the priests, yet were they bound to offer sacrifice for themselves and their own sins, Heb. ix. 7. None more holy under the gospel than the apostles, yet were they taught to pray, "Forgive us our sins," Luke xi. 4. Merit-usurpers are the worst servants; for how bountiful soever God be to them, they will never acknowledge their Master; all is their due: the most terrible usurers; all God's blessings they think but the interest of their own monies. But the least cloud in a diamond hinders the price; the least infirmity in a saint keeps him from being perfectly righteous. Yet no man puts away his horse, that hath carried him throughout his journey, for thrice tripping by the way. Nor do three parentheses disgrace a good oration. Three drops of poison are dangerous in a little cup of water; let them fall into a running spring, their malignity is soon dispersed to nothing. Wash a spotted robe, and it is clean again. Yet let us strive against all stains. Abraham going to sacrifice, left his two young servitors and the ass behind him. Lot's fear and doubting were like two timorous and cowardly servants; his covetousness like the ass: leave we all these three behind us in our devotion, that we may be welcome to the Lord.

(4.) He offers up his own daughters to the rage of the Sodomites, that he might deliver his guests, Gen. xix. 8; choosing rather to be a bad father than a bad host. This fact hath found divers excuses. 1. It was a less sin to follow than to oppose nature; and of two evils the less is to be chosen. (Ambr.) Answ. This is true in penal evils, not in criminals; in corporeal things, not in spiritual. There is no necessity that should compel a man to sin; he ought rather to die. "Happy is he that condemneth not himself in that thing that he alloweth," Rom. xiv. 22: then he is not blessed that alloweth the thing in act, which he condemns in judgment. 2. Lot did not mean to put off one sin with another, but useth a seeming submission to qualify their rage; he knew his daughters espoused to some great men of the city, and that they durst not attempt their constupration. (Cajetan.) Answ. But this had been to tempt God by a fond presumption, to make such an unruly rabble this offer, in hope it would not be taken. 3. Though a man in himself must not do a less evil for avoidance of a greater; yet to stop another's precipice into some monstrous mischief, and to mollify his mind by insinuation to a less; this they hold tolerable. (Chrysost.) As if men by custom must swear, the oath is better by their head, than by God. He that is shut up in a walled fort, let him escape where the wall is lowest. (Greg.) Answ. This is true, where we are persuaders from evil, not actors of evil ourselves. So if Lot had persuaded them to the young maids of the town, and to forbear the men, it had been more sufferable. But no man is to sin himself, with the hazard of his own soul, for the prevention of another's wickedness. 4. His intent was good to preserve his guests. (Chrysost.) Answ. We must not do evil, that good may come thereof, Rom. iii. 8. Indeed there is a necessity which comes a posteriori: as when a man hath sworn to undo his neighbour, if he break his oath he commits perjury, if he keep his oath he breaks charity. What now? Rather in breaking it offend only God, than in keeping it offend both God and man. But this perplexity is not from the nature of things; it is not necessary to swear falsely, or break charity; but from the nature of man, who cannot revoke what he hath spoken and done. 5. He knew that if his daughters were forced against their wills, they did not sin; and if they sinned not, he sinned not. Answ. If the maidens should consent, Lot was the author of their sin; if they should not consent, Lot was the author of their ravishment. There might have been uncertainty in their consenting, there had been none in his exposing.

His purpose was good, his offer was faulty. If by his allowance the Sodomites had defiled his daughters betrothed to others, it had been his sin. If through violence they had defiled his guests, it had been only their sin.

It is for God to prevent sin with judgment, not for man to prevent a greater sin in possibility, with a less in present act. Thus it cannot be justified, only a little qualified, 1. In respect of the times, wherein knowledge was not so clear. 2. By his charity, he did it to conserve intemperate his guests. 3. By his troubled mind, without any recollection or serious advice. The best minds troubled yield inconsiderate motions, as water violently stirred sends up bubbles. Thus Lot meant well, but God meant better: he preferred the unknown angels before his children, and the Lord preserved them all.

But if this were such an error in Lot, though meant in charity, how horrible is it in those that do it for iniquity! One would think there were no such monsters in nature, yea, monsters against nature. The sea-monsters are not so cruel, as these land-monsters, to their young, Lam. iv. 3. A good father will not sell his child's body a slave to man; shall any sell his child's soul a slave to the devil? Oh that the sun should shine upon that woman, which will prostitute her own daughter! that the body she brought forth with pains to this earth, she should sell for gains unto hell! Let her lose the name of mother, and be held a murderer: there is no woman ever more deserved to be called the devil's dam. Let all her sex be ashamed of her; and even the sinners that reward her, curse her. Parents, admonish your children, dissuade them from sin, pray against their sin, do not teach them to sin. What is said of the child's eye despising the parent, let me say of the parent's tongue tempting the child, let the ravens of the valley pick it out, and the young eagles eat it, Prov. xxx. 17.

(5.) His drunkenness. Lot fled from Sodom, yet he could not flee from sin: he that could not be tainted in the city, is overtaken in the cave. It is not the place that amendeth manners. Some places are more dangerous, none are secure from temptation. It is a popish fancy, that a cloistered life can make a man more holy. If drunkenness crept into Lot's cave, who can excuse their cells and cloisters? Lot sinned in the mountain, Adam in Paradise, the angels in heaven: are nunneries and monasteries safer than these?

Some wholly excuse his drunkenness, because he did not purpose to be drunk. (Chrysost.) But the apostle faulteth all excess, Eph. v. 18: the excess is a sin, whatever be the purpose before, or effect after. Others say for it, that he drank liberally to allay his sorrows, and mitigate his heaviness. (Aquin. Theodoret. August.) Answ. It ill becomes a just man to make use of such a comfort; the remedy was worse than the disease. I deny not, but wine to a man afflicted with so many griefs, hath the allowable use. Give strong drink to the heavy heart, Prov. xxxi. 6. But he that shall think to enable his body by disabling his soul, and to cure his sickness with his sin, runs into the fire to avoid the smoke.

Let there be no pretext found for drunkenness; it made a just Lot prostitute his body to beastly uncleanness. Sodom could not deceive him, but wine did. The fire of wine within him, did more than fire and brimstone without him. (Origen.) Nor in him alone hath it prevailed. Who would think to find Noah, that father of the new world, lying drunken in his tent? or that a little wine should do more than a whole deluge of water? that he who was not perverted by the bad examples of the old world, should now begin a new example of sin to the new world? Lord, what is man, if he be but himself! What living man had more noble proofs of God's mercy and justice; mercy on himself, justice on others? The Lord once said to him in the midst of innumerable apostates, Thee only have I found righteous, Gen. vii. 1. He that was purged when the world was unclean, proves now unclean when the world is purged. The preacher of the former world, and prince of the latter, is the first that renews the sins which he had reprov'd, and for which he saw it condemned.

There is no sin hath so strange an effect; it is worse than sin. Other sins procure shame, but seek to hide it; this displays it. Lot is thus made a fool to his daughters, Noah to his son: it is a common quality in this excess to disclose secrets. Adam had no sooner sinned, but he saw and abhorred his own nakedness, seeking concealment even in bushes. Lot and Noah discover their nakedness, and have not so much rule of themselves as to be ashamed. Drunkenness doth not only make vices, but make them manifest. So would God have it, that our shame might be double by it: both a shame for those imperfections we discover, and of that imperfection which moved us to discover them. One hour's drunkenness filthily discovered what six hundred years' sobriety had modestly concealed. He that gives himself to wine, is not his own man. How horrible is that vice, which shall rob a man of himself, and lay a beast in his room! He that resists that one sin, escapes many; as he that kills the pregnant dam, is sure to destroy all the brood.

Drunkenness commands all: the senses command the members, the affections command the senses, the heart commands the affections, the head commands the heart, and wine commands the head. As Themistocles' boy said, I rule my mother, my mother rules my father, and my father rules the whole senate. Wine is aspiring, and will get up to the crown, and then humbles the crown to the feet. If it once take the scone, as Joab said of Rabbah, all the rest will follow.

(6.) His incest. Rather than Satan will leave Lot untampt out of Sodom, his own daughters shall prove Sodomites. They that should have been his comforters to succour him, became baits to betray him. So little are they moved with that grievous judgment, the turning of Sodom to ashes, of their mother to a pillar, both in their eye; that they dare think of lying with their own father. Yea, and one of them afterward impudently calls that son Moab, My father's son by me.

Some have excused their fact, that they did it to preserve seed; not out of intemperancy, but love of their name and posterity; not for lust, but procreation. Ans. The end was commendable; but the means, by incest with their father, culpable: better for them never to have been mother, than to be so by their father. Yet their intent shall judge many: they affected commixion for fruit; divers make that their last and least end; lust of delectation is stronger with them than desire of propagation. It seems, they sinned directly against their own consciences; because they did first intoxicate their father, to put him from his rectified memory. They thought he would not consent to them, unless he first did forget himself; that while Lot was sober he would not be unchaste. Drunkenness is the key that opens the door to all bestial affections and actions. Wine knows no difference, or of persons or sins. Their fact was more heinous than their father's; his only drunkenness, theirs to make him so, and then to commit incest with him.

For his incest, he knew it not: he perceived not when they lay down, nor when they rose up, Gen. xix. 33. It is no incredible thing; not that it was done by nocturnal pollution, without the act of generation; as Tostatus out of Thomas. Now those sins condemn us, which we do knowingly. The use of his reason was hindered by drink; for if he had remembered himself upon his awaking, he would never have done it the second time. Some say, the progressive faculty may be exercised in sleep, as some walk in their sleep and transport things from place to place. Certainly, the devil was not absent in such a foul business, working fancies in his head. But in a word, his unchastity was the punishment of his ebriety. (Calv.)

Thus came his uncleanness from his drunkenness, but what is to be said for his drunkenness? Once and a second time he admitted it. Noah was drunk but once: one act cannot make a good heart unrighteous, as a trade of sin cannot stand with regeneration. So dangerous is it to give way to Satan's temptations; where he is once entertained, the next time he is confident. He that hath taken one sore fall, is the worse for it long after. I know it is true in some, Once to have stumbled, is always to be admonished; but this is above nature, a happiness only beholden to Divine grace.

These are the exceptions against Lot's justice, who (for all these) hath a testimony from the mouth of the Holy Ghost, that he was a just man. Now whom God calls just, let no man call unrighteous. Such is the difference, not of sins, but of men. He that sees Lot and Judah pardoned for incest, while Zimri suffers for fornication, must confess, that God doth not so weigh the faults as the persons. It is a foolish proverb of man's partial indulgence, That one man may better steal a horse than another look on. But the Lord is justice, and hates all sin whatsoever, in all persons whatsoever; yet will he pardon their great sin, that are members of his good Son, and severely punish the least fault in them for whom he suffered not. He regards not so much what as who: remission goes not by the measure of the sin, but by the quality of the sinner, yea, rather the mercy of the forgiver. Not the man that hath done no sin, but whom the Lord will not charge with sin, he is blessed, Psal. xxxii. 1. From all that hath been said, I will draw certain useful conclusions.

1. Even a just Lot is suffered to fall: he that was a gracious saint on earth, and is now a glorious saint in heaven, had his aspersions. When God upholds us, no temptation can move us; if he let go his manutenency, none is too weak for us. Which of God's dear children have not once done that thing, whereof they have afterward been ashamed? This the Lord suffers for divers reasons. 1. To humble us: if such excellent men have trod awry, how should we take heed to our ways! Shall such giants stumble, and we lame cripples be secure? 2. To keep us from despair: the Scripture tells us of their infirmities, that in their pardon we may read God's mercies. Let their falling humble us, and their rising again comfort us. If we had not such patterns, how could we but despair at the sight of our sins? But he will hope well of his wound, that hath so good experience of his Physician. 3. To magnify his own infinite goodness, that can to good turn our evil: he lets us fall, knowing how to make as good use of our sin as of our obedience.

Lot might be ashamed of his incestuous seed, and wish to have come from Sodom alone. Yet was this unnatural bed blessed with increase. Divers good women have failed of this fruit by the lawful rights of marriage, as Sarah, Rebekah, Rachel, Elisabeth; all hardly conceived. Some with one unlawful copulation have become pregnant; as Tamar by Judah, Bathsheba by David, Lot's daughters by their own father. Not that God favours forbidden conjunctions; but in his justice to bring such secret sin to open shame; in the elect for their conversion, in the reprobate for their further confusion.

Moab is derived from this incest, one that might call his father, grandfather, and his mother, sister. One father begot both the mother and her child, and one man is both the brother and son of the same woman. Yet from this line came one of our Saviour's worthy ancestors: of Moab came Ruth, married to Boaz, the father of Jesse, the father of David, the progenitor of Jesus Christ according to the flesh. God's election is not tied to our means: we may beget children, we can neither traduce blessings nor curses to them. Holy parents from a chaste bed have sometimes bred a monstrous and impious generation. And the Lord sometimes raiseth a holy seed from the drunken bed of fornication. Whatsoever we do, God will be chooser; and serve himself, not according to our act, but his own purpose. Weighty ears of corn have sometimes grown out of the compass of the tilled field; and sweet flowers been found out of the enclosed garden, even in the wild forest. Thus will God keep his own liberty of election, by his grace, not our works; and let us know, that we are not born but made good.

2. Notwithstanding these infirmities, still Lot is a just man: some particular acts may be too light in the balance, without extinguishing his title before the Lord. A man is sanctified in four respects. 1. In the not imputation of his sins: and that which is not imputed, is as it were not committed. 2. In inchoation of holiness, begun in this life, perfected hereafter. 3. In acceptation: God seeth none iniquity in Jacob, he seeth no transgression in Israel, Numb. xxiii. 21: there is sin in us, but God will not see it. 4. In comparison: so they shine like stars in a dark night. Lot's offences were some blemish to his sanctification in earth, they could not nullify his justification in heaven: blemish his virtue they may, not frustrate his grace. For if still as the elect sin, they should lose their grace, and cease to be righteous, God's election were as mutable as our condition. The frantic in his mad fits doth not exercise reason, yet he hath it; he loseth the use, not the habit. In a swoon the soul doth not exercise her functions; a man neither hears, nor sees, nor feels; yet she is still in the body. A suspended priest cannot be put from his right in the church, for he hath his ministry, though forbidden to exercise it. The outlaw is still a subject, albeit debarred of some privileges. The son angers his father, he doth not straight disinherit him. Though the vessel reel, yet, Fear not, thou carriest Cæsar, said that emperor to the quaking mariner. We are weak of ourselves, but Christ is in us.

Lot fell six times in many days, the just man falls seven times in one day: yet he is still just in his Saviour's righteousness. This concludes our comfort: he that bade Peter forgive his repenting brother seven times, will forgive our repentant souls seven thousand times: he scorns that any Peter, saint, or angel, should outgo him in showing mercy. In ourselves we are sinners, in Christ righteous. When the philosopher in his own mean clothes could not be admitted into the court on a solemn day, he went and borrowed rich and gorgeous apparel; he was then let in with ease and respect. Being in the presence, he was continually kissing his robe: the king noting it, wondered, and asked the cause: he answers, I honour that which honoured me. My virtue could procure me no entrance, my garment did. We are too base, ragged, beggarly of ourselves, to be let into that glorious court of heaven: by faith put we on the Prince's embroidered garment, Christ's righteousness; then shall we be admitted. Let us admire and honour that which honours us: what all our righteousness could never do, that his robe doth for us.

Now "if the righteous scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly and sinner appear?" 1 Pet. iv. 18. Righteous, that is happy; but scarcely saved, that is hard; yet shall be saved, that is happy again. Let no believer fear, for he is righteous; let none presume, for he shall scarcely be saved; yet, let none despair, for he shall be saved. For all thy sin, yet thou (being faithful in Christ) art righteous; for all thy righteousness, thou shalt scarcely be saved; for all that difficulty, yet thou shalt be saved. Thus like those on the seas, they mount up to heaven, and down to the deep, and up again, Psal. cvii. 26; or like the heave-offering, that was heaved up, and down, and up again; or as Christ, the antitype of it, was heaved up to the cross, down to the grave, and up again unto glory: so we are justified by Christ, this lifts us up to grace; we commit many sins, this humbles us with shame; yet we love righteousness, and endeavour to perfection, this shall advance us to everlasting glory.

3. Just Lot was delivered, neither for his justice, nor without it. Not for his own righteousness, but for God's mercy: I will deliver him, because I have a favour unto him. Nor doth the apostle mean, that Lot was delivered for his own sake; nor the prophet, that he was delivered for Abraham's sake, when he saith, "God remembered Abraham, and sent Lot out," Gen. xix. 29. He should have been saved, though he had not been akin to Abraham. Yet is this repeated to testify God's love to Abraham, and his gracious answer to the prayers of the sons of Abraham, which shall prevail with him. But indeed, God remembered Abraham, not so much because he prayed, but because himself had promised: the deliverance depended not upon any merit in uncle or nephew, but on the Divine goodness.

The pontificians say, there be two things in a good work; the meritorious part, to get heaven; the satisfactory part, to escape hell. It cannot do the latter, for the unprofitableness of it, being no more than we are bound to do. It cannot do the former, for the insufficiency of it, being not so much as we are bound to do. If God judge by the law moral, no work is good; but if by the law evangelical, joined with the remission of sins, many works are good. Some have affirmed that all our works are evil; as if truth and lying, covetousness and liberality, hatred and charity, were all one. God never taught that doctrine. Indeed our best actions have their blemishes and imperfections. The Egyptian midwives saved the Hebrew children by a lie; yet it is said, God prospered them, and made them houses, Exod. i. 20, 21. He rewarded not their lie, but their piety; he so regarded their mercy, that he regarded not their infirmity. Prosperity belongs to their goodness, pardon to their dissimulation. The Lord forgave the obliquity, and blessed the honesty of the work. There be three circumstances in every work, which St. Bernard would have us look unto; the lawfulness, expedience, decency: the main is the lawfulness. But man is so lame, that though he keeps the right way, yet he halts. Without our righteousness we cannot be saved, yet for our righteousness we are not saved, but for his that came to save us.

4. The just saints are to be followed but in their justice and sanctity. Too many encourage themselves on their falls. Lot was incestuous and drunken, yet he is called just; why for such sins am I held unrighteous? Am I better than he? Better? no, would thou wert half so good. 1. He sinned and condemned himself; thou sinnest and defendest thyself. Thou likest that in him which he disliked in himself. 2. They sinned and repented; thou showest thy sin, but no sign of repentance. Their weakness is seen in our hands, but their tears are not seen in our eyes. 3. Evil was never made to be imitated, but goodness. Lot's faith and obedience is not such a sinner's object, but his incest and drunkenness: as if Jacob's modest look, liberal hand, truth-speaking tongue, devout knee, and humble heart, were not worth noting; but only his lameness and halting. He marks none of their graces, but their scars. 4. Their falls serve to raise us up when we are down, not to cast us down when we are up; for our consolation afterward, not for our presumption before. To think of their errors should humble us with fear, not hearten us with encouragement to evil. It is said of the wicked, They fear where no fear is, Psal. liii. 5: here it may be said, where fear is they fear not. These examples are a solace to the penitent, not a refuge to the presumptuous. To say, Why should not I find mercy with David? this is the voice of faith: to say, Why should not I venture to sin with David? this is the voice of folly. 5. Thy sin is greater by this bold imitation: a lie ventured on by the example of a saint's frailty, is of a more malicious nature in thee, than it was in him. Any transgression thus derived, is the argument of a more ungracious soul than that it seeks to imitate. What he hopes shall excuse him, doth more properly condemn him, because he had that warning before him. 6. Thy repentance is doubtfuller. He that tempted them to sin tempts also thee; that is Satan: but he that gave them repentance, is not bound to give it thee; that is God. Thou makest thy fall certain, thy rising again is uncertain. Such a man hath been dangerously sick, and escaped; his physician was skilful and diligent, his medicine proper and effectual. Wilt thou make thyself sick, on purpose to try the skill of the one and virtue of the other? 7. For them, there was a cure behind, the sacrifice of the Lamb not then slain; but now if men wilfully frustrate the price of that redemption, Christ died no more: his next coming shall not be in the humility of a sufferer, but in the glory of his Father; not to redeem, but judge the world. 8. All Scripture is for instruction, all is not for imitation: a light to my feet, showing me the blocks whereat they stumbled, that I might keep myself upright. It is so done and written. For our imitation? No, that were an argument of too much violence, to draw on sin with the cart-ropes of examples; to take some stones from the temple, that with them we might beat down the rest; and to spoil ourselves by the ruins of God's saints.

This is fit to be urged against those that flesh themselves by the sins of God's children. Will any infer, What matter is it what manner of men we are, when Paul, a blasphemer, a persecutor, an oppressor, was received to mercy? 1 Tim. i. 13; when Saul, coming a wolf against the lambs, is made Paul, a shepherd for the lambs? This is true in him, but he did it ignorantly; thou having his example doest it maliciously; and God will not be merciful to them that offend him of set purpose. He that deliberately resolves to sin, doth what he can to make himself incapable of forgiveness. Indeed it is true, that there is none good, but he was once bad. Peter by experience of his own frailty, might learn with his keys to open heaven unto others. But though God forget our sins in his patience, let not us forget them in our penitence. God pardoned in Lot what was bad, and accepted what was good: let us follow his virtues, that we be never condemned for his sins.

5. If we will be delivered let us be just. But doth God deliver none but the righteous? Yes, sometimes also the wicked, and that for divers reasons. 1. That they might be brought to repentance; for that is the scope and purpose of the goodness and patience of God, Rom. ii. 4. But man is so given to pride, that if he speed well he thinks he deserves well; and so instead of humble thankfulness swells with proud arrogance. 2. For some progeny to come from them. For good Hezekiah to be born, his wicked father Ahaz is forborne. Why doth Amon draw out two years' breath in idolatry, but that good Josiah was to be fitted for a king? When I came into the sanctuary of God, then understood I the ends of these men, Psal. lxxiii. 17. There we find that many sacrilegious, extortioners, idolaters, are delivered, because God hath some good fruit to come from their cursed loins. 3. To fill up the measure of their sins: they have already done so much, that they are suffered to do more: so sin is punished with sin, as drunkenness with thirst. 4. To magnify the Lord's patience, in giving them time and means of penitence; that as they make his labour without success, they might be left without excuse. Thus was Ham delivered from that universal deluge, yet after he comes to deride his own father: twice had Noah given him life, yet he abuseth both his father and preserver. Even God's ark may nourish monsters: on the seats of the temple may sit contemnors of their spiritual fathers, as often filthy toads lie under the consecrated stones. Was this God's favour to preserve him to judgment? He had better have perished in the waters, than live under his father's curse. It is not simply our deliverance, but our thankfulness for it, and obedience after it, that gives sufficient argument to our consciences, we are in the favour of God.

6. Never did man serve God for nothing: if Lot be just, he shall now find the benefit of it, he is delivered. It is the speech of atheism and apostacy, "It is vain to serve God: and what profit is it that we have kept his ordinance?" Mal. iii. 14. Most false, from God, he highly scorns to owe a man any thing. Cyrus in the conquest of Lacedemonia, encouraged his soldiers, that the footman should have a horseman's place, the horseman a chariot, the lieutenant should be made a captain, the captain a colonel, and he that was president over a city, should be made a viceroy over a whole country. Whereas Christ, say they, for his soldiers, speaks of nothing but taking a cross, and bearing a yoke; of persecution abroad, and affliction at home. Here is not labour rewarded with honour, but honour diminished by labour: it was better with us before, we had more prosperity with less piety. They are miserably deceived; there is no honour like to his service, the fear of God rewards itself. I have laboured in vain, and spent my strength for nought; the earth is barren: but my work is with the Lord, and my reward with my God, Isa. xlix. 4; heaven is fruitful, there shall be a blessed harvest of recompence.

Then spake they that feared the Lord, and a book of remembrance was written, &c. Mal. iii. 16. They met together to serve God; for this purpose was their coming, and about this business was their communing. What followed? A book of remembrance was written for them: not one good work of theirs, but is there registered: the great Master of the Rolls records them, and rewards them; here in a heaven of peace, there in the peace of heaven. "And they shall be mine, saith the Lord:" when I shall say to the wicked, Depart from me, then I will acknowledge them for mine. "When I make up my jewels," setting all the trash and refuse on fire: I will gather up them into mine own treasury, as a man locks up his precious jewels in his cabinet. "And I will spare them, as a man spareth" (not every son, but) "his own son that serveth him," ver. 17.

This was the convinced devil's acknowledgment; "Doth Job fear God for nought?" Job i. 9: and Saul's insinuation to the Benjamites, disheartening their adherence to David; "Will the son of Jesse give you fields and vineyards, and make you captains of thousands, and captains of hundreds?" 1 Sam. xxii. 7. Reward is the encouragement of service. This was the ground and colour of the angry son's exception; "These many years do I serve thee, neither transgressed I at any time thy commandment; and yet thou never gavest me a kid, that I might make merry with my friends," Luke xv. 29. An unjust expostulation of a son to a father, and such a father as had given him the inheritance. "Ye know that your labour is not in vain in the Lord," 1 Cor. xv. 58. Labour: idleness shall do you no good, but labour. Your labour: the pains of another shall not profit you, but your own labour. Is not in vain: not like the blackamoor's washing, a labour in vain; but if it miss your end, it reacheth God's: we see not the success, yet it prospers. In the Lord: it may be in vain in the world, and men never requite it; but in the Lord it shall find recompence. Our labours end with our lives, but our rewards end not with our labours. This we know: divinity consists of certain grounds and infallible principles, a sure foundation, a knowledge. The physician, be his medicine never so proper, knows not whether he shall recover his patient. Plead the lawyer never so learnedly, he knows not whether he shall regain his client's right. The soldier may fight valiantly, yet is not sure of the victory. But divinity is a knowledge, making us know that our pious endeavours shall be rewarded.

7. The Lord first makes us just, and then saves us; as he first sanctified Lot, and then delivered him. So that our justice is not justice in proper and distinct terms, but mercy. "Ye are washed." What, have you washed yourselves? No, "ye are washed, ye are sanctified, ye are justified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God," 1 Cor. vi. 11. So Christ is "made unto us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption," 1 Cor. i. 30. Wisdom in the instruction of our souls, righteousness in the forgiveness of our sins, sanctification in the holiness of our lives, and redemption in the deliverance from all our enemies. We are none of these in ourselves; that he who rejoiceth, might rejoice in the Lord. Trust not your arms of flesh, nor your hearts of ashes, nor your purest spirits while they are housed in corrupted walls. If you have stood a time, trust not your legs, you may slide; if you have slipped and recovered, trust not your recovery, you may fall again. Trust not your strength, it is infirmity; trust not your wisdom, it is folly; trust not your holiness, it is blended with iniquity: prophets have fallen, patriarchs have fallen, apostles have fallen, stars have fallen, angels have fallen: but trust the mercy of God, which is of infinite perfection; and the merits of Christ, which are of perfect satisfaction. "I, even I, am he that blotteth out thy transgressions for mine own sake," Isa. xliii. 25. It is not Abraham, nor Moses, nor the virgin Mary, nor the virgin martyr, nor Peter at Rome, nor Paul at Jerusalem, that can do this cure: hear the Physician; It is I, saith the Lord. Not with the preparation of our own nature, nor with the co-operation of our own justice, nor disposition and liberty of our own will: hear him once again; It is I, even I, and for mine own sake, and Son's sake, that forgiveth your sins.

To conclude with application. God hath given us a gracious deliverance, which we may parallel with Lot's. We have been saved from the fire; such a conflagration as knows no comparison, but Sodom or hell. With a match it should have been done; without all match, if it had been done. Some differences there are: that fire was in a just severity, this in an unjust treachery. Sodom's fire came down from heaven, this gunpowder fire was fetched up from hell. That was inflicted by the ministers of God, angels; this was devised by the ministers of Satan, traitors. That was prepared for the nocent, this for the innocent. That was fire and brimstone, this fire and gunpowder; of a more sudden and despatching violence; not reserving a pause for a, Lord, have mercy on us. We were "a firebrand plucked out of the burning," Amos iv. 11. The Lord did not only deliver us from the burning, but he also kept the fire from kindling. He sent Lot out of Sodom, to save him; he prevented Sodom in England, to save us: he did not remove us from it, but he removed it from us.

He that sent that fire downward, kept this fire from mounting upward. He delivered Lot by visible angels, and angels were not wanting, though invisible, when he delivered us. He remembered Abraham, and sent out Lot; when he freed us from the fire, he remembered the Son of Abraham according to temporal birth, and his own Son by eternal generation, Jesus Christ. He did reveal to Abraham this purposed destruction of Sodom; he did not conceal from our gracious sovereign the notice of this intended destruction of his kingdom. Lot was sent out by break of day, and we delivered by four o'clock in the morning; that very morning: there wanted but a little work of the morning, and then sufficient to the day, to the year, to all ages of the world, had the malice of that morning been; more accursed than ever was read in the calendar of any time. The incendiary, a Faux, a firebrand indeed, kept his vigils, but the Lord prevented his jubilee. There was a hell-brand ready with his match, to make a general bonfire, both of mortal men and immortal trophies and charters; to make a whole burnt-offering of us all, and to pass us through the fire to that Moloch of Rome. Temples, sepulchres, monuments of age and honour, should have been tossed into the air, then into the water, after they had been first spoiled by fire. Our river had been turned into a river of blood, and her carriages, instead of commodities, into dead corpses and discerpted limbs; her crystal streams dyed into rubies. Thus they meant us like Sodom, but God delivered us like Lot. The danger was imminent and furious, their rage violent and monstrous, our deliverance strange and glorious; let our commemoration and thanks be solemn and generous, heroic and perpetual for ever. Amen.

"Vexed with the filthy conversation of the wicked." The next point is his place, which was sinful, flagitious, stigmatical Sodom. It was worse than a gaol to his just soul: and report lies, if our common gaols be not like to Sodom, the very dens of mischief, the schools of wickedness. Thus God's ordinance for reformation, is made a means of further transgression; and the place built for discipline, breeds and feeds villany. A malefactor learns more pestilent untowardness when he comes there, than ever he knew before. Oh that the magistrate would look to this; that drunkenness and blasphemy might not usurp the place of mortification and humility!

But why would Lot stay in such a wicked city?

Not as a neighbour affected with their customs, but as a physician to cure their diseases. (Chrysost.) But he that looked for a paradise, found a hell; and the cup of his prosperity was spiced with the bitter fruits of a cursed society. It was indeed a good land, but a bad people; as it was once said of Ireland, Nothing bad there but the people. Christ would not suffer his weak disciple to go bury his father, Matt. viii. 22, lest he should be perverted by some carnal friends at the funeral. I am life, tarry and live with me; let the dead alone, lest thou die with them. How often doth God part his children from the wicked, by making them smart with the wicked! As Augustine speaks of the religious taken among the rest by the Goths: Jure amaram vitam sentiunt, quia peccantibus amari esse noluerunt. "Woe is me that I sojourn in Mesech, that I dwell in the tents of Kedar!" Psal. cxx. 5.

To live among the good is a great happiness, a little image of heaven, a model and abridgement of the communion of saints. Where one doth love another and all love God; one is at peace with another, and all at peace with their own conscience; one doth honour another, and all honour their Maker. When the inhabitants of a parish shine in the day, like a firmament of bright stars in the night, not one malevolent aspect among them. Like a quire of tunable voices, every one keeping time and his own part, and in a sweet harmony, all singing the praises of the Lord. But oh where shall we find such a neighbourhood? how much ground shall we leave behind us, ere we arrive at this society! The prophet once cried, O ye heavens, drop down righteousness, Isa. xlv. 8; as if the earth had quite lost it, being taken up above the clouds. We may now cry and complain for want of this neighbourhood: O ye heavens, drop down kindness and charity into our times. O love that art alumna cæli, sis medicina soli, come down and help us.

Imagine, with the fable, a city consisting of select men, all peaceable, tractable, charitable, humble; the magistrate clemently ruling, the people meekly obeying. The enemy knows it invincible, while thus governed; therefore craftily resolves to shuffle in among them a pair of false brothers, a liar, and a thief. But because in their own forms they would soon be discovered and abhorred, he puts them in two disguises, the liar like a lawyer, the thief like a usurer. Their wealth procures them room and respect, they fall to work. The liar, with his forged weapons, whispers to the magistrate how the people stomach him; to the people, how the magistrate tyrannizeth over them; to private persons, what hard language is given them, what wrong is done them, what right is kept from them, and that the law is ordained to render every man his own. First, there is heart-burning, then brawling, then contesting at law: and now instead of peace and humility, there is pride and enmity. The usurer, he so robs them by a legal theft, that they become at once sensible of want and injury; covetousness gets into the heart, oppression fills the hand. Now farewell charity, every man for himself, none for God, and God for none. Consider yourselves, and wish this were but a parable: punish the devil's instruments; hang up thievery, cut out the tongue of lying, and so be shut of them: this were a fair riddance of them both, as the proverb hath it, without a session. There was a mathematician in Constantinople, that in anger thus vexed his neighbour. He did set in his cellar great caldrons of boiling water, with heat multiplying the motions of the vapours; and then turning them all into narrow pipes, gave them vent under his neighbour's floor; which made such an earthquake, that it shook all his house. Then with fire-glasses and barrels he so thundered and lightened, that he forced him to forsake his dwelling. (Agath.) The vapours of secret slanders, the earthquakes of open contentions, the thunders of blasphemy, the flashes of burning malice, do so afflict us, that we cry, Our soul is among lions; sons of men whose teeth are spears, arrows, and sharp swords, Psal. lvii. 4.

But still what doth Lot in Sodom, a saint among sinners? Fishes may be fresh in salt waters; live in the sea, and not partake the brinish quality: it is not so with man; rather, some evil for neighbourhood's sake. Pure streams passing by a corrupt soil, contract some of the putrefaction; and springs running through the veins of the earth, savour of the mineral which they last saluted. They "were mingled among the heathen." What followed? They "learned their works," Psal. cvi. 35. No wonder: can a man be clean among lepers? or take fire in his bosom, and not be burned? We certify ourselves of men's behaviour, as the Lacedæmonians inquired the carriage of their children: Of what sort are their companions? as they, Of what condition are their play-fellows? The mischiefs of Sodom and Babylon should forewarn our departure; as the swallows would not come near Thebes, because the walls had been so often besieged. The smitten deer is presently forsaken of all his fellows. A great tree never falls alone, but also spoils the underwood, which otherwise would have thrived well enough. The reason why the raven returned not unto the ark, is given by some, because she met with dead carcasses. The world's carrion keeps many from their faithful adherence to the church. Any thing taken from its proper place loseth its virtue: a coal of fire kept in the chimney, lives; separate it from the hearth, leave it alone in the air, it presently dies. What philosophy said of good, experience justifies of evil: evil is diffusive and spreading of itself; indeed more catching than goodness. Ask the priest, If a man carry holy flesh in the skirt of his garment, and touch other things with that skirt, shall they be holy? No, saith the priest. If one that is unclean by a dead body touch any thing, shall it not be unclean? Yes, it shall be unclean, saith the priest, Hag. ii. 11—13. Sooner are the good corrupted by the bad, than the bad are bettered by the good. Why are we taught continually to pray, Deliver us from evil, but that it hath a dangerous power to make us evil? Yea, Lord, free us from Sodom, separate us from sin, alienate us from the wicked; "Deliver us from evil; for thine is the kingdom, the power, and the glory, for ever. Amen."

"Vexed with the filthy conversation of the wicked." The matter of his vexing was their sin; the evil of the place came from the persons, who were fully, foully, filthily, palpably wicked. Not by way of infirmity, or in any mean degree, but wicked, in the extent of sin. Not seldom, or by fits, but always; their conversation was wicked. Not secretly and in corners, but notoriously in the public view; their visible life was wholly wicked. And for specification, if any sin were predominant above the rest, it was filthiness, Sodom's filthiness, a bestiality, yea worse. For it is not so bad to be a beast, as to live like a beast; a sin abhorred by nature itself. Therefore to put some method into this further discourse of their wickedness, three circumstances appear in the description. 1. The impudence of it, being notorious and open, Lot's eyesore. 2. The continuance of it, during their whole life; not an act or two, but their conversation. 3. The turpitude of it, being so obscene and nasty ; a filthy conversation. Thus we have the forehead, the heel, and the composition of the whole body.

1. The impudence : it was manifest wickedness, their faces did not blush at it. "The show of their countenance doth witness against them ; and they declare their sin as Sodom, they hide it not," Isa. iii. 9. It is true, that nocturnal pollutions shall have public plagues ; but they that dare sin God in the face, shall bear a heavier weight of his vengeance. The harlot doth bad enough, that wipes her lips, (as if the print of her sin could be seen there,) and it was not she : though she commit it, she will conceal it. But Absalom worse, that spreads his incestuous pallet on the roof, and calls the sun a blushing witness to his filthiness. "Pride compasseth them about as a chain," Psal. lxxiii. 6 : they wear their wickedness in pomp, as if they meant it should grace them. They "glory in their shame," Phil. iii. 19 : such as boast their quantities of drink, and varieties of uncleanness, (it is all one,) how far into their hearts they have admitted the devil !

Such are called "dogs," Rev. xxii. 15 ; not only because they are as fawning as dogs, flattering their feeders ; or as ravenous as dogs, insatiately devouring ; or as malicious as dogs, barking out scandals at their lives that shine with goodness : but as unclean as dogs, and as shameless as dogs ; noisome with impudence, and impudent with noisomeness ; their place is "without." "The wicked boasteth his heart's desire," Psal. x. 3 : he doth not covet it, nor excuse it, but boast it ; nor shift it to another, but makes it appear his own heart's desire. Mala admittunt, admissa jactant, jactata defendunt. Majoris est culpæ manifeste quam occulte peccare : ille dupliciter reus, quia et agit et docet. (Isidor. de Sum. Bon. cap. 20.) The popish rule is safer, Cautè si non caste : but these, vitia tam minime abscondunt, ut non abscondant. They prostitute their souls, as the Romans did the bankrupts' houses, with, Who gives most ? If their hand hath been the organ of unrighteousness, their mouth shall be the trumpet to proclaim it.

There is more modesty in them that seek concealment : if there be any bush in Paradise, any tempter to be named by Adam ; A woman of thy giving, Eve ; whereas it was a woman of his own seeking, concupiscence. Gehazi hath a lying cover, Saul a pretending colour ; here is something to be alleged for mitigation. But to sin without shame, yea, to out-sin all shame, to publish the tenor of villany in print : this is Sodom's state. Uncleanness was not confined to the chamber, nor thievery to the night, nor corruption blanched and skinned over with hypocrisy ; but borne aloft, justified by protection, and crowned with garlands of honour and approbation. This sin abandons secrecy, scorns reproof ; admonition to it were but like goads to them that are mad already, or a pouring of oil down the chimney.

It is said of Tamar, that Judah took her for a harlot by her dressing, Gen. xxxviii. 15. She takes upon her the habit of a harlot, because she means to be one ; her attire declares her purpose. If she had not wished to seem a harlot, she would have avoided such a place and veil. The external monuments of immodesty bewray a carnal heart : they that mean well, will never wish to seem ill. Nature (not too far perverted) is not more forward to commit sin, than willing to hide it ; and we commonly affect to show better than we are. Not few harlots put on the semblance of chastity, and bitterly rail on them that appear naught. Moorish passages are dangerous for travellers, but the pits which the eye sees the foot avoids. Let us never trust those that do not wish to appear good.

To conclude, then, Sodom sought no cover, and she was not covered ; fire and brimstone had free access to her ; and her confusion, no less than her corruption, was palpable to the world. Openness of sin saves justice a labour of inquisition : there need no hue-and-cry after that thief which presents himself. Are there no such public sinners amongst us ? none that openly dishallow the sabbaths ; none that justify sacrilege, a sin now as manifest as Sodom's ; none that have so sworn away all grace, that they make it their grace to swear ? Mark them that cause divisions and tumults among you, Rom. xvi. 17, mark them with the black coal of infamy : let them be to you, as lepers among the Jews, or as men full of plague-sores among you ; whom neither the fear of God nor man can work to peace, unquietness must be their portion for ever ; the shame of the gospel, malicious, wrangling Christians. Concerning these open sins, let me say to the magistrate, as David to Solomon of Shimei, 1 Kings ii. 8, 9, We may not, you must punish.

2. The continuance : as their sins were extant, so constant ; Their ways were always grievous, Psal. x. 5. Their ways, not some few steps ; grievous, not meanly offensive ; and that without intermission, always. It is not so much sin, as the trade of sin, that is damnable. They sin while they eat, sin while they walk, talk, even in sleep they sin ; their sportive, transportive mirth is full of obscenity ; their beds, boards, chambers, and (if they dissemble any devotion) the very churches, are witnesses of their impiety : such fluid souls, that no costive medicine can stay the flux of their sins ; but the very remanent snuff of original goodness must languish out in a stinking dissoluteness. Time, the remedy of other evils, increaseth this. Other creatures grow up to their height, and then decay and die ; only it is said of the crocodile, that she grows to her last day. So doth this man's sin. It is said of the moon, she waxeth, and waneth, and vanisheth, and then appears again with repaired horns : but here is no change, except from evil to worse. They so habituate sins, that the more habitual they are the less they are thought of ; as the friars dwindle their orders, from Minims to Nullans : or as some owe debts so long, that they forget them to be debts. They think the preacher does them over-hasty wrong, to call them from their inveterate lusts : as when a creditor demanded his money long due, the debtor jested with his companion ; See, I have owed him the money these ten years, and he is as earnest with me as if I had borrowed it but yesterday. Like men that have so often told a lie, that at last themselves think they speak true.

Lot may preach to them, but unless Lot could convert them there is no reparation of their life. Resolute sinners love dissolute teachers ; such as cannot, or dare not, speak the truth. That cannot, for insufficiency : their place hath set them to charge, but they have neither powder nor shot. That dare not, for flattery : we may say of their sermons, as it is reported of some harps, It is better to see, than hear them : their fingering may please the eye, their melody is nothing worth. Yet as St. Keywin's harp is kept for a great relic, so flattering teachers are venerable monuments with these.

They sin because they will sin. The cause is neither ignorance nor compulsion, but wilfulness. Though we must offend, yet for shame let there be some interruption and breaking off in our sins : let not men run headlong to hell, and never so much as look back. It is for the devil only to do nothing else but sin ; a sinner from the beginning, a sinner to the end. Who gives a penny to that merchant that rejoiceth in his shipwreck? or will confer an estate upon him that resolves to be a beggar? St. Augustine confesseth a state of himself unconverted, bad enough, when he said, I desire holiness but cannot obtain it; but these will not so much as desire to be good.

While they are in Delilah's lap, they think themselves as safe as if they were in Abraham's bosom. As beggars get their living by showing their sores: let a surgeon offer to heal them, they refuse it, because they live by them. We offer to cure men's maladies, their riot, rapine, uncleanness, lying, blasphemy. No, they thank us, and say, they live by them. This is that Babel which will not be cured. Yea, they are worse than those beggars; for they desire not ulcers, yet when they have them they make use of them; but these by an unnatural lust contract them, and make ulcers in their conscience. Perhaps the issue there hath continued so long, that if they offer to stop it, they die: the devil hath hampered some so fast, that they dare not but sin, for fear they should anger him, for a ne noceat; and their consciences would so pinch and torture them, that they dare not admit a conference. As they that have curst and shrewish wives at home, love to stray abroad; so men molested with a scolding conscience, as the whore, drunkard, homicide, are fain continually to play, drink, riot; to go to bed with their heads full of wine, and no sooner wake, but to it again. So that their conscience must knock at the door a thousand times, and they are never within, or at leisure to be spoke withal. Yet must they at last be met and found, as Ahab was by Elijah, even by this enemy: stay they never so long, and stray they never so far, they must home at last. Sickness will waken them, conscience must speak with them, as a master with his truant scholar after a long absence; and then there are no men under heaven who more need that prayer, Lord, have mercy upon them!

3. The uncleanness: their sin was not only palpable, and durable, but detestable; they were exposed to turpitude, their bodies prostituted to fleshly pollutions. By "filthy" understand all carnal defilements, the kinds whereof St. Paul specifies to the Romans under their proper names, because they were familiarly known to them. But to the Galatians, he wraps them up in general terms, because there they were more obscure; as our apostle doth not name Sodom's filthiness to the Christian Jews, lest by specifying it he should in a manner teach it. The decree of Pope Syricius involved marriage among the pollutions of the flesh: and such was the oversight of St. Gregory upon 1 Cor. vii. 2, Concessit minimo, ut majus declinetur: a false gloss of a sincere text, striving to prove by the apostle's words, that matrimony is by permission, not by commandment; and therefore that cannot be without sin, which is pardoned, and not imposed. But if it were a sin to marry, God himself should be the author of sin, for he was the author of marriage. Neither doth God pardon it as a thing forbidden, but permit it as a thing lawful, though the apostle doth not there impose it as a thing necessary. And it is a forced interpretation, to tax that of iniquity, which God hath ordained for a remedy. For he doth not forbid, but rectify our desire; "Let every man have his own wife:" a wife, not a concubine; his own wife, not another man's; his wife, not wives. Lamech's incongruity, "Hear my voice, ye wives of Lamech," Gen. iv. 23, was like false Latin; for wives admit of no plurality, when they be construed with one husband. God had abundance of spirit, yet he ordained but one woman for one man, Mal. ii. 15.

But let us abhor that doctrine, that shall at once cast out the aspersion of sin upon marriage, and yet seek to vindicate uncleanness from sin by a toleration of stews. It was God's express prohibition, "There shall be no whore of the daughters of Israel," Deut. xxiii. 17. Many flatter themselves that this is but a trick of youth: belike they are content to lose the kingdom of heaven with a trick: an unhappy trick, that costs a man his soul!

It is truly said, that a whore is the high way to the devil: he that looks on her with lust, begins his voyage; he that stays to talk with her, is half his way; he that enjoys her, is at his journey's end. She is a liar, out-lying a newsmonger; her kisses be sweet poison; her eye is on your face, while her heart is on your cash; a deep ditch, what is wrecked there is lost for ever; dressing herself all day, to provoke appetite at night; others' sins show like landscape, afar off, hers like huge statues; damnable both to herself and others. She keeps herself a stranger to repentance, till they two meet at an hospital. She lives like Cain, a reprobate vagabond without any constant habitation. Her body is the common sewer, her soul a snuff which only surgery keeps alive, and at last it goes out in everlasting stench.

For others; it is her misery and mischief not to be damned alone, she brings many to her own fire, and so does the devil special service. She is a witch that hath wrought upon saints, as Tamar (though otherwise a good woman) did once upon Judah, Gen. xxxviii. 15. He esteems her by her habit, and the very sight of a harlot hath fired him with lust: the devil knows that a fit object is half a victory. At the first sight he is inflamed, and (which is strange) caught with her love before he saw her face. Not examining whether she was fair or foul, sick or sound, friend or enemy, it was enough that she was a woman. The presence of the Adullamite does not restrain him; so had lust besotted him, that he could endure a witness. She was cunning, and would not trust him without a pawn: a pledge he leaves her, his staff and signet. Oh that the filthy affection should thus transport a son of Jacob! But in him let us see the easiest fruits of it, fear and shame. Fear: he came to pay the hire of his lust, and she was gone: now he fears, lest his own signet should seal his reproach, and to be beaten with his own staff. Shame; supposing, if these evidences were produced, not to own them, and wishing that no other might know them. When the fact appears, and the author cannot lie hid, with what shame, yea horror, must he look upon Tamar's two sons, the monuments of his filthiness! It must needs cut off his soul to hear them call him sire and grandsire, and Tamar both mother and sister. Shame is the surest and easiest wages of this sin, there is more belongs to it.

He that hath thus fallen, must go to the price of many a tear; it must cost him deep sighs, and the heavy groans of a broken heart. It is not a light and transient sorrow that can do it: the gates of heaven are shut, and every breath of a miserere will not open them. Their state is dangerous, and there is but one way to help them; to repent what they have done, and never more to do what they have repented. If we have admitted such a prostitution of our bodies, let us obtain by faithful penitence such a restitution of our honours. So shall the gates of bliss be opened again to us; for God esteems not men as they have been, but as they are.

"Vexed." The last point is Lot's case: he did burn in zeal, as Sodom did in lust: there was fire in them both; his, a holy fire from the altar of God; theirs, an unnatural fire blown into their veins by the bellows of hell.

"Vexed." This was no ordinary disturbance, nor common displeasure; but oppressed, excruciated, tormented; his senses, his very soul, exceedingly afflicted. He was not an idle looker-on, as if he minded not what they did; nor in a timorous observation of the proverb, Of little meddling comes great rest; but knowing it to be the cause of God, his heart was perplexed about it. He durst as freely expostulate, as they durst act; and took as full liberty of reproving, as they took licentiousness of offending. He was not vexed with them, but with their deeds: we are to hate none for their creation, but perverting the end of their creation. Let us love God's image, not the filthy defacement of it: peace with the person, not with the conditions.

"Vexed." That which is here passive, is in the next verse active, he "vexed his righteous soul." He vexed his own soul: who bade him stay there to be vexed? He vexed himself, when he might have quitted himself. Yet because he was vexed, he is delivered. He was but a guest to Sodom, an host to the angels: he liked well of their situation, not of their conversation, and found more bitterness in the one than sweetness in the other. Yet because he avoided their sins, he escaped their judgments. And surely they were both miraculous; for his declining their sins was no less a wonder than his deliverance from their flames. As the latter was God's gracious prevention, so the former was his prevenient grace; and he was not more bound to bless God for saving his body from the fire, than for saving his soul from their sin.

The nature and quality of his vexation I refer to the next verse. Conclude we with observing and admiring a wonder: a man environed with fire, and not burning; floating on the sea, and not drowning; dealing with dunghills, and not defiled; condemned and honoured, made rich by being impoverished. If I should propound a riddle; What is the highest and the lowest, the fairest and the foulest, the strongest and the weakest, the richest and the poorest, the happiest and unhappiest, the safest and most in danger of any thing in the world? I durst not promise with Samson, new suits of apparel to all that can expound it. It is a true Lot, a good Christian.

He is the lowest of the world; "Out of the depths have I cried," Psal. cxxx. 1: so low a hedge that every son of fortune treads him down. Yet the highest, for his "conversation is in heaven," Phil. iii. 20: let his feet stand upon earth, his head is in heaven.

He is the lowest in appearance to the world; for so disguised with weeping, watching, fasting, that he seems like "a bottle dried in the smoke," Psal. cxix. 83; so loaden with reproaches, that he looks black as if he had "lien among the pots," Psal. lxxviii. 13. There is no form, no beauty nor comeliness desirable in him, Isa. liii. 2. Yet the fairest; black, but comely; fairer than all the sons of nature; the delight of angels, the love of God. "Thou art all fair, my love; there is no spot in thee," Cant. iv. 7. Thus the face of Stephen appeared like an angel, Acts vi. 15: the sun, the heavens, the firmament of refulgent stars, are not comparable.

He is the weakest, a lamb among wolves, afflicted on this side, oppressed on that; a reed that bows at every gust; Elijah under a juniper-tree, weary of his life; Job on the rack, broken with sores and sorrows. Yet the strongest, being armed with faith, hope, and love, three invincible forces: faith being able to remove mountains, to overcome the world; hope an immovable anchor, able to stay the vessel in the greatest storms; love strong as death, undertaking death in the terriblest form, that it may come to Christ. Thus Elijah durst face a king, and tell him, Thou troublest Israel, 1 Kings xviii. 18. Herodian writes of Plantianus, the emperor Severus' favourite, that he had such a terror in his countenance, men durst not look him in the face. Therefore when he went abroad, he had his gentlemen-ushers before him, to give warning, that men might cast their eyes to the earth at his coming. It is said of St. Benedict, that he had such a power of terror in his eye, that casting but a look upon Totilas, that warlike king of the Goths, a furious and audacious man, he made him tremble. Such a majesty hath resulted from the face of divers martyrs, that the tormentors were more afraid of them than they of their tormentors. They are built upon such a foundation, that all the ordinance of hell can never batter them.

He is the poorest, not only in regard of superfluities, but even of necessities. Moses must not think scorn to keep sheep, nor David to beg bread of Nabal, nor Elijah to be fed with ravens, nor Lazarus to be glad of crumbs, nor the apostles for pure hunger to pluck the ears of corn, nor Peter to confess, "Silver and gold have I none," not a penny in his purse; nor Christ himself to be so near driven as to look for figs from a tree in the way, and miss his purpose. Yet still the richest; without meat, not without Christ: whatsoever he wanteth, he wants not content. And it is no paradox, that a man may be rich with little, and poor with much. Content is the poor man's riches, and desire is the rich man's poverty. There is no want where is no wantonness.

He is the unhappiest, for his hands are tied from revenge, his eyes muffled that he must not look upon vanity, his lips sealed that he may not return rebuke for rebuke. He lives in the worldling's paradise, as the poets feigned of Tantalus; up to the chin in pleasures, and is not suffered to taste them. Touch not, taste not, handle not; what a miserable life is this! Yet is he the happiest; the peace of conscience being his everlasting Christmas; a joy he hath which no man can take from him. The African king in Charles the Great's court, offering to be baptized, observed divers poor men sitting on the ground, and served in mean manner, demanded what they were; it was answered him, that they were the servants of Christ. Whereupon he replied, If the king keep his servants so rich, and Christ's servants so poor, I will be no servant of Christ's. They that thus look on the outside of Christians, find small glory to please the eye of sensual reason: it is the inner man that is fair, and rich, and blessed, adorned with more jewels than the eye of the world ever saw, or the treasure of the world itself is worth.

He is in continual danger, his soul being the butt for all Satan's darts, his body the anvil for the world's afflictions, he runs through many deaths, and is killed all the day long. Thus was Christ himself served; Nec recessit a servo, quod precessit in Domino. When the Jews offered Jesus gall and vinegar, he tasted it but would not drink; he left the rest for his church, and they must pledge him. Yet still he is safe, under the shadow of God's wings; and when the whole world floats on the waters, Noah shall sit dry in his cabin. Let Sodom be all on a flame, not a hair of Lot's head shall be singed. All the assaults of flesh and blood against them, is but as if glass should encounter adamant. The great King takes them into his protection, and woe unto all those that attempt their ruin!

This is the Christian's estate; now every man would be partaker of the height, not the baseness, of the beauty, not deformity, of the strength, not infirmity, of the riches, not poverty, of the happiness, not infelicity, of the safety, not the danger, that waits upon religion. But the comforts of Jesus be not for them that disclaim his sorrows. Joseph had fair possessions in the land of Egypt, but he bequeathed none of these to his children, because they were to have Canaan. So God allows his children but little here, because he means to give them heaven hereafter. Lord, whatsoever requisites be wanting, or troubles abounding, all our journey, let our latter end be peace.

VERSE 8.

For that righteous man dwelling among them, in seeing and hearing, vexed his righteous soul from day to day with their unlawful deeds.

It is an apparent argument of an ungracious man, that he can with unmoved patience bear the dishonours of God. Hot iron cannot choose but hiss when cold water is poured upon it; nor a good man but vex at open wickedness. I know there be some will sooner fight in their mistress's quarrel, than in their Maker's; fiery against their own disgraces, cool and remiss in the cause of Christ, as if it were quite unconcerning them. There is no love without zeal, as there can be no heat without fire. "Love is strong as death, jealousy cruel as the grave," Cant. viii. 6. Take death at the strongest, Christ's love to us was stronger; but if we abuse it, that love grows jealous, and that jealousy grows cruel, cruel as the grave. Our love to him must have the same nature, though it fail of the same measure; that which dishonours him, must vex our souls. Entire love will not suffer itself to be adulterated. No oil nor frankincense might come into the jealousy offering, because it brings iniquity to remembrance, Numb. v. 15. The ground of jealousy is love tending unto hate upon a just suspicion of a just cause: there is no competition with Christ to be admitted. Lot loved God, therefore was zealous of his glory; zealous, therefore reprov'd his offenders; reprov'g, he found no amendment, therefore vexed his own soul. Let him be righteous; if he had not dwelt among them there had been no vexation: let him dwell among them; if he had not been righteous, no trouble: let him be righteous, and dwell among them; if they had not been wicked, no offence. Be he righteous, and among them, and they wicked, yet if he had not seen and heard their evil deeds, yet he had been free. Yea, grant all these sinister concurrences, if their sins had been few and not frequent, his vexation had been less. But lay all these together; a good man, among the ungodly, seeing their works, and the unlawfulness of them, and the continuance of that unlawfulness; he must needs be vexed, and that vexation be of the same extent and duration as was the cause, their ungodliness, from day to day.

The general parts of the text are two; the incentives or kindlers, and the fire itself. The incentives are set down by four degrees. 1. Causal or radical, He being righteous. 2. Occasional, Dwelling among them. 3. Objectual, Their unlawful deeds. 4. Organical or instrumental, In seeing and hearing. For the fire itself consider, 1. The property, It is fervent against unrighteousness. 2. The sincerity, It works inwardly, moves the soul. 3. The rarity, But one among thousands thus vexed. 4. The constancy, From day to day. It is not cool, not counterfeit, not common, not mutable.

1. He being "righteous." As in natural things, like things are not opposed by like things, fire fights not against fire, but against water; so in moral things, the innocent are not opposed by the innocent, one good man doth not persecute another. If either the Sodomites had been righteous with Lot, or Lot unrighteous with them, here had been no contention. Wolf and wolf can agree, lamb and lamb fall not out; but who can reconcile the wolf to the lamb? That good man who was eyes to the blind, and feet to the lame, yet brake the teeth of the ungodly, Job xxix. 17. Faith is the ground of zeal: faith is from Christ, love from faith, zeal from love; nor can faith be discerned without love, nor love without zeal. Faith is first, as the foundation before the building, the evidence before the possession, Heb. xi. 1. That which made Lot righteous in Christ, made him zealous for Christ. When the weather is hot, every man opens his mouth; when it is cold, he shuts it, till his teeth chatter again. Where is righteousness, there is heat: where is heat, men will quest and open: "I believed, therefore have I spoken," Psal. cxvi. 10. But where is no heat, there is an imperfect sound, a chattering of the teeth, as if men were afraid to speak.

Righteousness, which is the life of the soul, is discerned as the life of the body, by motion, heat, and feeling. If the dishonours of God do not run like goads and poniards to our heart, we are all dead flesh; if his glory do not lift us up with joy, there is no heat in us. Antigonus' son being grievously sick, and none perceiving the cause; when his mother-in-law entered the chamber, his eyes began to quicken, his blood to rise, and pulse to beat extraordinarily: whereby the physicians understood the cause to be the unnatural love of his mother. As in that vicious love, so in true holy affection to God, the very mention of his name will make our pulse beat, our hearts uncontainable of joy or sorrow; our love cannot be suppressed. Good blood will never belie itself; well-born children are touched to the quick with the injuries of their parents: not thus to be moved, is to confess ourselves bastards. This point will fall heavy on some, when it comes to be concluded, that where is no zeal, there can be no righteousness.

2. "Dwelling among them." One reason why God suffers evil men, is to try the good. Virtue is more glorious being set off with vice. Beauty were less admirable if there were no deformity. Some Canaanites are reserved to make trial of Israel's constancy. There must be sects, that the approved may be known, 1 Cor. xi. 19. They are the best lilies that thrive amongst thorns. To be temperate in islands, sober among Germans, chaste in Sodom; this is the praise. Divers have stood with filthy shoes on holy ground; but to stand on filthy ground with holy shoes, here is proof. It is peculiar to heaven, to have never a bad neighbour: only that immortal kingdom hath the privilege of never being tempted. This world is for trial, that to come, for reward. The solitary man knows not himself; he thinks himself good, because he hath no means to be bad. Let him refrain sin, yet it is laus parva, quia laus parvi. (Bern.) He that overcomes the solicitation to evil, holds his virtue in assurance. If I can be patient among my offensive neighbours, chaste among the lascivious, sober among epicures, modest among impudent railers, just among defrauders, faithful to the church among the common and exemplary spoilers of it; this argument is of force. The soldier can keep his station till he be assaulted. When temptation oppresses, and lust rebelleth, as when a man's horse curvets, then let him sit fast. When blustering storms of persecution shall make a man gird the garment of his religion closer about him, this approves him. True zeal, like fire in a frost, is the hotter for opposition.

Among them that hate righteousness, and him for it; that say of good living, as Festus did of great learning, It makes a man mad, Acts xxvi. 24. They cannot know another to be sober, that are mad themselves. As old men answer the young, You think us fools, but we know you are not wise; so answer we these, You think us mad that are so hot against sins, but we know you mad that are so cold for your souls. Achish and his courtiers thought David mad, yet he was the wisest man among them. It is not a Nicodemus that the world takes notice of, but a Peter; Thou wert with him in Galilee; they will put him to it.

Among them that thought Lot to be the only man that molested them. Ahab can charge Elijah with this, and Tertullus Paul, Acts xxiv. 5. The mutinies and uproars of the world were fathered upon the Christians in the primitive times; as the popish traitors decreed to blow up a state, and then to lay it upon the puritans in these latter days. There can be no cross or judgment in Sodom, but Lot is the man that brings it. Yet in all sense he that does but defend himself, is not the author of strife. Though the true man strike some blows, yet the thief is he that begins the fray.

Among them that thought Lot a proud and imperious fellow; as Eliab censured David, I know the pride of thy heart, 1 Sam. xvii. 28. There is no goodness in man, but such will ascribe it to vain-glory. This opinion of others is derived from a consciousness of themselves; that would not do one good deed, but to be highly applauded for it. Therefore would not the rich man perhaps help Lazarus, because he feared that as Lazarus died, so his good turn should die with him. Nor the Levite succour the wounded man, Luke x. 32, because it was not in popular view. The Pharisees did all to be seen: now that distressed man was out of the way, nobody to look on.

Among them that thought him a fool for his labour. Tell us of our facts, as if they were faults? Do not all thus? You only against it? Alas, it is but one doctor's opinion. That which the world calls policy, eats up true wisdom: their discretion and moderate staidness devours all true honesty. O say they, "Be not righteous over-much," Eccl. vii. 16. But of that extremity there is in these times no fear, it is now short shooting that loseth the game. You have scarce one that exceeds, for ten thousand that fault in the defect: and it is better to have our broth boil over, than be raw; rather go in furs than naked. Liberality fears and flees covetousness, rather than prodigality; truth is more suspicious of falsehood, than of vain-glory; zeal is more cautious of coldness, than of heat; is more afraid lest the fire should go out, than endanger the chimney.

Among them that thought him exorbitant, because he walked not after their rule, 1 Pet. iv. 4. Often do we hear remiss professors strive to choke all forward holiness, by commending the golden mean: a cunning discouragement, the devil's sophistry! Whereas the mean of virtue is betwixt two kinds, not betwixt two degrees. It is a mean grace that loves a mean degree of grace. Yet this is the staff with which the world beats all that be better than themselves. What, will you be singular, walk alone? But were not the apostles singular in their walking, "a spectacle to the world?" 1 Cor. iv. 9. Did not Christ call for this singularity; What singular thing do ye? Matt. v. 47. You that are God's peculiar people, will ye do no peculiar thing? Ye that are separate from the world, will you keep the world's road? Shall Lot leave his righteousness, for such an imputation of singularity? Must the name of a puritan dishearten us from the service of God? St. Paul said in his apology, "After the way which they call heresy, so worship I the God of my fathers," Acts xxiv. 14: and by that which profane ones call puritanism, which is indeed zealous devotion, so let my heart desire to serve Jesus Christ.

Among them that hated the truth, and loved the prophecy of wine and strong drink, Micah ii. 11. Such a man may live in quiet: if Lot had spoke peace to Sodom, and not the truth, they had brooked him well enough. It is truth that breeds hatred among bad neighbours. "Nevertheless I tell you the truth," John xvi. 7; though it breed sorrow, or anger, or malice in your hearts, yet I tell you the truth. I know that in these days to speak the truth, is to be censured of indiscretion; the world thinks us children or fools to hazard ourselves by speaking the truth. Yet we will not square our positions to their dispositions, nor forbear to tell what they are loth to hear. Indeed, you will hear the truth, if there be no nevertheless; if it concern you not. But saith Christ, better lose your favours than your souls; and it is better for us to discharge our consciences from a burden of blood. They that flatter you, are your deadliest enemies; that either in furthering sin, or in smothering sin, spill your dearest lives.

Among these bad men dwelt this good Lot, and still he was righteous. Neither their exemplary life, nor popular exposition, nor powerful terrors, could turn his feet out of the paths of goodness. It is likely, they endeavoured to win him to them, either by rewards or menaces. But as when Capellus tempted Fabricius, the first day with an elephant, so huge and monstrous a beast as before he had not seen; the next day with money and promises of honour; he answered, I fear not thy force, and I am too wise for thy fraud: so Lot could be corrupted with neither. But now, if he could be holy among wicked, a saint among sinners, how is it that we are evil among the good, sinners among saints? He could be hot when all the rest were cold, and shall we be cold when many are hot? He was righteous in the midst of irreligion, we in the midst of true religion are unrighteous. We have no interdictions of piety; may be some snuffers to qualify our zeal, and make it burn brighter; no extinguishers to put it out. It is not forbidden us to serve God with all our heart, with all our strength. If there be some lazy professors, divert we our eyes from them to the gracious examples of righteousness. Complain we of trouble? There is no age that always suffered good men to live in quiet. As St. Augustine said of persecution; Inventus est ignis, qui unum diliet, alterum damnificet, utrumque probet. Were we frightened with the Spanish Inquisition, wearied with the Turkish imposition, somewhat might be pleaded for our remissness. But he is a bad swimmer that cannot move on with the current. The gospel calls us, grace invites us, good examples help us; what is now left to excuse us, if we be not righteous?

"Their unlawful deeds." Sin is the object or matter of a saint's vexation. It is the attribute which God gives himself, I am a jealous God, Exod. xxxiv. 14. Now when we ascribe any human affections to God, we must separate them from all imperfections whatsoever. A man may be jealous not out of love, or without just cause; God cannot be so. The ground of his jealousy is love; the cause of his jealousy, our unfaithfulness to him. We cannot be jealous of God, because his love is infinite, and we need fear no partners. Paul wished this happiness to all his hearers, Acts xxvi. 29. God's love hath room enough, beyond all measure and comprehension, nor is it diminished by being communicated. How many millions soever the Lord loves, he loves thee and me never the less. But man's love to God is so pent and narrow, and the bed of affection so little; that if we admit a partner, he hath cause to be jealous; another's gain is his loss. There is an obligation of love between the husband and the wife: when he conceives likelihood of any breach, he grows jealous. Love is the ground, and suspicion the cause. If no love, no suspicion; if no suspicion, no jealousy. This is man's torment and rack; nor can the strongest bars enclosing her ease his pangs. Knowledge is the only cure of jealousy; there is more misery in doubting her false, than in proving her so. The remedy of known evils is patience; but for doubted evils there is no physic. This spark once kindled will never die, nor can time, that dull and tardy physician, help it; nor can the strictest observance satisfy it. This is the jealous man's misery: he may prove his wife false, he can never prove her true. The anguish of this affliction is more or less according to his affection.

Thus hath the soul of man plighted her faith to God, and by virtue of that contract is called his spouse. If she forsake his holy bed, and run after other lovers, he grows jealous; not by way of suspicion or doubt, because he knows the heart and most secret motions; but because his honour shall not be given to another. Thus he is jealous over Jerusalem, Zech. i. 14; and if she prostitute her betrothed love, he disclaims her for his wife, Hos. ii. 2: and when he quite gives her over, and ceaseth to be a husband, then he will no more be jealous, Ezek. xvi. 42, as a man divorceth himself from a wanton wife. As the primary nature of God is to be loving, so it is the nature of that love on just cause to be jealous, and the nature of that jealousy to be cruel, cruel as the grave, Cant. viii. 6; if before the grave swallow us, repentance do not help us. God is so jealous in the decalogue, that he will not set any creature in the same table of the law with himself. There shall stand neither father nor mother, king nor Cæsar, saint nor angel, in the same table with God. If we take our lusts into a resolute competition with him, his jealousy will burn like fire against us, Zeph. i. 18; Nah. i. 2.

Now that which grieveth God, should also vex us: this hath tried the zeal of the saints. So was Moses vexed; the idolatry of man made him break the tables of God, Exod. xxxii. 19. So Elijah; he durst confront a king, and reprove an idolatrous kingdom, 1 Kings xix. 14. Samuel hews Agag in pieces, Hezekiah rends his clothes at blasphemy, Mattathias sacrifices the sacrificer on his own superstitious altar, 1 Mac. ii. 24. It grieved Paul's heart at Athens, to see the town so given to idolatry. Phinehas' wife heard at once of her father-in-law's death, of her husband's, with many others; yet did not all this so afflict her as that the ark was taken by infidels. It is of this alone she speaks dying: "The glory is departed from Israel; for the ark of God is taken," 1 Sam. iv. 22. We are no Lots, if not vexed with the world's unlawful deeds. All Israel saw the boldness of Zimri, in bringing a whore so palpably to his tent, Numb. xxv.; but their hearts were so full of grief, and their eyes of tears, for their bleeding brethren, that they had no room for indignation. Phinehas looked on too, but with other affections. Zimri seemed to him as one that defied the Lord, and flouted the people's sorrow; that while they were wringing their hands, and beating their breasts, he would be dallying with his mistress. His heart boils with a desire of holy revenge: his hand was used to a censer, but now it shall manage a javelin; and with one stroke he joins those two bodies in their death, which were joined in their sin; and in the heat and height of their lust, makes a new way for their souls to their own place. As they were more beasts than any that ever he sacrificed, so their slaughter was the best sacrifice that ever he offered. He doth not stand casting of doubts: Who am I to do this? I am a priest, my office is all for peace and mercy: it is for me to sacrifice for the people, not to sacrifice any of the people: my place is to appease God's anger against them, not to revenge God's anger upon them; to desire the conversion, not to work the confusion of a sinner. Is not one a prince in Israel, the other a princess of Midian, and can the death of two such persons be so put up? Or if it be safe and fit, why doth my uncle Moses rather shed his own tears, than their blood? I will even be sorry with the rest, and let them revenge whom it concerneth. No, this holy fire of zeal hath quite consumed all the dross of such deliberation; he holds this execution to be both his duty and his glory. How doth God love this heat in all the carriages of his servants! and if it ever do transport them too far, yet he will rather pardon erring fervency, than lukewarm indifferency. And to show that it pleased him, he presently frees Israel from the plague, and entails the priesthood to himself and his posterity for it.

But this holy disposition is not to be found in many. Will you know what vexeth us? We think ourselves wronged, and know not how to be revenged; this vexeth us. If God do not answer us with rain or fair weather, as we would have it; this vexeth us. The better estate of our neighbour, as if another's preferment were our ruin; the crossing of our unnatural desires, if we cannot have our own wills; the interdiction of our lusts by a superior law: these things vex us. Men would have the law according to their lives, not their lives according to the law. (Sen.) If the usurer's interest comes not in the same pace that his covetous heart prompts it, this vexeth him. To be told that sacrilege is a sin, that our contentions be carnal, that while we maintain strife with our brethren we have no peace with God; this vexeth us. Private inconveniences take up our vexation, not God's loss. But if you will be angry without sin, be angry at sin; not with your brother, but with his and your own faults. When you see God's name dishonoured, his service profaned, his good Spirit resisted, and the church or family that is named in heaven and earth wounded; let this vex you. Be vexed at them that are vexed at God himself on every slight occasion; that if their mouths be not filled with laughter, and their bellies with delicacies, are ready to break forth into terms of undutifulness, What profit is there in serving of God? Mal. iii. 14. But let the zeal of Lot be a coal to kindle this dead age; so may this text be as profitable, as it is convenient for these times. If those angels were sent again to survey the earth, what other news or observation of their travel would they return, but that "all the earth sitteth still, and is at rest," Zech. i. 11; all are either cold or but lukewarm. Not only those frozen in paganism out of the church's pale, but even the most within the tropics of Christianity have just so much and so little heat, as to think they have enough and need no more. This end of the world being like the period of David's life, so old, so cold, that no clothes were enough to keep heat in him. Our spiritual state and condition is like our country's site and position, between the torrid and frigid zones, neither hot nor cold. If Lot's example may but warn us, and warm us, to be inflamed with the love of God and hatred of sin, where my labour ends, your comfort shall begin, and the fruit of both continue for ever.

4. "In seeing and hearing." The eye and ear are those special doors, that let into the heart its comfort or torment. We are not sensible either of the mischiefs or pleasures which we neither hear nor see. Sodom might have continued sinful without Lot's disturbance, if their sin had not been exposed to his sight and sense. His soul had been quiet enough within him, if suspicion had not begot mistrust, nor experience a manifest proof of God's dishonour. His eyes and ears were the unwilling witnesses of their impiety, which he neither would see, nor yet could look off. No man delights to look upon ulcers, unless from a desire of healing them; nor to hear the barking of dogs, howling of wolves, and screechings of owls; such is the noise of oaths and blasphemies; but with necessity and detestation. There are many things which a good ear would not hear; as his servant cursing him, Eccl. vii. 21: nor a good eye look upon: says Hagar of her child, "Let me not see the death of the child," Gen. xxi. 16. As the blind bishop answered Julian, taxing Christ of impotency, that he could not open the eyes of his servant; I am glad that I want eyes to see thee, the monster of men. Such was Lot's unhappiness, that he must see and hear their wickedness. From this instrumental means of his vexation we may observe divers things.

1. The sight of sin makes a man either sad or guilty; if we see it, and be not sorrowful, we are sinful. If Lot had not now been vexed at them, God had been vexed at him: on such a cause not to be angry, had angered Heaven. Eli heard of his sons' impiety, doubtless, with grief enough, but not with anger enough; therefore he is punished with hearing of their destruction, that was too remiss in hearing of their transgression. It is unhappy to make another's sin become our own, by a fond indulgence: he that sees evil without dislike, does not see it without fault. They are not true-hearted that stand by without drawing their weapons against the notorious oppugner of holiness. Meroz is cursed by the angel, because they came not forth to help the Lord in the day of battle, Judg. v. 23. They saw the armies and heard the drums of those proud adversaries, gave the looking on, took part with neither: they fought not against God, yet because they did not fight for God, they are cursed.

Such are dough-baked Christians, too clammy for the stomach of God; whom he hath borne long, yet but wamblingly. Shall we hear blasphemy, see uncleanness, and hold our peace? will the Lord digest us in such a temper? While the fields and tap-houses beguile the temples, curses are offered up instead of prayers, vain expenses for alms, and we see this, are not our souls grieved? While men pray as if they were asleep, and hear sermons as dead men do their funerals; it would make a man sick to see God thus worshipped. But alas, how do men rage at those that find fault with others, or endeavour to be good themselves! Let a sparkle of fervent devotion break out in a family, all the neighbours are up in clamours; as when the bells ring disorderly, every man is ready with his bucket to quench the fire. Disgraced they must be for puritans, but only by Laodiceans. Indifferency strives to dash zeal out of countenance. But if we hear and see evil, and dare not reprove it, cannot amend it, yet let us grieve for it, that we be not guilty of it.

2. The most offensive sins are such as be objected to sight and hearing. There is a sin that is only mad within-doors, without admitting any witness but the inevitable ones, God and their own conscience. But sins that are secret to man, we leave to Him to whom all things are open: they be only known evils that vex the righteous. When all Israel rings of the lewdness of Eli's sons, it is high time for their father to be grieved. Spiritual and internal sins may be more culpable, corporeal and outward be more infamous. Take an instance: while God was angry, all Israel grieved, the heads hanged, the people plagued, a prince dares brave God and them all in that sin, which he saw so grievously punished before his eyes. Here was fornication, an odious crime; and that of an Israelite, whose name imports holiness; and that of a virtuous prince, whose actions are so many rules to others; and that with a Midianite woman, with whom it had been unlawful for him to marry; this in the face of Moses governing, of all Israel mourning, even while they were yet bleeding and weeping for the same offence: how monstrous was this impudence! But because he was a prince he thought he might sin by privilege; Who dares control me? His nobleness sets him above the reach of justice. It is easy for the greatness of authority to bear out the smallness of piety. Commonly the sins of the mighty are mighty sins; therefore their destruction is made answerable to their presumption, and their vengeance so much the greater as was their conceit of impunity.

In this example we read the sins of the world; blasphemy is audible, drunkenness visible, oppression sensible; we hear them, see them, feel them; there is no gall of zeal in our souls if we be not vexed. How can we not be ashamed of them, that are not ashamed of themselves! A wicked man thinks he may live out of danger of the law, if either he have a great man to his friend, or have not a great man to his enemy. Pride would be out of request at home, if notice were not taken of it abroad. While sin hides itself in corners, there is some hope: if there be shame, there is possibility of grace. But when it dares once look upon the sun, send challenges to authority, defy heaven and earth, the ulcer is desperate, the member fitter to be cut off than lanced.

3. He did see and not see, hear and not hear. Connivance at rank impiety is bad in all men, intolerable in some; such are the ministers of either gospel or justice. For preachers, if they wink, the wolf may prey on the lamb: cold preachers make bold sinners. But we have cause to tremble when we consider, that God will in some sort reckon with us for the religion of our people. Let there be fire in our lips to consume the dross of vices that are fallen into the sink of our times. When the whole city is secure, it is our parts to mourn for their abominations, Ezek. ix. 4. The evils, the devils, of these days will not out but by frequent preaching and fervent praying. Shall we be mutes in the midst of so many raging consonants? not as loud for God, as they for Baal, for antichrist? We see wickedness, we hear it: O let us pray it down, let us preach it down, outface it, outlive it. Let us be within and without preachers: the weights of the sanctuary by the law, were to be double to those of common use. How gracious be their feet, not only their lips, that bring the gospel! Isa. lii. 7; because their feet must walk in the way which they prescribe. It is good life that must accompany doctrine, as lightning doth thunder. Fire in the preaching does well, but water in the preacher to quench it by example does ill. Infirmities are in all, but rank and resolute sins become not those that find fault with the like in others. In all respects, and by all means, let us make it appear, that God's glory is our only scope; therefore we dare not but rebuke sin, as men preferring the winning of souls before the winning of the world.

Connivance is yet worse in magistrates: we can but reprove it, they must correct it; and open wickedness is too stubborn to be hidden out of countenance; it is well, if sharp whipping can reform it.

No scarlet robe so well becomes a magistrate, as one made of zeal. Be wise, ye judges, Psal. ii. 10; yea, also, be just, ye judges: some are so wise that they dare not be just; nor punish less offenders, for fear lest great offenders should punish them. I know there is a wisdom required to distinguish of offences; and true Christianity takes no delight in blood. If magistrates were only to kill, the devil might have been put in sole commissioner. It is a breach of justice not to proportion the punishment to the crime; for theft, rapine, adultery, sacrilege, to say no more, with Eli, but, Why do ye so? 1 Sam. ii. 23. This is true connivance; to shave the head that deserves cutting off. A weak purgation doth but stir the proud and tough humours, and anger them, not drive them out. To whip one for murder, or to burn treason in the hand, or to lay a pecuniary mulct upon incest, is in effect to patronize evil, not to punish it. Bare reproofs do but encourage wickedness, and make it think itself as easy as is the censure: like vehement showers to a ripe field, which only lay the corn that is ready and worthy of a sickle.

Moses did put the idolaters to the sword, Exod. xxxii. 27: it was his mercy that made him thus cruel: all Israel might have cursed him if some had not smarted by him. Do not our magistrates hear and see idolatry, blasphemy, sacrilege, profanation of sabbaths? are there not laws for castigation? why then be these impieties suffered in the face of Heaven? Doth not want of execution make all laws like great bells without clappers? The magistrate's sword should not be like a child's dagger, rivetted in the sheath: a sword, saith Paul, not borne in vain. When they punish malefactors, they are said to consecrate their hands to God, Exod. xxxii. 29. The judge's countenance should be like a northern wind, Prov. xxv. 23, to dispel the fogs of sin. The kings of the earth are charged to render double to the bloody strumpet of Rome, Rev. xviii. 6: why then do her locusts increase and multiply? God grant our too much pity never undo ourselves. There are two special causes of this connivance in subordinate magistrates; cowardice, and covetousness.

Cowardice and timorousness is a quality too base for eminence. "Should such a man as I flee?" saith Nehemiah, chap. vi. 11. It is the want of courage that betrays the truth; while men are more careful of their own quiet, than of God's glory. Solomon's throne had carved lions, not foxes, apes, nor wolves; no toyish, petulant, deceitful, or ravenous things, but majestic lions: no dastard fear is admitted to that seat. Magistrates have iron gauntlets, and need not fear children's blows. Moses seeing the sin, commands them to punish one another, and they do it. None replies, He is but one, we are many: we may more easily destroy him, than he can destroy our god. Aaron durst not resist us in making it, and shall he withstand our keeping it? Not so, God hath set such gracious characters of majesty in the brow of authority, that guiltiness dares not look it in the face. They stoop to the basest and bloodiest revenge he should impose. Sin is so conscious of itself, that when it is brought forth to trial, paleness and fear shall betray the guilt, and it will rather seek a hole, than a hold or fort. If the fore-horse in a team be shy, the carter fenceth his eyes on both sides, that he may lead the way fore-right without starting. Let the magistrate rectify his looks, and only bend them directly upon justice: a squint eye, cast upon persons, ill becomes him. Let him look no side-way, neither to the left hand for fear, nor to the right hand for favour.

the eyes of the wise, much more of the foolish; of the righteous, much more of the covetous, Exod. xxiii. 8. When a malefactor shall give him so much gold for a, Say, you saw me not; then, as if he had the Jews' curse upon him, hearing he will not hear, and seeing he will not perceive, Matt. xiii. 14. "A gift is as a precious stone; whithersoever it turneth, it prospereth," Prov. xvii. 8: a prosperous stone, as if he meant the philosopher's stone, so much in quest and request; a charm more powerful than a witch's night-spell. The building of great houses, keeping great houses, or rather leaving great houses, and matching with great houses, are too frequent occasions of injustice. When a small office shall swell up a great estate, the world must needs swell bribery in it. The ambition to advance their own house, blows out their zeal to God's house. Job compares justice to a cloak or robe, chap. xxix. 14: a cloak it is; but the cloak that hangs, like our gallants', on one shoulder is quickly blown off: a robe it may be; but a loose one, some night-gown, that is soon put off. Many say, they discharge a good conscience, and so they do in some sense, they discharge it quite away. Justice is called a girdle, to girt all other virtues; but let them take heed lest it sag and bend to the side where the purse hangeth.

4. Sodom's sin was so much the more heinous to God, for offending man, and vexing the heart of his servant Lot. Iniquity then exceeds itself when it grows scandalous. "Woe unto the world because of offences!" Matt. xviii. 7; when it is not enough for men to be bad themselves, but to rail at the good. If there be one in a company that abhors impious language, they will blaspheme on purpose to vex him. They had better have sunk into the ocean, bound to a mill-stone, ver. 6. They whet their tongues like razors, not only to shave a man, but to cut his throat; but the Lord shall cut them out. Thus popelings hiss like serpents at their mother; curse like Shimei, not only by word of mouth, but in their railing and lying pamphlets. Many a good man may say, "I was the song of the drunkards," Psal. lxxix. 12. Ask the drinking-schools, if no such doctrine of hell be heard there. While we play upon David's harp to ease their griefs, they cast their spears and javelins to wound us. What Paul bids put from them, Eph. iv. 31, they delightfully call to them. Serpents, not only deaf to our charming, but turn their tails to sting us.

Nor let the great ones, whose authority should punish these abuses, think to escape; there be often pasquils to cast aspersions on their noble names. Whereas honour is a curious parcel, gilt, laid on with God's own finger, which no lewd tongue may scandalously lick off. For us, our contempt is not enough, unless it be chanted in rhyme. It is Joseph's party-coloured coat, composed of all kinds of graces and blessings, that procures their hatred. Such is the world's desperate policy, to vex them whom God hath blessed. But the Lord takes them into his special tuition; and if any shall hurt his faithful witnesses, there goes a fire out of their mouths to devour their enemies, Rev. xi. 5. "Destroy all them that afflict my soul," saith David, Psal. cxliiii. 12: not that he would have it so, but because he knew it must be so. A man had better anger all the witches in the world, than one of the saints; for God often forbears offences against his own majesty, when he plagueth offences against his little ones.

5. He that would not be vexed with evils, let him turn his eyes and ears another way: be not fond to be grieved; no man is bound to seek his own vexation. Therefore nunc te melioribus offer; let us frequent their company, where in seeing and hearing we may reap comfort. But how shall we know them? They have not such marks, as Du Bartas describes Cain's supposed horse; and he may deceive others, that cannot but deceive himself; yet the wise heart may discern them. By the innocency of their actions, sobriety of their speeches, disesteeming gain, coldness after pleasures, ardour in God's cause, you may distinguish them; as by sparks rising from a heap of embers, you may know there is fire within. So did the saints leave such repining tumults, and resort to places of sanctity and benediction. If we fall, here be they that shall raise us; if we stand, that shall confirm us; if we complain, that shall comfort us. Sorrows divided among many, are borne more easily: many small brooks meeting and concurring in one channel, will carry great vessels. By their reproofs we shall know ourselves: we are blind in our own imperfections, therefore we borrow the eyes of our friends, lending them ours; so we mutually direct and correct one another.

There are two helps to goodness; the praises of an enemy, and the reprehensions of a friend. He that shall take from friendship the liberty of a modest reproof, leaves nothing to distinguish it from flattery. To see men in troops fill the courts of God; to hear the melodious harmony of his praises, the volleys of invocations sent up to his glorious name; to behold the charitable contributions to the poor, the holy emulations to exceed in good works, all like bees labouring to bring honey to the hive of the church; where wrongs are pardoned, good men encouraged, the gospel honoured, and the will of God obeyed: O here is an object worth our seeing and hearing, which instead of vexing, shall delight our righteous souls: lifting up our desires to heaven, where all good works are done with perfection; where we shall see and hear what we shall never be weary of seeing and hearing: see the glory of God, hear the melody of angels, the joy of all saints, and be both ravished in the pleasure, and confirmed in the eternity of them.

To conclude; we that have grieved others, let us now be grieved for it ourselves. It was an impotent and childish passion in Honorius, to be more grieved for a paltry hen, than for his imperial city. Yet if we can more lament the departure of a friend into bliss, than the departure of Christ from our own souls; and be more heartily troubled with a convulsion of body, than with dishonouring our conscience; if every trifling inconvenience of our own have power to rack us, when the dishonour of God cannot move us; wonder we no more at Honorius. We may howl for corn and wine, Hos. vii. 14, but in vain; our true tears and sobs should be for our sins. We are yet in the day, yet in the way; let us husband aright this blessed opportunity, the only certain hour of our visitation. O let us not play out the candle, and go to bed darkling; nor consume our lives in folly, and go to the grave in ignorance; like boys that slubber out their books before they have learned their lessons. That sudden conversion of one at the last, was never intended in God's purpose for our temptation. If every man should run on in sin, till he meet unexpected mercy, because one in sin obtained mercy; then every man might as well spur his beast till it speak, because Balaam's beast did once speak.

Could we be sure that God would call us at the last, yet how unsweet were our sacrifice, the bran and dregs of our dotage, the wine and flour being consumed in folly! whereas the good man is the older the better, as Christ kept the good wine till the last. If we repent when we cannot sin, all is necessary: they leave us, we leave not them; nothing is here voluntary. What equity is it to lay the heaviest burden on the weakest beast; to force old age, too weak to bear itself, to carry the load of our repentance? When that strong man is grown stronger by prescription, our tabernacle rotten by corruption, when custom hath turned vice into nature, and sin is soaked into substance, our bones being full of the faults of our youth, we would then repent; we would if we could. But as he that never went to school will hardly, when he is put to it, read his neck-verse; so he that never learned the doctrine of repentance in his life, will find it very hard, if not impossible, at his death. Wine at first drawing is quick and lively; when it runs low, it grows dead. Let us give God our youth, that is livelihood, and pleasing to him; not when our life runs on the tilt, the lees and dregs of old age. Heaven is not unlike Ahasuerus' court, no mourners are suffered there; all joyful guests in their wedding garments: we must either mourn on earth, or mourn in hell. Thus we that have vexed the Spirit of God, and the eyes and ears of others by our sins, let us now please the Spirit of God by our repentance, and rejoice the eyes and ears of others by our amendment. Wretched men if we defer our repentance; wretched, if we repent not our deferring! Let us repent as soon as we can, yea, and repent for this, that we have repented no sooner. In a word, howsoever in indifferent things it be held safe to hear, and see, and say nothing; yet in gross and scandalous evils let us not be silent: so if we cannot mend others, yet, with Lot, we shall save our own souls in the great day of Christ.

"Vexed his righteous soul." I come from the kindlers to the fire itself. Zeal is a fervency of spirit, arising from a mixture of love and anger, say some. It is not a single affection; that were to confine it, rather than define it: there are more affections exercised in it than love. Nor yet is it a mixed affection; that were rather to compound it than comprehend it. It is not one affection, nor many, but a fervent heat of all; as varnish is no one colour, but that which polisheth all. It makes a man to love what he loves, excessively; to desire what he desires, passionately; to hate what he hates, deadly: his sorrows be not remiss, but bitter and racking; his joys not transient and overly, but ravishing; when he hopes, his eyes are dim with waiting; when he fears, all his bones feel a trembling and shivering. To be cold or lukewarm is not an affection, but a constitution: so zeal is no nature, but a temper; a spiritual heat wrought by the Holy Ghost, improving all sanctified affections for the glory of God. As the spirits are to the body, and wine to the spirits, and quickness to the wine, so is zeal to the soul, making it vigorous and strenuous in God's service, like a giant refreshed with wine, Psal. lxxviii. 65. Faith and zeal are the soul's two wings, whereby she is made resembling the angels; who are armed with wings, and called a flame of fire, for their burning and flying execution of God's hests. It is zeal that helps us to do what we pray, the will of God in earth as it is done in heaven. This zeal is the axis, the hinge, the life-blood that runs in every vein of the text; a burning fire in the heart of Lot, that gives him mettle to contest with God's enemies; and because he cannot amend them, he vexeth his own soul. His example teacheth us three observations of zeal; that it doth prove our righteousness, improve our righteousness, and honour our righteousnesses.

1. It is the argument of a righteous man, to be far from coolness in his Maker's service. "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might," Eccl. ix. 10. Doth this become us in other things, and misbecome us in the worship of God? Shall a man eagerly follow his lusts, and not be violent for the kingdom of heaven? The slothful hastens his own beggary in temporal things, much less shall he be rich in the graces of Christ. He that hath but a mean skill in the most excellent art, is never admired: a man had better never poetize, than only rhyme; never paint, than do no more but daub: as good no religion, as coldness in the best religion. Shall we, like those Jewish elders for the centurion, be instant for a friend, and cold for our heavenly Father? He is worthy of infinitely more love than we are able to give: all our brooks and springs of affection ought to run into this main; not one small channel be suffered another way. Let all reflect upon him, and nothing be respected out of him, of whom, for whom, and through whom, are all things.

How unbrookable is dulness in any work to a man of spirit! A heavy and saltless oration is insufferable to a quick hearer. We single out the forwardest deer in the herd, choose the liveliest colt in the drove; and think we the backwardest man fit enough for God? Will he that is all Spirit, be pleased with a leaden and drowsy service? He bids the giver, give cheerfully; the doer, do quickly. He forbade the Israelites to offer the firstling of an ass, Exod. xxxiv. 20: why so? doth God hate the ass? No, but for the quality of the creature; it being the hieroglyphic of slowness: to show that God cannot abide tardity in his business. It is lazy to go, we are bid to run the way of his commandments. As sails to the ship, and wind to the sails, so is fervency to righteousness. A soldier without courage, a horse without mettle, a creature without vivacity, such is a Christian without fervency.

2. It doth also improve righteousness; like the fire which came down from heaven upon the sacrifices, causing the sacrifices to ascend thither in acceptance. Righteousness hath no grace, but this fervency makes it more gracious. Repentance is one primary grace; yet if a man's sorrow be not fervent, it is like a hot summer shower, that makes the streets stink after it. Faith is a fundamental grace, should overcome the world; it will prove but a coward without fervency. Hope, the waiting-maid of glory, will soon fall asleep, if zeal keep not her eyes open. Love without fervency is cold and dull, and as it were enforced; and you cannot extort love. Relief of the poor is left-handed without this; no reward belongs to it. It is only fervent prayer that prevailleth, Jam. v. 16. Israel had never wrestled, or wrestling, not prevailed with God, but by fervency. It was no perfunctory devotion in Moses, that caused the Lord to answer, Let me alone. No vapours ascend up from the still, unless there be fire under it; nor prayers reach heaven without the heat of zeal. Fluminal baptism is but a cold proof of a man's Christendom, except this fluminal baptism of fire and zeal approve it, Matt. iii. 11. The worship of God without this, is like meat dressed by an uncleanly cook, it will not down with him. Let a table be furnished with the choicest viands the season affords, if they be boiled or roasted to the halves, or stand on the board till they be lukewarm, the guests will not be pleased with their cheer.

Fervency is that mark which God would have us set on all his services, that so they may be discerned to be his own: as the name of a famous tradesman doth sell his commodity, so the mark of zeal crowns all our works. If the colour be pale, the motion insensible, and the pulse leave beating, we give a man for dead; the moving of these argue life. They whose actions want heat and colour, that give unwillingly, that do justice constrainedly, appear dead. It is fervency that makes a difference of actions: we have all alike precious faith, the seeds of all graces are in every convert; the inequality is in the degrees, the degrees are seen in the fervency. This makes men differ in grace, as stars do in glory, or as humane men in blood and dignity.

3. It honours righteousness: many thousands have been righteous, whose names are not on record; but of those that have been zealous in their piety, the Scripture takes special notice. Our apostle having spent one whole verse upon the commendation of Lot's fervency, in vexing himself for their sins, is not so content; but exegetically presseth it further, exemplifies it in particulars, showing that a righteous man is better than his neighbour. The righteous are the best of the world, the fervent are the best of the righteous. It is true of zeal, as of fire; the nature of it is to multiply, as one coal kindles a whole heap, and one torch lights many. Elisha calls Elijah, the horsemen and chariot of Israel, 2 Kings ii. 12; in the plural number, to show that he was one man worth a thousand; doing God more service than a Jesuit doth the pope, or a hypocrite Satan. It is not unlikely that David's zeal made him styled, A man after God's heart.

But do we thus honour our righteousness, that God should honour us? If at the same time come several news; one, some loss of our own estates; the other, of some apostatized Christians; which doth now most vex us? We hear at once God's name blasphemed, our own name traduced; which most stirs us? We perceive trade decaying in England, the religious professors of the gospel bleeding in France and Germany by the sword of a cruel enemy; which of these goes nearest to our hearts? When some unruly youngers were sporting in the field on the sabbath day, a churl fretted and stormed at it; an honest neighbour did also dislike it, that they so little regarded the sabbath: Tut, quoth the other, what tell you me of the sabbath? it vexeth me, that they have spoiled my corn. In carnal things we are very sensible; in spiritual, without feeling. Men carry swords, and stand on terms of reputation, on the least cross word they are ready to cut one another's throat; confessing their lives to be little worth, not so much as a word. Let God be dishonoured a thousand ways, they are as stupid as the stones they walk on; if they take any part, it is against their Maker. Be the honour of their own house questioned, their weapons fly like lightning: let God's house be pulled down to the ground, all their help is, to carry away the timber and the stones. They heat the furnace seven times hotter in their own cause than they do in God's cause.

But will the Lord multiply his favours upon such? Husbandmen cast their seed on the fruitfullest ground, which will return them the best harvest; and God his graces on such as will improve them. When judgment covers the earth, who shall then be delivered but the zealous Lots? God will preserve them, as men do their plate, while they let the baser stuff burn. For their fervency in goodness, was Enoch translated, and Elijah advanced in a triumphant chariot to heaven. However all believers have their places in blessedness, yet He that rewards all according to their works, observes that congruity in crowning his own graces, that the most zealous in this world shall be the most glorious in the world to come.

"Vexed his soul." As this was no common fervency, so no counterfeit: he little dissembles whose soul is moved. Zeal, like the king of Israel, hath many shadows, therefore we must distinguish it from all semblances. There be false fires, which while they usurp the honour of it, rather bring an ill name upon it. How common a thing is it to wound all holiness under the name of puritan; whereof convinced, they think to make amends with, Cry you mercy, I meant the hypocrite: as the ruffian strikes a man first, and then excuses it, that he mistook him. Besides, it cannot be denied, but some have taken on them this order, greater than the knights of Malta, or of St. John of Jerusalem, that have disgraced it by an unworthy deportment of themselves. And some, after it hath served their turns, leave it; as the door, when it hath been oiled, leaves the creaking. For their sakes, the name of goodness is blasphemed all the day long, an ill report and suspicion raised upon them that serve God in truth: so for the deceiver's fault, the true man is beaten. There is in the body the native and radical heat, a principal instrument of life; and there be often anguish and distempered heats, that cause sickness and death.

There be some that vex themselves out of envy: Lot did not so. The poets feign this affection to be born of Styx and Pallas: they meant, inspired into men by Satan, and those envious devils. This is a black zeal, reckoned among the works of the flesh: see 1 Cor. iii. 3; Acts v. 17; Gal. v. 21; Jam. iii. 14; 1 Cor. xiii. 4; Rom. xiii. 13. These are not pure tapers, shining clear, and giving light; but brinish and ill-made candles, that sparkle and spet at others. Lot vexed himself because he saw men bad; these, because men are good: not that God's law is broken, but because others keep it better than themselves. It is the cursed zeal of these men, to malign the good zeal of all men.

There be that vex themselves out of choler; robustious men, transported with intemperate passions. We do not read that Lot was cruel and turbulent, vexing others; but he vexed himself. Severity should never be but by compulsion, and then not without compassion. Christianity abhors cruelty, and rather wisheth with that happy queen, that it knew not how to write a sentence of condemnation. It is for the malignant church to satiate herself with gore: nothing but fire and faggot is the voice of Rome. This is a wolvisch fervency, to feed on no diet but the warm blood of the lambs. Poor sheep are the subject of their tyranny: to the lion they are as submiss and fawning as dogs; over the rest they rage and domineer, like the sea in a storm. Whereas the thunder spares the yielding purse, and melts the resisting metal; descends not to the low cottages, but strikes the towering pinnacles. The sons of thunder dare check the highest and greatest; as John did Herod, and Jonah Nineveh. But these, like bustards in a fallow field, cannot raise themselves without a whirlwind; and then, like squibs in a throng, they fly out on all sides. This turbulent fervour is bred of two causes; the defect of love and humility, the excess of passion and imperiousness. As spirits, that being once conjured up, scorn to keep within their own circles. A wildfire, no hearth can hold it: it is mettle in a headstrong horse; and runs like the weights of a clock when the spring is broken.

There be that vex themselves without cause, and strike an Israelite instead of a Sodomite, their friends for their enemies. A contentious zeal: Sheba blows a trumpet, and suddenly they are up in arms. Alas! against whom do you fight, ye sons of debate? Brethren against their own mother's children? You are brethren, wrong not one another in the sight of your Father, in the arms of your mother. What way is this, but to advance the name of Mahomet in the temples of Jesus? But to come nearer home; how hath antichrist got ground by our dissensions! The unnatural coldness of some, and the preternatural heat of others, hath set us together by the ears about trifles; while the common enemy breaks in: and we have poured those vials of indignation one upon another, which should all be spent upon the seat of the beast. While the devil can busy men about ceremonies and circumstances, he hopes they will let him alone about the principal, which is faith and manners. Alas! they are not worth our vexation; we have made him too much sport already. How doth St. Paul beat down their weapons! Rom. xiv. 4, 10. Let our zeal come in to part, not to partake the fray; all endeavouring and praying, that peace may be within the gates of Zion.

There be that vex themselves out of hypocrisy; they have other ends than God's glory. Ostentation leads them more than conscience: they will offer violence to nature, wring out a show of fervency; but all is on the stage. When such a furious Orlando hath done his part, he is quite another man. These be histrionical professors, that bounce at the gate as if they would break down the house; more violent than a Jesuit in the pulpit. There is nothing more liable to suspicion, than a fantastic affectation of zeal. A horse-courser's jade will bound, curvet, and show more tricks, than a horse of good mettle. "Come, see my zeal for the Lord," says Jehu, 2 Kings x. 16: his word was, "for the Lord;" but his project was for the kingdom. It is not a little art to hide art: let me tell them that love to be marked for the religious, by the white of their eyes, audible sighs, unfashionable garments, (as if this were, not to fashion themselves to the world, Rom. xii. 2,) by conspicuous places in the church, and ruffling their leaves for proofs; that the best zeal is to hide zeal. The preacher in the pulpit, or the painter in the windows, must proclaim their benevolences: this is far from Christ's rule. Comets make a greater blaze than fixed stars; reed, than substantial fuel. A fever breeds flushings, and is more seen in the face, than natural warmth at the heart.

There be that vex themselves out of ignorance; for there is a zeal not according to knowledge. Thus a devout papist vexeth himself, that his adored idols should be held as puppets, and that the pope's supremacy is curbed. The separatist vexeth himself, that all reformed churches receive not his innovation; that his sect-master should not be set at the stern to guide the whole vessel. Blind they are, and led by the blind; whose errors they first imitate, then inherit. Out of this ignorance, Satan hammers them like swords and pistols, to raise tragedies; till they become, like the Turk's janizaries, his best soldiers. Here is a pitiable fervency, like mettle in a blind horse, or a sting in an angry bee. If their eyes were opened, and their zeal directed, they might be special instruments of God's glory. The Stoics would pull out the gall and bowels, as if they had no use to serve virtue. Not so; they are bad masters, but good servants. Let anger remain still, but stand in awe of reason: as a soldier, that at the command of his captain takes up and lays down his weapons. There are three affections in the soul, like three minerals in the earth, salt, sulphur, and mercury. Wit is like salt; anger like sulphur; affability like mercury. These well tempered and allayed, are necessary and helpful, otherwise noxious. If wit whet itself to justify mischief, if anger be not qualified by reason, if affability turn to flattery, if all be not directed by knowledge, they run to danger. When the ship is under sail, with a fair way, and a forewind, then look to the steerage, keep the watch, have an eye to the compass and landmarks. The angels are said to have eyes to guide their way, as wings to maintain their flight. Turn Paul's zeal to the right, and he did not so much hurt before as now he will do good.

Thus true Christian fervency hath divers counterfeits, which brings honest zeal into suspicion with the world. But shall men tax all the apostles because of one Judas? or admit no fire into their houses, because some sparks are unruly, and will not keep their own hearths? The very name of a counterfeit presupposeth an original: he that hears of a false Christ, takes it granted that there is a true. Slip-coin warrants us that there is of that stamp current money. The best drugs have their adulterates; and let not men that have been deceived by base colours, despise those that be dyed in grain. This we may safely conclude, that that virtue which even hypocrites put on to grace them, is, questionless, some rare and admirable thing. The true Lot, whose fervency is in the Spirit, not in show; in substance, not in circumstance; for God, not for himself; guided by the word, not by humour; tempered with charity, not driven with turbulence: such a man's praise is of God, though it be not of men; and through all contempts on earth, it shall find a glorious reward in heaven. But as St. Paul said of his countrymen, "I bear them record that they have a zeal of God, but not according to knowledge," Rom. x. 2; so I must invert it of my countrymen, I bear them record, that they have a knowledge of God, but not according to zeal. Now the Lord rectify our zeal by our knowledge, and heat our knowledge by our zeal; that every man of a Philemon may be made a Zelotes, of a faithful servant on earth a glorious saint in heaven.

"That righteous man." This is the singularity of his zeal. One Lot will be righteous amongst and against all Sodom; and express this righteousness in the midst of their vicious customs. It hath been the lot of fervent holiness to be rare, as to be excellent: adherents may hearten, opposites must not dash zeal out of countenance. It is the common remora to all forwardness of profession, the small number of such: why should I attempt more than others? Few indeed there be that stand with all their might for religion, and few there be that shall be saved. He is unworthy of heaven, that will not live well without company, nor do good but by example, nor move a step before his neighbours. Cowards stand still looking who should go first; and they are mere jades that will not go except the way be led them. He was a brave and bold Israelite, that first did set his foot into the channel of the sea, leading the rest all along that moist and uncouth walk: he a soldier of courage, that first mounts the breach. Yea, resolute spirits will cast lots for the onset, and show willingness to desperate services.

The fear of trouble is a poor hindrance to godliness, where faith looks unto the preserver and reward. The fearful stand in the fore-rank of them that are cast into the lake, Rev. xxi. 8: they have been most backward to goodness, therefore shall be foremost in vengeance. The timorous snail puts out her horns to feel for danger, and pulls them in again without cause. It is an ill modesty that suffers another to outgo him in the way to bliss; like some travelling jade, that hearing another horse come after him stands still till he overtakes him. True faith neither fears to do well, nor to reprove those that do ill. But there be few so good. Yet Lot was good alone, none to go before him, none to go with him, none to come after him, in all Sodom. No man can say so with us, for we see some zealous of God's glory. And if there be any, true emulation will single out the best patterns. How dearly is one content to buy a choice principal, or some rare copy!

He that intends to be a good artist, propounds to himself the most exquisite master and lesson. God limits us to no ordinary stint of holiness, but bids us aim at perfection; if we can, to go beyond all that have gone before us, yea to come (if possible) close up to Christ, 1 John iii. 3. From this point we may well gather three duties.

1. So near as we can to make choice of the good; for man naturally produceth works conformable to the objects before his eyes; as Jacob's sheep brought forth lambs according to the colour of the pilld rods. A good example hath not so much power to make us good, as a bad one hath to make us evil. One man sick of the plague will sooner infect ten sound ones, than ten sound men can cure him. The flocks feeding among the bushes will leave some of their wool behind them: it is hard to live in the forest of impiety, and to reserve integrity. Sin upon earth is in its own soil, grows without planting, or any pains bestowed on it; much more when it is manured with applauses and practice. But virtue is like some precious seed fetched from Paradise, which will hardly grow here without special care and indulgence. It is not safe venturing among the wicked in confidence of our own strength; no more than it is to run among thieves, in hope that they will not rob us. How many breathe in this world, like men sleeping in a boat, carried down the stream even to their grave's end, without waking to think where they are! Therefore, if we may be our own disposers, seek we our lot among the righteous. The situation of Jericho may be good, but the waters are naught: he that goes from Jerusalem to Jericho, soon lights among thieves: to leave holy company for base commodity, is a quench-coal to righteousness. "Can one be warm alone?" Eccl. iv. 11. Can one single coal keep itself from going out? He that forsakes the orb of heat and fervour, the congregation of saints, must needs take cold.

2. If, like Lot, we be necessitated to the society of bad people, yet let us be good still; yea, therefore the more holy, because in the midst of a perverse generation, shining as lights in a dark place, Phil. ii. 15. The colder the climate, the more piercing the air, the more doth a man's natural heat fortify itself within: their palpable wickedness caused Lot inwardly to vex himself. Every visible act of vice should be our encouragement to virtue. The dissolute lavishness of many prodigals makes the wary man still the better husband. And it is the tradesman's policy, by engrossing a commodity in the plenty and neglect of it, to enrich himself when a year of dearth shall come. It made Erasmus more studious, by seeing the monks such illiterate dunce; as the good knife is made sharp by the dull whetstone. The Christian will be good and devout, like Daniel, though alone; though with the emperor's and the world's opposition; though he seem a prodigy among men, the pointing of all fingers. We "are for signs and for wonders in Israel," Isa. viii. 18. Signs and wonders, where? even in Israel. If it were a wonder to see a family serving God in Israel, what is it in Sodom! If a miracle in Jerusalem, how much more in Babylon! But as he that stands upon a hill, where the air is clear, and sees the fields round about beaten with tempests, the valleys full of fogs and mists, doth not seek to change his station for being alone, though he be remarkable to every eye; let our hearts be aloft, fixed on Christ; and albeit we are exposed to the world's derision, yet we shall bless God for our deliverance from the world's malediction.

3. Let us follow the examples of the best, not of the most. Who had not rather be righteous with one singular Lot, than perish with all ungodly Sodom? Neither have we him alone, but even a cloud of witnesses, that have been faithful among the dissolute; a pillar of fire (in many blessed precedents) that went before directing us the way to Canaan. The church is full of those holy acts and monuments: the confession of Christ before Pontius Pilate, the profession of the apostles before the world's tyrants, the bold testimony of the martyrs at their stakes. O let the very pictures of their fires warm our hearts, and inflame our constant zeal to do, and (if God will) to die as they did, that we may come to the place where they are. If we find a living Lot among us, fasten we our eyes upon him; let his sprightly example put us forward. He is a dull jade that will not follow: a brangling hawk in the company of high flyers will mend her pitch, and make her point: the society of the prophets is able to make even a Saul prophesy. Yea, let us learn to be righteous even by a man of meaner grace: a good mettled horse seeing but a jade in the company put forward, springs out and is scarce restrained. No free spirit but is ambitious of a transcendence in lawful endeavours. At Silas' coming, Paul burnt in the Spirit, Acts xviii. 5: a lesser stick may fire a billet, a little candle lights many torches. But these great examples, how should they work in us great zeal! So the Stoics defined zeal; The emulation, without envy, of something good. Thus Alexander was stirred up with the fame of Achilles, Cæsar of Alexander; Cicero with the eloquence of Hortensius, Demosthenes of Isocrates. The zeal of the Corinthians provoked many, 2 Cor. ix. 2: let this good man's provoke us, that we may provoke others; helping them that come after us, as we have been holpen by those before us, toward heaven.

"From day to day." This is the constancy of his zeal; it was not mutable. The fixed stars are ever like themselves, whereas meteors and vapours have no continued light: the wicked may have some aguish fits, and lunatic moods. To run with the stream, or sail with the wind, or like the marigold to open only with the sunshine, is no praise of piety. Give me that Job, that will be as honest a man among his thousands, as under the rod, when the number of his present ulcers exceeds his former riches. To shoot up like the corn on the house-top, by the favourable influence of great persons; for a Saul to prophesy no longer than he is among the prophets; or for a Joash to be good only while Jehoiada lives: that which depends upon human supportations, is but like Ephraim's, a transitory goodness. Thus you have some rash riders; at their first exerunt they gallop amain, till within some few miles they tire, and are overtaken by the slow pack-horses. The hasty girds of profession are seldom durable; sudden showers have sudden ends. And whereas the sun and all natural motions are swiftest toward their end, these begin hot in the spirit, and conclude stone-cold in the flesh. Their religion is but a blaze, which quickly goes out in smoke and smother. True fervency, like the vestal fires, or the fire of the altar, is never extinguished. To be hot to-day, and cool to-morrow, gives little assurance of Lot's fervency.

Would we know the means to maintain a constant righteousness, to be good, yea better, from day to day? 1. Pray instantly. Prayer and zeal, like water and ice, naturally produce one another. Fervency enliveneth prayer, and prayer increaseth fervency. At heaven-gate he that does not knock mainly, knocks vainly. This God will hear, yea, if it should want a tongue, so it want not a heart. As Christ, though he heard not the words of Zaccheus, yet he perceived his desire to invite him, therefore invited himself, Luke xix. 5. Thus he breathes more grace into our soul, that breathed our soul into our body. 2. The ordinary fuel to maintain it, is preaching; sermons being so many bellows to increase this holy flame. 3. Reading the word hath a special place: no devout soul ever returned from that exercise, but his soul was more warmed. 4. Meditation perfects the rest. Contemplate that infinite Majesty, the apparition or shadow whereof fired Moses more than the burning bush. Let but the unfolded heavens give way to Stephen's eyes, to behold Christ in the glory of his Father, how willing is he to ascend by that stony passage! These be the accustomed meals of the good soul, that will keep natural heat from decaying. When thou goest to bed, rake up thy fire, wrap up thy devotion with prayer; so in the morning thou shalt find it ready to cheer thy heart.

Discontinuance of good duties hath lost men much virtue: to bethink the cause betwixt God and ourselves only by snatches, when we have nothing else to do; or to read the Bible by fits, only upon rainy days; here may be a smattering, to maintain table-talk, but not enough to keep life and soul together. Let not men plead want of leisure, they have somewhat else to do; for there is one thing necessary, to which, as to the king's business, all the rest must vail and stand by. From our most serious labours we can steal some hours for our pleasure: is there no time to be spared for God and our soul? Oh that men should think one sabbath more tedious than ten holidays! Nor let those flatter themselves with sufficiency, that present themselves in the temple twice every Sunday; let God have some of the devotion at home, and by themselves. The king's ordinary servants do not only wait on festival days, but are always ready in the presence to be commanded. True love is most passionate without a witness: he that humbles himself before the Lord alone, betwixt them two disburdens his heart, weeps, prays, begs mercy, hath some proof of his Christianity. Our families, beds, boards, walks, and meetings must witness our devotion as well as our temples: this is the daily work of Christians.

I know the soul hath its satiety as well as the body; and fire may be oppressed with too much wood; nor doth God so require men to serve him, as to be unmerciful to themselves. He that hath done his work honestly, may go to play merrily. But this is rare, to find a man offending on the right hand. Nor let the derisions of Sodom cool this religious heat; a wise man will not be scoffed out of his money, nor a just man be flouted out of his faith.

One caution; when we have thus heat ourselves, let us beware of taking cold again. The fire is put out either by the subtraction of fuel, or pouring on of water. Sin is the quench-coal; he that voluntarily admits it, or does not suddenly repent it, endangers the cessation of zeal. When we have done a sin, till we repent truly, we serve God but coldly. He whose very hunger hath tempted him to steal a lamb, says but a cold grace to his supper. How the oppressors and defrauders of this city give thanks to God for their wealth, I refer to your thoughts and their own consciences. Sin is worse than a thief in the candle, or an obstruction in the liver. A deadly sin clapped on the heels of late devotion, is like a sudden cold after a violent heat; dangerous, if not mortal. Let us beseech him that hath begun a good work in us, to finish it; that we be not vexed with sin to-day, and pleased with it to-morrow; but that our lusts may drop from us like leaves in autumn, and our graces enjoy a perpetual spring, through the sap and life of all goodness, Jesus Christ.

Thus I have run through the main scope and other passages of the text; and yet some further instruction remains, if your good construction will admit it. Three things I take leave to consider; a question, an illation, and a conclusion.

Lot was vexed in soul, inwardly grieved; but was his zeal confined to his own breast? Did he smother it from the Sodomites? How could they then be convinced of their crimes, or know his dislike of their foul courses? Certainly, that holy man did not keep it in, but manifested it to them on all just occasions. Fire in Jeremiah's bones will make him weary of forbearing; and new wine, if it have no vent, will burst the vessels. We may justly suspect that zeal that is never manifest: let men talk what they will of their honest hearts, whilst they have dumb mouths and lame hands. Faith will open the lips, and he that loves God cannot but speak for him. Nicodemus was but cold when he stole to Christ by night; but when he buried Christ by day, his fervour broke forth like unsuppressed love. It was hard enough for Obadiah, to hide his religiousness in his bosom, as he did the prophets in a cave. Profession is the relative to faith; with the heart we believe, with the mouth we confess, Rom. x. 10. Some confess and believe not, such are hypocrites; some believe and confess not, such are timorous cowards; some neither confess nor believe, such are atheists; some both believe and confess, these are sound-hearted Christians. Fire cannot be smothered, it will either find a vent, or go out: true righteousness never wanted words or deeds to declare itself. David often professed not only to praise God, but in the great congregation: both for them that cannot, and for them that will not. But, "Hast thou faith? have it to thyself before God," Rom. xiv. 22. What then? Be present at mass, communicate with the wicked in their idolatries; because faith may still be firm before God? No, Paul speaks of the faith that concerns indifferent things; otherwise, he that expresseth not his faith before men, hath denied the faith before God.

Earnest affections will find a tongue: if it be low water, the mill may stand; but a strong current will set it a-going. If the spring of zeal be wound up in the heart, the wheels will be kept in motion. It is not enough to keep our religion within doors, to tumble over a few orisons while we are dressing or undressing ourselves, half asleep, half awake; nor to observe a short perfunctory form and stint, as mill-horses do their round, or pack-horses their pace: such coward soldiers are not for Christ's standard. They must be those that dare hazard themselves to many troubles; a fire not quenchable by the world's buckets, but consuming their own and others' corruptions. So Chrysostom conceives the apostle, as a man made all of fire, walking in the midst of stubble. The sluggard hears of a lion, and quakes; tell Samson and David, they will go out to meet him. Let Agabus tell Paul of bonds at Jerusalem; he answers, "I am ready not to be bound only, but to die at Jerusalem, for Jesus," Acts xxi. 13. The horse neighs at the trumpet, the leviathan laughs at the spear. Tell Luther of enemies in Worms, he will go, though all the tiles of the houses were devils. To carnal friends he says, I know you not; to dissuaders, Get you behind me, Satan. Four comely things are commended by Solomon, Prov. xxx. 30, 31, to which we may add a fifth, stronger than the lion, swifter than the greyhound, nimbler than the goat at climbing upwards; more victorious than a king; it is a resolved Christian, who, armed with faith and zeal, disdains all resistances in his journey to the kingdom of heaven.

If the Sodomites be so condemned for vexing a righteous Lot, what deserve they that vex the true Lot, Jesus Christ the righteous, with their unlawful deeds? Is it not enough that we have once put him to death, but that we must again renew those wounds, and being healed set them bleeding afresh? The Jews were but the instruments of his crucifying, we are the principals: they cried, Crucify him, in the court of Pilate; our sins cried, Crucify him, in the court of heaven. Ours, I say, not the reprobates'; for as his death was not efficient to save reprobates, so their sin was not sufficient to kill him. To despise the blood wherewith we were sanctified, Heb. x. 29; this comes near him. If we ask him concerning his former wounds, he will answer, Thus was I wounded in the house of my enemies; but if concerning these new incisions, by blasphemies, oppressions, &c., he will answer, Thus was I wounded in the house of my friends, Zech. xiii. 6. The least unkindness of a friend pierceth deep: My own familiar friend did me the mischief, Psal. xli. 9. Our latter vexing of him is far worse than the first: his body was then passible and mortal, now it is glorious and immortal: the Jews knew not what they did, we know it and yet grieve him: then he was dead and buried, but he rose again; we bury him in forgetfulness not three days, but all our life, excepting only his mention.

The torments of his passion were unconceivable, incomparable, intolerable; yet it appears by his protestation, that the least wilful sin of a Christian doth more vex him, and strikes more to his heart, than all those dolorous pangs. It is our sin still that keeps him on the rack, and (though he be out of the reach of sorrow, yet) does what it can again to kill the Lord of life. What pleasure can we take in grieving him that is the life of us all? Call not thyself the friend of Christ, if thou delight in that which tormented him. Think of this, you cursing swearers, whom nothing can persuade to be civil, to be men, I say not, to be Christians. You swear away your salvation, curse away your blessing, vex the Lord that bought you. If nothing can assuage your rancour and hell-bred malice, know it had been better for you that there had been no Christ. His first death was for your redemption, but the many deaths you now put him to, is for your greater damnation. If your blind souls could consider this, it would not only mollify your hearts for the sins past, but also terrify you against sins to come. Nor flatter yourselves, that he shall do you good at your death, who have misused him all your life. When that fearful hour comes, you would all then fain go to heaven, and that by Christ: alas, as that despairing pope said, the cross could do him no good because he had sold it away; so how should Christ do you good, who have railed him away? You have vexed him so long as you lived, and his justice shall vex all the veins of your hearts when you are dead. The nearer a man comes to God, the more heartily he detests sin: now if Lot, a man holy but in part, with many infirmities, were thus vexed with iniquity; what an offence must it be to the most righteous God, and Him that died for it, Jesus Christ!

The conclusion. If Lot were so vexed at others' sins, how should we be vexed at our own! For them is required a sorrow of compassion, for ourselves a sorrow of compunction. Come we home to a self-condemnation; we, we have dishonoured God, therefore are to be vexed at ourselves. What is repentance but contrition? what is contrition but a vexation? We that have sinned with Sodom, let us be vexed with Lot. If Lot had not repented his own sins, he had never grieved for theirs; if the Sodomites had been thus vexed, they had not perished. We have sinned; what shall we do unto thee, O thou preserver of men? Job vii. 20. What, but repent and amend? Repentance is the proper medicine for sin; as God hath ordained a salve for every sore. A medicine which cureth the eyes and nothing else, we may say was made for the eyes and for nothing else. A man loseth his wealth, and is sorry for it; will sorrow recover it? He burieth his child, and is sorry for it; will sorrow raise him from the dead? He suffers injury, and is sorry for it; will sorrow right him? Himself is sick, and is sorry for it; will sorrow heal him? nay, will it not rather hurt him? Sorrow then was not made for these things. He hath sinned, is he sorry for that? sorrow now will help him, repentant sorrow will take away his sin. Sin is then the sickness, for which sorrow is the remedy. Direct this lesson to your hearts before you go home to your houses, and digest it before your dinners; have troubled hearts, vexed with sorrow for your sins. Many a one comes into the church a dissolute sinner, that goes out a humble saint; why should I not hope so much of you? This were a blessed effect of a sermon, when the fruit of one hour is no less than eternity of days. A square piece of metal, molten and cast into a round mould, comes out round; a piece of blue put into the scarlet vat, comes forth scarlet. Remember our Saviour's sentence of sin, Except you repent, you shall perish, Luke xiii. 5. If the child cry it lives; so if we can heartily cry for our sins, there is life in us. Thus let us be grieved, that we may be comforted.

VERSE 9.

The Lord knoweth how to deliver the godly out of temptations, and to reserve the unjust unto the day of judgment to be punished.

PROFANE people conceit God to be all of mercy, and cannot endure to hear of his justice; or if they be convinced to acknowledge him also just, yet they measure it by the poverty of their own judgment, and think it pity to destroy a man for his sins. Indeed it pleaseth God to be magnified by his mercies above all his works; and we never find him called the Father of judgments, but often the Father of mercies. Mercy seems to be more properly his than vengeance, for he takes the matter of mercy out of himself and his goodness; but that he punisheth and condemneth, our sins compel him to it. (Bern.) But both are infinite in him that is infinite; and as mercy hath her day in giving time of repentance, so justice must have her day in the retribution of vengeance. All sins are debts, all God's debts must be paid: it is a bold word, but a true; it is in vain to hope for pardon without payment. Every sin must be punished, either in the person of the Saviour, or in the person of the sinner. Too many reckon their own sins as the false steward did his master's debts: of a hundred, they set down but fifty; as if God would not call them to account, because he knew them faithful. Thus they may hide God from themselves, but they cannot hide themselves from God. Do they think that God will be so kind to them as to be unjust to himself? No, the Lord will be just, let them go on and perish. There can be no reconciliation without remission, no remission without satisfaction, no satisfaction but in the blood of Christ. Turn over the book of thy conscience, see if thou canst find that reckoning there discharged. We keep books for expenses, do we keep none for offences? He never breaks his sleep for debt, that pays as he takes up. But careless arrearages shall find a day of reckoning.

That God is not just without mercy, nor merciful without justice, this text proves; which speaks of a deliverance to the godly, to the unjust of vengeance. God indeed is slow to anger, yet he will not acquit the wicked, Nah. i. 3. "So that a man shall say, Verily there is a reward for the righteous: verily he is a God that judgeth in the earth," Psal. lvi. 11. A man, any man, every man shall confess it, none have power to deny it. This is our apostle's conclusion upon the premises: God could preserve the holy angels by his mercy, and confound the apostate angels in his justice; in his mercy saveth righteous Noah, when by his justice he drenched the unrighteous world; justly destroyeth four ungodly cities, and mercifully delivers one just Lot. He that could do such mighty works, in heaven, on earth, in the waters; can as easily still deliver his children, and "reserve the unjust unto the day of judgment to be punished."

The verse contains a pair of thwart sentences, directly opposite, in quality of persons, conditions, and events. Here is the godly, and unjust; a delivering, and reserving; out of temptations, into judgment. God stands in the forefront, and hath two arms stretched forth; one arm to the east, another to the west; one to deliver the godly out of trouble, the other to inflict severe punishment upon the wicked. Here is an enlargement, and an attachment; a delivering out of prison, and a casting into prison; a releasing from present perturbation, and a binding over to a further session. The godly are acquitted, absolved, freed; not reprieved, but quite delivered. The unjust are apprehended, bound over, go as it were under hail; at the general assizes they must make their appearance, and being guilty receive their sentence. This the Judge can do, and will do: he wants not power, for he is "the Lord;" he wants not wisdom, for he "knoweth." His Almighty wisdom, and all-wise power, are extended to both these actions, "The Lord knoweth." The righteous proceeded thus far; they come upon their trial, for temptation is a trial; but not to arraignment, much less to conviction, least of all to condemnation. But being charged by that common barrator, the accuser of the brethren, and thus brought before the Judge, not publicly at a session, but to a private examination, they are found innocent, and delivered. Temptations, like fetters, may hamper and afflict them for a while, but when their cause comes to be heard, and their righteousness appeareth, they are discharged. For the other, their guilt is manifest, therefore the chains of bondage are upon them, which, together with the custody of Omnipotence, shall keep them fast to the day of judgment, and that shall send them to execution, to be punished.

In the enlargement consider these particulars. 1. What, A deliverance. 2. Who are delivered, The godly. 3. From what, Out of temptations. 4. By whom, The Lord doth it. 5. How; we need not examine, it is sufficient, The Lord knoweth how.

First, the matter is a deliverance. It is a great comfort in every distress, to hope for a deliverance; to believe it, greater; to be sure of it, greatest of all. Thus certain is every Christian, by the assurance of faith, grounded on the infallible promise of God. It was promised to Abraham, "In Isaac shall thy seed be called," Gen. xxi. 12: yet must Isaac, before he had seed, be killed; and that by his father's own hand. Here Abraham might reason; I may believe the promise, and not obey the commandment; I may obey the commandment, and not believe the promise; but how can both stand together? But he holds the promise, and obeys God, though all the reason in the earth cannot tell how that promise and that commandment should stand together. Though I know not, and reason know not, yet God knoweth. In human reasoning it is a note of ignorance to stick always to the conclusion; but in spiritual trials this is sound divinity, to hold fast God's promises. Therefore he both believes the one, and obeys the other: this deliverance was above his reason, it was not above his faith. He did not argue, but obey; being sure that what God commands is good, and what he promises is infallible; therefore, careless of the means, he trusts to the end. Daniel is not delivered at the beginning of his trouble; he must first be in the lions' den, then he finds it. Those three servants are not rescued at the oven's mouth; in the furnace they are. That is a gracious, well-trying faith, that can hold out confidence to the last.

Abraham, after that terrible command, must go three days' journey, a tedious extension of his sorrow; and in all that travel no angel meets him with news of a deliverance. He sees the chosen mountain, dismisseth his servants; a strange devotion that will abide no witnesses; none comes yet. All the while the altar is a building, his own heart bleeding, Isaac pleading for his life; none yet. He binds his hands, lays the wood on the altar, the sacrifice on the wood; yet no news. Now having kissed him his last, after many mutual tears, he lifts up his hand to give the fatal blow of death; yet he does not think, perhaps God will relent after the first wound. Lo, now the comfort of Abraham, the hope of the church, lies a killing by the hand of his father; yet there is no revocation. It would have made the bowels of a savage yearn at this spectacle, to see the knife of such a father hanging over the throat of such a son; yet he whom it nearest concerned is least touched; faith had wrought in him, what cruelty would in others, not to be moved. He proceeds, condemning all fears, and overlooking all impossibilities: deliverance he might expect, but he knew not which way it could come; only that the same hand which raised Isaac from the dead womb of his mother, can revive him from those ashes. Now having given Isaac, and Isaac given himself, for dead; the knife is falling upon his throat; now, now comes the deliverance, by an angel calling, forbidding, commending him. Often is deliverance promised, and yet the time not mentioned. They "shall serve the king of Babylon seventy years," Jer. xxv. 11; not a day, not an hour to be bated. "At the end of four hundred and thirty years," Exod. xii. 41: till then Moses undertook it in vain. That very night, Dan. v. 30. Neither did Daniel, that knew the determined time of seventy, till upon the expiration, pray for deliverance.

God defers his deliverance, 1. To return us home: when no man will harbour that unthrift son, he will back again to his father. 2. To make us seek our deliverance in the right place: while money can buy physic, or friends procure enlargement, the great Physician and Helper is not thoroughly trusted unto. 3. To set a better price on his benefits; for suddenly gotten are suddenly forgotten. Abraham's child at seventy years was more welcome than had he been given at thirty; and the same Isaac had not been so precious to him, if he had not been as miraculously restored as given; his recovery from death made him more acceptable than if he had never been in danger. God's charges are often harsh in the beginning, hard in the proceeding, but the conclusion is always comfortable. Spiritual consolations are commonly late and sudden; long before they come, and speedy when they do come, preventing even expectation.

The Lord defers on purpose, that our trial may be perfect, our deliverance welcome, our recompence glorious. Say our temptation be externally afflictive, and we are not delivered from it; our poverty is long, and we shall never be rich; our sickness tedious, and we shall never recover: what now? shall we despair and die? No, but whether he doth deliver us or not, we will serve him; though he kill us, we will trust in him, Dan. iii. 18. Though he hold off long, and suspend our ease, yet deliverance shall come; if not the same way we would have it, yet a way that is better for us. Shall we be sullen, because our desires be not presently granted? as Jonah would die, because he was displeased; Ahithophel, because he was despised; Saul, because he was discomfited. No, death itself shall deliver us; that Red Sea shall put us over to the land of promise; and we shall say to the praise of God, We are delivered.

The persons delivered are the godly. Godliness (according to the propriety of the word) consists in two things; the devout adoration, and sincere imitation, of God. They that worship him as he will be worshipped, and follow him in the things wherein he will be followed, are right godly men. He that worships God aright, adheres to the rule, and believes the reward. Superstition first loves, and then believes; true religion first believes, and then loves. Reverence and zeal become adoration: for a man to mouth a Pater-noster, while his heart is in his coffer; as if he could reconcile those two contrary masters, and at once serve God and mammon; in vain thinks himself godly. When in the temple God scarce hath our knees or our voices, seldom our minds, never tell me of godliness. You are not atheists, to think that he regards your prayers, as he doth the humming of flies and bees; that they be so formal and heartless. The godly man knows that God sees him, sees him in every place, takes special notice of him in the church. Cæsar's eye made his soldiers prodigal of their blood: God's eye and speech to the soul, "Well done, good and faithful servant," makes him work out his heart. Loose thoughts are too bad for common places, intolerable in divine worship. We may observe how God bates of his own service for us; allows us to go from his temple to quench a burning house, or to help a beast out of the pit; and makes homicide the greatest sin upon earth. Now shall he bate of his own glory for our benefit, and shall not we bate of our benefit for his glory? They that either for wantonness or covetousness, much worse for drunkenness, violate the sabbath, which is the time of God's worship, or neglect the church, which is the place of his worship, have little godliness. We are charged to "worship him in spirit and in truth," John iv. 23. The Jews worshipped him bodily, we must also in spirit; they figuratively, we in truth.

Nor is adoration enough without imitation; it is the sum of all religion, to imitate him we adore. He was called a Platonist, that followed Plato's principles; and he that follows the example of God, is godly. Outward holiness must be joined with inward; a man may be a saint at church and a devil at home: true godliness is seen in our own house as well as in God's house; he is far short of godliness, that is not an honest man. It is shame for Christians to learn honesty of pagans; and yet they say, some of us are a form below them. We may know whose children such are by their complexions and conditions: "He that doeth righteousness is righteous," 1 John iii. 7. It was not enough by the Levitical law (whose ground was moral) to chew the cud, but to divide the hoof: our feet must be clean as well as our mouths. While the worship of God sits in our lips, and the dishonour of God is seen in our lives, we might as safe be wholly unclean. Some have the mark of the beast in their hand, some in their forehead, Rev. xiii. 16: whether in the forehead or in the hand, so it be his mark, it is all one to the devil. This commended Job, that he feared God, that is one part of piety; that he eschewed evil, that is the other, Job i. 8. The doctrine of faith is much controverted; and while Satan can raise troubles about faith, he hopes the world will let him alone about manners; and so that the name of Christ may perish from off the earth: but it is a counterfeit faith without obedient and practical godliness.

God's word is first sown in the heart, that seed is rooted in faith, that root brings forth a tree of charity, and that tree bears the fruit of good works. Our persons are justified by our faith, our faith is justified by our charity, our charity by the actions of a godly life. Therefore justify thy faith, that thy faith may justify thee. Faith is an illumination, and many content themselves with an illusion: if we want charity to our brother, there is no faith to our Maker. Some lose themselves by vituperating Christ, as pagans; some even by praising Christ, as profane Christians: these so praise his merits, that they never weigh their own misdemeanours. But do good, and have good: little says the Scripture of the apostles' learning, it speaks much of their acts. It is not the taste of meat that nourisheth, but after concoction the benefit is in the strength. The conscience is not satisfied with reading good things, the comfort it feels is in the practice. Children take after their father; thus to show mercy, is to be godly, Luke vi. 36. Forgive your offenders. Why? God doth forgive you: be as ready to pardon men, as you are ready to desire your own pardon of him. He that walks under a wall in a sunny day, shall be heated by the wall, which first was heated by the sun: if God have forgiven us, the warmth of charity is in us to forgive others. "Be ye holy." Why? Because God is holy, 1 Pet. i. 16. If we find a piece of wax with an impression or mark upon it, we know there hath been a seal, the print whereof is left behind: holiness is the print of God's sacred seal; if not holy, not sealed. God is patient toward sinners; furious avengers of themselves are not godly. He is the God of peace; the sons of malice and contention are far unlike him.

We see who are godly, now these are delivered; they, of all men, out of temptations, because they, of all men, are most subject to temptations. The higher a tree shoots up, the more tempest-beaten: if a Christian grows to any stature and tallness in grace, and sprouts up toward heaven, Satan will raise the sorer storms against him. Some are not troubled with temptations, know not what they mean; ask them, they never felt the devil so busy about them. The more miserable creatures they. No prince makes war against his obedient subjects: should they rebel against Satan's laws, they should hear of him in another kind. But as God said in his justice, "Ephraim is joined to idols, let him alone," Hos. iv. 17; so Satan in his malice, They are joined, united, incorporated to sin, let them alone. They meddle not with repentance, and he meddles not with them; all is peace, Luke xi. 21. Let them take it for the fearful sign of a dead heart, when they feel not the thorn in the flesh, temptation. Fall they to deprecation, cry for pardon of their sins, and seek the kingdom of heaven; then Satan begins to bustle, then temptation upon temptation: Job had not more foes to vex him, than they shall find baits to entice them. Therefore Christ on purpose, to the pardon of sins, annexeth, lead us not into temptation. Not only because, with the pardon of sins past, we should desire the prevention of sins to come; that neither our consciences be stung with the old, nor our concupiscences corrupted further with the new: but because a man's sins be no sooner forgiven, and he rescued from Satan, but that lion foams and roars, and bestirs himself to recover his loss. So that grievous temptations do always accompany the remission of sins. Some suspect themselves to be out of God's favour, because they are so wearied and worried with temptations; but if godliness and temptation be such inseparable attendants on the same person, it is otherwise. For the devil's hatred is to them most, whom God loves best; and where he shows mercy, Satan will exercise malice. So that in the characters of temptations we may spell God's love, which cannot be enjoyed without Satan's disturbance. Yea, howsoever weak consciences have been dismayed at it, one proof of saving grace in us is the exercise of the devil's malice against us.

They that receive from God more graces, are sure of more temptations. Let God testify good of Job, the devil will have a fling at him. If Peter have once the keys, Satan will tempt him to be a Satan to his Master, Matt. xvi. 22. If there be honey in the vessel, the wasps will be busy about it. But as no wise man leaves his house for some flies, but rather seeks to drive them out than they should drive him out; so no good man forsakes his holiness for temptations, but rather resists the devil, as knowing then he will flee from him, Jam. iv. 7. A full barn is better than an empty one, though thieves let this alone, and be pilfering about the other. We do not destroy our roses for the cankers, but rather destroy the cankers from the roses. It is no policy for the traveller to leave off his weapons, because he knows there be thieves in the way. We say, one true man is hard enough for two thieves, one faithful man is able to repel many wicked spirits. Our godliness doth not secure us from temptations, but conquers them. Christ was no sooner come out of the water of baptism, but he enters into the fire of temptation: if he be full of the Holy Spirit, he shall be set upon by the malignant spirit. If God say, "This is my Son;" Satan will say, "If thou be the Son of God," Matt. iii. 17; iv. 3. That Divine testimony did not allay his malice, but exasperate it: the serpent most violently assails him whom God hath honoured.

Neither the gifts of grace, nor the seals of grace, can free us from assaults: we may have force to repel bad suggestions, we have not to prevent them. The more we are engaged to God, by the bonds of our own profession, and the pledges of his favour, so much the more busy is the tempter about us. That Goliath defies none but the host of the living God: if we be once seen in the field, then he is mad, and seeks to wring away our weapons, and with them to wound our own bosoms. Lord, how should we escape that dragon's assaults, when the Son of thy love could not be free? when even to be gracious draws on his enmity, and the profession of a good conscience is the butt for his burning arrows? He that spared not the Head, will not forbear the remoter limbs. If the state of innocence could have been any defence against evil motions, the first Adam had not been tempted, much less the Second.

Nothing should more comfort us than resistance: if we did not stand for the Lord, Satan would not stand against us, Zech. iii. 1; if we were not in a way to do good, we should find no rubs. The devil hath no cause to trouble his own, especially while they go about his business. To sin, he would have our paths smooth, and calm, and pleasant, winning us forward; but if we turn our feet toward Zion, then he encounters us, and blocks up our way with temptations. But it is not the presentment of bad motions that can hurt us, but our entertainment of them. Ill counsel is the fault of the giver, not of the refuser: if we be tempted, as Joseph was by a great lady, and withstand it, we are not the worse, but the better. We cannot forbid lewd eyes to look in at our windows, we may shut our doors against their entrance. If Satan knock, it is in our choice to open: a booty lies in our way, we may choose whether we will stoop and take it up. To suggest evil, is Satan's blame; to resist evil, this is our praise. The more we are tried in the furnace, the purer gold we shall go to the treasury of heaven. Lord, make us as strong as the devil is malicious: say in a sweet spiritual feeling to my conscience, as thou spakest once vocally and audibly to my Saviour, Thou art my son; and let the devil do his worst.

Temptations we understand to be of two sorts; probations, or provocations; trials of suffering, or trials of doing. God tempts, to draw something out of us, and to make it appear; Satan tempts, to put something into us which was not before. It is one thing explorare an sit peccatum, another provocare ut sit peccatum. The former we may properly call examinations, searchings, afflictions; these are of God. The other, incitements, enticements, impulsive motions to sin; these are of Satan. Now this promised deliverance stands in analogy and reference to both these.

For Satan's suggestions: what godly man hath not been wrought upon by temptations; not only to like the bait, but even to swallow it with consent of will? Yet hath it not choked their grace, God hath delivered them. Look upon David, 2 Sam. xi. While his people are busy in the war against Ammon abroad, Satan as busily makes war against David at home; they lay siege to Rabbah, he lays siege to their king. The temptation first takes fire at his eyes, his eyes recoil upon his heart, and his heart burns in the desires of his lust. The tempter so prevails, that he makes him become a tempter, bestowing his own bad office upon him. He sees Bathsheba, inquires after her, sends for her, solicits her to uncleanness. There was store of fair virgins in Israel, yet he must dote upon the marriage-bed: he had many wives of his own, and was not restrained from taking more; yet is not contented saving with the only one of a subject. He was not overcome by the solicitation of a strumpet, but himself was the prosecutor of this filthiness. There is nothing wanting to amplify his sin, and cause our fear. O whither shall we go, if God stay us not? What man among the millions of God's servants was better furnished with preservatives against such temptations? Where could the devil have less hope of prevailing? Yet is this strong man overcome; and as it is hard and rare to commit a single sin, he does not only abuse the wife, but betrays the husband, and teacheth his lust to look with bloody eyes on the life of his faithful servant. If wine cannot work him to father a false seed, the sword of an uncircumcised anatomy shall fall upon him. Thus deep in is David, and falls asleep many months, exchanging the conscience of his sin for the sense of his pleasures. Yet even out of this temptation he is delivered; Nathan shall rouse him, the Spirit shall melt him, his own heart shall smite him; with a wounded soul he shall cry for pardon, detest his wickedness, and find mercy.

In this glass we see ourselves, how apt to be tempted, to go along with it, yea, often to persist in it; yet, withal, God's infinite goodness to deliver us from it. For this we pray, "Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil;" the latter being an exposition of the former: that we be not led into temptation, deliver us from evil; the cause being taken away, the effect ceaseth. The best of God's children may not only be drenched in the waves of sin, but even lie in them for a time; as a man may sink twice to the bottom, yet rise with life in him. But they that belong to the covenant shall be delivered. Saul is tempted, sinneth, and sleppeth in it his last: David is tempted, sinneth, and sleppeth, but not his last. Peter is tempted to conceal, to deny, to forswear his Master; yet one look of Christ delivered him: Judas is tempted to betray him, goes on, and perisheth. The Lord would never have suffered so dear favourites of his, as Lot, David, Peter, to fall so dangerously; if he had not meant to make them universal examples to the world, of not presuming, of not despairing. For how can we presume of not sinning, or despair for sinning, when we find so great saints thus fallen, thus risen? How many years had those ten brethren forgotten their unnatural treachery! Alas, what long and dead sleeps may the holiest souls take in fearful sins! Were it not for God's mercy that thus delivers us out of temptations, we should end our spiritual lethargy in a sleep of death. David in those ten months might have some transient glances of remorse; but no compunction is heard of till Nathan's message, and perhaps had been further adjourned, if that monitor had been longer deferred. God could have sent him sooner, and checked David in his first project of sin: so had Bathsheba been chaste, Uriah alive, and himself guiltless of murder. But that Almighty wisdom knew how to win more glory by the permission than by the prevention, by the permission of one sin to prevent millions. How many thousands had presumed on their own strength, if such a champion had not fallen! How many thousands had despaired in the consciences of their own misdeeds and weakness, if such sins had not found remission! It is happy for all after-times that we have such precedents, so holy sinners, so sinful penitents: their falls have taught us by whom to stand. In a word, many saints have committed as great sins as reprobates: that the one is pardoned, not the other, the difference is not in the quantity or quality of the sin, but in the mercy of God.

Uses. 1. We that pray for deliverance from evil, must endeavour against evil. The best fencer lies close, and is more careful to defend than to offend: while we lie open, Satan hath a fair mark. Rank mirth, gluttony, gaming, and wine, lay a man open. That wine is an inducement to lust, David knew, and therefore gave Uriah such superfluous cups; and it is hard to refuse pledging, where a king begins a health to a subject. This might easily lay him open to evil; the drunkard may be any thing but good. But temptation is then stronger, when it proceeds from a mighty instrument: the requests of princes are commands, their very suits imperative. How many Bathshebas and Jane Shores have thus been wrought to pollute both a royal and matrimonial bed! The countenance of authority is authoritative with many: ask a Romist, whether if the pope command him to kill his sovereign, he is to do or refuse it: perhaps he trifles that the pope will never command it; but put him to it, If; then his answer must be affirmative. If Saul charge a Doeg, he will wreak his spleen on the priests. Let the master tempt his servant, the father his child, their least word is a law. But it will be no excuse to say at last, such a great person tempted me, as Adam said of Eve: it is what that we must regard, not who; the action, not the person: be the mover never so glorious, if his motion be to sin, let it be entertained with defiance. Let us have wary eyes, for it is not the self-appearing devil, but the same a transformed angel, that doth corrupt us.

2. Consider what preventions the provident God useth against our sinnings. How many stays doth Saul find in his pursuit of David: twice he casts his javelin, and missed him; exposed him to the Philistines, but he slew them; Michal was given him for a snare, yet she delivers him; Jonathan is constant to him; Saul hath begirt him, lo then he is delivered by the Philistines' invasion, 1 Sam. xxiii. 27. This found Balaam in his pestilent itch to curse Israel: one night God puts him off; the second time he answers his importunity and bids him go in anger; an angel stands to cross him, his beast turns out of the way; she bruise his foot against the wall, at last falls down under him: many crosses to recall him. How is the other Saul (with his letters missive to vex the church) arrested from heaven! I know there be sudden sins, no sooner thought of than despatched; which is like fire to powder. But in our resolved intentions of doing a sin, if we would mark it, we meet with strange impediments, as Jonah did in his flight; which should make us grow jealous of such enterprises. Some have been frightened from their uncleanness by the tolling of a passing-bell; others diverted from a bad journey, by the sudden lameness of their horse. How often hath God prevented murders by strange accidents! Sometimes he shortens our own arms, sometimes strengthens others against us. Sometimes reason is heard, when religion sits out; and the dishonesty, inutility, or difficulty of a sin is perpend. But it is best, when the fear of God hath corrected us, or the word of God averted us, or the Spirit of God recalled us. By innumerable means doth the Lord stop our precipices, hedge up our ways to sin; that when temptation invites us, we may have hands manacled, and feet fettered with detentions; and we cozen the devil against our wills. He would have us come, and we would come, but (thanks be to God) we cannot come. Let us observe it; as when we are doing well, we have many provocations to alienate our minds from it; so when we are intending mischief, God sends many inconveniences, as it were vocal accidents, to hinder us; as if God should say, Take heed what you do.

3. Let us meditate how we are blessed of God, and have reason to bless God, for these happy deliverances. As St. Augustine: I had time and place to commit sin, but then the tempter was away; thy doing, O Lord, it was that he was away. The tempter was present, but then time and place were wanting; thy doing it was that I wanted time and place. Time and place were convenient, and the tempter was there also, provoking me forward, all opportunities furthering; but then I had no stomach to it, lust was cool, my will had no will to consent: thy doing it was that I was unwilling, that the edge of my appetite was dull. Sometimes I had will, but then I wanted means; sometimes I had means, but then I wanted will; sometimes I had likewise will and means, but then I also wanted ability: another time, means, will, and ability were concurring; but then came in some other interruption; a messenger with sudden business, the distress of a friend, the invitation of a neighbour. Still, O Lord, that I was not led into temptation, nor captivated by suggestion, it was thy doing. Blessed be God, as for his furtherance in good, so for his hindrance in evil. If we be godly, and find these things true, let us enter into our chambers, fall upon our knees, lift up our hearts, and say in humble thankfulness, Lord, thou hast delivered me, I find thy mercy, to thy name be the glory.

4. Lastly, if we love not evil, let us long for our final and plenary deliverance from it; that immortal court, where sin can no more enter, than sorrow or death; out of this the tempter is excluded for ever. Here the Lord delivers us from the damnation and domination of sin, there from the temptation and assault; here it shall not overcome us, there it shall not come near us. "Wretched man! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" Rom. vii. 24. Who? He that now frees us from the burning, will then from the smell of the fire. Here even a saint is but a mixed creature; and the sin which he hath by his generation, fights against the grace which he hath by his own regeneration. This felt St. Paul: and Hierome in his very abstinence; My face was pale, but my heart was flushing, and I had a burning mind in a chill body. Mortal perfection is a vain dream. Aquinas thinks we may fulfil a precept two ways; either perfectly, when we perform the full scope of it; or imperfectly, when we keep the way conducing to the end. (Epist. 22.) But as when the captain bids the soldiers fight and conquer, he that fights and conquers, perfectly doth his will; he that fights and doth not get the victory, comes short of doing his will: and in God's battles, he that conquers not, which is the end, doth certainly fail in the means. Therefore he that sincerely loves God, and detests sin, desireth dissolution for no other end, but to be freed from temptation. The good soldier will fight when he is in the field, but he is contented to have the battle over. This is one benefit that death against his own will shall do us; a perfect delivery from all temptations. In Paradise man had a power not to sin; in heaven he shall not have the power to sin. Satan shall then be bound in eternal chains, never to stir out of that local torment, and the elect be set at triumphant liberty.

For probations, which are the other sort of temptations, or trials by troubles; they are derived from three fountains, and may thus be distinguished, not in propriety of terms, but after the common acceptance. As they come from Satan they are usually called temptations; as they come from man, persecutions; as from God, afflictions. All these are in some manner from the Lord; neither man nor devil can afflict us without God, God can afflict us without them. When we pray not to be led into temptation, we pray not against correction, but against evil; for though Christ makes us invincible, he makes us not invulnerable. All our days are evil, some worse; as the ague hath chief fits, critical days. Some be more grievous sufferings than others; as martyrdom in the extent (for it may be occulta cogitatione, though not aperta passione); and we have cause to bless God that we resist not unto blood. If there were no good in these temptations, they should not come near us; for nothing absolutely evil shall come to a good man. And when they have done the business they came for, they shall leave us: the plaster will not stick on when the sore is healed.

Do they come from the ungodly? Whether Tertullus persecute the church with his tongue, or Elymas with his hand, God hath the command of both. Indeed the wicked are the mediate causes of our troubles: the righteous are as the centre, the other the circumference, Psal. cxviii. 11; which way soever they turn, they find themselves environed; yet still the centre is fixed and immovable, being founded upon Christ. It is good for some men to have adversaries; for often they more fear to sin, lest they should despise them, than dislike it for conscience, lest God should condemn them. They speak evil of us: if true let us amend it; if false, condemn it; whether true or false, observe it. Thus we shall learn good out of their evil; make them our tutors, and give them no pupillage. In all things let us watch them, in nothing fear them: "which is to them an evident token of perdition, but to us of salvation," Phil. i. 28. The church is that tower of David; if there be a thousand weapons to wound us, there are a thousand shields to guard us, Cant. iv. 4. When the angel saluted Gideon, The Lord be with thee; he replied, "If the Lord be with us, how is all this evil befallen us?" Judg. vi. 13. Why do the Midianites vex us? Yes, God may be with us, and the Midianites against us: yea, therefore are they against us, because God is with us. It is neither our shame to suffer what Christ suffered, nor their honour to do as Judas did. (Cypr.) Howsoever they be wicked instruments, yet the just hand is the Lord's. God gave, saith Job: what, and the devil took away? No. The Sabaeans took away? No; but the Lord took away. As when the malignity of a disease is spent, health will return; so when all our adversaries have done their worst, if not before, then God will deliver us. Let Jezebel fret her heart out, and swear by her gods, Elijah must be safe. Let the red dragon spout forth floods of venom, the church hath wings to fly away, she shall be delivered, Rev. xii.

Do they come from God? he chasteneth whom he loveth: storms and afflictions are not from fury without love, but rather from love without fury. "Lord, he whom thou lovest is sick," John xi. 3: Lazarus may be sick and yet Christ love him. The intelligent son knows that his father's correction is no argument of his father's hatred; therefore is silent. "I was dumb, because thou didst it," Psal. xxxix. 9. I was not dumb for that I did, but confessed my sin; but dumb for that thou didst, acknowledging it a just punishment. "In a little wrath I hid my face from thee for a moment," Isa. liv. 8. It is but a little, for a moment: and I hid my face, never turned my heart from thee. Indeed as man is under the law, they are legal punishments; but as under grace, paternal corrections. They are a testimony of his good favour toward us, when by them he separates the sin which he hates from the person which he loves. And this he always so tempers, that it is neither according to our sins, nor exceeding our strengths. Ours? No, but not above God's strength in us. No parent corrects another's child, and he is no good parent that corrects not his own. By this we come to know our friend: three things are not known but in three places; valour, but in danger; wisdom, but in anger; a friend, but in misery. Afflictions have done us this good, that we are sure we have a Friend, a Father in heaven, for we have tried him. Faith understands troubles to be probationis indicia, not reprobationis argumenta. Our life is a web woven by the hand of God, the thread reaching from our birth unto our death. The woof is trouble, but still runs with it a web of interwoven comforts. But if so, then may we not pray for their removal? Yes; "Remove thy plague away from me," Psal. xxxix. 10: thy plague and mine; thine by affliction, mine by passion; thine because thou didst send it, mine because I endure it; thine because it comes from thy justice, mine because it answers my injustice: remit what I have done, and remove what thou hast done. But whosoever laid it on, the Lord will take it off. Be our troubles many in number, strange in nature, heavy in measure; yet God's mercies are more numerous, his wisdom more wondrous, his power more miraculous, he will deliver us out of all, Psal. xxxiv. 19. This doctrine well digested, will breed good blood in our souls, and is useful three ways.

1. To fortify our patience: he needs not fear the trouble, that knows an infallible deliverance. Possess your souls in patience, Luke xxi. 19. He doth not say, possess your mouths, for some being provoked will give no bad language; nor possess your hands; many being urged can forbear violence: yet still the desire of revenge may boil and rankle in both their hearts. But possess your souls, that is, yourselves, in patience: this binds both mouth and hand to the peace and good forbearance: all are quiet, if the soul be quiet. Two things become a Christian; sapientia in verbis, patientia in verberibus. Time is the physician's cure, reason the philosopher's cure, patience is God's cure. Time helps sorrows, but still this is tedious, and time runs too dully with them that be in misery. Reason qualifies it, for it is the courage and magnanimity of a man to suffer. But this only seeks means to extricate us: reason will not stay for time; but faithful patience looks neither to reason nor time, but knows a better remedy: she commits her cause to God, and resolves upon this resignation, that either her sorrow shall be less or her fortitude more. Patience is a noble kind of conquering. Faith, charity, and patience, are the three rich possessions of a Christian: by faith we possess Christ, by charity we possess our neighbour, by patience we possess ourselves. He that wants faith is without the Head; he that wants charity is without the body; he that wants patience is without himself. Our patience, like our trial, hath but a short exercise; our deliverance is glorious and everlasting.

2. To confirm our hope. He that hath tasted the mercy of God in some notable deliverance, hopes in the next trial for the same assistance. Experience brings hope, Rom. v. 4; because it hath made the matter easy: he that hath often done a thing easily, mistrusts not to do it again. David had often found his deliverance out of hard exigents, therefore says, In the name of God I will leap over the wall: his experience had made it so easy to him, that it was but a skip or jump in his conceit.

3. Let us not feign afflictions before we have them: we can expect no deliverance out of fantastical griefs. "Be not deceived; God is not mocked," Gal. vi. 7. There are beggars by permission, that feign themselves halt and blind; and beggars by commission, that have patents for fires and wrecks; but their fires are often feigned and false fires, and all their wrecks the wreck of their own consciences. Let them take heed, lest their fictions prove at last true afflictions, their dissembled lameness prove lameness indeed. As Martial writes of Caelius, who to avoid the giving his attendance early and late to the great ones of the time, feigned himself sick of the gout, so cunningly, that his hypocrisy came home to him, and he fell sick of the gout indeed. How often have those mischances fallen to men without relief, for which they begged relief before they had cause! God promiseth deliverance from the temptations he sends, not those we fetch; such as come from our want, not from our wantonness. Many make to themselves crosses; and while God's hand is not visible, they with their own hands beat themselves. Haman, that great favourite, hath honour enough, though Mordecai do not cringe to him; yet this makes him discontent: here was a cross of his own begetting. Ahab was king, had lands and demesnes enough of his own, yet because Naboth denies him his vineyard, he falls sick of the sullens. For this trouble let him thank himself: what needs a rich man be a thief? Amnon had variety of choice objects for his inordinate affection, yet he must be love-sick of Tamar, 2 Sam. xiii. 2, 4; none but his half-sister can please the eyes of that wanton prince. Ordinary pleasures will not content extraordinary persons; such pampered and ungoverned youths, whose greatness and ease have made unruly appetites. This is the unnatural heat of which he languishes; was not this an affliction of his own making? It is not rare to see a great man vex himself at the neglect of a peasant; whereas a true lion will pass by with an honourable scorn: to see the husband of a virtuous and comely spouse, doting on a foul and forbidden bed: to see a rich man pine away with projecting how he should live when he is old. Innumerable be our fantastical evils, and we trouble ourselves about nothing. Evils come fast enough of themselves, there is store made to our hands, we need not increase their number: those ill weeds will grow without our planting.

4. Our deliverer is "the Lord." It is the voice of all creatures in their several languages, Salvation is of the Lord: the confession of men more sensibly, Thou art the preserver of men, Job vii. 20: the acknowledgment of saints more especially, "Our help standeth in the name of the Lord," Psal. cxxiv. 8. This word leads us to a consideration of his power; He can deliver us, and none but he. "Lord:" his Almightiness was the first name he would be known by to the world, Exod. vi. 3. Not that Jehovah was not in some manner formerly known: see Gen. xv., and xxvi. 24. But as if he made this difference: Then I gave promises what I would do, now I come to perform the promises; with God Almighty, which signifies my majesty, I will show myself Jehovah, the God of Abraham, which shall demonstrate my mercy. "The Lord:" his sovereignty is a point that comes not often to be handled, therefore here I take leave to enlarge myself. It may be considered in seven respects.

1. It is independent: many things are said to govern, but they have some dependence on their superiors. Our life is beholden to the fruits, the fruits to the trees, the trees to the earth, the earth to the rain, the rain to the sun, the sun and all to the Lord, Hos. ii. 21, 22. Fruits are from trees, and trees from seeds; both moistened by the air, and matured by the sun: element is qualified by element, orb depends on orb, the sun itself on primum mobile: we can go no higher. The child looks up to his father, his father lives by the peace of the country, the country could have no peace but by the magistrate, the magistrate is countenanced and warranted by the king, the king is ruled by God. Still one looks upon another, but the eyes of all things look up unto thee, O Lord, Psal. cxlv. 15.

2. It is absolute; he may dispose of his subjects at his pleasure: as the potter, having the lump in his hand, makes what kind of vessel he listeth; great or small, round or square, for the parlour or for the stable; and when he hath done, he may set it on his cupboard, or on the dunghill: be it to honour or dishonour, he will be honoured by it. Man respects deserts or demerits, in making the poor rich, or the rich poor; in ennobling the base, or debasing the noble: God doth all according to his own will, without further relation. "Is it not lawful for me to do what I will with mine own?" Matt. xx. 15. He can make Tabor a little heaven, and turn Paradise into a desert. It is absolute, without control: there is none to call him to account or examination, with Why dost thou thus? O Lord, it was not therefore thy doing because it was good, but therefore is it good because it was thy doing. Whether thy mercy saveth us, we have cause to be thankful; or thy justice confoundeth us, we have no cause to complain: still, "Thou continuest holy, O thou worship of Israel," Psal. xxii. 3.

3. His Lordship is universal. First, over all times:

other lords die, but he is eternal. Eternity is properly the duration of an uncreated Ens. It is improperly taken, either for things that have both beginning and end, as everlasting mountains; divers such phrases in Scripture: or for things that have a beginning but shall have no end; so are angels and men's souls eternal; so, eternal life, eternal fire. But God calls himself, "I AM," Exod. iii. 14: I am what I have been, I have been what I am, I am and have been what I shall be. This attribute is incommunicable: all other things had a non esse preceding their esse; and they have a mutation tending to nothing. "They that war against thee shall be as nothing," Isa. xli. 12: all come to nothing unless they be upheld by the manutenance of God: but "Thou art the same, and thy years shall have no end," Psal. cii. 27. Thou turnest man to destruction, and again sayest, Return: "even from everlasting to everlasting thou art God," Psal. xc. 2; the sole umpire and measurer of beginning and ending. Secondly, over all places, heaven, earth, hell, Psal. cxxxv. 6. Kings are limited, and cannot do many things they desire: they cannot command the sun to stand still, nor the wind to blow which way they would: in the lofty air, in the depth of the sea, no king reigns. They fondly flatter the pope with his long arms, that they reach to purgatory; (but indeed both power and place are alike imaginary;) it is Christ alone that hath the keys of all places. Thirdly, over all creatures; binding the influences of Pleiades, and loosing the bonds of Orion, Job xxxviii. 31; commanding the fire against the nature of it, to descend, 2 Kings i. 12; creating and ruling the stars, Amos v. 8, overruling the lions, Dan. vi. 22, sending the meteors, Psal. cxlviii. 8, hedging in the sea, lapping it up like a child in swaddling-cloths, Job xxxviii. 8, dividing, diverting, filling it. In both fire and water, those two raging elements that have no mercy, he shows mercy; delivers us from both in both. He calls the fowls, and they come; the beasts, and they hear; the trees, and they spring to obey him. He hath a raven for Elijah, a gourd for Jonah, a dog for Lazarus. Makes the leviathan, the hugest living creature, preserve his prophet. That a terrible lion should be killed, as was by Samson; or not kill, as they forbore Daniel; or kill and not eat, as that prophet, 1 Kings xiii.: here was the Lord. Over metals; he makes iron to swim, stones to cleave asunder. Over the devils; they must obey him though unwillingly. But they continually rebel against him, and break his will? They do indeed against his complacency, not against his permission. There is then no time, not the hour of death; no place, not the sorest torment; no creature, not the devil; but the Lord can deliver us from them. Therefore at all times, in all places, and against all creatures, let us trust in him for deliverance.

4. It is necessary; we could not live but by his dominion. Take away government, we are worse than beasts; a bad king is better than no king. If man rule ill, He overrules all: "Higher than the highest," Eccl. v. 8. Above all, to support; the pillar, and the foundation of the pillars and foundations of the world. Above all, to correct; binding kings in chains; if authority grow warped, to straighten it with his justice. Above all, to direct: he directs natural government to natural good: that the elements be not at war, but working in a well-disposed harmony for our benefit; that one doth not swallow up another, nor the stronger oppress the weaker; it is the Lord's doing. As he made nature with his Fiat, so he sets it a working with his Faciat: let it so be, let it so work. He directs politic government to politic good, that we might live like men in a civil peace : supernatural government to salvation, that we may live like Christians in a gracious obedience and comfort. This power was necessary for creation ; he must be an Almighty Lord that could make us of nothing. It is necessary for preservation, to conserve things in their being and working. Necessary for redemption ; it must be an infinite store that must pay an infinite debt. If the Lord had not become a servant on earth, those servants could never have been lords in heaven. All the parts of a commonwealth ought to uphold one another in policy ; all the members of the church to uphold one another in charity ; as in a building one stone doth bear up another, but the foundation bears up all. The members uphold the body, the body the members ; the subjects uphold the king, the king upholds the subjects ; but thou, O Lord, upholdest us all.

5. It is immutable : whatsoever the Lord is, he is simul et semel. With us one thing doth exclude another ; this moment thrusts out that ; learning excludes ignorance, riches poverty ; the business of this hour gives place to the next. But God's essence and perfections are together : eternity is the essence of God. As he is eternal, with beginning, so invariable, without change. We are not present to things past or to come : God is to all times and things, past, present, or future, ever present. The reason is, he is immense, and fills all places without motion, without ascent or descent. Indeed he is sometimes said to descend ; but it is because he then doth some new work ; men took no notice of his presence before. This Lordship hath no succession, yet he produceth works successively : Ego facio, and Ego faciam. But this is not in regard of himself, but in respect of us, that he is said to do one thing after another. He doth not now create the world, nor now destroy it, nor now call Abraham out of Ur ; nor is Isaac redeemed from sacrifice, and Christ sacrificed, in the same place or at the same time. The type must properly go before the antitype. It is false then to say that men were justified before they were born : they are elected before all time, but called and justified in time : these things are done successively. With the Lord there is order, though there be no time. If I come to a pillar with my left side toward it, it is then on my left side ; if I come with my right side toward it, then is it on my right side ; yet is the pillar itself immovable. All change is a kind of death, saith the school : if God could change, he could die. Now change is either substantial, or qualitative : but God's substance cannot be changed, and he hath no qualities. Again, it is either amissive, or perfective : no man changes but he is either the better or the worse by it : God is the fountain of life, nothing can be added to him, for he is infinite ; nothing derogated from him, for he is the Lord Almighty. In his will, in his purpose, in his joy, in his justice, in his mercy, in all unchangeable. How is he then said to repent ? Not that he doth repent, but appears to us, in the alteration of his work, as one repenting. There may be change in the work, there is none in the Workman. The unchangeable decree of God disposeth the change of all things. A man that builds a house, hath an idea in his head whereby he purposes to frame it ; he decrees how to order this part, to erect that corner, here to build a partition, there a chimney, to set up a scaffold, and pull it down again : here is a variety and change of the work, the worker is still the same. What God once is, he is for ever : once just, ever just ; once merciful, ever merciful.

6. It is incomprehensible ; who ever saw God in his strength, and lived ? This Lord is in himself invisible, as indivisible ; seen in his mighty works, never to be seen in his person. But we shall see him face to face ? 1 Cor. xiii. 12. Not the Deity itself, as the Anthropomorphites dreamed : not a light only resulting from him, as was the error of the Armenians : but by face to face, is meant the clear knowledge of our understanding : and we shall know him, not with comprehensive knowledge, but with adequate knowledge, as he is cognoscible, for he is incomprehensible. So are those places to be understood, Heb. xii. 15 ; 1 John iii. 2 ; Rev. xx. 4. The intellectual vision is not of his essence, but of some work represented. And that of Daniel, chap. vii. 9, was but a dream or vision upon his bed, some divine and supernatural revelation. But did not John Baptist see the Holy Ghost ? Matt. iii. 16. No, not the Divine nature, but the Dove. But doth not Job assure himself of seeing God ? Job xix. 26. Not God himself, but his Redeemer, God in the veil of the flesh : Jesus shall be thoroughly and joyfully looked upon ; but the Deity shall not be seen hereafter with the bodily eyes.

Nothing can apprehend that which is out of its limits ; but we are finite, and God is immense. Every thing that is seen, must be seen in some place ; but God is in no place. Our body indeed shall be spiritual, not needing meat, nor sleep, nor breathing by air ; yet it is not capable of comprehending that infinite Spirit. Here we understand him after the measure and capacity of man, in a human resemblance ; as if he had feet, eyes, affections ; because they that should know him, have such. But when we read of God's foot, let us think of his coming, as a man removes by his feet. When we read of his eyes, consider his knowledge of all things, as a man sees all by that organ of sense. So when we are said to see his face, conceive our knowledge of him to be meant. "He that planted the ear, shall he not hear ?" Psal. xiv. 9 : he doth not say, Hath he not an ear ? but, shall he not hear ? The pure in heart are promised to see God, Matt. v. 8 : but as that pureness is in heart, so is that vision in heart. We say, I see a man's wisdom, see his valour, see his meaning ; yet are not these visible : so not this Lord, but by his effects, what his power worketh. Thus far in heaven we shall exceed in knowledge. Here we know him only by negatives, what he is not ; that not mortal, not mutable : and by his works ; The Lord is known by his judgments, Psal. ix. 16 ; and, "Be still, and know that I am God," Psal. xli. 10 : you that are absent, come and see ; you that are present, stand still and contemplate : see and know, know and confess, confess and apply, make use of what you see and know. What is that ? I am God, you are but men. Put them in mind, O Lord, that they are but men ; worms, vanity, nothing. But I am God ; not a popular, titular, idle, abject god, like the gods of the Gentiles, not able to wipe the dust off their own faces ; but a God that makes gods, a God that mars gods ; that hath a dominion above all dominion, above all comprehension. Lord, we cannot comprehend thee in thy majesty, do thou comprehend us in thy mercy.

7. It is glorious and blessed : he is the chiefest good, and he enjoys himself, therefore is perfectly and infinitely blessed. Our blessedness consists in enjoying him ; his, not enjoying us, but himself. The Hebrew speaks of blessedness in the plural ; as the Latins call wealth, divitiæ, opes ; because many things concur, as to make up a rich man, so to make one blessed. There is of them both an essential part ; as gold, silver, lands, houses be the materials of riches. And an external part, the free and certain possession of these things ; for if they may be gone, a man is poor in possibility; when they are gone, he is poor indeed. Man's blessedness is from another, the Lord's is from himself; man's is in grace, God's in nature; man's temporal, God's eternal; man's voluntary, God's necessary, it cannot be otherwise; man's changeable, God's always the same. The greatest and stateliest monarch puts off his glory and robes at some times; as when he goes into the bath, the bed, the grave. He carries no sceptre in the bath, yet may he then have a crown on his head; he hath neither sceptre nor crown in his bed, yet even then he is known a king by his attending guard; but in the grave he leaves off all. Now God's glory is never left off, there is no interruption of his blessedness, not a moment wherein he is less happy.

His blessedness is internal or external. Internal consists, 1. In the contemplation of his own sufficiency: thus he saw all to be very good which he made, and took pleasure in his own wisdom that made them. 2. In the comprehension of all happiness; for it is nothing to be blessed, and not to understand it: many were happy if they did but know their blessedness: God's omniscience is his blessedness. 3. In the delectation taken in this comprehension, when he knows there is nothing can offend him; whereas kings may be free from danger, not from fear. 4. In the contentation taken in this delight; having all things so fully in himself, that he needs no addition. Many men think not themselves happy in the much they have, because they want something they would have; but there is nothing more for God to desire. He contemplates his own goodness, and rests in himself with a sweet complacency, as the infinite fountain of all blessedness. External blessedness is that he receives from the creatures, every one, sensible and insensible, especially angels and men, Psal. cxlviii. He is blessed in himself, Rom. ix. 5, yet he will also be blessed of us. We can add nothing to him, nor may we take his due honour from him. He looks for praises for electing us, creating us, &c. We discourse our blessings with an annual commemoration, rejoice and solace ourselves in them; but still let us reflect all by praises to our Maker. A king will take a present of a beggar, that by this occasion he may (not enrich himself, but) reward the poor man. God needs not this outward clothing, yet he is pleased to wear it for our sakes. "Blessed be God," &c. 2 Cor. i. 3.

Thus far I thought good to meditate on the ineffable majesty of God. It is not possible to drink up all the sea, to suck in all the air, much less to comprehend God. (Nazian.) When a man considers himself in relation to the reasonless creatures; how the beasts do him homage, the earth yields him her fruits and metals, the sea brings him in merchandise, the air provides breath for his nostrils and fowls for his table, the sun missest not his hour to enlighten him; he may then think himself something: but when he considers the Lord, he is swallowed up, and thinks himself nothing. Now though a man cannot drink up all the river, yet he may taste it; though not span the sun, yet look upon his beams; though we cannot take in all the air, yet enough to fill us. Let us get enough of this Lord to fill our hearts, we need no more. (Bern.) When a man thrusts his hand into the fire, it burns him; when he comes but near it, it warms him: let us come with a purpose to partake, not to comprehend the Lord. (August.) The two days' offering are the two Testaments; these eat and feed upon: what is reserved for the third day, is for the world to come; it will fire us to search that. (Origen on Levit.) Nor is this point barren, but hath its comfortable use, and that even applicable to our purpose. Doctrine being like the sun, not only to delight us with the contemplation, but also to warm and quicken our affections.

1. This Lord being the Supreme, and all other powers subordinate to him, and dependent on him, let this encourage our faith to trust him with our deliverance. Trouble not yourselves with your enemies, nor yet say, Our own hand shall deliver us, Exod. xiv. 13. Kings are men of might, yet but men of dust: without this Lord their power cannot save themselves, much less us. Angels are mighty, but cannot come unless this Lord send them. I could ask my Father, and he would give me legions of angels, saith Christ, Matt. xxvi. 53: we must ask our Father, or not have one angel to do us good. He shall look his eyes out, that trusts to any other deliverer than the Lord.

2. His dominion being so absolute, let men cease to rebel against it. I will be exalted, not only in my Israel, but among the nations, Psal. xli. 10: if they receive me, with their good contents; if they refuse me, against their wills. And if there be any ground, whose lines are extended farther than people and nations inhabit, there also will I be exalted. We fear kings, and take their wrathful looks as messengers of death; and we do well to give fear to whom fear belongs, Rom. xiii. 7. But here is a power we cannot resist, a wisdom we cannot delude, a justice we cannot corrupt. Locks, and stocks, and treble-barred doors, a dark dungeon, and a cruel gaoler, all cannot keep them in whom this Lord will deliver, Acts xvi. 26. His power shall shake the foundations of the earth, that earthquake the foundations of the prison, that trembling (as in the body) disjoint and unfasten the doors, and loose all their bands. There is no knot but he can untie it; let us at once fear and trust him.

3. This being universal over all times; the God of Abraham, and of his seed; "Jesus Christ the same yesterday, and to-day, and for ever," Heb. xiii. 8; the God of our fathers that were, of ourselves that are, of our posterity that shall be; then our enemies shall never find time, wherein he shall not find means to deliver us. Over all places; whither shall we go from his presence? Psal. cxxxix. Whither? That place was never yet discovered. He is present even to those that shun his presence, that say to him, Depart from us; how much more to us! The Lord is with us; yea, he is not only with us, but for us; Immanuel, God in our nature, God in our flesh. "The Lord of hosts is with us; the God of Jacob is our refuge," Psal. xli. 11. The God of virtue, there is his power: he is our refuge, there is his favour. The Lord of hosts, strong: the God of Jacob, sweet. The one of puissance, another of promise. "The Lord, the Lord," Exod. xxiv. 6; whatsoever belongs to power, majesty, governance: "merciful;" whatever belongs to election, dilection, compassion, covenant, sacrament: both together a just equilibrium between greatness and grace; a fair and sweet harmony. Over all creatures: as heaven is his throne, the earth his foot-stool, and the sea his wash-pot; so all creatures in them are at his beck; none can say, I alone have escaped. He can make the very flies and insects, those scorns of nature, executioners of his vengeance. Over us, in a gracious and special manner; which affords us a challenge and defiance against all adversary forces; we fear not armies of men, legions of devils, nor the gates of hell. The Lord is our God: which are not only words of charity, comprehending in a community all Christians; but words of faith, when we take this great Lord for our proper and peculiar God. That he can deliver us, this we presume; that he will deliver us, this we assume; from that principle or thesis, we derive this hypothesis, and appropriate it to ourselves. Therefore we say not only, with the leper, "Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean," Matt. viii. 2; but we know thou canst, and we believe thou wilt, and we beseech thee to do it.

4. The necessariness of this Lordship gives us experience, experience confidence, and confidence will bring deliverance. How easily would the thunder strike us dead, the sea break in upon us, thieves spoil us, the whelps of Rome worry us, the fiends of hell ruin us; but that our Lord sits in the chair of omnipotency and protects us! Many are the dangers which we see and fear, innumerable those we neither see nor fear; therefore, to take away all attribution to ourselves, even when we know not, the Lord delivers us. "How manifold are thy works, O Lord!" Psal. civ. 24. How manifold! if we sail in the main ocean, and put not into some arm or creek, we never find an end. But we wonder not because they are common. Of fulness comes loathing. It is not magnitudo, but novelty, that draws our eyes and observations. But he that considers his own weakness and impotence; how he was made in the womb, and knew it not; taken from the womb, and not able to help himself; that God must now give him his daily bread to feed him, his daily breath to quicken him, or he perishes: or that considers the power of his enemies, with the implacable fury of their malice, the blood-hounds of hell; and yet that he is delivered: must confess, This is the Lord's doing. That Sisera should fall by a woman, Pharaoh's host sink like stones into the bottom of the sea, an invincible navy perish by a few rotten ships on fire: "Oh that men would therefore praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men!" Psal. cvii. 8; that our children's children to the last period of any generation in this island may say, O God, we have heard with our ears, our fathers and grandfathers have declared to us, that noble work of thy deliverance.

5. The immutability of it gives us further cause to trust in him. Laban may love Jacob well, but his countenance will change upon him; Amnon will hate Tamar more than ever he loved her; Pharaoh's officer forgets Joseph when his turn is served: there is no constancy in man; but I the Lord change not, Mal. iii. 6. The world changeth, the vine casts off her grapes, the tired earth grows dull in increase, man's stature is lessened, his length of life less than that, his honesty little or nothing at all; the sea encroacheth upon the land, springs look like autumns; states change, policies change, governments change, all the materials of nature change: we see it, we need not preach it; it is matter of sight, not of faith. Every man's mouth is full of this complaint. The world is fickle: whatsoever is delectable, vanisheth like smoke. That medicine helps to-day, which doth not to-morrow; God is always helpful. That receipt helps one which helps not another; God helps all. (August.) The hoarder adores his money; yet is his wealth but like an inheritance on Salisbury Plain; he may rob many passengers for a time, at last somebody will rob him. Set not your heart on riches, lest you be driven to say, as Laban to Rachel, Thou hast stolen away my heart. And when they are gone, their loss gives more of pain than their possession of pleasure. Contrarily, God's love increaseth; though not really, in itself, yet effectually, to us. (August.) Friends are mutable, Paul had many adherents, yet at last complains, "No man stood with me, but all forsook me," 2 Tim. iv. 16. Indeed Alexander opposed his words: some withstood him, but none stood with him. Yet then he finds this Lord to stand for him, he delivered him, ver. 17. Peace changeth into war, discord thrusts out amity; but in God is constant peace. "I create the fruit of the lips; Peace, peace," &c. Isa. lvii. 19. Where we find, 1. Sureness; Pharaoh's dream is doubled for the sureness. 2. Greatness; no peace like our reconciliation with God, it is past all understanding. 3. Multiplicity, all kinds of peace that may stand with goodness. If sufferings abound for Christ, consolations abound also, 2 Cor. i. 5: if the exuberance be in either scale, it is in the comforts. We read of seven enemies, Rom. viii. 35; and of seven victories, ver. 38. And if there be any other obstacle, from the height of heaven to the depth and bottom of hell, or further malignity in any creature, it shall be removed. Whom God loves he loves to the end; and if he have once given us an earnest of his favour, we shall be sure of the whole bargain.

6. The incomprehensibleness of this power, so far transcending the narrowness of the human heart, and yet so visible to the eye in the great and wondrous effects, may well further show us where our deliverance lies. Howsoever the noblest demonstration of things be from their causes and principles; yet the nearest to usward, and most apprehensible, is from the effects and performances. At Sennacherib's army Judah hung down the head, rent her clothes, and hid her face; nothing was left her, but, Lord, bow down thine ear and hear, open thine eye and consider: yet in this extremity they found the Lord a Deliverer; an angel slew in one night 185,000 of them. Here was an invisible hand, but a mighty one; a power not comprehensible, yet discerned in the work. If any object, We see not our signs, not one finger of this hand appears: we are in distress, and the Lord hath thrust his working arm into his bosom, buried his mercies in forgetfulness: yea, he does that which seems contrary to his works of favour, which the prophet calls strange and improper works, Isa. xxviii. 21, almost alien from his nature, troubling his own people; that the very wicked insult, Where is now their God? yet even then is an invisible hand working for us; and when the devil's conspiracy is come to the birth, it shall be abortive, or strangled in the womb; the God of our salvation will deliver us.

7. It is blessed, and that which blesseth us, and all things to us: the sun doth not so necessarily lighten the air, as God doth bless them his favour is pleased to shine upon. Christ is his principally blessed Son. "Son of God," Matt. xxvi. 63. "Son of the Blessed," Mark xiv. 61. This blessedness comes down from him to the rest of his children: all blessings come from God, but by the hand of man, even that man of God, and hand of his Father, Christ. That bread should not choke, rather than nourish, it is blessing. That garments, which are cold of themselves, should keep us warm; but especially, that we perish not in our sins, that we are delivered from the power of death and paws of the dragon, this is his extraordinary blessing. Blessedness is every man's desire; now he that hath God, hath blessedness. Whosoever hath the sun, hath the light of the sun: he cannot want water, that hath the fountain. St. Augustine hath the story of a histrionical mountebank, that to get spectators, and money by them, promised to tell them the next day what they all most desired. The theatre being full of people, and their minds full of expectation, what was the device? "You would all buy cheap and sell dear." But this holds not, for the good man in a famine will buy corn dear, and sell it to the poor cheap. And on the other side, the unthrift will sell his inheritance cheap, to buy vanities dear. Therefore he failed of his promise. But if he had told them, You would all be happy, this had been a full satisfaction. Let us cleave to this blessed God, and he will deliver us from sin and hell, which is blessedness begun; and bring us to salvation and heaven, which is blessedness perfect and consummate.

Let this teach us to bless him that blesseth us. A man drinks of a river, he adds nothing to it, but takes something from it: when we offer to God our praises, we give him nothing, we receive something from him. It is but thanks we give, but we "take the cup of salvation," Psal. cxvi. 13. We send up praises, as a man throws up flowers, that fall down back upon his own head; so the showers of our free-will offerings fall down upon ourselves in showers of mercies.

Let it also invite us to love him, as being most blessed and lovely. Look what foundation there is in any other, why thou shouldst love, fear, serve, honour them; all these are a thousand times more in God. Thy prince hath honour, thy father reverence, thy master service, thy wife love: all these are due to God in a transcendent measure. He that is thy king, is but God's servant; and spiritually we are all kings, in Christ: and when all the confederate kings of the earth cannot deliver thee, this Lord can save thee. Thou lovest thy country, it is well: thy country gave thee not being and life: to displease God is the way to make thine own country spew thee out. If therefore Curtius, in a vain-glorious love to his country, threw himself into the gulf, because the oracle said, Whom the people loved best, he must be cast in to stop it; how are we bound to love God even above our own lives, that hath preserved us here, and provided a better country for us hereafter! Thou reverencest thy father, thou doest well, nature itself would rebuke the contrary; but if such awe be to the father of thy flesh, what humble reverence is due to the Infuser of thy soul, the Father of thy father and of all mankind! Thou servest thy master, well done; that God which always commands, not seldom commends this obedience: but if a master's reward be such an encouragement, what is it to hear from heaven, Well done, good servant! Thy wife hath thy heart, it is fit, you are one flesh; but be not so uxorious to thy wife, as to be injurious to thy Husband, Christ. Of all places, remember Solomon, and let not thy wife have God's place. The love of a brother is great, of a friend greater, of a wife above that; but the love of God must be above all. Let the dead bury their dead; follow thou me, Matt. viii. 22: forsake thy father living, much more dead, to follow Christ. If the wife of thy bosom alienate thy affection from him, she is a traitor to thee and to him. Now if lust or profit comes in competition with God, examine thy conscience, which preferrest thou? Gold many go to the devil for, "yet The law of thy mouth is better unto me than thousands of gold or silver," Psal. cxix. 72. How many, of all these things, do make it their last and least care! Many men's shoe-ties cost them more in a year than God and their souls: so unmindful are we of thee, O Lord!

"The Lord knoweth how." I have held you long in this point of deliverance, and you say it is high time to deliver you from it: one circumstance more, and you have your wish. This last concerns the wisdom of God: it is enough that he promises deliverance, he keeps the manner to himself. It is set down indefinitely: no man, no apostle, no angel, can know all the means of God's delivering his: it is enough that he himself knows. This gives a check to all saucy inquirers, that will not believe help from the Lord, unless he tells them how. It hath ever been the foolish ambition of man, to be most prying into concealed things; desiring to know what he is forbidden, and slighting that he is charged to learn. It was not the thirst of gold that was the fall of mankind; the earth and all her metals were his: not of honour; he had sovereignty over all the creatures: not of pleasure; he wanted none: Satan had another bait, a forbidden knowledge. How divine a thing is knowledge, whereof even innocency itself was ambitious! Adam looked for speculative knowledge, he should have looked for experimental. He thought it had been good to know evil, whereas good was ample enough to have made up his perfect knowledge and blessedness. He that knew all other things, knew not this one thing, that he knew enough. All that God made was good, the Maker being much more good; they good in their kinds, he good in himself. Adam knew the Creator, and his creatures, yet this could not content him: he would know that God never made, evil; evil of sin, evil of death; both which himself made by desiring to know them. Ever since, we know evil too well, and smart with knowing it: how dear hath this lesson cost us, that it is safe to be ignorant where God hath not bid us know! Yet still are we transported with this saucy appetite of our grandmother, and run ourselves aground with the curious affectation of forbidden knowledge. For the things revealed, Lord, give us a sober knowledge; for the things concealed, give us a contented ignorance. There is more manifested than we can know, enough to make us happy by knowing. Deliverance we look for: how or when the Lord will deliver thee or me, that is in his own bosom, and the breast of his Privy Counsel, Jesus Christ.

"The Lord knoweth how." As there is nothing impossible to his might, so there is nothing concealable from his understanding. God's wisdom and providence is like the eye of a well-drawn picture; that looks upon all and every one, as if every one were all. Take an eye and draw never so many lines from it, it sees all alike, and at once; the centre is present to every point of the circumference. This is a threefold comfort to us.

1. He knows our temptations before they be upon us; he sees the preparing of the potion, weighs the ingredients to a scruple, qualifies the malignity of the purgatives with sweet consolations. Satan, that bloody apothecary, minds nothing but the drugs and dregs of poison; but God puts in an antidote that he knows not of: he means to do hurt, but the Lord knows how to convert it to good. Thus, as Augustine saith, all the misery of a Christian is a medicinal pain, not a penal sentence. Now he that looks to our affliction, will look to our extrication. He would never suffer Satan to assault us, but that he knows how to deliver us. If Pharaoh had kept himself at home, God's honour had not been so great at the Red Sea: he knows as well how to get himself honour of Satan, as he did of Pharaoh.

2. He knows them when they be upon us. The Lord looked down upon the affliction of Israel, Exod. ii. 25: Pharaoh plagues them, he sees it, and therefore plagues Pharaoh. "Thou hast considered my trouble, thou hast known my soul in adversities," Psal. xxxi. 7. Now he that knows the soul in adversity, knows how to deliver it out of adversity. "The Lord look upon it," says dying Zechariah, 2 Chron. xxiv. 22. Yes, he did see it. The wronged child hopes to relieve himself by making moan to his father. The eagle, though she flies aloft, hath still an eye to her young ones; if any danger approach, she swiftly stoops to defend them. (Plin.) Thus Christ in heaven hath an eye to his darlings on earth: if any Saul be riding with a bloody commission against them, down he comes from his imperial throne to their rescue. Why dost thou persecute me? Me; dost think, Saul, that Christians have no patrons upon earth?

3. He knows how to rid them from us. They are often so perplexful and intricate, that neither we see, nor the world sees, nor reason apprehends how, yet the Lord knoweth. Egypt afflicts Israel through many degrees; Pharaoh suspects them for purpose of revolting, imposeth on them heavy burdens; still God looks on, and lets him alone. To the name of strangers is added the name of slaves. Israel had gathered some rust in Egypt, and now must be scourged: it is well they bore their burdens, who else had borne the burden of God. When, like palm trees, they flourish with their burdens, midwives are suborned to destroy their male children; and they whose office is to help the birth, must murder it. Still the Lord knows, and holds his peace. From burdens they proceed to bondage, and from bondage to blood; from vexation of their bodies to destruction of the fruit of their bodies. If the midwives refuse, the multitude shall do it: cruelty had but smoked before, now it flames up. It is rare tyranny that finds no villany for an executioner. Lastly, impossible labours are laid upon them, the tyrant requires tasks not feasible: they could neither make straw, nor find it, yet they must have it. Do what may be, is tolerable; but do what cannot be, is cruel. Yet thus doth Pharaoh pick a quarrel to punish; and if they do it not, they are beaten. Now God begins to look down, and spite of all he delivers his people. No arms shall keep them longer in Egypt, no armies shall hurt them out of Egypt. Pharaoh or the sea looks for their conquest; to escape is beyond all hope, all thought; yet both shall be disappointed; the Lord knew how to do it. So that they did not cry so loud before, as now they sin: not faith, but sense, teacheth them to magnify that God after their deliverance, which they scarce trusted for their deliverance.

The antichristian enemies of God's church and truth, after the infatuation of so many treacherous conspiracies, found out at the last a speeding one; such as in so many thousand years, from the fall of the reprobate angels, never came into the head of any devil, to put into the head of any man; or if the head could devise it, yet to find a heart to receive it, or a hand to act it, would have been thought impossible. But decreed it was in the senate of Rome, in the bosom of that man of sin, who turns the keys of the kingdom of heaven into the keys of the kingdoms of the earth. Advised by that family of malice, who, of all the world, were the only ones that found out how to systematize a lie, as Augustine said of the Priscillianists. Thus far God lets them alone. Executioners must be found, there must be hands as well as heads. Ulysses may contrive, Diomedes must through with it. Still the Lord says nothing. Their secrecy makes them confident, dejected with a treble bond of counsel-keeping, religion, oath, sacrament: You shall swear by the blessed Trinity, and holy sacrament, not to reveal it: thus they eat their God upon a bargain of blood. Still the Lord is silent. They build the foundation of their design under the foundation of the parliament house, and say to the ground, Cover us: they trust not the air, but lay up their treason in a subterranean vault, with great improbity of labour. Who should discover those inward chambers of death? Yes, the Lord knows how. Their catholic doomsday is now at hand, and there wants nothing but a hand to act it: they say of our souls, There is no help for them in their God. Then was God's time and him; and in a parable, by a miracle, we are delivered. Their stratagem is defeated, their dungeon and hell of secrecy opened, the deeper hell of their hearts eviscerated, their vault of most barbarous villany ransacked, to convince the and all the world, that the Lord knows how to deliver his. Alas, we were like men that dreamed, nay, we dreamed not of this: the noise of millstones, light of candles, bread and wine, bride and bridegroom, were our song; the plot of ruin came not within the reach of our thoughts. Blessed be that God who only delivered us.

Thus he can deliver with equal means, with small means, with no means: he can tell how. Midian comes against Israel; they, like the sand by the sea, covered all the valley; the Israelites were two and thirty thousand strong. They think, We are too few: God says, The people are too many. They say, The Midianites are too many for us: God replies, You are too many for them. Indeed, if Israel had expected the victory from their own fingers, they had been too weak for Midian: but seeing God will give the conquest, and have the glory, they are too strong. Where human strength is opposed, there needs an equality: but now God will fight, and he knows how to do it with a few, with none, as well as with many. His care is not how to get the victory, but how to preserve the glory of it gotten. Therefore he chooseth to save by few, that all the honour may redound to himself. So jealous is he of his glory, that though he give deliverance to Israel, yet the praise of the deliverance he will keep to himself. Therefore he shortens their means, that they may not shorten his mercies. Now if he will not allow lawful means to darken his honour, how intolerable is unlawful means! He that remembers the year eighty-eight; (and what true English spirit can forget it, or forbear to report it to his children?) an invincible navy, an implacable fury, furnished with instruments of murder and torture, confident of our utter desolation; and consider how they were all desolated, and we delivered, when no arm nor finger of flesh was for us; must needs confess, that the Lord knows how: he used no help in the delivery, let him have no partner in the glory. There is less danger in stealing any thing from him, than his honour. If men steal the prince's tribute, or clip his coin, he may pardon it; but not if they go about to rob him of his crown. No, but still let him be praised, both in our chambers at home, and abroad in our churches, for our time, and throughout all the generations of our children's children after us, till Christ appear in the clouds; and then in the kingdom of heaven for ever and ever. Amen.

"And to reserve the unjust unto the day of judgment to be punished." We have seen how the godly speed, now let us mark the end of their persecutors. The wicked keep such a noise in the world, that a poor man's tale can no more be heard, than the humming of a bee in a clap of thunder. So headstrong and uncontrollable is the precipice of sin, that when the righteous would withstand it they are borne down by it. The church should never find so many stratagems directed avowedly against her, but that she takes a course which the world dislikes. The disapproval of the ungodly, is the approval of our life and conversation, says Gregory, in Ezek. Hom. 9. In all ages, the rebuke of Christ hath been the religion of Christians. The reason is, our singularity and dissent from their customs; which as it makes them hiss like serpents, because we trouble their nests; so, like an antiperistasis, it should inflame our zeal. We have read of heathens that would shun the popular current. Phocion had not suspected his speech, had not the people applauded it. Antisthenes mistrusted some ill in himself for the vulgar commendation. And shall we be brutishly driven with the drove? or rather, like nails in a wheel, turn as we are turned, without either conscience of sin or guidance of reason? If we live like them that are reserved to judgment, how should we think ourselves not reserved with them? This is their time to persecute, ours to suffer: their time will come to suffer, ours to triumph. Let me rather feel their malice, than be wrapped up in their vengeance. That man refuses to be one of the body, (the church,) who is not willing to bear the world's hatred along with the Head (Christ). (August. Tract. in Joh. 87.) They are our corrosives, corrosives, used only to pare off our excrements, and eat out our dead flesh by their temptations: but the patient is preserved, when the plaster is thrown into the fire.

St. Hierome allegorically upon Ezek. xlvii. 19: The possession begins at Tamar, and reacheth along to the waters of strife. Is there peace between Joshua and Gibeon? then there is quarrel enough for the Amorites against Gibeon. The heirs of heaven can expect no better at the hands of the children of this world. A larger book might be written of the apostles' sufferings, than that of their acts. And had not the Divine power given them a miraculous success, in the safe conduct of a gospel through a world of temptations, it might have been entitled in a bloody rubric, The book of the sufferings of the apostles. "God hath set forth us the apostles last, as it were appointed to death," 1 Cor. iv. 9. Paul might well say last, with an emphasis: the former endured but the injuries of their own country; the last, the malice of all the world, vieing who should multiply the most disgraces upon them. "Concerning this sect, we know that every where it is spoken against," Acts xxviii. 22. They might well affirm it, that were the first authors of it. As Cæsar wrote of those battles, quibus non solum interfuit, sed et præfuit, at which he was not only present, but in which also he had the chief command. But let us stand upon our guard, keep to the lists of our warfare, maintain the fight we have sworn in baptism. Subtle arguments well answered, breed a clear conclusion: our souls shall shine the brighter one day for this rubbing. Consider we two encouragements. First, Christ endured such contradiction of sinners, Heb. xii. 3: he is the Commander and beholder of this combat; the Judge and rewarder of this courage; the Leader of the company, and Conqueror of the enemy: "Be of good cheer, I have overcome the world," John xvi. 33. Next, their rage is but like their general's, sharp but short; for a time; for they are reserved to the day of judgment to be punished.

The parts are four, according to the proceeding of civil judicature; the malefactors, their binding over, the assizes, and the execution.

The malefactors, The unjust.

The binding over, Are reserved.

The assizes, To the day of judgment.

The execution, To be punished.

"The unjust." This term must be considered in a threefold relation. 1. As it is a want of that righteousness which the law requires. 2. As a want of that righteousness which the gospel accepts. 3. As it implies a habit of unrighteousness, such as both the law and gospel condemn. Of all these a little.

1. For legal justice, how far short is the best man of it! God requires a perfect fulfilling of the law, because he gave a perfect ability to do it. If man would lose wilfully this sufficiency, what fault is in God? Now the son that inherits his father's goods, is bound to pay his father's debts: we have our father's goods, natural endowments, &c., therefore bound to answer for his sin; if so we call original sin, not ours, but his. But howsoever our parents conveyed unto us original sins, we ourselves are the parents of actuals. All naturals are depraved, all supernaturals are deprived, by the first fall. Man's nature may be inclined to some moral virtues imperfect, as truth, justice, temperance, chastity; but not to supernatural, as faith, hope, charity, humility; these are quite out of nature's orb. So for that justice which should give absolute obedience to God's will, all men be unjust.

2. For evangelical justice, which is had by faith: this is a righteousness of grace, to supply the defects of nature. We that had no righteousness of our own, must be beholden to one that hath some to spare: such a one, as though he give never so much, hath never the less; an infinite and inexhaustible fountain of goodness. Satan, like a chymic, had extracted all the juice and spirits of our grace: we have no way to enrich our bankrupt estate, but with the treasures of Christ. He was not only our Brother, by taking our flesh upon him, but also our Surety, by taking our debts upon him; not only the nature of man, but the form of a servant. He may well say, I paid that I never took, Psal. lxi. 4. What man will give his son for his sin? Micah vi. 7. Yet God did more; he gave his Son for (not his own, but) another's sin. Man's sin was the cause of Christ's death; Christ's death the cause of man's life. He gave life to us, by giving his life for us. Had he been mere man, this had done us no good; his justice had been little enough for himself. But the Son of God suffered, not in the propriety of his nature as man, but in his unity of person; and so he merited. The sword of justice was awaked to be sheathed in our bowels; the Shepherd interposed himself to take the blow, Zech. xiii. 7. By sin we are indebted to God more than we are worth; now Christ undertook for us. In his circumcision, he gave the earnest, set his hand to the obligation, to pay the whole debt. God is the Creditor, he paid him, and sued out for his church a discharge. Satan was the gaoler, he paid him; death the executioner, he paid him too; though for their fees they parted his garments among them. As Jacob's life was bound up in the life of Benjamin, without whom his grey hairs would be brought to the earth in grief, Gen. xli. 30, 31; so our life is bound up in the life of Jesus, and if he be not with us, we shall die with anguish, and go to the grave in sorrow.

This is a second way to be just; the former we lost by sin, this we find by faith; he that wanteth this is unjust and must perish. Now reprobates cannot have this justice, by reason they lack faith; as he that is blind hath no benefit by the light. Indeed the world thinks this an easy attainment; but is quite mistaken. A child cannot generate, nor a man regenerate himself; the latter is as possible as the former. Man's nature being whole, could not preserve itself; much less being broken, can it repair itself. He that cannot keep himself from death while he lives, will more impossibly restore and revive himself to life being dead. Faith is a rare gift, though there be many Christians: all think they have it; yet even Christ himself says, he shall scarce know where to find it. How great a part of the world lies quite out of the orb of faith! In Rome it is not; they contest against it. In courts it is rare; many live there rather by the favour of the prince than by the faith of God. In the city, the credit of faith is so weak, that it cannot be trusted without ready money. In the country she is likeliest to be had; but the tenant finds so little faith in the landlord, that he thinks it a needless virtue in himself. Among lawyers there is just so much faith as there is charity. Most men have so much, and so little, as to think they need no more. The professors of faith are like Gideon's army, two and thirty thousand; but when the faithful are separated, as those soldiers were mustered, there are but three hundred left. Lord, increase our faith, and the number of the faithful; that we who cannot be just in ourselves, may be just in Jesus Christ.

3. There is a third kind of justice, actual, practical, inseparably proceeding from the former; it is a sanctified conformity to the will of God. This justifies all them to the world, whom faith hath justified to the Lord; when in all our earthly business we still carry a heavenly mind; when our faith to God is seen in our faithfulness to men. "Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life," Rev. ii. 10. Continue in evangelical faith, though you die for it; continue in moral faithfulness, till you die in it. There is a faith of the law, Matt. xxiii. 23. There is a faith of the gospel, Matt. xxv. 23; Rom. i. 17. The one is fidelity in our promises; the other is confidence in the promises of God. If he covenant with us, I will be your God; we must stipulate, Then will we rest upon thee. Thou shalt be my people; then we must be faithful. According to the faith which we believe, God is faithful to us; according to the faith by which we believe, we are faithful to God. Both these together; for no man can deal faithfully with God legally, unless he believe evangelically that God will deal faithfully with him. Want of legal faith opposes the majesty of God; want of evangelical faith opposes the truth and mercy of God. Be not false-hearted in the first, nor faint-hearted in the latter. In a word, he is a just man that doth good; and there is no sap of life in the tree if no fruit appear in the branches.

The unjust man wants all these three righteousnesses: he is not legally just, for he hath no purity of nature; he is not evangelically just, for he hath no sanctity of grace; he is not practically just, for he hath no morality of life. The first wicked men cannot have, the next they will not have, and (without that) the last they shall not have.

Thus we see negatively who are unjust; but there is more than a bare privation in it, there is something positive: it includes not only a defect and indisposition to do well, but also an actual contrariety to justice, doing what is palpably evil. So there is a twofold malignity in it; the transgression, and the duration of it. For the former, the wicked are unjust to God, to men, to themselves.

1. To God. Righteousness is an obedience to the will of God, and injustice is no other than disobedience. That we may learn to judge ourselves in this, consider the infallible marks of obedience. First, it must be entire, respective of all the commandments; he that transgresseth one, hath not obeyed. Saul kept part of God's precept, slew the most, and worst; yet God rejected him as disobedient. Many piece their lives, as beggars do their cloaks, here and there a new patch: an alms at Christmas, this is a patch of charity; communicate twice a year, two patches of faith. Disobedient for all this. Secondly, single or sincere; we must obey the law without a glance at our own profit, or credit, or safety by it. If one eye look one way, the other another way, the object will never be well seen. The servant would go to church, to please his master; more fain another way, to please himself: but he that looks any other way in his devotion, than to the Lord's precepts, is unjust; he makes God the second, himself the principal. Thirdly, ready. Angels have wings to fly about it.

Abraham no sooner received that strange command, but he rose early to obey it. A compulsory obedience the devils may give, but are never the nearer being righteous. He shall never be welcome to God, that comes on his feet, and leaves his heart behind him. Fourthly, constant. That obedience which hath an end, had never any true beginning. If it falls it was never a fixed star, but a mere meteor. A man may lose his horse, his purse, his cloak; these be separable: the grace that hangs on by tacks, like a mantle, soon drops off. Divers have a crust of profession congealed by cold; desirous to keep themselves warm by the fire of the temple, which the summer of wantonness thaws into fluid and spilt water. The grasshoppers camp in the hedges in a cold day, &c. Nah. iii. 17. In cold weather they lie in heaps and swarms; in hot weather they scatter: when prosperity comes, their looseness appears. In God's book these are found unjust servants. Fifthly, true or just, no trick nor equivocation in it. It seeks not to obey God for man's sake, but man for God's sake: it obeys men, but never against the Lord.

Disobedience is called witchcraft, for it goes from God to the devil, and like a witch intends mischief and revenge. There be two parts of it; disobedience material, when it breaks the law; formal, when it scorns the Lawgiver. Disobedience did cast Adam out of Paradise, angels out of heaven, Jonah out of the ship, Saul out of his kingdom, Israel out of Israel. Superiors complain that others do not obey them; but no wonder, when they obey not God. Shall any creature owe that man service, that will perform no service to his Maker? God for this often makes a tumult and rebellion in their own bosoms; that reason, the queen regent of the soul, cannot be heard, nor any of her laws be respected, because the mutinous affections make such a combustion, putting the whole man out of order and good disposition. Disobedience will not bow, but it shall be broken; as the thunder melts the stubborn metal, and spares the unresisting purse. Thus is he unjust to God, that detains his honour; that is fed and gives no thanks: such a one steals his meat. He requires the seventh of our time, the tenth of our increase: we are unjust that deny this. These are thought honest men, yea, think themselves no less; they go as merrily with this profanation and sacrilege at their heels, as horses with an empty coach. Yea, the devil serves them as carriers do their horses; lay on them heavy loads, and then hang bells at their ears, to make them music. These are reserved to judgment, for no human law takes hold of them. Where should the poor minister have the tenths adjudged to him? And for making that day common to licentiousness, which God hath separated for especial holiness, where is this censured? A good lord gives his poor servant a farm to live on; for the rent, he requires every week one day's service, and at the year's end the tenth of his profits. He that returns not this small part to that God who gives all, is most unjust, and will be so found at the day of sentence.

2. To man. Such are they that measure their right by their power, and therefore will do injury because they can do it. Unjust, 1. To the commonwealth, as the golden extortioner. (I may so call him, because he gets gold by usury; as Babel is called the golden city, because she is an exactress of gold.) Let all the scribes in the city pass their words for him, yea, set their hands to it, yet God will hold him unjust. 2. To the church; that deny reverence to their mother, and withhold her maintenance; and, which is worse, plead a custom for it; as if it were a custom for children to rob their parents. The Italians have a trick in the art of rapier and dagger;

hey will teach a scholar with a traverse or two, to get the point of his adversary's weapon, and then to lock him up so sure, that (turning away his face) he uns him through: and forsooth he turns away his ace, because he will behold no cruelty. It is custom in England that locks up our points; and the law takes away the church's weapons by a trick of custom: yea, men stand still, behold this, justify it; but God's judgment shall find them unjust. 3. To private persons; such as steal away a man's good name with a felonious slander. Every one is bound to preserve the reputation of his brother; he that abuseth it (colour his spleen with what pretence he can) shall be condemned for unjust. Such a man is a monster, his throat a sepulchre, his tongue a sword, his mouth a bag of poison. I know in divers courts, scandals have their just censures; but how if the courts themselves admit of scandals? By the law of quittance, he that accuseth another of crimes which blemish his credit, and cannot prove them, should undergo the punishment due to such an offence. Gallio drove the railing Jews from the judgment-seat, Acts xviii. 16; he knew they had more malice than matter: a rare example! Thus lawyers often hunt a man at his form and leave the cause at loss. A captain of Darius hearing a mercenary soldier rail upon Alexander, struck him with his javelin, saying, I hired thee to fight against him, not to rail against him. Let advocates plead the cause, not inveigh against the adverse party.

The great injustice of the world is oppression; that doth ravish the poor, Psal. x. 9, not of their bodies, but of their estates. The hard-hearted Levite did but pass by, without succouring the robbed passenger, Luke x. 32: it is wicked miserum relinquere, but worse miserum facere. If the Levite be taxed for not helping him, what is their punishment that robbed him! Such are depopulators, ruining people to feed beasts; that where before men devoured sheep, now sheep devour men. This hath been an old disease, complained of by our forefathers; there were oppressors in their days, but the successors of them are now worse. Antigonus was a tyrant bad enough; yet being dead, and a more cruel one succeeding him, a cynic fellow falls every day a digging by the highway. The passengers asked him what he digged for: he answers, Antigonum refodio, i. e. I am digging up Antigonus again. Rehoboam's government made them ready to say, God be with Solomon. This caused the poor widow, an old tenantess, so to pray for the life of her young landlord, who had now the third time racked her rent. This he hearing, demanded the reason why she should so bless him, that had so cursed his father, seeing that he (in his modest phrase of oppression) had improved her rent. She answered, When your grandfather dealt hardly with us, we wished him in his grave, hoping for some goodness in the next. Your father was worse than he; we longed to be rid of him, our hopes looked on you; now you are the worst of all. And seeing by experience, seldom comes the better, we desire to keep you still; for certainly when you are gone, the next will be the devil himself. Innumerable other be the demonstrations of injustice: as, the wicked borrows, and pays not again; the sword-man wounds the image of his Maker; the tradesman abuses the simplicity of his customer; the lascivious corrupts the wife of his neighbour: these be capital unrighteousness, that bring men to judgment.

3. To a man's self. So is the unthrift, that spends himself into poverty by pride and luxury. His father went to hell with excess, and he follows after with misery: out of a laborious silkworm rises often such a painted butterfly. The drunkard is unjust to himself; hath blood, and he fires it; spirits, and he chokes them; drowns himself on the dry land. So is the envious, that loseth the sweetness of his own, by grudging at his neighbours; that grinds himself to powder with his neighbour's mill-stones: another's fatness shall keep him lean; and not being patient to tarry sickness's leisure, or (which is more despatching) his empirics, soon dies of the sullens. The covetous is unjust to himself; what he should add to the content of his nature, he adds to the continent of his treasure. It grudgeth his heart, that his heart should have any good. If his body be not kept pining, his mind is repining. A secret and sore judgment; that he who is unjust to all others, should be most unjust to himself. When pride, or lust, or misaffection calls for the purse, it is ready; let the soul call for it, that cost may be spared. While you deny yourselves for a whole year the body and blood of your Saviour, are you not unjust to yourselves? While you hear sermons, the food of your souls, as if you had no stomach to them, you are more unjust to your spiritual life, than he that wilfully famisheth himself is accountable for his own death. O hear your consciences in time, and comfort them, lest they be never able to comfort you.

Thus you have heard the nature and specifications of injustice; now look upon the continuance of it, for so much the word imports. God will not cast all sinners into hell; who then should go to heaven? but the unjust; such as practise unrighteousness without any recovery of repentance. The unrighteous shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven, 1 Cor. vi. 9; Eph. v. 6: it is the continuance in sin that excludes from mercy. Two things throw men to perdition, without the intervention of extraordinary favour; malice in sin, and utter apostacy. These be the symptoms of that endangered disease, for which there is no balm in Gilead; we call it the sin of the Holy Ghost. Not that it is against the Third Person, as he is the Third Person, more than against the First or Second; but because it is against the function or operation of that Person, whose office is to illuminate the mind, and mollify the heart with love; therefore himself is called love. If men sin wilfully after that they have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for their sins, Heb. x. 26; because they maliciously have sacrificed their sacrifice, and split the only vessel that should save them. "The iniquity of Eli's house shall not be purged with sacrifice for ever," 1 Sam. iii. 14; never expiated. "There is a sin unto death; I do not say that he shall pray for it," 1 John v. 16. Every sin is unto death, but this emphatically; with a prohibition of interceding set upon it, like the flaming sword that kept Paradise: pray not for it. Schoolmen give this reason why the sin of malice is unpardonable: The defect may find remission, where the will may pretend fear of excess. A sin of ignorance is often forgiven, as was Paul's, 1 Tim. i. 13; because a man may affect too much knowledge, as Adam did. A sin of infirmity is oft forgiven, because a man may affect too much power and dominion, as did the angels. A sin of carnal fear is often forgiven, because a man may affect too much zeal, as did two of the apostles. A sin of partiality is oft forgiven, because a man may affect too much justice, Eccl. vii. 16. But not a sin of malice, because a man can never affect too much charity.

No less doth apostacy and falling off from God. A man may sin beyond all comfort in his own conscience, till he cannot hope for himself; as did Judas: beyond all interest in the church's devotion, till their prayers cannot help them; "Pray not thou for this people," Jer. vii. 16: beyond all claim to

Christ's satisfaction; the blood of the Lamb shall not help them, Matt. xii. 31. That which makes this sin past all cure, is, because it strives against the cure; as a madman wounded, will not suffer his wounds to be bound up, but rather seeks to wound the surgeon. God hath mercy upon sinners, Christ came to call and die for sinners, there be none now in heaven but they were once sinners; which of all the holy patriarchs, blessed apostles, can excuse themselves that they never did act unjustly? But injustice was none of their trade; they did not live in it, nor die in it. Zaccheus was once unjust, but he testified his repentance by charity and restitution. But they that practise unrighteousness to the end, in the end shall find judgment.

Are reserved. This is the binding over: God puts off many wicked men from the quarter sessions to the great assizes. There is a reservation that tendeth to good: as in the danger of wreck, much luggage is thrown overboard, the precious things are reserved. In the general slaughter of Amalek, Saul reserved Agag. Unless the Lord had reserved a remnant, we had been as Sodom, Isa. i. 9. But here is a reservation to punishment: whether they sleep or wake, play or work, stand or walk, their time runs on, their judgment is nearer; and they are more surely kept unto it, than any dungeon, with the thickest walls and strongest chains, can hold a prisoner till his arraignment comes. This reservation affords us a twofold collection or observation.

1. Wickedness hath but a time, but the punishment of wickedness is beyond all time. The most raging sea of malice hath bounds, the devil himself knows that he hath but a short time. Stay till the Amorites' sins be full, then comes their overthrow. The wicked are suffered to have their wills upon the righteous, their fills of unrighteousness; but, "How are they brought into desolation, as in a moment!" Psal. lxxiii. 19. The manner is scarce visible, the time scarce divisible: how, and in a moment. Impudent Pharaoh, bloodied with this unresisted tyranny, can belch out defiance in the face of Heaven; Who is God? It is too much honour for man to receive a message from heaven; yet God sends to Pharaoh, and is repulsed. Humility says, What is man, that God should regard him? Pride says, What is the Lord, that I should regard him? Thus he domineers for a while; but ere God have done with him, he will be known to him, and known by him to all the world. He could have swept him away suddenly, as a man most unworthy to live, who with the same breath he receives, denies the Giver of it. But he was reserved to another purpose, he must rage awhile longer, that his determined confusion might be the greater. He sees Israel crossing the sea, and wonders; yet hath neither the grace nor wit to retire. He is angry at the sea, thinks not on the Lord; sees not the plain difference which he puts betwixt his Israel and the Egyptians. He cannot now either consider or fear, it is his time to perish. Fair way he had, and smoothly ran on, till he came to the midst, not so much as one wave to wet the foot of his horse. When he is too far to escape, then God begins to strike. They know not why, but they wish themselves out again. Their chariots grow heavy, when they had done them the service to bring them to their perdition.

Wicked men run not faster into sin, than they would run from judgment. But they shall find, that it was never so easy to post into transgression, but it will be more impossible to post from destruction. Saul's persecution makes David take many a weary step: he kills the priests, consults with witches; what not? He hath his day, but in the mean time is reserved to the Lord's day; the battle in Gilboa shall pay for all. The people are slain before his face, his sons fall under the swords of uncircumcised enemies, and the last scene of that tragical field is reserved for Saul himself. God is long ere he strikes, but when he doth, it is to purpose. The wicked man is not half so sure of transient pleasures, as he is of permanent plagues. Sin serves him as Abner did Ishbosheth, put him on the challenge of the kingdom, and there leave him miserable; or as Tamerlane helped Cosroe to the kingdom of Persia, and then took it away again. It is like a boy's squib, flashes, and cracks, and stinks, and is nothing. It serves him as Jael did Sisera; he asks water, she gives him milk; he wishes shelter, she makes him a bed; he begs but the protection of her tent, she covers him with a mantle: she gives more than he asks, but withal, more than he expects. When his troublesome thoughts were pacified with the change, and he flatters himself, It is better to be here than in the whirling of chariots, in the horror of fight or flight, among such wounds, such shrieks, such carcasses. But, as when Agag says, The bitterness of death is past, even then he feels the sword: so in these contentful thoughts Sisera dies; the terror of Israel lies bleeding at the foot of a woman. Do we see impudent sinners flourish, awe the greatest, confront, yea, control magistracy? It is their time, and they take it: do what mischief they can, answer it as they may. But the Lord laughs at him, for he seeth that his day is coming, Psal. xxxvii. 13. There is a day of reckoning, and that day is coming, and the Lord sees it. He that may reckon with them at any time, will not reckon till that time.

2. The unjust are already reserved, the decree is passed against them. They are bound over to the last assizes by a threefold recognisance, as it were with infrangible, though insensible, chains of judgment; the bond of their sins, the bond of their conscience, and the bond of omnipotent justice: and this threefold cable is not easily broken.

The first bond is their sins: "He shall be holden with the cords of his sins," Prov. v. 22. His own shackles shall hold him fast enough, he needs no stronger chains than those he makes for himself. It may be asked the sinner, what he means, to make his fetters so strong? Saul was ever from the beginning his own enemy; neither did any hands hurt him but his own. At last, his death is suitable to his life; his own hand pays him the reward of all his wickedness: he that had been so long a killing his soul, now makes as short work with his body; Satan needs not bind a reprobate faster than he binds himself. The wicked do not, like temporal malefactors, go under bail; where it is but forfeiting the recognisance, and escape; for every step they take in sin, brings them directly forward to their judgment.

Therefore is this bondage called a death; sin being the death of life on earth, and the life of death in hell. There may be certain degrees in this spiritual dying, as there are in a corporeal dissolution. There is a syncope or swooning, an epilepsy or falling sickness, an apoplexy or cold palsy, which if it be total is also final. The former are incident to the faithful, but recoverable by their ordinary repentance; as a man in a swoon is restored by sprinkling cold water, or bowing forward the body. The second are greater crimes, deadly sins; so expelling the Spirit of God, that no sign of his presence appears. It must be an extraordinary repentance that recovers these offenders; as a man in the falling sickness, by striving, sweating, beating of himself. Now they that are in a swoon, or foaming under an epilepsy, are bound ist enough, they cannot run away; yet such fits and ills may be recovered. But when it comes to an poplexy, a putrified custom, a rotten obstinacy in in; the grave does not surer bind a dead body with her mouldy bars, than these bonds of obduracy enchain such a soul. There may remain awhile some small appearance of breath, a little natural warmth; yet it is impossible, without a miracle, to recover that spiritual life, which is so long, so universally excluded.

There is a proceeding with the mortified conscience, as with the dead carcass. First, the dead man that is to be buried, is the impenitent sinner; resembling a corpse in many respects. 1. In lack of sense; so lethargized in sin, that he feels not the prickings and woundings of a sore heart. Lay a mountain upon a dead man, he feels not the weight. Christ counsels him to buy restoratives, Rev. iii. 18; he perceives no need to buy: the cause of buying is the feeling of want, not the want of feeling. There is no love to God, no charity to men, in them; they have the true love of sense, but not the true sense of love. 2. In lack of appetite: they neither hunger nor thirst after righteousness, as being full of sinful crudities. Life brings appetite, appetite desires meat, and meat affords nourishment; if the soul hungers not, it lives not. Appetite is sharper in famine than in plenty; a double punishment, more stomach and less meat: but these desire not the body and blood of Christ. There is no corporal affection like thirst; as we see in Hagar, in Samson, in Christ himself suffering; not esurio, but sitio; extreme heat working upon the radical moisture. But dry these souls are to the death, yet feel no thirst after the waters of life. 3. In lack of motion. Indeed, a dead body hath a natural propulsion downwards; so these unjust men have a passive motion, they move down to hell; but they cannot actively move one finger to goodness. A corpse is a heavy, disanimated lump, pressing downwards; as sin cast Dathan from this world, Lucifer out of heaven. 4. In lack of heat, infected with the poison of that serpent, which is cold in the fourth degree, mortal. When a man is dead, chafe him, rub him, bow him, put aqua vitæ into him; then take him by the hand, and bid him walk; yet he cannot stir the least joint: except the soul be restored, all persuasions be in vain. 5. In lack of sweetness; the soul, his salt, being gone, what can keep it from putrefaction? Thus is adultery a noisome uncleanness; slander an unsavoury breath, like the stream that comes from a new open grave; their throat being an open sepulchre, Psal. v. 9. Heaps of ill-gotten wealth is a very dunghill; all wickedness like stinking carrion to God.

Now the coffin or grave for such a sinner is threefold, according to his death. The sepulchre of the body is the earth; the sepulchre of the soul is the body; the sepulchre of both, dying in sin, is hell: as there is natural, spiritual, and eternal death. The bearers that carry him, are four. 1. Hope of life; neither age nor sickness can put him out of that hope. 2. Promise of repentance to himself, when he can sin no longer. 3. Presumption of mercy, as if God must needs save him because he made him. 4. Love of the world, which makes him forget the world to come. These carry him out of life, as the widow's son was borne out of the gates of the city, Luke vii. A wanton eye carries a man out by the gates of his sight; a swearing tongue, by the gate of his mouth; listening to scurrilous speeches, by the gate of his ears.

Thus dead is every obstinate sinner: dead in sin, saith Paul; yea, saith the Lord. It is not the opinion of some physician, that may be deceived in his principals, but it is a Thus saith the Lord. It is said of Adam fallen, as of a condemned malefactor, that he is dead in law. Not only in respect of the dissimilitude betwixt God's life and theirs; which is such an alienation, Eph. iv. 18, as is indeed a diametrical opposition; but in the order and course of God's justice, sentencing death to every one that sins: and this death must be answered either in the sinner or in the Saviour. So they are as dead to God, as a traitor to the prince, or as a felon is to the judge.

This is one especial bond, whereby they are reserved and bound over to the day of judgment; a death in sin. Not but that Christ is able to raise the dead, and to loose these bonds, Psal. cxvi. 16. He raised three sorts of dead in the three years of his ministry: one in the house, Jairus' daughter; another in the gate, the widow's son; a third in the grave, which was Lazarus. St. Augustine (Serm. 44. de Verb. Dom.) thus resembles them: A sinner is dead in the house, when he sins secretly, imagining mischief in his mind. He is carried out of the gate, when he sins openly, not confining it within doors; but brings it forth, Psal. vii. 14, in word or deed, and makes it scandalous to the church. He stinks in the grave, when he sins habitually, without any remorse. The first may be raised by doctrine; the next by discipline, as appears by Christ's own practice and direction, John ii. 15; Matt. xviii. 17. But what shall we do with the incorrigible and customary sinner, who is dead in the grave? Only pray, with Mary, "Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died," John xi. 32; but I know all things are possible unto thee. Now there was weeping for the damsel dead in the house: more weeping for the man carried out of the gate; the mother wept, the church laments: but most weeping at Lazarus' grave; Martha wept, and Mary wept, and the Jews wept, and Jesus wept, and groaned in the spirit. We ought to weep penitently for the beginnings of sin; more for the proceeding and increase; most of all for the completion and accomplishment of death, when the sinner betakes himself to the scorner's chair, deriding God and all goodness. Let us say in the church, as Demosthenes did in Athens, We have more cause to weep for the lives of the bad, than for the deaths of the good. It is over the spiritually dead, that the confused quire of hell sing songs of triumph. They are glad to see us sin in the house, admitting an ill motion to our purpose; rejoice at our carrying forth, breaking out into notorious offences; are most merry, when we continue in filthiness, till we stink in the sepulchre. O let us hearken to Christ, Arise, sit up and speak; to comfort our mother on earth, to please our Father in heaven.

The next bond is their evil conscience; an inflexible binder, hell itself is not surer. Such a man is αἰσχροκατάσπιτος, damned of his own self, Tit. iii. 11. Unless he could run away from himself, he cannot escape this judgment. There be three acts of conscience. 1. Before the deed is done, examining whether it be lawful or unlawful. 2. In the deed doing, allowing or resisting. 3. After the deed done, approving or condemning. There be divers reasons why every man hath a conscience.

1. That man might have an internal schoolmaster to direct him. Now the fittest for this office is conscience. (Chrysost.) If the irascible or concupiscible part had been our governors, either they would have been often absent, or else led us amiss. What a beast is man under the regiment of lust or sense! and how seldom does anger play the game with reason! But conscience, like a pulley, keeps reason in the right wheel; and either cashiers mutinous affections, or executes martial law upon them. If only outward rulers were to govern us, they have no eyes to see the mind; there might be misrule enough within doors, and they never the wiser. Therefore they would either be condemned for meanness, or condemned for partiality. But in the conscience there is both awe enough and justice enough, and every man is willing to be ruled by his own mind; if not, this schoolmaster hath a rod to compel him.

2. That he might have a thing within him to put him in remembrance. In the law a man will do nothing without his counsel learned; but for the passages of his life, he seldom stands upon advice. This monitor will be ever plucking him by the sleeve, telling him, this action is naught, God is angry at it, unshiftable plagues attend it. David carried in his bosom, as it were, a painted picture of adultery and murder, says Chrysostom. The word doth but sometimes discover our corruption: it is the glass St. James speaks of, wherein we look, and see our image, but turn our backs, and forget it. But conscience is always at hand; it is the continual reflection of the soul upon itself. Even in the dark it will represent to a man his own form, make his wounds smart, and send him quickly to the Physician.

3. That he may have a judge within him; wherein conscience hath yet a higher office. For, 1. A schoolmaster may be despised. Customary sinners, like boys grown tall and stubborn, condemn the rod. A remembrancer may be dispraised; and said, as Hushai of Abithophel, his counsel is good, but not at this time; but a judge we all tremble at. 2. External judges may be corrupted, but the conscience will take no bribes. Oh that as every judge hath a conscience, so this conscience might evermore give the judgment! 3. The guilty person may flee from another judge; but there is no evasion of conscience. It is impossible for a man to run away from himself. 4. Great men cannot be brought to judgment-seats: the poor are like the primitive or original matter, under generation, so under reformation; but the rich are like stars above the moon, too high for the reach of ordinary power. When a company of Lacedemonian gallants had defiled the bench and seat of judgment, the magistrates at first stormed, and vowed punishment; but when they knew who did it, they enacted a law of exception: It is lawful for those gentlemen to do what they will. But be they never so great, this judge will make them stoop. 5. Preachers dare not reprove all men particularly; such an attempt would bring them into contempt. Conscience fears no man; dares check a magistrate, control a prince. It may sometimes slumber: no woman is always scolding; but when she wakens she will speak.

4. That man might have his comfort, or his torment, within him. Comfort to the righteous; in all afflictions they have this stay, that they be not overwhelmed with sorrow. Though they be condemned, this approves; affords liberty in prison; in the want of outward food, this sustains: it is the "hidden manna," Rev. ii. 17. Torment to sinners; that they may taste of God's judgments even in this life. (Chrysost.) In the midst of all their prosperous fortunes, they have inward tortures. A malefactor in prison, though he fare well, yet is tormented with the thought of ensuing judgment. It is the hand-writing on the wall, that prints bloody characters in Belshazzar's heart. This is the breakings-out of the flames of Tophet, a little model of hell: as a looking-glass broken into many small pieces, every one can show the contracted form. This is another indissoluble chain that binds them over.

The last bond of this reservation is the immutable justice of God. In respect of his decree before the world, and suffering them to heap up sin in the world, that they may be punished in the world to come. But this is to be adored with reverence and with silence. The Lord knoweth how to do it.

For ourselves, let us take external prosperity for no good mark of our election; the fattest beasts are kept for the slaughter. Flatter we not ourselves with the sense of impunity; the less sorrow we feel, the more we have cause to fear, for the more may be behind. Let us break off our sins by repentance, that God may break the bonds of our durance. Pray with David; "Bring my soul out of prison, that I may praise thy name," Psal. cxlii. 7. "Rescue my soul from destructions, my darling from the lions," Psal. xxxv. 17. That our sins being remitted, and our consciences quieted, we may live in grace, and go to the grave in peace; and when all books be opened, ours may have no sin found in it, but instead thereof, the righteousness of Jesus Christ.

"Unto the day of judgment." This is the assizes. Sinful persons riot in the gaol of their durance; yet when the session comes, they begin to be a little calm, put off their disguises of dissoluteness, and put on some modesty and semblance of humiliation. Then they change their apparel, their garbs, their looks; all to appear civil. If the meditation of this dreadful day, when all hearts shall be searched, all secret corruptions embowelled, a final sentence pronounced, by a Judge that cannot be deceived, upon sinners that would not be converted; if this cannot make us tremble, our hearts disdain comparison for hardness with the nether millstone.

Jugment is diversly understood. For rule and government, Matt. xii. 18: order them aright. For equity, Luke xi. 42; Jer. xxii. 3. For opinion, 1 Cor. iv. 3: that is a man's judgment, which he thinks. For plagues and calamities, Exod. vii. 4. For righteousness and holiness: All the ways of God are judgment and truth, Psal. xxv. 10. For authority, John v. 27. For God's secret counsel, Rom. xi. 33. For our afflictions, 1 Pet. iv. 17; 1 Cor. xi. 32. Here it is taken for a determination, or giving a sentence by a judge on the bench, and in the seat of justice. For this there is a court, and a throne. The court shall be kept in the clouds, Matt. xxiv. 30. If any ask, Why rather on earth, than in heaven? I answer, the malefactor to be judged hath sinned on the earth; and it is the manner of secular judges there to keep the assizes, where men committed the trespasses. All the elements have been abused by sinners, therefore are they judged in the midst of the elements; that the very place guilty of their fault, might be satisfied with their ruin. Again, to be admitted into heaven, though there to be judged, is an honour whereof sinful nature is not capable; therefore they must remain in the lower parts of the world. No reprobate man or devil shall ever see God: Christ indeed they shall see in the glory of a Judge, not in the glory of God. There is also a throne, Matt. xxv. 31. Earthly kings, when they will show themselves to their subjects in awful majesty, ascend their thrones; this is the highest state of a kingdom. This throne shall be most terrible to the wicked; a fiery flame, and the wheels burning fire, Dan. vii. 9. But to the faithful there is a rainbow about it, Rev. iv. 3, to qualify the terrible-ness of it.

"Unto the day of judgment." This point I have divers times handled: therefore to avoid a coincidence of discourse, I fasten only upon two meditations, formerly not observed; the sufficiency of the Judge, and the necessity of the judgment.

1. First, the sufficiency of the Judge: his infinite perfection cannot be better discerned of us, than by comparison. There be two main conditions that concur to the making up of a judge; outward warrant, and inward enablement.

For the former; judgment is not every man's work, there must be commission and designation for it. There have been indeed some extraordinary actions of justice, without specification of warrant. Such was the act of Phinehas, Numb. xxv., for which some plead extraordinary instinct from God; and doubtless he would not have accepted that sacrifice, if himself had not prompted it. So he had the substance of authority from private revelation, though not the form of authority from public deputation. But I rather think that his judgment was also solemnly warranted. For both, God says to Moses, Hang up the heads; and Moses to the under-rulers, Every one slay his men that were joined to Baal-peor. So that for this execution every Israelite is made a magistrate; and then why not Phinehas? But it is objected, that he was a priest, and his place for peace and mercy. I answer, even this act of justice was a work of mercy: Samuel thought it not out of his office, to hew Agag in pieces. They might make a carcass, which might not touch it. Levi got the priesthood by such a sacrifice, shedding the blood of idolaters. Thus ordinary justice might well bear out Phinehas in that act. But it is not for every man to challenge this office; private persons may only pray for the redress of sin; if the man be not warranted, it is a lawful question, Who made thee a judge? Now if a deputed judge be of great authority, who hath yet a supreme magistrate over him, to examine and reform him; how mighty is this Judge, that makes, yea, and unmakes judges! that judgeth them, and if they do ill, condemns them! By him kings reign and judges rule; by him shall king and judges be called to account. The Jews once questioned Christ, "By what authority doest thou these things?" Matt. xxi. 23. And the fools of the world would fain doubt it. But this day shall show, that the Father hath committed all judgment unto the Son, John v. 22.

For the other, which is enablement; whatsoever sufficiency is in other judges, comes from the Lord; how infinite then is himself! To make a sufficient judge, these virtues are required.

(1.) Knowledge, Deut. i. 13. A man can best judge of that which he knoweth. Ignorance of the judge is the misfortune of the innocent, says Augustine. It is bad at the bar, worse on the bench. An advocate's ignorance can wrong but one man's cause, a judge's may prejudice the whole country. In this Paul thought himself happy, that he stood before a judge expert in the laws, Acts xxvi. 3. "Wisdom is better than weapons of war," Eccl. ix. 18. Without this a magistrate is but a blind Polyphemus, a great monster without an eye. A stander-by can say, This you cannot do by law; or in derision, You are beside your book. It is a shame for a justicer, that before he can tell what to do, he must go consult his clerk. Otherwise he must weave a resolution out of his own brains, as spiders spin their cobwebs out of themselves. If he hit on the right, it is beholden to his luck, and so he relieves the plaintiff's hope, not with constant equity, but with an uncertain lottery; and fills up the time with that which empties the occasion, some adage, or a stolen jest of stale wit, or a patch of poetry. But our Judge hath clear eyes to discern the cause; and knows the law, for it was of his own making. There is nothing that can lie hid from his knowledge, or escape his power. The Jesuit cannot equivocate with him, though he have tricks beyond the devil.

(2.) Courage, magnanimity, or spirit: typified in Judah, that judicary tribe; whose emblem, or escutcheon, was a lion couchant, that lies by the prey without fear of rescue, and turns not his head at the sight of any creature. The principal pillars of a house had need be heart of oak. Of soft wood, or bending lead, carpenters will not make them rules; and are flexible dispositions fit for rulers? Men do not choose a starting horse to lead the team. He had need be of David's valour, that can snatch the prey out of the lion's mouth, rescue the oppressed from him that is too mighty for him. Now all the courage of man is but the gift of God: "In thine hand it is to give strength unto all," 1 Chron. xxix. 12. If a beam be so radiant, how glorious is the Sun himself! The Judge of all the world is inflexible. It is falsely said of Cato, that the sun might sooner alter his course, than he pervert his course of justice. The stoutest and strongest may yield, either for fear, as Pilate when he heard but a buzz that he was not Cæsar's friend; or for favour, as Eli, that buried the living severity of a judge, and burning zeal of a priest, in the frozen and dead indulgence of a father. But whom should this Judge fear, or who can deserve his favour? No audacious swaggerer dares cross him, no great man's letters can prevail with him, nor the frowns of kings, nor the flatteries of courtiers, can move him.

(3.) Integrity; there must be no corruption in him. The brain had need be of a strong constitution, that can disperse and dispel the fumes surging from a vicious stomach, liver, or spleen. He whom neither clamour, nor rumour, nor terror, neither furious passion, nor melting compassion, can divert from justice, is fit to be a judge. In this court of Christ, there will be no commuting, Give me thy silver for thy sin. No dispensing, Bear with me, and I will bear with thee. No conniving, as Eli, The judge shall judge it, 1 Sam. ii. 25; whereas himself was judge, and did not judge it; so sentencing himself, while he did not sentence his sons. No slubbering over a cause, without ransacking the bowels of it. But a vindicating of truth out of all the dens and thickets of juggling conveyance. The scholar searcheth it by disputation, the judge by examination. Neighbourhood is my friend, alliance is my friend, bounty is my friend; but justice is my friend above all. Thus Job searched out the cause which he knew not, Job xxix. 16. Man doth search before he finds, God doth find before he searches. Man goes by discourse, by certain rules and principles, and general deductions, and from thence concludes: God sees at first. Man and truth are two several things; truth and God is all one.

Mortal judges may be blinded with bribes, and the champions of justice become mammon's slaves. A gift in the bosom wresteth judgment; the injection of a dram sways the golden balance of justice, and so the cause is poised by the weight of the bribe. If the left hand be full of bribes, the right must be full of mischief. But our Judge is not thus to be wrought upon: "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" Gen. xviii. 25. Did not the Judge in his mortal flesh scourge such money merchants with zealous severity? Did not his apostle with fiery indignation ban Simon and his money? It comes to pass that whole kingdoms and churches perish, because such men and their monies perish not. Oh if this Judge would take gold, how few rich men would go to hell! But gold hath lost millions of souls; it never did, never shall, save one. A dram of grace shall be more worth then, than all the treasures of the earth. Sublunary materials have their places; "Iron is taken out of the earth, and brass molten out of the stone," Job xxviii. 2: the sun is found in his orb, fire in his element, &c. But where is grace to be found, and what is the place of justice? It is not found in the land of the living, ver. 13. Nature says, It is not in me: wealth and honour disclaim it, It is not found in us. Then how shall we do in the day of judgment? It is found in the treasury of Jesus.

This point willingly and usefully extends itself to magistrates, of what place soever; collaterally to all persons, teaching them to do equity, and to preserve integrity.

[1.] Do justice: to this the judge stands bound in reason, as the proper act of his function: if he be not at leisure to do this, it is time to unjudge him; as the woman said to Philip, Do not reign. Judgment is not man's, but the Lord's, 2 Chron. xix. 6. Judges are a kind of living instruments; and the nature of instruments consists in the use and operation; as a knife is only to cut. That avails nothing, which does not avail to its own proper end. If the axe be not good to hew, we say it is good for nothing. What then say you to those magistrates, that have eyes and see not, ears and hear not? They are idols: only one defect of those idols they are not troubled with; we cannot say, They have hands, and handle not; for they handle too much; so much of the money, that they care not to handle the cause. Eyes they have, and see not; feet they have, and walk not; mouths they have, and speak not; hands they have, but they do handle. These are instruments without operation; for judicem judicare, is as agreeable and natural, as for the eye to see, the ear to hear. If the other be not idols, sure they are idolaters; golden calves if they be not, yet they are worshippers of golden calves. Yet in doing justice, I would not have judgment triumph over mercy; whereas mercy rejoiceth against judgment. To banish all favour, is to banish some equity. There may be favours within the cause, not favours without the cause; legal favours, though not personal. Where no wrong is done to justice, there may be fair use and place for mercy.

[2.] Keep integrity, what place soever you make good; it is the spiritual constitution and best health of your souls. The breach of this, the apostle calls a shipwreck. The weight of all goodness will leave us, when we leave that: it shall pour contempt upon princes, and make a great Antiochus called a vile person. As we love our lives, as we love our souls; through all the transitory, temporary, momentary passages of this world; let us preserve the life of our lives, and soul of our souls, our integrity.

2. The necessity of this judgment. That this should be, it stands both with the justice and mercy of God. "It is a righteous thing with God to recompense tribulation to them that trouble you; to you that are troubled, rest with us," 2 Thess. i. 6, 7, rest with himself. For this world, they are afflicted most that serve God best; and men of worst conscience flow with abundance. So that the world thinks none miserable but the conscionable; the more holy, the less happy. Who have more seconds and friends at a pinch, than the deboshed sons of Belial, the roaring monsters of the world, that with crest and breast oppose all hinderance in the way of their lusts and humours? What plotting, what siding there is to maintain a ruffian, to countenance some disordered retainer, to uphold a rotten alehouse, to procure a homicide's pardon, who sees not? Whereas a good man's trouble is by all cunning aggravations greatedened; as if the world meant all hurt against him, that means none. Oh if in this life only we had hope in Christ, we were of all men the most miserable, 1 Cor. xv. 19. There had need be a judgment; and for this cause among the rest, the saints cry instantly, incessantly, Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly.

Be pleased to consider this point also comparatively. Without judgment how could any nation stand? All things would run to disorder and confusion but for this. There can be no society among men without indifferency: there is no indifferency, where offence is done without satisfaction: satisfaction may be sought many ways, can no way be enforced, but by judgment. This they resolve into several acts of judiciary proceeding, even from the summons to the sentence, from God's own example in the first sinner's conviction. If visible powers were not more feared than the invisible God, the world would be overrun with outrage. Even when God's own Israel had offended, Moses makes them bleed for it. He that was so good, that he would rather perish himself than Israel should perish, yet pronounceth sentence of death on the idolaters, rejoices and blesseth the executioners. It is charity as well as justice, to punish offenders; and it is hard to say whether God loves more a pitiful justice, or a punishing mercy. But might not those sinners have repented and lived? Or if they must be punished, can nothing serve but death? Or if they must die, shall it be by the hands of their brethren? Or if brethren must cut their throats, shall it be done in the heat of their sins? Yes, so God commanded; and even that judgment was mercy; judgment on the bad, mercy to the whole; the corrupt blood is let out, that the body may be preserved. Moses had a soft heart, but zealous and wise; pitiful he was, not fond.

A sinful commonwealth cannot live, unless it bleed in the common vein. There is not a better sacrifice to God, than the blood of malefactors: this sacrifice so pleased him in the hands of the Levites, that they alone must sacrifice to him still. Next to our prayers, we do no better service to God, than in punishing obstinate sinners; if they deserve it, even unto blood. How doth this free the land from those judgments, which God otherwise would inflict! His revenge pursues transgressors; but if the revenge of man's justice overtake it, God gives over the chase: to execute this judgment, saves him a labour. If the land be defiled with blood, in duels, drunken quarrels, there is no way to purge it, but by their blood that polluted it. Often hath the Lord done justice on the whole body, because the head hath not done justice on a member; and the seasonable infliction of a less punishment hath avoided a greater. The tribe of Levi, by shedding the blood of the idolatrous Israelites, was cleared from the blood of the innocent Shechemites. The best friends to the state are the impartial ministers of judgment; nor do the prayers of them that sit still and do nothing, so much pacify God's wrath against us, as their just retribution. We gaze and wonder at the iniquity of the land, yea, shed tears for it; but it is the public sword of our authority in correcting it, that must reconcile the Lord. Governors are faulty of those sins they see and punish not. It is no less than a good sight in a state, even a malefactor at the gallows. We could not eat our meat, nor sleep in our beds, nor pray in peace, but for judgment. Such is the necessity of it, that no state can stand without it.

This is a benefit in our land which we must acknowledge by experience, God grant we may acknowledge with thankfulness. We have courts and judgment-seats for all causes; spiritual and temporal, civil and criminal, pecuniary and capital. We have judges visiting all the great cities twice in the year at least, 1 Sam. vii. 16; so that the people cannot complain that they travel far for justice, nor expect against trial, who stand or fall by the deposition and verdict of their nearest neighbours. The widow took a right course in soliciting the judge, Luke viii. 3. "When they have a matter," saith Moses, "they come unto me," Exod. xviii. 16. And when Christ chargeth us to "agree with our adversary," Matt. v. 25, he speaks not against just proceeding in law; but rather ratifies and rectifies the course of civil justice. Being smitten, he struck not again; yet he expostulated concerning the act, John xviii. 3. Paul reproving the high priest in justice, Acts xiii. 3, was yet prepared to suffer; and he appealed unto Cæsar. If then it be so necessary for man, that he cannot conserve his profit, credit, quiet, life itself, without judgment, how much more stands it with the honour of God! There be innumerable sins, which neither the eye of man sees, nor the arm of man can reach; these must not escape, God must be glorified in all: now he cannot be glorified, unless all transgression be punished, and all obedience crowned. I conclude.

Oh that men would therefore prepare themselves for this last and great audit. "I beheld a pale horse: and his name that sat on him was Death, and Hell followed with him," Rev. vi. 8. Many tremble at death, but how would they be affrighted if they could see his follower, hell! The jackals do not more wait upon the lions, nor crows upon armies, nor gaolers on sergeants, than the devil attends on death for a booty. Death is but as the hook, that jerks the reprobates, like fishes, out of the pond of this world: there is afterward a fire and a frying-pan, or scalding caldron, to come. "Let us eat and drink; for tomorrow we die," 1 Cor. xv. 32. Never beast made such a senseless argument. Riot, because we shall die? How strange is such a conclusion to such a promise! It is all one with them to be a farmer's hog, or an alderman's horse, or a lady's puppy, or themselves; that think death the full period, the last and final cessation of the creature. So when Antisthenes cries out in his pangs, Who shall ease me? Diogenes tendered him a knife, to cut his own throat. Our frantic combatants, falsely termed brave spirits, as prodigal of their lives as cocks and dogs, pouring them out on every drunken quarrel, little think of this dreadful day to come. It is not the loss of the men we so much pity; good for nothing but to stop breaches, and make up forlorn hopes, in the mouth of cannons; but it is the loss of their souls. If they did think of this judgment, they would have little list to such desperate combats. For who would not rather welcome a rapier or pistol, than a lingering and racking sickness; but for this consequence, that after death comes judgment?

Death is but the beginning of sorrows; when we have done with him, judgment begins with us. Yet too many banish this meditation as too melancholy; and, like children or cowards, rather shut their eyes, and choose to feel the blow, than to see and avoid it. How silly is it to fear death, whose pangs are sometimes less than the tooth-ache, more than the day of judgment, which whom it finds out of Christ, shall cast into everlasting fire! So fools fear the thunder-crack, and not the thunder-bolt; the report of the ordnance, not the bullet; the serjeant's arrest more than the gaoler's imprisonment. Let us not seek to avoid death, this we cannot, but prepare ourselves for the trial, this we may. Some a little wiser, and a very little better, upon a cold thought of death, admit a short-breathed parley of judgment. And then after a sigh or two, put all upon a Lord, have mercy on us; we trust it shall go as well with us as with others; even as God will have it. These have some scattered and preposterous flashes of the last judgment in their consciences, yet take no course to get faith and pardon in Jesus Christ. Most men think all well, and they shall answer the matter easily enough; not weighing the horror of their sins. But how fearfully do they find themselves deluded, when their souls awake, as Jonah did in the tempest, in the gulf of fire and brimstone! Let us ballast our ship before we put to sea, lest we perish in the main; and judge ourselves, that we be not judged in the day of Jesus Christ.

"To be punished." This is the execution. It were a vain session, if malefactors were not put to execution. Irrite and forceless are those censures, which impunity follows. The mulets and fines which are not required, do make wickedness more bold and insensible. But after God's judgment follows an unavoidable execution; the unjust are not only judged, but punished. Among men, good laws drop into contempt, by making difference of offenders; magistrates are afraid to meddle with the outrages of the mighty. Whence it comes, that small thefts are condemned to carts, while the great sacrileges are honoured in coaches. If the great beast make a gap in the mound, the whole herd will not be afraid to follow. It was the Lord's charge to Moses, Hang up the heads, Numb. xxv. 4. God could as well have struck the rulers as the people; yet while himself punisheth the vulgar, he bids Moses punish the princes; which one would think should have been more properly reserved to his own immediate hand. Yet these he leaves to human authority, that he might procure awe to his own ordinances. It is the impartial execution of noble offenders, that wins credit to government; and the want of it cuts the sinews of any state. If their sins have made them base, let there be no favour in their penalty. But in this judgment, God respects no persons; he knows no valour, no honour, no riches, no royalty, in the matter of sin; but "Tribulation and anguish, upon every soul of man that doeth evil," Rom. ii. 9. He knows nothing in man, nothing for man, but only the righteousness of one, God and man, his Son Jesus. There is a sin among men, for which there may be some mediation; "but if a man sin against God, who shall entreat for him?" 1 Sam. ii. 25. None but Christ. From hence I will only derive these two collections.

1. That man's soul is immortal, and his body shall be raised again; otherwise how could there be a punishment after the day of judgment? Carnal reason can hardly imagine, how a soul should have subsistence after its separation from the body; it seems incredible, because it is invisible. But eagles can see more than owls: nor was mere nature ignorant of this; through all clouds of error she could see this clear truth, that souls die not with their bodies. This is an inbred instinct sucked from the breast of nature, an indelible principle stamped in the soul by God himself, not to be rased out. The waggoner hath a being, though his coach be broken; the ship is wrecked on the sea, yet the mariner may swim to harbour; the adder lives after she hath slipt off her coat; the musician keeps his skill, though his lute be broken; the snail may creep out, and leave his shell behind. Beside faith's clear sight, and supernatural revelation; I saw souls under the altar, Rev. vi. 9: John did see spirits.

Reason itself can find no absurdity in it. (1.) I know my soul to be in my body, I cannot see it: my body is but a house of clay; cannot another substance be as capable of this soul as clay? may not the air, or heaven, or any other place, contain it as well as earth? (3.) The soul is not guided by the body, but the body by the soul; that may be choleric, when the body is phlegmatic; that cheerful, when the other is melancholy. Divers martyrs have expressed solid joy, when their corporal torments have been extreme; as if they had been spirits without bodies. The body would often eat, when the soul hath a mind to fast; the body would sleep, the soul rouseth it up to pray: often have you seen a cheerful mind in a distempered body. Now if their dispositions be so manifestly cross, that the one can be well when the other is ill; one grieved and troubled, when the other is in perfect health; it is plain, that this soul may as well be, and be sensible, out of the body, as in the body.

(3.) It were foolish for men to be so careful about their surviving names, if their souls were extinguishable with their bodies. What is that honour to me, whereof I am not sensible? If death were the destruction of the whole nature and substance, a good remembrance were to little purpose; and men had better leave their posterity more wealth, though less credit behind them.

(4.) Death itself were but a toy, if no judgment followed it, or if there was no soul to be judged. It were then only as the breaking of a pitcher, which was full of nothing but fluid air. He were a coward that would fear death, if he thought it to be the end of all fear. Expiration were not terrible, if it left nothing that remains sensible.

(5.) If the soul does exhale as sensual brutes, why does it understand more than brutes? The soul of the beast is as salt to keep it sweet: man's hath a nobler and more divine dowry; it can discourse, reason, forecast, invent, remember; it can read, exercise arts, deduce conclusions; which be characters of an immortal nature. For men will not write on waters, nor engrave curiously in snow, ice, or such liquefying stuff. Therefore it is a particle of divine breath, inspired into formed loam by God himself. It doth not arise out of the body, but is infused into it; therefore may as well exist without the body after, as it did without the body before. Dust returns to dust, the spirit to him that gave it, Eccl. xii. 7; both to their originals, dust to dust, heaven to heaven. First the soul goes to this tribunal, then the body to earth: first the soul is judged and punished or rewarded, as the principal in good or evil; afterwards the body, as a mere accessory. The soul of the righteous is first crowned, as that which more purely and primarily served God; the body did but rather hinder, therefore must come after. The day of death to the body is the day of birth to the soul.

(6.) The body is but sometimes awake, the soul is never asleep. The body is infirm and dull; now that which never sleeps in the body, shall certainly never sleep out of the body. And how is that liable to death, that is not capable of sleep? In the deadest and deepest slumbers, that is always discoursing, working, thinking; death's younger brother cannot overcome it, sleep's elder brother shall not annihilate it. No somniferous opium, or dormitory potion, can charm this into slumber: yea, it doth not seldom exercise the faculties with more freedom in the epilogue of sickness, in the confines, yea, even article of death; and shows more vigour in the corporal weakness, than it did in the fulness of health: as a prisoner looks and speaks more cheerfully, when the windows be open, than when all are shut up in darkness. Yea, it rejoiceth at death, as at the keeper's turning of the key, to open the door, and set it at liberty. It leaves the body, as the inhabitant leaves a rotten and ruinous house; as a carpenter leaves his axe when the edge is blunted; or as a musician lays by his lute, when the strings are broken; or as a guest makes haste out of his inn to his long home. She never sleeps in sleep, therefore not in death; for death is a long sleep, as sleep is a short death. Elijah prays that the child's soul may come to him again, 1 Kings xvii. 21; therefore it was not extinct, though out of the body. "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit," was St. Stephen's farewell, Acts vii. 59: his spirit was not stoned to death. Fear not him that can kill the body only, &c. Matt. x. 28. To kill the body is one thing, to kill the soul another. By St. Paul's choice, a man may be at once "absent from the body, and present with the Lord," 2 Cor. v. 8. "As thou livest, and as thy soul liveth," saith Uriah to David, 2 Sam. xi. 11: he speaks of two different lives. The rich man was in hell, Luke xvi. 25: no man thinks his body there; it was his soul. God is called the God of the living, Matt. xxii. 32: now the bodies of the saints are dead, therefore their souls be safe.

To conclude, then, the soul is not a vapour, but a spirit; not an accident, but a substance; the body's elder sister, an excellent queen over it: in it, but not mixed, but separable from it: a guest that falls not with the house; but departs from it for a better habitation: and when it is re-edified at the resurrection, will revisit and reunite it again to itself. Thus it lies not a dying with the flesh; but as when the body sleeps, the soul sleeps not; so when the body dies, the soul dies not. If it have kept house well, it shall be exalted to everlasting peace; if unjust in life, after death it must be punished.

But is the soul only accountable, is that alone liable to punishment? No, the body that hath accompanied it in the sin, must not be separated in the penalty. Divers have believed the soul's immortality, that have doubted the resurrection of the body; and this error seems to have found place in some of the Corinthians. "How say some among you, that there is no resurrection?" 1 Cor. xv. 12: some of you, all do not say so: St. Paul doth not wrap up the innocent and orthodox with the rest in the same accusation. Many acknowledged this, some doubted; therefore he spends a long chapter in this argument; which I forbear to amplify, as not daring to suspect any of us taken with such a hesitation. The soul never dies, and a man is not a man without his body: therefore there must be a resurrection of bodies. Let a green twig be bowed together by the hand of man; when the hand is gone it will come to itself again. Some are so nimble that they can lay their heel on their head; yet is not this the right place; but after such a forcible violence, the whole body comes again to the first proportion. Death may take one piece of man from another; but when he shall be driven to let go his hold, these two parts shall join. The soul is a spirit, and cannot be called a man without the body: no man is said to be a husband that hath no wife; nor is the sap a tree; nor fair-written paper called a book, till it be bound up in a cover. The soul in heaven is not a perfect man without the body. The uses are,

(1.) It discovers their pitiable folly, that, upon every galling discontent, lift up their own hands against their own lives. They think death the remedy of all evils, seek it as a present ease, the only cure of their violent passions and perplexed consciences. But alas, then begins their present misery; for that sends them to this judgment, and for this lamentable end, to be punished. They leap out of the smoke into the flame; from a momentary disturbance, that may be cured by faith and repentance, into a woe that enwraps them in eternal vengeance. What a fool was that crafty politician, that could order his house, dispose his goods, and then hang himself! He little thought of this judgment. Thus Saul, forsaken of all hopes, scorning death's blow by the hand of a Philistine, begs it of his armour-bearer; and what he could not obtain of him, himself supplies. As if he had borne arms against himself, he falls on his own sword. The armour-bearer follows his master, and does that to himself which he durst not to his king; both yielding that to their own swords as familiar executioners, which they grudged to their pursuers. Saul had been told the evening before by a familiar, "Tomorrow thou shalt be with me," 1 Sam. xxviii. 19. Now he makes haste to prove the devil no liar; rather than fail he makes his own mittimus, accepting the greater mischief to avoid the less. He might have suffered the Philistines' violence without blame; to have died by an enemy had been his fate, not his fault. But when he will needs act the Philistines' part upon himself, he lives and dies a murderer. Other prisoners by breaking the gaol may escape the assizes; but here to break it and not to stay for a summons, is to hasten the judgment, as it were to purchase a sessions, for his own damnation. Upon the soul we pass not this sentence, upon the fact we may. There may be repentance, but the deed is heinous; and without repentance the punishment will be grievous.

(2.) Let it teach us all to provide in our life, a harbour for this storm that comes after death. How unshiftable otherwise shall we be in that hour, how unable to answer at the day of judgment! What is it for a poor man to take care of his winding-sheet? or the rich for a curious tomb? their names may stink like their carcasses for all this. Or for the superstitious to be buried in a friar's cowl, or with a great sum to purchase a grave under the altar? Whereas a good man buried in the church, is a temple in a temple. Or for the desperate to wish for mountains, instead of monuments? when they shall be turned out of their bodies, as Hagar was out of doors; and rejected from God's presence, like vagabond Cain; saying with the unjust steward, What shall become of us? It is a provided receptacle, that shall comfort them that have it: foxes, and hares, and even vermin fore-acquaint themselves with muses, thickets, and burrows; and when they are hunted, repair thither for safety: and shall man be to seek for his refuge? "The conies make their houses in the rocks," Prov. xxx. 26: we have only one Rock to burrow in; our only city of refuge, and sanctuary of peace, Jesus Christ.

2. The other collection is, that there is a punishment ordained for the wicked: a punishment for the matter; but for the quality and manner, this is sealed of God and concealed from man. Horrible it is, and unconceivable; therefore hath no specification in Scripture, saving only in some shadows and narrow representations, according to human capacity; the figure, rather than the nature, of hell. Divers popish writers have made certain maps and models of hell, searched all the nooks of that dungeon, surveyed the dark rooms, quartered them into regions and cantons; here placing lust, there riot, there covetousness. Bellarmine says that one glimpse of that burning climate were enough to make a man not only Christian, but even turn monk, and confine himself to the strictest rule of their mortification. But to wish such a sight, and come off like a discoverer; to make report unto men, is superfluous, superstitious; a thing that God hath not thought fit for him to grant, nor necessary for man to know, Luke xvi. 31. If we ask what is in heaven, Christ answers, You know the way, John xiv. 4, follow it. So if you ask what is in hell, you know the way, avoid it. What is death, do you ask? If I knew, I should have been dead, says one. No man ever saw hell, that came back to make relation. Let us hear Moses, the word, the preacher: if the Lord mean us any good, they shall do us some good. Let us not desire it painted in tables, but considered in our meditations; and that frequently: short and transient thoughts of it may leave men to the long and permanent pains of it; so think of it that we study to escape it. Take these glimmering shadows of it.

By the want and privation of all comforts. How terrible is it for a man to be famished! it is able to make him gnaw his own flesh. In hell the want shall be greater, and the desire more violent, described by gnashing their teeth for anger, and gnawing their tongues for hunger, Rev. xvi. 10. A son takes it grievously to be banished the sight of his father: Absalom was weary of his life by this delay, 2 Sam. xiv. 32. What a torment is it then to be shut out for ever from the presence of God, without all hope of readmission? David was but the father of his flesh, God is the Father of all spirits. Absalom might have life by him, but did not live in him; yea, he could live not only without him, but against him: but in God we live, and without him can be no life. It was grief enough for Adonijah, though he were pardoned, to be decourted, confined to his country house. With what horror shall the reprobates hear, Depart from me, ye cursed! Everlastingly to be expelled from him in whom is all life, must needs be an everlasting death. If in the Lord's presence be the fullness of joy, the fullness of sorrow must be in his absence.

By the necessity, in respect of the decree of God's immutable justice; which casts them into prison without bail or mainprize; no ransom, no redemption. Bondage is terrible, especially to them that have ranged in liberty. Though Absalom be repealed, yet to have his own house his prison, vexeth him. It could not content Shimei, though he had room enough, to be confined to the river Kidron for gadding. Take a man from his well-furnished house, seated in a good air, his grounds watered with commodious springs, with his choice of gardens, fields, or walks, from walking or riding at his pleasure; and lay him up in some loathsome prison, to spend but the short misery of his remaining days; how disconsolate is this restraint! Such, and ten thousand times more, is it to be fetched from this broad world, sunshine, light, and delight, and to be bound in the chains of eternal darkness.

By the society: the company adds much to the content or torment of a place. A loving wife, gracious children, kind neighbours, cheerful companions, are the sweet refreshments of this life. Now for a man to be excluded from these, and to be haunted with furies, mal-contents, melancholy or wrangling copesmates; how grievous is the change! No man delights to dwell among hearse and funerals, or to live in charnel-houses; unless sextons, that can make themselves merry with dead corpses. We hate to dwell in hospitals, bridewells, or bedlams; yea, the very society of ruffians and tear-Christis is odious to us, if the love of God be in us. How intolerable then is the habitation among dogs, unclean birds, reprobate spirits worse than any screech-owls, tigers, or toads!

By the extremity: flesh and blood hath been exercised with many sharp miseries, and those sorer than flesh and blood (without the comfort of grace) could ever endure. The colic, the gout, are torments; the strappado, or the rack, the slow burnings of material fire, all terrible. Yet are all these but the taste of this punishment; like an itching to those exquisite pains. The rich oppressor will then think his former gout a pleasure; and the murderer wish to hang eternally on his gibbet. But hath a man been vexed with a disquiet conscience, the arrows of guiltiness sticking in his sides, groaning under the pressure of unbearable sins? This comes nearest to the say of hell, a taste of those vials, to which the gall of asps is honey, and the stings of scorpions a mere tickling. That which made the human nature of the Son of God sweat clots of blood, and heavy his soul to the death; crying as if he were forsaken; think of that punishment.

By the eternity; which makes all the rest absolute. Did the glass hold more sands than ever the sea washed on the shore, and but one little dust could pass in a million of years, this were miserable enough; yet would there be an end of that long ruin. But this punishment is a continual fever, a death which hath no death: it hath a beginning, it hath no end. Add eternity to extremity, and then consider hell to be hell indeed. If the ague of a year, or the colic of a month, or the rack of a day, or the burning of an hour, be so bitter; how would it break the hearts of the wicked, to think of all these beyond all measure, beyond all time! Yet is all this truth, saving that it comes far short of the truth. This is much, it is not near all.

Oh that men would meditate on this before they sin! but such thoughts are held too melancholy; and we counted bloody physicians to speak of hell in our sermons. They upbraid us, that we torment them before their time, Matt. viii. 29. Men are loth to be tormented before their time, and yet fear not to be tormented time without end. Alas, all our scope in discoursing of this fire, is but to snatch your souls out of the fire; we bring you to the brink of the gulf, that seeing it with horror you may never fall into it. All this the very devils, I do not say, believe, but feel and shudder to think of. Shall a temporal king have his judgment-seat, his prison, his executioners; and not God, who is infinitely just? Shall man punish with death corporal, and is not death eternal just with the Lord? Let men ruminate of these things by themselves; and if the description of these flames cannot make them detest sin, how likely are they to become firebrands of these flames! Without some infallible antidote against this poison, methinks the souls of unbelievers should go out of their bodies, as devils do out of the possessed; raging, rending, foaming. It is a wonder that any should die in their right senses and wits, that have not learned to die in the faith of Christ. Death itself is painful, therefore no marvel if men wish it short: of an easeful life man desires a protraction, but speed of his inevitable dissolution; not more willing to live when he is well, than to be out of his pain when he must die. Every pang of violent and mortal sickness is a death: to lie one hour under death's tyranny is tedious; but to be a whole day a dying, is beyond natural patience. What then is that death which knows no end? As this body is as frail as the life that animates it, so that death is as everlasting as the soul that endures it. It were grievous for man to be but so long a dying, as he hath leave to live; yet one minute of the second death is worse than whole ages of the first. Let us never be so mad and desperate, as to shrink at that which must come, and will soon be over; and not to tremble at that which may come, and continue for ever.

To conclude, here is one thing that answers to all doubts and questions that here might be moved. If it be asked who these unjust are; the Lord knoweth: he knows who are his, which is a knowing of approbation; who are not his, which is a knowing of reprobation. If, how reserved, what bonds be upon them; the Lord knoweth; he hath insensible chains of durance. If, when this day of judgment shall be, what time is designed for it; what month, what year, the Judge shall appear in the clouds; the Lord knoweth; it is not fit for man to know, the Lord keeps it to himself. If, how they shall be punished, what that fire and brimstone is, how differently it shall work upon sinners, where the local seat of torment should be, in air or earth; still, the Lord knoweth, and will reveal it in his own time. One query before I part with the verse.

Whether doth God always forbear notorious sinners to this great day? Indeed he set a brand upon Cain, that he should not be cut off by the hand of man, but reserved to this general session; and many an oppressor dies aged in his bed, and tarries long for his condemnation. Even this is a heavy punishment, that suffers men to grow old in their sins. It is best for a reprobate, excepting only never to be born, to have his swaddling-clouts a winding-sheet, and his cradle become his sepulchre. Then is a terrible woe, when God forbears smiting, and man forbears sinning. But this impunity doth not always hold to a mature and white-haired death. Some are met withal betimes, in the heat of their fury, breathing out blood and slaughter against the church; even suddenly confounded, as Paul was converted. Korah rebels; doth his fall stay for his age? No, the earth opens, and swallows him quick. That element was never used to such morsels: many dead carcasses hath it taken into its hungry bowels, never before bodies informed with living souls. Before it hath been only opened with the violent hand of man; now opens itself. It had often been a grave, now it is both a grave and an executioner. Those five kings pull sudden vengeance on their own heads, they come forth to their death; Joshua's sword and God's hailstones despatch them apace.

Sisera flees from the impartial hand of a victor's war, gets into a tent, a friend's tent, there securely falls asleep: in the midst of all that tumult, and the jaws of death, he finds time to sleep; as too many hearts do in the midst of their sins and spiritual dangers. And whiles haply he was dreaming of the clashing of armours, rattling of chariots, cries of the bleeding, and triumphs of the conquering; even then he sleeps his last, and hath the fatal reward of all his cruelty. His head was fastened so close to the earth, as if his body had been listening what was become of his soul. Of his hundred thousands, so soon hath he none left, not a page, to prevent his death, to accompany it, or bewail it. He bragged of great wonders that he would do with his iron chariots; and now one nail of iron kills him; and he knows not by whom he perishes. Fearful are the examples of these sudden dooms; there is nothing more horrible, than to die in the act of sin without the act of repentance. Too many promise themselves the grace and space to repent in their old age: that rich man afforded himself many years, Luke xi. 19; fool, he had not many hours. Nadab and Abihu, while they were offering sacrifice, were made sacrifices. God sends down true and strange fire upon them, that offered false and common fire to him. What sinner can be safe, when these sons of Aaron so suffer? Nature might have pleaded for them, They are young men, scarce warm in their office, the sons of the high priest, of great eminence, they have not yet experience, may be more careful all their remaining time, it is but their first fault.

Think of this, ye that study pretences and patronages for your sins: what hope of plea shall you find either in the greatness of your birth, or greenness of your youth, or in the newness of your ill doing, when you do that you know God hath forbidden? Oh there is no privilege that can bear off a sin with the Lord; no prerogative can challenge pardon; whenas you see young men, sons of the ruler, for their first offence, struck dead. How did the javelin of Phinehas take Zimri napping; as it is reported of one of the popes, to die in the instant act of his adultery! Let fornicators tremble at this remembrance, when they purpose fulfilling their lusts. The blasphemer, that wounds himself by wounding Christ, hopes to quit all with a miserere at the last: but did he never hear of Julian, of divers common swearers, that have died with oaths in their mouths? The drunkard assures himself to be sober long enough before he dies; yet how many hath he heard of, yea, some known, that have perished in their cups, and never awaked from their drink, till their souls appeared to judgment! Examples of men quackled, drowned, crushed to death, breaking their necks, are frequent enough. The thievish oppressor promises himself to give over, when age hath filled his purse. Such is the resolution of reprobates, and men ordained to condemnation. I have credibly heard of one slain outright with a piece of timber, which he stole but half an hour before. Of another that had stolen a sheep, and resting his burden on a stone, was strangled with the struggling of it about his neck.

Thus doth God sometimes execute martial law, doing present execution; that fools might not say in their hearts, There is no God: as he forbears others, that men might see a necessity of the solemn judgment to come. We pronounce not definitive sentence upon particular men so dying; but certainly they leave behind them to their friends little hope and comfort of their salvation. Nor yet is speed of death ever-nore a judgment: sudden dying is always deprecable; and when it comes, full of fear, doubt, and suspicion of the worst; but is never a manifest and infallible argument of anger, but when it strikes men in the act of sin. Howsoever, leisure of repentance is a sign of God's special favour: when he gives a man law, it implies that he would not have him apt up in destruction. But presume not, O sinner, nor flatter thyself that the day of judgment is a great way off. Thou knowest not, when the drunken up is in thy hand, whether thou shalt live to drink it off. When thou swearest, whether thy mouth shall ever open again to call for pardon. When thou goest to the bed of adultery, whether thou shalt ever rise again from thy unclean pillow. When thou liftest up thy hand to strike thy brother, whether thou shalt ever lift it up for mercy to thy Father. When thou beginnest an unjust contention, whether thou shalt ever end it ere thou comest to hell. O think of a powerful arm, which though it draws back long to catch the harder blow, yet is it always able to strike dead the despiser of goodness ere he can have leave to swallow his spittle.

How often doth God cut men off for a sin they ever did, while their assiduous iniquities are not summoned, nor meddled withal! Not much otherwise he did Zebah and Zalmunna: they had been cruel to many of Gideon's father's children, yet had they been spared if his mother's children had not died by them. For Succoth, he slew the rulers, and spared the people; for Midian, he slew the people, and would have spared the rulers. Gideon would, but God would not: he will find occasions to bring wicked men to their judgment; and they which should have escaped the penalty of their public wrongs, must perish in a private quarrel. So swaggerers, when for self and homicide they have escaped the judgment at a session, often bleed their last drop in streets and corners; God doing on them just execution, by an unjust adversary's weapon. Wherein he shows his manifest wrath, by performing that himself which he charged the magistrate to do, and he performed not. The slaughter of Gideon's brethren was not the greatest fault of those kings; yet when the rest should have found an unjust forgiveness, this alone kills them. The sins of a wicked man are many, yet some one shall bring him to shame. Not seldom doth God pay men with one sin for all the rest. Shimei had faults enough, cursing and abusing the Lord's anointed with dust and stones: David pardons him, Solomon confines him; he might now rest in peace. No, he must run to Gath, to fetch home his servants, with the loss of himself: this paid him for all the rest. Joab had treacherously murdered Abner and Amasa, but escapes for both these: at last he sides with Adonijah, and this brings him to his end in blood.

How many bloody murders have been thus punished in a mutinous word! The tongue in rash language hath scourged the iniquity of the hand. One hath done many robberies, escaped many searches; at last, when all hath been forgotten, he hath been hanged for accessory to a theft he never knew. Suspected felony hath often paid the price of an unknown rape; and they that have gone away with unnatural filthiness, yet have clipped off their days with their own coin. Still God's judgments are just, even when man's may be unjust. Sinner, that which hath befallen any of these, may befall thee, what dispensations soever thou givest thyself. Some of these were mighty, some rich, some young, some thought themselves as wise as thou; none of them ever looked for such ignominious ends, more than thou doest. In the fear of God, if we deprecate such ends, let us decline such courses.

VERSE 10.

But chiefly them that walk after the flesh in the lust of uncleanness, and despise government.

So monstrous are the outrages of the world, and so incorrigible the boisterous precipice of sin, that reason (which is of a middle nature betwixt grace and corruption) begins to doubt whether there be a God and Judge of all the earth. The godly suffer injuries, and are not delivered from their oppressors. The wicked are impune and prosper in the midst of all their flagitious crimes. Where is then the Judge, to punish the one, to deliver the other? He sits in heaven, sees and disposeth all that is done upon earth; beholds the sufferings of his pious children, knows when it is fit time to release them. The wickedness of the unjust cries to him for vengeance; he knows when to answer it. He forbears to strike these, for the ripening of their disobedience; to ease the other, for the exercise of their patience. Some hot spirits would call fire from heaven, sudden destruction on their persecutors: Not so, saith God; there is a day prefixed, and what is it to you if I will have them tarry till then? They cannot wind themselves out of my hand; I have them bound fast enough: be you quiet, and let your expectation depend on this judgment.

Now from this thesis he comes to the hypothesis, accommodates the general doctrine to his own purpose. If God will take vengeance on all the wicked, let not these pernicious seducers, beasts in the shapes of men, think to escape. They follow the flesh, not reason, much less the Spirit; but, like brutes, are governed by their sensual appetite. They "walk after:" the flesh is not like some stranger, whom they meet rarely; or some friend, whom they see but now and then; or a neighbour, whom they border upon, and often converse with; or a domestic companion, with whom they eat, drink, play, sleep. But it is their captain, their leader, their commander, whose colours they march under; file, or rank, or troop, according to his direction: their primum mobile, by whom they move; as if they had no particular motion of their own: so benighted and puzzled with blindness, that they know no other way than the flesh guides. It is the weight that sets all their wheels a going; the horses that draw their chariot, the very life of their corruption, and corruption of their life, without which they do nothing. "In the lust of uncleanness:" if you desire to know what course this flesh prescribes them, it is lust; renouncing all study of honesty, they must give themselves to lust. But there may be a sanctified lust; I desire to do thy will, O God: or a natural lust, as hunger is an appetite to meat. Therefore this lust hath the specification; lust of uncleanness; a sordid, belluine, irrational, stinking turpitude. After this the reprobate walks; his whole self, all the parts of him: his eyes walk after to look upon it; his ears walk after to hearken to it; his mouth walks after to talk of it; his feet walk after to pursue it; his hands stay not behind to act it; his heart is foremost of all to desire it. Finally, whatsoever may cross their lusts, they set themselves to condemn. "Despise government." Not that Almighty word which rules heaven and earth, but all the beams of God's omnipotent royalty, in his deputed magistracy; vilipending all laws, canons, sanctions; dishonouring all princes, judges, sovereign powers. Neither Moses nor Aaron, Cæsar nor Paul, minister of the word nor minister of the sword, find reverence in their hearts, or obedience in their lives. As if they resolved to disgrace that, wherein God hath imprinted the most immediate characters of his own supreme majesty.

"But chiefly." There be degrees and differences of sins and sinners; for God here sets a "chiefly," especially, principally, upon some. Whatsoever becomes of others, they shall be sure of a large share in vengeance. There is a notorious mark set upon them, a boring through the ear, like perpetual slaves; or a burning in their hands, like once convicted malefactors; a branding with some indelible mark of shame. There is great reason for this "chiefly," in respect of the sinners' quality: they "walk after the flesh," that is, their own carnal desires and sensual delights, in the strength of corruption, yet perhaps without eruption. They bask such facts as may expose them to the censures of men; so keep themselves, that the national laws cannot fetch them in. How doth the covetous man scrape and oppress, yet dares look the judge in the face; because though he be in the extremity of the law, yet not beyond it. The usurer guards his interest with statute-lace, he will not take a penny above that stint or allowance; so he escapes, and is rather made a grand juror than a guilty prisoner. The adulterer walks under the canopy of night, throws the silken robe of greatness over his lust, and then the judge dares not see it; or locks it up with the doors of secrecy, and then the judge cannot see it; or buys it off with money, and then the judge will not see it: or when none of these will serve, he hides his head where the law's hand cannot find him. Now upon him God sets his mark, this "chiefly:" thou escapest fairly, yet remember thou art reserved to judgment. The more remiss man hath been against thee, the more impartially will God proceed with thee. He is content thou shouldst pass all apprehensions till the last, till his own pursuivant, death, comes for thee. A king takes some capital offenders from the common course of justice, and reserves them to his own censure.

But how is this so fitly applied to the next clause, despisers of government? This should rather seem to bring them into present condemnation; that by suffering temporal punishment, they might repent and escape the eternal. Magistrates are often more curious and sensible of their own injuries, than of the Lord's: though this be an abuse of authority, to wear the sword of justice in their own sheaths, and to draw it not so readily against public offences, as in their private causes. How then come these to be reserved? Either they are too great for the hand of authority, or too contemptible for the eye of authority. Too great, as the popish clergy are exempt from the temporal sword; or a strong faction of malcontents; a beast that knows its own strength. Or too base for notice: such are the droves of beggars, professed ciphers, nothing-dos that swarm about this city, and have their cantons all over the country. Spite of all laws, statutes, and contradictions, they will beg rather than work; and curse that authority to the pit of hell, that shall correct their vicious life. These the connivance of man lets alone, and the patience of God also forbears; but their damnation sleepeth not.

Great difference then doth God make of offenders: eye for eye; not the whole body for an eye, not two eyes for one. Theft finds an easier mulct than murder, murder than treason. All sin is culpable enough, but there is a chiefly belonging to some; as to him that miscalls his brother, Matt. v. 22. "Whoremongers God will judge," Heb. xiii. 4; they are often reprieved to his own tribunal. "Without shall be dogs," &c. Rev. xxii. 15. Many other sinners shall be excluded, but chiefly these. If hell were too little, some less offenders should be thrust out; these must have room. There is a chiefly on the head of a debauchee: howsoever men live or die out of the pale of the church, a wicked Christian shall be sure of plagues. Woe to him that betrays the Son of man! Matt. xxvi. 24. Jews, elders, priests, soldiers, Pilate, all guilty: but chiefly woe to Judas; he had "the greater sin," John xix. 11. The Midianites fare not so ill as the wicked Israelites, Judg. viii. 16. The sword quickly despatcheth them; these die with lingering and horror, the flesh torn from their backs with thorns and briars, beaten and scratched to death. How severe was this revenge! how sad a spectacle to a tender heart! to see their bare bones looking in some places through their skin and flesh; every rent worse than the former, death multiplied by torment!

Such a chiefly, or high place, in hell is reserved for some sinners: the rest are beaten, but they that know God's will and do it not, especially, with many stripes, Luke xii. 47. All corrupt and rotten trees are good for nothing but the fire; but chiefly the vine, if it be dead and fruitless. At that dreadful day how many shall unwish themselves Christians; or wish that the gospel and they had never been acquainted! If infidels live ungodly, they do but their kind; their punishment shall be, though just, yet less. But if men after a religious nurture, and knowledge of the truth, shall shame their education; this God takes more heinously, and revenges more sharply. The more bonds of duty, the more plagues of neglect.

"That walk after the flesh," &c. Here is a double misbehaviour; one in regard of themselves, another in respect of their betters. While they neglect service to their governors, they justly become slaves to themselves. It is fit they should be left to their own desperate guidance, that scorn to be awed by God's Ordinance. In the former of these vices consider two things. 1. What is their leader, The flesh, &c. 2. How they follow this leader, Walk after it. In particular, here is the daughter, the mother, and the grandmother: the daughter is uncleanness, the mother lust, the grandmother the flesh. Uncleanness is from lust, lust from the flesh; uncleanness, lust, flesh, and all from the devil. In a tree there is the sap, root, branches, fruit: Satan is the root, flesh the sap, lust the branches, uncleanness the fruit. All of them bad counsellors, intolerable commanders.

"Flesh." By flesh, to decline the various acceptations, we here understand the whole corruption of our unmortified nature. It is not only a privative incapacity of goodness, but a positive inclination to all evil. The godly are not wholly freed from it, but not wholly governed by it. It is in the wicked, as the Turk is at home, ruling all; in the regenerate, as the Turk and Christian, they can never agree. The flesh, like Esau, is the first-born; but Jacob, grace, gets the blessing from it. These are mixed in the believer, as fire and water are in compounded bodies, light and darkness in the air at twilight, or water cold and hot in one vessel. We cannot say, that the water is in one part hot, in another cold, but the whole quantity is partly hot and partly cold, that is, lukewarm. The flesh lusteth against the Spirit, &c. Gal. v. 17. The flesh carries him one way, the Spirit another: as the inferior orbs have a violent motion from without, and a natural motion contrary of their own. But still light shall overcome darkness, heat over-master the cold; and the dead flesh be weakened and finally annihilated by the quickening grace of Christ.

Many complain of the flesh, as of the night-mare in a slumber; they would remove the burden, and cannot: hence they begin to doubt of their salvation. But then Paul could not be sure of his salvation; for he cries out for deliverance "from the body of this death," Rom. vii. 24. And we need no better proof that a man is not dead, than because he feels his deadness. If we be sensible of the flesh, detest her motions, repent of her over-bearings and prevailments; weep and fight, as a troubled air doth at once both rain and thunder; call upon Christ for victory, with the weapons of resistance in our hands; we shall then sing to his glory that triumph, Blessed be God, that gives the victory through Jesus Christ, 1 Cor. xv. 57.

But the flesh in these men here, is a lord paramount; which not only makes laws to a reprobate, but makes him keep them: a queen regent; and under her conduct and standard marcheth the whole feminine army, envy, avarice, pride, &c. The devil dotes on the flesh, and her resisting is a resigning; for if Satan should not feed her with temptations, she would tempt him for them, and snatch her own bane. Sometimes she is troubled with a wrangling neighbour, conscience; which, if she cannot pacify, she will tear up; as surgeons do incurable fistulas. She hears of Christ's passion, and is glad of it; not as her remedy, but her security: she takes his death as a licence to sin, and his cross for letters-patent to do mischief. She hears the word, as a man writes on the waters; no character, no print of his finger is left behind. She will not understand, but dies without instruction, Prov. v. 23: only hell-torments can open her eyes. So the rich man lift up his eyes in hell, Luke xvi. 23: they were never opened before. As Gideon taught the men of Succoth, with briers and thorns, Judg. viii. 16: he made them to know, taught them with a vengeance. She is ever ready to run into extremes; like the Jews, in adversity unfaithful, in prosperity unthankful. Or as Laban's sheep were in the extremes; either all black, or all white: Jacob's were in the mean, party-coloured. The wicked are always in extremities, of either defect, or excess; of irreligion, or superstition.

For us that have both our Father's blood and our mother's blood in us; grace from the former, as we have flesh from the other; and one of these will be master; let us, as it is fit, give the sovereignty to our Father; let his grace rule us, albeit the flesh entice us. Be thou a faithful porter in God's house; diligent to keep out his enemies, and to let in his friends. Beware of denying entrance to the least motion of grace: for man's heart is like a spring-lock; pull to the door after you, and the lock will shut of itself, but being shut it cannot be opened without a key. The heart with the least pull locks out grace easily; but cannot open to re-admit it without his help that hath the key of the house of David, that opens and no man shuts, that shuts and no man opens, Rev. iii. 7. Know you not that flesh and blood shall not inherit the kingdom of heaven? 1 Cor. xv. 50. We say in wrongs, flesh and blood cannot endure this: we say in temptations, flesh and blood cannot hold out. What flesh do we mean? that which God hath damned? which he will never admit to the kingdom of heaven? A fair plea! when that must be our apology which is our impiety. No, let grace be our direction, for it is grace that must be our salvation.

"Lust." This is the daughter of the flesh, and mother of uncleanness; the branches that grow from that cursed root, and bringing forth more cursed fruit; the sparks that fly up from that burning furnace, the bubbles of that noisome and baneful fountain. For method of discourse, I shall examine five questions concerning lust.

1. What lust is. It must be considered as the original fountain of all sins; and so it is an impotency of heart, whereby it is inordinately carried with the desire of evil. Original sin is called lust, because it principally shows itself in lusts: as an obstruction of the liver is perceived in the burning and dryness of the palms. Or it is taken for a branch and fruit of the former corruption: flesh is the tyrant reigning; lusts are his laws, rules, precepts; obeying them is the vassalage, a tenure in villany, Rom. vi. 12. It is either the inborn occasion of sin; or the inward act, whereof be three degrees. 1. The first motion. 2. It likes us. 3. We yield to it. The first is impossible to be avoided, the second difficult, the last by grace easy. The appetite desires noxious meat, yet we choose whether we will taste it: it pleases our palate, yet is it in our choice to swallow it down: we swallow it and it makes us sick, yet then let us refrain it. Lust then is either the faculty of desiring, or the act itself; the one like a drowsiness of nature, the other like the passion of slumber; that native pravity, this active pravity; that the nourishment of sin, this the accomplishment of sin.

There is a threefold concupiscence; natural, sensitive, voluntary. 1. Natural, which is in stirps and plants, whereby they covet and draw unto them their food and nourishment; this is properly called ὀρεξις, desire. 2. Sensitive, such is in brute beasts. 3. Voluntary, this is in man only, (though the other be not excluded,) and is called ἐπιθυμία, lust. In this voluntary lust we must consider δύναμις, the faculty itself; and ἐνέργειαν, the exercise of that faculty. Further, these must be considered naturally, such is an appetite to meat; or supernaturally, such is a regenerate desire: so there is a holy covetousness, Psal. cxix. 127; a spiritual lust, Gal. v. 17; an anger without sin, Eph. iv. 26. Thus we may covet, desire, affect, and sin not. Or morally, in relation to the commandment; which consists in lusting after unlawful things. Such are not our own; another's house, or wife, or any propriety of his. Or lawful things in an unlawful degree, as exceeding in measure: so sinners covet wine to riot; or money to hoard, not to use; or strength to revenge; or beauty to tempt; or apparel for pride. To lust for a lawful thing may be an unlawful lust; as to desire it above its proper measure, or short of its proper end. Therefore St. Augustine (De Doctrin. Christia. lib. 3. cap. 10.) calls concupiscence, a motion of the mind to enjoy riches, health, another, yea himself; or any thing else, not for God.

2. What is the seat of this lust. "I know that in my flesh dwelleth no good thing," Rom. vii. 18: where Ambrose by flesh understands the body. His reason why sin hath the habitation in the flesh, rather than in the soul, is because the flesh is derived by propagation, so is not the soul. For if that were propagated as the flesh, sin should rather dwell in the soul than in the body; the soul being the agent offending more than can the body, which is but the instrument. Ans. This proves that the first pollution is of the flesh; not that the soul can be free, for by infusion must follow infection, as good liquor is spoiled by a musty vessel. But sin disperseth itself into the whole nature of man, body and soul. So there is νοῦς σαρκός, a mind of flesh, Col. ii. 18: nor is the natural mind apt to any good. "Corrupt minds," 2 Tim. iii. 8: therefore the apostle requires a renovation of the mind, Eph. iv. 23. Nor by the outward man must we understand the body, and by the inner man the soul; but the regenerate part is called the inward man, the unregenerate part the outward, 2 Cor. iv. 16. Grace is the inward man, because, 1. The power of it is chiefly discerned in the mind. (Martyr.) 2. It does not appear to the eyes of men; so called "the hidden man of the heart," 1 Pet. iii. 4. (Pareus.) 3. It does not seek external things: evil lusts are ever wandering abroad, without a man, exercised about vanities; this keeps home, and seeks not riches, but peace of conscience. (Cajetan.) 4. By way of eminence: as the mind is more excellent than the body, so the spirit more noble than the flesh. (Calvin.) Lyranus would have the inner man to be reason, the outer sensuality, that beast of man which always rebels against reason. So Gorrhan: In the flesh, that is, in the sensual man: so Tolet, Pererius, and the present Romists. But it is plain by the apostle's demonstration, that the flesh is the whole natural man, and the spirit the whole renewed man; there being in the regenerate something that is spiritual, and something that is carnal. The seat of sin is in the rational part, the will bringing it forth: the body doth but execute the edict of reason and will; therefore the part rational hath something carnal. Schoolmen, like the philosophers, make two parts of the mind; λογικὴν, the reasonable part; and ἀλογον, void of discourse, the seat of affections and passions. (Arist. Eth. lib. 1. c. 13.) If Paul should make no other difference between flesh and spirit, his apostolical theology were no greater comfort than their blind philosophy.

3. Whether lust be a sin. We must know that not only the act of lust, but concupiscence itself, is corrupt and forbidden. (Beza.) The difference between us and the pontificians in this point, lies thus. They say, there is concupiscence formed, the second motion, which is with consent of will; this is sin; and we say so too. There is concupiscence unformed, without deliberate consent: this they say is no sin; we affirm it. They say, it is not sin, but the cause of sin; as the sun is said to be hot, because it causeth heat: but we call it truly sin itself. Let us first weigh some of their arguments against it, then ours for it.

Object. That which is natural cannot be evil; but concupiscence is natural, for it was in man before his fall. Ans. As it is natural, it is not forbidden; if the matter desired be lawful, the manner regular, the end honest; God's glory, ours or others' good. So a man may desire that is proper to him, the wife of his bosom; or that is appropriate to him, as an office, 1 Tim. iii. 1.

Object. Nothing involuntary is sin, but the first lust is against the will, therefore no sin. Ans. The rule of good or evil is not man's will, but God's law. That which is in us necessary, was in Adam voluntary, and by him in us. Now it cannot be avoided, then it might: his willing transgression transmitted to us a necessity of sinning. Original sin is in infants, it is not voluntary; yet they die, which could not be in justice, had they not sinned. So though that saying of Aristotle may be true, No man is bad with his will, nor happy against his will; yet habit can make that necessary, which was at first voluntary.

Object. The law commands no impossible thing, nor doth God condemn for that which no good man avoid. Ans. The law was possible to created nature, that is now impossible to corrupted nature; that we want power to fulfil it, is because we had power and would not keep it. No one better knows what power we have, than He who gave us the power itself. (Aug. de Temp. Ser. 61.)

It is objected from Jam. i. 15, that either concupiscence is not sin, but the cause of sin; or if it be sin, yet is not mortal sin; for sin, till it be perfect, brings not forth death. Ans. This is no true conclusion, concupiscence brings forth sin, therefore it is no sin; but therefore it is not that sin which it brings forth. A man begets a man, therefore is he not a man? No, but therefore he is not that man which he begets. Yea, he is a man even because he begets a man. And to say, Sin perfected brings forth death, therefore sin not perfect brings not forth death, is as if we should thus reason; The father begets a mortal man, therefore the grandfather doth not. Because actual lust produceth death as the nearest cause, this hinders not original lust as a remote cause to be mortal.

Our reasons. Argument 1. Whatsoever is forbidden by the law, is sin; but the law forbids the first motions of lust. If you ask, what commandment forbids it; I answer, Lust with consent is forbidden in the ninth, lust without consent in the tenth. Without this distinction I see not how we can make ten commandments. The seventh forbids lust in the voluntary desire, as our Saviour expounds it, Matt. v. 28. Therefore if the tenth should not restrain the involuntary and first rising lust, it were superfluous, as being all one with the seventh. It is not untrue, that original sin is condemned in the whole law, but more directly in the first and last commandments; because these two more properly concern the heart of man: the former respects it as concerning God, the other as concerning man. St. Paul confesseth that his lust tempted him against his will, Rom. vii. 7; and by that lust he means the first motion: for the second, which are with consent of will, he knew well enough before to be sins; yea, the very heathen knew this by the light of nature. To covet them is forbidden; if we do covet, we break the law, therefore sin. The other laws condemn the depraved affections with which we are delighted; the last, the very appetites by which we are tempted. To say with Pererius, that the former only prohibit the outward act, and the last the inward consent, is false by Christ's own exposition; who citing the law, "Thou shalt not kill," affirms it to be broken by rash anger; and that, "Thou shalt not commit adultery," by lusting after a woman, Matt. v. 21, 22, 27, 28.

Argument 2. "If I do that I would not, it is no more I that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me," Rom. vii. 20. He is unwilling, yet he calls this lust, sin. Pererius answers, It is called sin because it is the effect of sin; as the writing is called the hand, because it is written by the hand. Solut. But that which makes a man bad cannot be good itself. Whatever makes a thing to be of such a character, is still more itself such. Concupiscence is not only the cause of sin, and the punishment of sin, but sin itself; as St. Augustine hath it. The Jesuit replies, Augustine means not moral sin, nor mortal sin, but the fault of corrupt nature: as blindness, deafness, lameness, are called the sins or the errors of nature, as being against the integrity and perfectness of our natural constitution; so the rebelling of concupiscence is against the integrity and perfection of the soul, an error in nature. Ans. There are natural faults in the soul; as ignorance, forgetfulness, dulness of understanding; in the body, infirmities, weakness, sickness: which are the effects of sin, not sins themselves. But all these are effects and passions, whereas concupiscence is active and working. In a word, it resists the motions of God's Spirit: now all disobedience is sin. In civil matters no man is accessory to a sin without consent of will, but it is otherwise in the court of conscience.

4. What variety of lusts there be. St. Paul enlargeth lust to all motions, inclinations, passions, and perturbations, of heart, mind, will, and affections, Eph. ii. 3. Original concupiscence is the seed of all sins in man: look how many sins there be in the world, so many lusts in the heart of man, 1 John ii. 16; the number of lusts is no less than the number of sins. Of actual lust there be two degrees; sudden, or voluntary and deliberate. Sudden is the motion not agreed to; voluntary is with consent. The eye is sometimes cast upon an object on the sudden, without any intention or consultation of the mind; sometimes it is sent on the heart's errand by the mind's direction. As the eye may be shut in a twinkling, without thought or purpose; and it may be shut with deliberation, to sleep, or prevent harm. The heart is a furnace, that sometimes sends forth sudden, sometimes leisurely flames. The first is the nature of sin, the next is the nurture of sin; consent doth nurse the child of death, practice brings it up; actual lusting is the oil that feeds the lamp of concupiscence. The mother brings forth the daughter, and the daughter nourisheth the mother: Hagar produceth Ishmael, Ishmael sustains Hagar: blessed is that Abraham, whose house is well rid of them both.

5. How heinous this sin is; even no less than damnable in itself. Lusts are often more punished by the great Judge, than divers actual sins. The continued lust of uncleanness, is worse than a discontinued act of uncleanness. He that always desires pollution deserves greater punishment, than he that is overtaken with it against his will. One kills a man against his will, another desires to kill him and is hindered; this last is the murderer before God. It is this lust that Paul calls the burning: it is one thing to be hot, a good man may be hot; but to burn is another thing; when lust finds indulgence, and is scarce restrained with shame. The act of adultery is not more heinous among men, than the unlawful desire and consented lust of the heart is to God, Matt. v. 28. Without practice, the very purpose stands culpable before him. Silly people think the commandment is not broken, if the outward gross sin be abstained; but God fetcheth in malice, anger, envy, within the compass of murder. Some ignorants use the commandments for prayers: poor souls, they little think they are God's thunderbolts, to throw them into hell for their sins. Thus usury, the desire of gain by the undoing of others; hoarding of corn in dearth, which is to make a private profit of God's public judgment; bad example, with a delight to corrupt others, which are like those erring lights, that instead of guiding ships to the haven, lead them upon rocks and shelves: all these are degrees of murder. So a wanton eye, an obscene discourse, a vain attire, a light behaviour; all these are degrees of adultery. Lust is like a secret malignity in the bones, hardly got out: wounds and ulcers are sooner cured because of their appearance. Adultery may be restrained by corporal impotency; still lust is hid within; it must be a potent medicine that fetcheth it out. The uses are,

1. It justly humbles us. If the first motion, without consent, be sin; if the second, with consent, be greater sin; Lord, who can say, My heart is clean? Not many can clear themselves so with Samuel, from the act of injustice, 1 Sam. xii. 3: fewer with Paul, "I have coveted no man's gold," &c. Acts xx. 33: but, I was never tempted to this; no man could ever say this but one, even that man who is the Son of God. If we had no more, this last were enough to hide our faces, and stop our mouths before the Lord. Too few take notice of this natural uncleanness; though it be born in them, and borne about them, yet they neither see the filth nor feel the weight. Moors, that never saw men of more temperate climates, think there is no other complexion but their own. He doth much good that goes not after his lusts, Eccles. xviii. 30; but he is not perfect, that doth not what is written, Thou shalt not lust. (Aug. de Mixt. et Concup. cap. 23, 29.) Now shall we not be cast down for that, which without repentance will cast us down to hell? Paul did not more truly bear about him the marks of the Second Adam, Gal. vi. 17, than we do all the marks of the first Adam. Let us know, that eternal fire is the wages of this lust; consent makes it hotter, practice inflames it. This lust is in us all, and this lust is sufficient to condemn us all.

But then, alas, what shall we do? How should we escape? This necessitates our ruin. Therefore as the law compelled him that had opened a pit, and left it uncovered, to make good his neighbour's beast that miscarried in it, Exod. xxi. 33, 34; so having opened a pit, lest any soul should perish in it, let me cover it again with comfort. The condemning quality of this sin is taken away by regeneration, Acts ii. 38. All sins; now children have no sin but original lust. The guilt which was contracted by generation, has been done away by regeneration, says Augustine. In Christ it is pardoned, and shall not cast his members to hell. Yet is it by nature so dyed in grain, that nothing but his blood can purge it. And even in the purged it still remains. It shall not reign over us here, not confound us hereafter, yet will dwell in us till our dissolutions. Pardon frees us from the damnation and domination, not from the inhabitation, of sin.

2. It teacheth us to withstand the beginnings of sin, to kill that pestilent brood in the cradle, to destroy them in their infancy, as we do a nest of young wasps. For lust, when it hath conceived, bringeth forth sin: and sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death, Jam. i. 15. Lust tempteth, there is the mother: being moved by the devil, there is the father:

it conceiveth, thus the child is begotten: she is the mother of the dead; as grace (like Eve) is the mother of the living. Delight is the midwife. It bringeth forth sin, there the child is born; it must now have a nurse to bring it up, that is custom; and the full stature it grows unto, is death. It tempteth by enticing the mind to evil, conceiveth by the consent of will and resolution to do evil, bringeth forth by execution and practice, nurseth it to growth by custom and continuance; lastly, this stripling engendereth another child, Benoni, the sorrow of the mother, and that is death. If we cannot prevent the conception, yet let us destroy it in the birth, make it abortive, by purposing never to act it: if it is born, and draw the air of intention, yet let us stop it ere it come to action; let us not do the determined evil. If it oversway us to like and act it, yet let it never come to a habit, let us devow a custom. But how much more easy were it to stop it in the first cause! as seasonable physic doth meet with an infection at the first taking, before it run into the veins, and corrupt the blood. The seed of Ishmael had never afflicted the seed of Israel, had Ishmael been killed when he was banished. At the first rising of Elijah's cloud, Ahab had time to get home dry; that once ascended, all the speed of his chariot cannot outrun the shower. Cut off the gangrened joint, and save the body. The way to minish the increase of ravenous and noxious fishes, is to destroy the spawn with the mother; to be rid of harmful birds, is to spoil their nests. When a fire-ball is thrown into a ship at a sea-fight, they presently cast it out ere it break or fasten. Meet thine enemy at his coming out of his bed, before he arm himself; take lust ere it come to a rebound. At the first motion, stop the mouth of it; let it never make a reply; stand not to argue, lest thou be overcome.

3. Let us avoid them as perilous and mortal enemies. 1. Dangerous for their nature; continual tempters. Conscience doth sometimes sleep from reproving, these never rest from enticing. 2. Dangerous for their number. If you despise them as being very little, you may have to fear them as being very many. (August.) Many temptations come in by the cinque ports, the senses. More by Satan's injection, that presents to the affections things absent from the senses. Most by lust itself, that (as no created thing is quicker than thought) tumbles over a thousand desires in an hour: many strings to sin's bow, that if some break, the rest may hold: many trains of powder, some likely to take fire. 3. Dangerous for their effect, bringing forth the most monstrous offences. Open but the pit, out swarm these pestilent locusts, Rev. ix. 2. Who would have thought that David's wanton look should have begot murder? He that hath given way to his lust, must confess such fearful precipices. Murder we detest; yet how many hands hath the lust of revenge embued in blood! how many necks hath it brought to an ignominious halter! Incontinence hath the name from uncontained lust: many a disease of body, reproach of name, consumption of estate, loss of life and soul, are beholden to it. 4. Dangerous for their continuance: an ill seasoning, that is never got out but by breaking of the pitcher: a mark that all carry to their graves, some to their torments. While the soul doth animate a body mortal, it will tempt both body and soul. Cut off the sprig of a tree, it grows still; a bough, an arm, still it grows: lop off the top, yea, saw it in the midst, yet it will grow again: stock it up by the root, then (and not till then) it will grow no more. Next unto God and Christ, we may thank death itself, for the abolition of lust. We have three birth-days: the first of nature; this gives lust the breeding: the second of grace; this sets lust a bleeding; it doth mortify it, not nullify it; it makes it dying, not dead: the last of glory, then are we rid of it for ever. Thus all the saints in heaven are thrice born; to sin, to grace, to glory. Lust in the first is a king, in the second a slave, in the third nothing. The second nativity crosseth the first, the last perfects the second. To be freed from concupiscence is a main motive of that zealous prayer, Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly.

Let us (in the mean time) beware the captivity of our affections. Let not sin reign in our mortal bodies, Rom. vi. 12: where it is a sovereign, it will force obedience. There is difference between lusts and actual sins. 1. The intervention of time. Lust is sudden, action requires time. He hath the present lust of covetousness, he must tarry a time to enlarge and fill his barns, Luke xii. 18. 2. The interposition of place. Lust often desires, that cannot be present, therefore adultery must stay for opportunity. 3. The interception of instruments. Balaam had a desire to kill his harmless beast, but he had no weapon, Numb. xxii. 29: the hand is not so quick as the thought. 4. The interposition of impediments. Absalom lusts for his father's crown; there be many hinderances, he cannot reach it. If to achieve were as easy as to desire, one man's lust were able to ruin all the world. 5. The intercession or pleading of arguments. The soul hath some discourse between the lust and the act. The Video meliora proboque (I see better things, and approve them) of the heathen poet, is in the soul of a Medea, a sorceress. 6. The entrance of other desires. Sometimes the second nail drives out the first. So the Lord sets our lusts together by the ears, as the Egyptians against the Egyptians; that while two poisons wrestle we may live. The falling out of thieves helps the true man to his goods. The lust after beauty is driven out by a desire of revenge, that again by a golden thirst; and if grace comes, this drives them out all: as the feathers of an eagle, that will not endure blending with other feathers, but rather consumes them. All these inters should be the interruption of sin, and for the compunction of heart; that though concupiscence have conceived, she may not be delivered. Justly should we say to lust, as the Hebrew did to Moses, "Who made thee a prince over us?" Exod. ii. 14; whence hast thou this authority? Wilt thou kill me, as thou killest the worldling? No, thou shalt not, I have a deliverer, Rom. vii. 25.

5. Seeing the flesh will be in man so long as man is in the flesh, let us strive to fill our hearts with better desires. Lust works in the memory, by remembering vanities, injuries, bad examples: instead of these, let us remember our sins, our ends, our audit. In the affections: if it work by pride, stop it out by humility; if by malice, with charity; if by uncleanness, with chastity; if by covetousness, with liberality; if by revenge, with mercy, as darkness will give place to the sun. In the mind, if idle thoughts find room, it is because God is not there. "Let the word of God dwell in you richly," Col. iii. 16: emptiness of that food will cause the repletion of lusts. In the body, if it work by drunkenness, rather turn Rechabite, never drink wine. If by surfeit and high feeding, fall to Daniel's pulse, shorten the commons of sin; as it is better to beat down the house, than to be fired in it. If by idleness, screw up thy endeavours to a greater task. They be idle, therefore regard vain words, Exod. v. 8, 9: thus a Pharaoh could conclude. Let lust never call, but we have other business. The best remedy is prayer: when concupiscence tempts us to folly, let us make the matter known to our Husband, Christ. When lust covets transient riches, call home the meditation of those permanent joys; and say, "Our Father, which art in heaven." When lust would study how to get honour, then say, "Hallowed be thy name." When ambition would have such a preference, then say, "Thy kingdom come." When it would carve thy own portion, then, "Thy will be done." When it covets monies and riches, then, "Give us this day our daily bread." When it would revenge thy wrath on others, then say, "Forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them that trespass against us." Howsoever it tempts us, let us pray, "Lead us not into temptation." And that we may never yield unto it, "Deliver us from evil." Let not lust reign in us, "for thine is the kingdom:" we cannot avoid it ourselves, for thine is "the power:" and for our deliverance, thine be "the glory, for ever and ever. Amen."

"Of uncleanness." Of sores, and ulcers, and such noisome pollutions, sordid and odious to God and good men; such is the subject of my present discourse; that this may well be called a spital sermon. But as the physician is seldom sent for unless men be sick; nor is so much consulted about diet as physic; the whole need him not, but the diseased, Matt. ix. 12; so if there were no sin, you should need no preacher: yet wise men require antidotes and preservatives, and would rather pay the physician to keep them well than to make them well, health being not so easily restored as conserved. Therefore let them that be infected with this leprosy, learn now the means of their recovery; let them that be not infected, observe the means to continue their purity. Whether they be or be not, this discourse, like the bath, shall do them no harm; an honest heart will not return unbettered. For method, first, I will describe the disease of uncleanness; then, the cause; last, the cure.

The disease lies not, like the megrim, in the head, nor like a pleurisy, in the blood, nor like a gout, in the joints and extreme places, nor like an ache, in the bones; but it is epidemical, like an ill habit of body, and possesseth in a reprobate not only the whole man, but the whole of man: as Job was not here and there ulcerous, but all his body one coagulated ulcer; there is no whole part about him, Isa. i. 6. First, there is a contemplative uncleanness, when the mind pleaseth itself with vicious thoughts: thus there may be a world of wickedness in a man, though the acts of pollution be refrained. The devil, who is the father of lusts, John viii. 44, reigns in the soul by these; yea, such a heart that infernal prince takes up for his bed-chamber. Secondly, there is a preparative uncleanness, which is an effeminateness of carriage, or affectation of inviting the eyes of lust; all their postures being so many characters, to spell the meaning of their lascivious hearts. It were well, if such a one were forced to cry, as the leper in Israel, I am unclean, Lev. xiii. 45. Thirdly, there is a procurative uncleanness; that takes up the devil's office, and helps forward the damnation of men. Such was Jonadab to Amnon; whose unkindly flame might else have wasted itself out in time, but that such a wicked counsellor blew the coals. This was no worse a man than the king's brother's son: now this noble pander will project a course for Amnon's satisfaction. The procurer is as unclean, if not worse than the committer: the fire would languish, vanish, perish, if there were no such fueller. Fourthly, there is a sensitive uncleanness; when the ear sucks in obscene stories, the eye delights in immodest mixtures, and the tongue screws it into all discourses. This is, as if the door were not wide enough, to set open all the windows, and break down the walls, to let in the air of uncleanness. Actual uncleanness follows, whereof there be many degrees.

1. Fornication. I mean not titular; as hostess and harlot are convertible terms: nor metaphorical; as "the children of whoredoms," Hos. ii. 4: nor spiritual; as idolatry is called fornication: but corporal; which is commonly taken for the incontinency of single persons. The natural cure of this uncleanness is marriage: thus Shechem bewrays a good disposition even in filthiness, he would not let Dinah fare the worse for his sin; but as he had with dishonest rage abused her, so he strives with honest love to entertain her. Her deflowering shall be no prejudice to her: as the sin was done by him, so he would have the whole shame redound to him; and so he will hide her dishonour with the name of a husband. To this purpose he communes, craves, offers, indeed would buy her; even purchase leave to make her satisfaction. He sues to his father, to hers, to her brethren, to herself; and begs with submission what he might have gotten with violence. The father consents, solicits, is ready to buy his son's peace with his own pain. No dowry shall hinder, but Shechem shall recompense Dinah. How far worse are they, that abuse without any purpose of amends! But marriage in this case is some satisfaction, no restitution: a good salve is not so good as no sore. This may make the next act lawful, not justify the former. However the scene concludes, the first entrance was naught. Though a late satisfaction be better than none, yet a timely prevention is best of all.

2. Adultery, when one or both are married. This is the breach of many faiths; and so much the more pernicious, as it is a wilful shipwreck abroad, when it hath a harbour and safe remedy provided at home.

3. Whoredom; which is a mad and transportive desire to abuse many. Sometimes it is lust, joined with anger; doing it in spite; a desperate revenge, by polluting another's bed to cast away his own soul. So the foolish child, when one snatcheth his apple, throws his bread after him. Sometimes it is joined with covetousness; he wastes his body to fill his purse; as a fool burns his band to make tinder. Always it is joined with folly; not so much respecting a fair woman as she is fair, but as she is a woman: foul water will quench that fire as well as fair.

4. Unnatural uncleanness; as men with men, men with beasts. But these things are so horrible in the deed, that they are even disgraceful in word.

5. Uncleanness with our own kindred, which is incest. To patronize this, some allege precept, practice, and custom. But that law to the Jews, Deut. xxv. 5; Gen. xxxviii. 8; Matt. xxii. 24, was partly political, for distinction of families; and partly typical, preserving the right of primogeniture, prefiguring the spiritual birthright in the Messiah, which should be endless. The moral law was otherwise, Lev. xviii. 16. Therefore we answer, that albeit God had particular exceptions from his general laws: as the cherubims over the ark was an instance against the second commandment; the Israelites robbing the Egyptians, against the eighth; and Phinehas killing Zimri, against the sixth; yet it is plain that the Lord condemns all incest.

6. With more wives than one, which is polygamy. I know this fact of Jacob is diversely excused. As, first, it was prohibited by no law. (August.) Ans. It was not prohibited by a law written, it was by the law engraven: God made but one woman for one man; and he was a wicked Lamech that first begun bigamy. 2. But custom excuseth; as at first a side garment was a shame to the Romans, but at last it grew to a fashion. Ans. That was a thing indifferent, the decency whereof time might vary; but there is no custom against the first institution. 3. In the multiplicity of wives he propounded to himself the multitude of children. Ans. If ever such an indulgence had been fit for any, then Noah should have been dispensed with, to propagate the world; but God gave him no such indulgence. 4. This was done in a mystery. Ans. Indeed, August. Ruper. Greg. all reduce it into several allegories; yet cannot this justify the fact; no more than Christ's second coming like a thief, can warrant a thief sudden breaking into a house. This therefore must be granted Jacob's infirmity: to marry two wives was his transgression; but to marry two sisters, no less than incest. Albeit God disposed this to increase the holy seed, yet the fact is against his ordinance; and our positive law makes it death, as by the law institutive it is deadly. Every man shall cleave to his own wife, Gen. ii. 24. A wife, not a harlot; his own, not another's; wife, not wives.

7. Uncleaness with a man's spouse; I mean between the betrothment and consummation. The Levite's spouse, till he married her, was but his concubine; and their conjunction was fornication. It is not enough to say, they were married before God; the hand of the church must be there, or this is culpable uncleaness. Marriage is no amends; otherwise than wilfully to break an arm or leg, to set it again; or to condemn a man first, and then to sue out his pardon. The common opinion is, this is but a true covenant antedated; the taking possession of a man's own without due course of law; the mowing of his corn before harvest; the plucking his own grapes ere they be ripe. But this is trivial: contract is but a right to the thing, marriage gives a right in the thing. Contract binds to marriage, not allows to touch before marriage. Contract is but like articles agreed upon, marriage puts a seal to the covenant. Such a fruit of their bodies is but a monument of their sin; and without hearty repentance, a good proceeding seldom follows so bad a beginning.

8. Uncleaness with a man's own wife. This is when the use of the marriage-bed is either unseasonably, or intemperately; in a season prohibited, or in a measure not moderated, or in a manner not ordained, or to an end not warranted: as when it hath altogether respect to pleasure, not to generation; or to beget an heir for their lands, rather than a saint for heaven; or their own image, rather than the image of God. If uncleaness can creep into marriage; where will it be kept out? How foul is the disease, when the very remedy is often infected! Not but that the marriage is pure, but the married impure: marriage doth not stain, nor so much as dye, in the Romish sense; it is honourable and clean, yet the married may be unclean.

9. Uncleaness with a man's self; as the heathen dishonoured their own bodies among themselves, Rom. i. 24. There be three turpitudes against nature; with another kind, or with the same kind of the same sex, or with no other person but with themselves. Thus St. Augustine distinguisheth between flagitium and facinus; the latter is in hurting another, the former in committing against a man's self. Other sins are without the body, fornication against the body, 1 Cor. vi. 18, this uncleaness in the body. This was the sin of Onan, Gen. xxxviii. 9; abusing himself against the order of nature and institution of God. This was a grievous sin; against God, whose ordinance he disobeyed; against his wife, whom he unjustly defrauded; against himself, whose issue he should not have prevented; against mankind, whose number he should have increased; against his brother, to whom issue should be raised. Some Hebrews think, that he did it to preserve the favour and beauty of Tamar, which bearing of children would have impaired. However, sensual was his pleasure, and the sin in any man is very grievous.

10. Ravishment: the former is a rape upon a man's self, this upon another. Such was Shechem's sin, Gen. xxxiv. 2, as some understand it; but some rather think, that Dinah being so light to wander and gaze, was not over-difficult to yield. Commonly, such lust ends in loathing, as Amnon's; beating her out of doors, whom he was sick to bring in. And therefore Shechem's seemeth to be no rape, because he still loved her; and having wrought her shame in his father's house, he would not send her home with disgrace to her father's tent, but rather seeks to marry her whom he had defiled. His offence did not make her odious; but so constantly he affects her, that he is willing to draw blood of himself, rather than forego her. Amnon's rape was far worse. Tamar is sent for as his physician, but he makes her his physick. She dressed him meat, but that was not the dish he longed for: he loves the cook, not the cates. She presents the diet, he throws down that, and falls aboard with her. His sickness is now forgotten, the devil hath made him lusty and strong on the sudden. The innocent virgin entreats for herself, persuades in vain: shows the sin, the shame, the danger; Thou shalt be a fool in Israel; I, no wife, yet no virgin. Prevailing not by reason, she seeks to cool his present heat with future hope of an impossible thing. Ask me of my father. But in vain; he grows mad with resistance, and resolves to be a ravisher. If the devil were not more strong in such than nature, they would never seek pleasure in violence. This rape defiles Amnon, not Tamar: the wrong was hers, the uncleaness his. She that is ravished, is more a maid, than she whose own loose thoughts have made her unclean. Two lay together, only one committed adultery, as Augustine of Lucretia. She was but the patient; and it was not her fault to suffer, what was not her will to do. Her virginity was not lost, but torn from her by compulsory means; she still reserved it in her soul, though it had forsaken her body. The inhabitant is not to be blamed for thieves breaking into the house. She can do no more than bewail what she cannot keep; lamenting the shame of another's sin; living like a widow, who was neither maid, wife, harlot, nor widow, but a ravished woman. Thus you have the specification of some uncleannesses, (which, oh that none knew but by a general apprehension and hearsay! and not as Adam knew evil, by sense and experience,) now to

The causes; which are many. Physicians say, that to know the cause is half the cure. By cause, here, I understand not only that fundamental cause, which is inordinate affection, the boiling fountain of lust; but also such occasions as breed and nurse uncleaness. These are,

1. A roving eye, that looks up and down for the objects of lust. "The sons of God saw the daughters of men," Gen. vi. 2: by that looking came lusting, thence preposterous marriages, thence universal confusion. "His master's wife cast her eyes upon Joseph," Gen. xxxix. 7: her eye led her heart, her heart led her tongue, her tongue led her hand. (Ambr.) Such be the harlot's three weapons: the first engine is her eye, the very motion whereof discourseth a silent filthiness. 2. Her tongue offers to take hold where her eye cannot. 3. Her hand offers to catch him, whom her tongue cannot win. Tamar "sat in an open place," Gen. xxxviii. 14, where she might be seen: Hebr. in the door of eyes. This was Achan's confession; I saw, I coveted, I took, Josh. vii. 21. The eye betrays the heart, the heart the hand: sin gets in by the senses, yea, by the least piece of a sense; as bad air at a crack in the window. By them it seizeth on the inmost fort, and there it commands them like a tyrant, to whom it was beholden for entrance. This is the order of our crimes: Achan's song shall many chatter to a doleful tune; I saw, I coveted, and took. The thief, I saw the booty, coveted, and took it: the drunkard, I saw the colour of the wine: the idolater, I saw the goodly picture: the adulterer, I saw the beauty, coveted, and took it, and took my death with it.

David rose from off his bed, and from the roof of his palace he saw a woman, 2 Sam. xi. 2. From an afternoon's slumber he riseth to his evening's walk: the eyes which unseasonable sleep had shut up, an enticing object opens. Her bath was no open place, but lust is quick-sighted: she could espy nobody, but David had espied her. "Dinah, the daughter of Leah, went out to see the daughters of the land," Gen. xxxiv. 1. The daughter of Leah; her mother's own daughter, right bred; because both had a fault in their eyes: the mother's, a defect of nature; the daughter's, a defect of nurture: hers an infirmity, this a curiosity. Her eyes were guilty of this temptation: she would needs see and be seen; and while she looks about vainly, she is looked upon lustfully. Thou lookest about idly, thou art not looked at idly; thou lookest about curiously, 'thou art looked at still more curiously, says Bernard. I know there may be a clear and honest aspection, as the queen of Sheba came to see Solomon, 1 Kings x. 2. See this woman, saith Christ to Simon, Luke vii. 44. But it is better to be blind, than look with lustful eyes. This sin is little regarded: many come to the church with Christian ears, but pagan eyes; and Satan comes faster in at the eyes, than God at the ears; that which should save the soul, is lost by the wandering sense. There can be no safety to the chariot, where these unbridled horses are let loose. "Turn away mine eyes from beholding vanity," Psal. cxix. 37: we must see it transiently, not behold it wishfully. He can never keep his covenant with God, that makes not a covenant with his eyes, Job xxxi. 1. But my inward man is safe, why may not my outward man be free? This is an idle presumption: he is more than a man, whose heart is not led by his eyes; he is less than a good man, whose eyes be not restrained by his heart. So, the ear is the trap-door of the soul; the flies of hell are ever humming about it. It is temptation enough to the thief, that he hears of a booty. If dishonesty come so near as the ear, let wonder stop it out, and save virtue the labour.

2. Bad company. Joseph shunned the society of his mistress, Gen. xxxix. 10. We know our own hearts, we know not the hearts of others. To be the provocation of sin is unholiness, not to avoid the provocation of sin is unhappiness. God and his angels will protect thee "in thy ways," Psal. xci. 11: in thy ways, not in thy wanderings. If we once rove out of the lists of our calling, there is nothing but danger. Had Dinah kept at home, her virginity had been safe: had Shechem forced her in the house, she had sustained loss without sin. It had not then been her evil, but his: her gadding gave the occasion, even this made her not innocent. It is no sufficient warrant to draw us into suspected places, and spiritual dangers, only to see. No wise man will go into the infected pest-house, only to see the fits of the visited. Who would poison his body to please his taste? With the lascivious we hardly learn to be chaste. Immodest behaviour makes way for lust; this gives life unto wicked hopes. A cold denial invites a second charge: she deserves some blame, that hath only been tried, though she consent not. A fair carriage keeps temptation out at the staves' end; lightness of presence lets it in to the grapple, and gives encouragement to lewd desires. Though we fight and conquer, yet it was our fault that we were put to fight. A man is not only to keep his conscience clear, but his name; and to keep this is harder. For our conscience is in our own custody, our credit lies in the hands of others: this stands on likelihoods, and their construction of our deeds. It is no easy thing to disprove a slander; like an unruly spirit once raised, hard to conjure down. Our reputation is more frail than ourselves, still liable to suspicion: it must be our good behaviour, and avoiding bad society, that can keep our name from scandal.

3. Idleness, or no company, and nothing to do. Such a heart is the devil's day-bed, whereupon he takes his nooning. The philosopher called love otiosum negotium, a disease to be cured by labour. "Thou wicked and slothful servant," Matt. xxv. 20: if slothful, certainly wicked; if "slow bellies," presently "evil beasts," Tit. i. 12. While Israel is working in Egypt, pursuing or pursued in Canaan, they have no leisure to be wanton. Let them lie still in the plains of Midian, the dancing lasses of Moab will soon seduce them to folly. Who ever saw David so tempted and foiled in the times of his busy war, as when he was idle at ease? In troubles he could rise up in the morning to his early devotions, prevent the morning watch, break his night's rest with the cares of the day, the service of God and business of state took him up: thus long was he innocent and holy. But when Satan finds him wallowing in the bed of idleness, he now thinks him fit for a temptation. Gentlemen that live of their lands, and those of a worse condition, that have given over all trades, to live of their monies, think themselves the only fortunate men; they need not toil, nor weary their limbs with labour; instead of the pen or the pike, the pot and the pipe is all their exercise. But there are none more unhappy; for lust can be no stranger to an idle bosom: the industrious man hath no leisure to sin. Doth any man complain the contiguity of his labour? he finds fault with his own felicity: the toil of action is recompensed by the benefit: if he were not doing good, he would be doing ill. If we did work less, we should suffer more: while we work not ourselves, Satan works upon us.

The sitting bird is the fowler's mark: the devil is like some lazy companion, that while he finds us busy gives back and sees it no time to meddle with us. But if, like the idle housewife, when her gossip comes in, we throw away our work and hold chat with him, nothing can please him better. Gratify him but thus far, to talk with him, and he thinks us sure. Exercise is wholesome for the body, better for the soul. The earth stands still, therefore becomes nature's common sewer; the receptacle of corruption, all dregs; the heavens, that are ever in motion, are always pure. The troublesomest work to a good man, is to have no work: which when he hath supplied by prayer and meditation, and yet finds room for more guests, he studies business; and if he does not find it, he makes it. They that surrender themselves to sloth, find matter of disease breeding in their bodies and souls. The active spirit is soonest dulled with no labour; as the water that hath been heated, soonest freezeth. The danger of women's corruption is their leisure: idleness breeds fancies, which continuance of domestical business would keep out.

4. Lust after beauty. This is the general snare, and occasion of uncleanness. "Joseph was a goodly person, and well-favoured," Gen. xxxix. 6; lovely to all, but not looked on alike with all eyes: his fellows praise him, his master trusts him, his mistress dotes on him; all love him, she over-loves him. That is true of the poet, that virtue never hath a better grace, than when it shineth from a beauteous face. Yet was this danger, it gave him means to sin; which when he refused, it was the occasion of his trouble. But he was fair without, and fairer within. Even the sons of God were caught with beauty. Balaam could not harm Israel with his curses, he doth with his courses and counsels: his curse had hurt none but himself, his counsel cost the blood of twenty-four thousand. Send out your fairest women among them: this policy was fetched from the bottom of hell. There is no sin more plausible than wantonness, wantonness is no way sooner provoked than by the sight of beauty. This shall draw them to lust, their lust to folly, their folly to idolatry; so God shall curse them for thee, unasked. This project of that cursed magician was too prosperous: the daughters of Moab do more in the tents of Israel, than the Amorites and Amalekites could do in the plains of Moab. The women made them captives, whom the men felt conquerors. Had they sent their subtlest politicians, and strongest soldiers, to persuade or compel them to idolatry, they had been returned with scorn. But the eloquent and victorious beauty of the women effected this. It had been happy for them if Balaam had used any charms but these.

I know that a man may lawfully desire beauty in his own spouse, as Jacob loved Rachel; not for provocation of lust, but more loving society. Some actions do not so well rid off a hand, without some delight; as eating of meats, learning of arts; and such is matrimonial society. As meat pleaseth us better in a clean dish, wine in a crystal glass; so virtue in a comely person. But if the beauty be let into our thoughts, and the virtue shut out, there is no speedier way to ruin. As it is God's use to fetch glory to himself out of the worst actions of Satan; so it is Satan's ambition to advantage himself by the fairest works of God. If the Lord suffer him, he will ruin us with the most rare pieces of creation. No one means hath so enriched hell, as beautiful faces. The beautiful harlot "increaseth the transgressors among men," Prov. xxiii. 28. Three of David's children were undone by it at once; it was the occasion of Amnon's incest, of Tamar's ravishment, of Absalom's pride and murder. Beauty, if not well disciplined, proves a traitor rather than a friend. It is a blessing to be fair; but such a blessing, that if the soul be not as clear as the skin, leads to a curse. It is no rare thing to find the foulest soul dwell fairest. If the inward conditions be bad, oh what strange mischief can beauty bring about! How many Solomons and Samsons hath it befooled and blinded! The weaker sex is the stronger in temptation: it was the dowry that our grandmother Eve bequeathed to her daughters, that they should be our helpers to sin. Indeed it is not a woman's fault to be fair: the candle does not amiss in burning; the foolish fly offends, that scorseth her wings in the flame. The crystal stream is not to be blamed, because some distracted man drowns himself in it. Yet to be but a temptation, and though the unwilling occasion of another's ruin, is an unhappiness, albeit not a sin. The Lord so mortify all inordinate lusts in us, that we may be admitted to that city, into which no unclean thing shall ever enter.

The cure follows; and this is twofold; the one a preservative, the other sanative. To see the sin in the proper and natural odiousness, is a preventing antidote. For them that be infected, there are other medicines. The horribleness of it is seen in itself, and in the effects.

For itself, the light of nature discerned and condemned it. It is objected that Solon, a lawgiver, one of the wisest among the Grecians, used to buy harlots for the young men: and among the Carthaginians it was a custom for the virgins before their marriage, to prostitute themselves publicly in the temple of Venus, that they might bring the greater portions to their husbands. Ans. This was not by natural light, but the unnatural darkness of those given over to a reprobate sense, as the punishment of former wickedness, Rom. i. 28. Object. But the prophet Hosea was thus commanded, "Take thee a wife of whoredoms," Hos. i. 2. Ans. Nothing can be concluded for it out of a typical act: neither did he make a harlot, but take a harlot, to reduce her to chastity. Object. But fornication is reckoned among indifferent things, Acts xv. 20. Ans. Their esteeming it so did not make it so; their own conscience thought otherwise. Abimelech calls it a great sin, Gen. xx. 9; this that heathen could see, but not so clearly as Joseph, Gen. xxxix. 9. Dishonour to the husband, wrong to the children, breach of covenant, but above all, disobedience to God, is in it. "Against thee have I sinned," Psal. li. 4, was his confession, that had sinned against Bathsheba, Uriah, and the whole church; but especially against the Lord. It is most odious among Christians; this folly ought not to be done in Israel, Gen. xxxiv. 7; 2 Sam. xiii. 12: it is bad enough in all places, here intolerable; not to be named among saints, Eph. v. 3. Let the act be so abhorred, that it may quite lose the name; especially, let no saint have such a name. It makes the name stink both living and dead. Living; If a brother be a fornicator, with such a one eat not, 1 Cor. v. 11. Dead; "his reproach shall not be wiped away," Prov. vi. 33. It is more heinous than theft; Men do not despise a thief, if he steal to satisfy his hungry soul; but he that committeth adultery destroyeth his own soul, ver. 30, 32. Goods may be restored, honesty never: the breaches may be repaired, the pristine state not recovered.

For the effects: 1. It breeds diseases in the body, that the quality of the sin may be seen in the nature of the plague; as we know a rotten nut by the worm-hole in the shell. 2. It makes a more loathsome soul; so odious, that till it be cleansed, neither will God dwell with it, nor shall it dwell with God. 3. It blasteth the estate, roots out all the increase, Job xxxi. 12, and brings a man to a piece of bread, Prov. vi. 26. The parents' uncleanness makes the children beggars. 4. It curseth the house, Hos. iv. 13, 14. His own sin abroad, is able to make his house miserable. What followed upon David's adultery, but present payment? The deflowering of his daughter Tamar, the murder of his son Amnon, the treason, incest, and ruin of his Absalom. How justly is he scourged by the sins of his children, whom his own act taught to offend! Unlawful lust still propagates itself by example: when the father of a family brings sin home to his house, it is not easily swept out. 5. It endangers incest; when the legitimate son may come to marry the bastard issue of the same father.

It is not only the punishment of sin; that a man being hateful to God for other sins, is made hateful to men for this; that what lay hid in an impure heart, may be exposed by an ignominious deed: other sins owed him a shame, this shall pay it him. Therefore, he that is good before God, shall be delivered from the strange woman, not the sinner. But also, the cause of sin, it brings on more wickedness. So the apostle joins them, "fornication, wickedness," Rom. i. 29: if πορνεία be first, κακηγορία follows. Give lust room in the eye, she will possess body and soul. The Midian faces first appeared to Israel; they like them, that brought them to like their presence, that to take pleasure in their feasts; from their boards to their beds, from their beds to their idols: and now God is separated, and they are joined to Baal-peor. Corporal fornication is the way to spiritual: if superstitious love make idols of flesh, how soon do they give us up to idols of wood and stone!

7. It hath not only undone persons and houses, but ruined whole cities and kingdoms. What a breach did this double fornication make in Israel! God doth not smother his wrath, but himself strikes with the plague, and bids Moses strike with the sword, Numb. xxv. Dinah is ravished; the whole city is destroyed for it. While every man lies sore of his own wound, Simeon and Levi rush in with weapons and kill them. What was the shrieking of women and children in all the streets of that city, while the fathers and husbands take mortal physic for their prince's sickness! For a particular Amnon to answer his lust in blood, is not so ponderous; many an unclean lover meets with such a catastrophe. But for a whole tribe to be cut off for uncleanness, as was Benjamin, Judg. xxi. 6; for a whole kingdom to smart, as Abimelech said to Abraham, Thou hast brought a great sin on me, and on my kingdom, Gen. xx. 9; that the whole kingdom of Israel should smart for the king's filthiness; these be dire effects. The name of king became odious to Rome, for the rape of Lucrece: famous Troy was razed for one Helena.

8. It is commonly mixed and plagued with blindness. So had lust besotted Judah, that he could not discern the voice of Tamar which he heard every day, Gen. xxxviii. 15; nor foresee what shame might follow those pledges: this passion for the time even bereaves a man of himself. Thus impudently blind was Joseph's mistress, Gen. xxxix. 12: it had been too bad to yield, but for a woman to solicit, yea, to importune, yea, to force the modesty of her servant; gross and desperate! As sin ever ends in shame when it is committed, so it makes us past shame in the committing. Thus Amnon thrusts his defiled sister out of doors: where was his reason? Secrecy had some hope; but to expose her, what was it but to anger a royal father, incense a brother, incur the law, provoke her friends, fill the world with outcries? Though he looked not so high as heaven in doing the sin, yet he might look so low as earth to prevent the shame. No; lust knows no reason, and they that lose their honesty shall lose their wit. This is just with God, to punish a deboshed heart with a besotted understanding. Uncleanness loves a dark mind, as well as a dark house. How foolish were those Israelites, in joining themselves to Baal-peor! All idols are abominable, this was also beastly; the devil appeared in a sordid and nasty form; yet uncleanness works them to it. Cupid is blind; and whither may not he be transported that wanteth his eyes?

9. Not seldom it goes off in hatred of the object: ordinate conjunction increaseth love, this begets detestation; and that both where it is crossed, and where it is satiated. For the former, Potiphar's wife is an example, Gen. xxxix. 17: if she cannot have Joseph's body to enjoy, she wills it to ruin; when she fails of his love, she seeks his life. Lust is a pleasant madness when it is yielded, a desperate madness when it is opposed. Love is not more witty than malice: the arguments of his innocency shall challenge him of sin: he left his coat because he would not do that, for which he is condemned because he left it. No hate burns so furiously, as that which ariseth from the quenched coals of love. He either ardently loves thee, or mortally hates thee, says one. For the other, look on Amnon; how did he hate abused Tamar more than ever he loved her! 2 Sam. xiii. 15. He should indeed have hated himself for this brutish violence, not his innocent sister; but his former love was not more unreasonable and misplaced, than his later hatred. Fraud drew her into the house, force entertained her within, and hatred drove her out. So did one hour change the extremity of his love into extremity of hate, that he is now sick of her, as before he was sick for her; and she that kept the keys of his heart, is now locked out of his doors.

10. It is a sin not easily repented of: "Whoredom and new wine take away the heart," Hos. iv. 11. St. Paul comforts the Corinthians, that they are washed from their sins, 1 Cor. vi. 11: they will not off without washing, and there can be no washing without water, and a drop or two will not serve to baptize the conscience. But, say some, this sin ordinarily of itself brings to repentance. Indeed, loss of spirits, and terrors of the fact, may breed some kind of remorse; and the expectation did not promise, nor the fruition perform, more delight, than the remembrance brings irksomeness. The face of uncleanness looks lovely, but the farewell is deadly. If we could foresee the end before we taste the beginning, we would never let it come so far as to repentance; our former detestation would save our after-sorrow a labour. But lust often ends in discontent, seldom in true repentance. "Her guests are in hell," Prov. ix. 18, and that is no way to heaven.

Lastly, it pulls down God's fearful judgments, Heb. xiii. 4, though it escape the censure of man. Amnon had so quite forgotten his sin, that he durst go to that house a feasting, where Tamar was mourning; not suspecting him other than a friend whom he had deserved to make an enemy. Now when his heart was merry, he fell down dead, 2 Sam. xiii. 28. Wicked Absalom meant this murder to his soul, as well as to his body; but God was just in both. He that in two years' forbearance would find no leisure to repent, must now perish without leisure to cry for mercy. How fearful a judgment came to that Levite's concubine, to be abused to death! Judg. xix. 25. She had wronged the bed of a Levite before by her willing wantonness; yet her father harboured her, her husband forgave her, the world had forgot it, herself never smarted for it. Thus far she goes smoothly away with her sin; and neither father, nor husband, nor neighbour, nor magistrate, nor her own conscience, upbraids her with it. Now it is forgotten of all hands, God calls her to account for it. Yea, so just and even is that Almighty Judge in his retributions, that the matter of her sin shall be the manner of her punishment; he will plague her with her own delight. Uncleanness was her fault, uncleanness shall be her fate and ruin. Before she had exposed herself with willing pleasure, now she is exposed by force: adultery was her sin, adultery is her death. Men may forget their own filthiness, God remembers it; and will pay them when they least expect it. Sin is a faithful debtor, it never borrows without payment: if it owe us a punishment, it will not break with us. And if it fail of present judgments, yet this is sure, it destroyeth the soul, Prov. vi. 32. Lusts fight against the soul, 1 Pet. ii. 11, but uncleanness kills it. These be the terrible effects, which if tremblingly applied, like corrosives will eat out the dead flesh, and become so many proper ingredients to the medicine of our cure; or like ashes that are made by a fire of wood, which being poured on, will smother the fire in the wood, and put it out.

The other remedies are, 1. To abridge the flesh of provocatives; beating down the body, and keeping it in subjection, 1 Cor. ix. 27. Take away the fuel, if the fire be too hot. High feeding and lasciviousness are inseparable; that is the limbec which distills all into lust.

2. To remember a man's beginning and end. The Lord did not make us for pollution; and the thought of death will be a death to lust. Meditate of thy mortality whensoever thou art tempted to this iniquity.

3. Fear God, which will make every joint tremble at the very suggestion. Some forbear a sin because it is dear, some because it is laborious, others because it is dangerous, few because it is impious. But the death of lust is religion: morality resists but in cold blood; heat nature, and all her in-born principles are forgotten. Regard of name and credit may fear the shame, yet love the sin. But he that fears God, and is watched by his own conscience, can never find a place dark enough to offend in. The law looks to our words and deeds, and requires that they be good: religion also fetcheth in the thoughts, and makes them holy. We cannot without danger trust a moral heart with a fair body: we may safely trust a fair body with a sanctified mind. This was Joseph's argument, the pleasure of sin cannot stand with the fear of God. He might conceit, that this kindness might endear him as strongly to his mistress, as his service had to his master: to be so great a lady's minion, how many hundreds of our younger brothers would have embraced it! But holy fear had taken up all the room before carnal love came. He knew that all the honours of Egypt could not buy off the guilt of one sin; that such an advancement would have cast him down from the royal favour of God. The good heart chooseth rather to lie in the dust, than to rise by wickedness. This were to get up on the scaffold of death, that a man might look higher.

4. Abhor idleness; the standing pool will gather filth of itself, and be full of toads and vermin.

5. Attend the word preached; wherewithal else should a young man cleanse his way? Psal. cxix. 9. That physic is only able to purge it. This shall "deliver thee from the strange woman," Prov. ii. 16. If wisdom enter not, lust will: they that find not delight in the Spirit, will seek it at the flesh. By the word of God abiding in you, ye shall overcome the wicked one, 1 John ii. 14. How have all weapons of reason and moral resolution doubled in this encounter! It is the sword of the Spirit that gets the victory.

6. Prayer: if Paul be buffeted, this is his refuge, and it brings remedy; he prayed thrice, 2 Cor. xii.

8. Declare thy grievances, this shall bring down heavenly graces. Shall we be like infants, that cry when a pin pricks them, but cannot tell where? Say, God knows our wants; what then? The sullen child says, My father knows that I want bread, I will not ask him though I starve. God hath promised to hear, but only those that call upon him. He so orders things, that he seldom gives till he be asked: it is a poor pains, but to ask and have. "Ask of me, and I shall give thee," Psal. ii. 8. The woman that would be rid of her importunate tempter, is plain with him, I will tell my husband.

7. Flee the temptation: at other times, Fight, Timothy; now, Flee, Timothy, 1 Tim. vi. 11. When such an enemy pursues, it is high time to fly. Rather will Joseph lose his livery, than blemish his mistress's honour, his master's in her, his own in both, God's in all. He cannot be excused, that lives where he may in likelihood be faulty. To be safe from evil works, is to avoid the occasions.

8. If we cannot fly, yet let us deny. David solicits; had Bathsheba denied, that great sin had not been committed. Had she been mindful of her covenant with God, and her matrimonial fidelity, the inordinate desire had been checked, and in time choked. But ambition was the bawd to lust; and the conceit to be the king's mistress, to command him that commanded Israel, prostitutes her soul before her body: her facility furthers the sin. The first motioner of evil is most faulty: but as in quarrels, the second blow makes the fray, and the law takes special notice of that; so in sins, the second blow, that is, the consent of will, is by the law of God most culpable. Lust is a sin of two; if but one party be wise, both escape; he that is sure of either, may be secure of both. Women are the weaker in nature, yet stronger in desires; and though many hold it an impudence to woo, yet they hold not the innocence to deny. The woman at first tempted man, and therefore looks ever since that man should tempt her. She was an agent in his first ruin; in all the rest she would be a patient. The heat of man's constitution disposeth him to be the first profferer: now his chastity lies in the hands of women. If she have the grace to refuse, what he had the fault to offer, they are both delivered. Lust would be the most common sin of the world, if, like other sins, it could be done alone. Indeed, it is best never to be put to a denial; but by a fair carriage to put temptation out of hope. Wisdom forbears some lawful things, because they may be occasions of things unlawful.

9. Modesty; which is the only visible virtue, the chastity of the looks; a transparent glass, through which we see a clean and uncorrupted heart. This sets the face in a right posture; far from pride, and not nearer to wantonness. The beauties of both mind and body meet in the centre of modesty. An affected and coyish demureness is incident to them that be bad; but true modesty is seldom found but in innocence. Modesty is the outwork of the citadel, that keeps the enemy even from the walls. For a great example of this virtue, we cannot look too much upon Joseph. Foreign stories make honourable mention of many famous for chastity. Of Amabaens, who had a beauteous wife, yet abstained from her: perhaps he loved his harp better. Of Xenocrates, and of Spurina, a fair young man, who disfigured his face of purpose that he might not be desired of women. Of Hippon, a Greekish woman, that drowned herself to save her chastity. (Valer. Max.) None came near Joseph; who neither abstained from his own wife, that were a folly rather than a chastity; neither disfigured nor destroyed God's workmanship, which were to pull down our house, because the eye of a passenger covets it. But in the heat of youthful blood, when his lady solicits, promises reward, threatens ruin; convenience of place, opportunity of time, all the helps of hell concurring; then to resist! O here was fire falling upon wet tinder, that soon went out. The fathers commend him for these four great virtues in this one act. For temperance, that he would not be enticed by his mistress. For justice, that he would not wrong his master. For fortitude, that he overcame many assaults. For prudence, choosing rather to leave his vesture than his virtue.

10. Marriage. "It is better to marry than to burn," 1 Cor. vii. 9. Burning is the disease, for which marriage is the proper medicine. This is that ordinate fuel, whereon such fire should feed. St. Hierome's sophistry on that place is absurd; Marriage is called ood, because it is a lighter evil : for lust can never be ood, being a transgression ; and marriage cannot in self be bad, as it is God's institution. Not that very tickling should draw us to marrying ; but aurning, an restuant flame : for it is one thing to burn, nother to feel heat. Some pontificians have cast itter aspersions upon marriage, taxing that for uncleanness which is ordained an antidote against uncleanness. But that is a blasphemous doctrine, and ust needs imply, that God himself was mistaken, nd that upon a more serious deliberation of the lessed Trinity. Jehovah Elohim, Gen. ii. 18 : here was a greater consultation about making the woman, than about making the whole world. But t is objected, that in marrying they break their faith. Ans. They do not break the faith because they marry ; but because they wax wanton against Christ, and so marry, 1 Tim. v. 11. They are first incontinent, suffer themselves to be abused ; and then to over their offence, and to keep them from public shame, they marry. To accept of marriage only as a cloak to hide their former naughtiness, this is the sin condemned. Howsoever they think, marriage is an ordained remedy ; strange lusts will give place to true conjugal love. Let the husband love his wife, the wife love her husband, (and they have reason, for they took each other for that purpose,) these unnatural fires will out.

These be the rules of prevention, to escape uncleanness : but if any be defiled, they must take another receipt ; true contrition of heart, the floods that come from a broken rock ; washing themselves in the laver of repentance, that they may be clean. David in a zeal of justice against the rich oppressor, takes an oath to cut him off : God is more favourable to David, than to take him at his word. David says, The man shall die : Nathan says, Thou art the man, but thou shalt not die. Beside uncleanness, he had shed innocent blood ; and the strict law requires life for life. But oh, the wondrous power of repentance ! as if it could dispense with the rigour of justice : Thou shalt not die. In David we hear the voice of the law, awarding death unto sin ; in Nathan, the voice of the gospel, awarding life unto the repentance for sin. Whatsoever the sore be, this is the remedy. The soul that hath sinned, shall die, saith the law. The gospel comes in with an exception ; The soul that hath sinned, and not repented, shall die : never any soul applied this remedy, and died. Blessed is the man, not that hath not sinned ; where is he to be found ? but, whose sin shall not be imputed, because he hath repented, Psal. xxxii. 1, 2. It is only unfeigned repentance, that can cleanse our souls from these known evils.

Without this, God's hand will as surely overtake us in the punishment, as Satan's hand hath overtaken us in the sin. But, for comfort to the wounded soul, there is no sin so foul, but the blood of Christ can scour it off. Uncleanness is a deep stain, sized into the soul by her dwelling in the body ; there is no means to get it out, but by the blood of the Lamb. Even the garments of the saints need washing ; and what can make them white ? only the blood of the Lamb, Rev. vii. 14. It was the Jewish scoff at Christ, He could save others, not himself. St. Ambrose replies, He only can heal my wounds, that neglected his own. His garments were dyed red, Isa. lxiii. 1, to make all ours white. But neither can this be had without faith, nor faith be assured without repentance. It is a happy thing for a man to improve the days of his peace, for the prevention of future vengeance ; to seek only to be safe by being good. Next to this Divine providence, our best guard is our innocence, next to that our repentance.

For him that hath fallen, to pray, Lord, deliver me ; for him that hath not fallen, Lord, preserve me, in Jesus Christ. Take here two characters.

The unclean person stands like one tormented with a dreadful disease ; there is not a limb or joint about him, but suffers with the distortion of that one part. If some spot or token of his soul's infection should break out and appear in his face, no leper would change complexions with him. If he had a hundred eyes, he could bestow offices on them all, to purvey for his lust. He loves to be looking on pictures ; and when he cannot reach the substance, he courts the shadow. He sends his eye to the market, and money is his cater. The pestilence is in his breath, it infects every place he comes in. His body is rotting apace, but his soul is already fallen to pieces. His mistress is his idol, and he would never learn any prayers, but for doing his devotions to her. For God, he either thinks or wishes that he could not see in the dark. He is born to be a woman's slave, not her lord and husband : he dares not marry, for fear (contrary to other men's minds) of being paid his own debts. If he do bestow himself, he commonly solders up some cracked piece ; and in marriage is more jealous than before he could be luxurious. He and his strumpet make up a faggot for hell-fire ; and must burn together in torment, as they have done in turpitude. Before he dies, he is become all stench ; his soul stinks to God, his body stinks to himself, his name stinks to the world. It is just that he who leaves God for a harlot while he lives, should lose God, and his harlot, and himself, when he is dead. Reason left him long ago, and he hath ever since lived beast. Commonly he dies of Hercules' disease, a fire in his marrow. He may come to be sorry, seldom to repent. At last, he is brought to his couch, or crutch ; and there every body leaves him.

The chaste is a pure man whether in wedlock or virginity. If married, he loves his wife, not because she was rich or fair, but because she was and is good ; because he once loved her, and still loves himself in her. All change he abhors ; for he married not only for pleasure, but posterity. It is her soul he sets his love upon ; he knows the body to be but physic for lust, a shell for progeny ; therefore chose her not for that half whereby she is a woman, but for the better, wherein she is a man. Sensual affection looks only to the shape ; rational hath respect to the soul and mind, forgetting the sex, or leaving it to the sense. Souls have no sexes ; therefore they that love in soul, their love admits no more impurity than inconstancy. If he be single, his mind keeps his mortal fabric sweet ; his conscience hath got the better of his concupiscence ; he is so far from doing, that he dares not think amiss. His mirth is so clear, that you may look through it into virtue, not beyond. He had rather seem not to understand a bad motion, than to hold conference with it. He censures all charitably, and abhors suspicion ; he thinks none should do ill, because he means well. He entertains none but honest thoughts ; if loose ones look in at the window, he presently shuts the door. He neither with unseasonable sleep rusts his soul, nor with immoderate diet teacheth his body to rebel. He is one of those that be not defiled with women, for they are virgins ; and follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth, Rev. xiv. 4. His soul is Christ's betrothed spouse, and he accounts death but a messenger, to bring her home to her Husband. He is so clean, that the angels love to be about him here, and he shall be received among them hereafter.

"Walk after the flesh." This walking is the axle-tree, whereon the whole frame of the text moveth. There is no man can walk without lust, but the good man does not walk after lust; if it go with him, it shall not go before him. It is the natural man's way, the Christian's trouble in the way. If he be enticed out of virtue's path, either he doth not give consent, or he doth not give full consent, or he doth grieve for consent. Either he doth not walk, or he walks not far, or he walks against his will, and soon correcteth his steps, Psal. cxix. 59. The wicked man is taken in his walk, Psal. lxxviii. 21. But he that doth purpose beforehand not to sin, and in the act doth strive against sin, and after the act is sorry for sin; though he step awry weakly but not wickedly, God in mercy spares him, because this is none of his walk. He that is in the flesh cannot please God, Rom. viii. 8, so long as he keeps that way: but as water that hath been frozen with cold, may afterward be heat with fire, so he may come from a carnal to a spiritual course. Things of the flesh are of three sorts: some good, as the knowledge of arts; some indifferent, as honour and riches; some evil, as the works of sin. We walk in the former, and do well, keeping the right end; in the middle, not amiss, keeping the right manner; in the last, we go amiss, and there is no pretence to excuse us. We make the good become evil to ourselves, when we employ our learning to justify error. We make the indifferent very evil, when we prefer temporals to spirituals; as the tongue of the feverish infected with choler, makes sweet things taste bitter. I observe four things in this carnal walking. 1. Their slavery to it. 2. Their constancy in it. 3. The specification of it. 4. Our remedy from it.

1. Their slavery. To walk is their errant diligence; to walk after it, is their servile obedience. The flesh leads, and they follow like dutiful servants. All service is from sin, this is the service of sin. If man had not sinned, he should not have served. Ham was born of the same parents, only his sin brought him to a slavish condition, Gen. ix. 25. This was just with God: but for man to make his eldest son lord of all, and the rest no better than his servants, is such a tyranny of custom, (as if they were all illegitimate,) that in the book of God we can find no such distinction. There is a service of superiority. The good prince thinks himself but the highest servant of the commonwealth. He troubles his thoughts, he breaks his sleep, about the business of state; sets his shoulders under the weight of government; and his superiority in ruling it, is but subjection for the conservation of it. There is a service of equality. "By love serve one another," Gal. v. 13: he that doth not, is like a loose tooth in the mandible, better out than in. There is a service of inferiority; which is either, 1. Voluntary, when a free-man makes himself a servant; and such a servant may make himself free again. Or, 2. Temporary: he that works for us by the day, is so long our servant; at night he is free. Or, 3. Factory; undertaking such a work for such wages, during such a time: he is a servant. Or, 4. Captive, such as be taken in the wars; which St. Augustine (De Civit. 19. cap. 15.) will have called servi a servando, because they were saved in slaughter. Or, 5. Native, such as are born servants, being the children of servile parents. Or, 6. Venditive, that have sold themselves; concerning whom God set down a law, Exod. xxi. So Ahab sold himself to work wickedness, 1 Kings xxi. 25. But Paul seems to acknowledge this of himself; I am carnal, sold under sin, Rom. vii. 14. We answer, there be two ways of selling unto bondage: one compulsory, as the brethren sold Joseph; so the regenerate are sold under sin, but against their wills. The other voluntary, as the wicked sell themselves to Satan for very vanity; instating themselves upon the flesh, that they tell (without asking) who owns them, by the superscription of their livery, so that sin by the commandment becomes exceeding sinful, Rom. vii. 13. As a headstrong and unbroken horse, the more he is curbed by the bridle, the more he breaks out. (Pareus.) Wine will inflame any man, but he that hath a feverish body is more fired with it through his infirmity. (Lyrano.) There is a buying and selling: "Ye have sold yourselves for nought, and ye shall be redeemed without money," Isa. liii. 3. But this is in a diverse sense: they are sold for nought in respect of God, because he hath no honour by it, and redeemed for nought in respect of themselves they paid nothing for their redemption, but not in respect of Christ, for he bought us dear. But these have wilfully sold themselves to the service of sin.

2. Their constancy in it. Walking is a continued act; and acts continued make habits. Two sorts of philosophers had their names from walking: the Stoics, who derived their doctrine from Plato; and the Peripatetics, who had Aristotle for their prince. (Lactan.) Besides their ambulating life, severing themselves from common society, they had a certain peculiar and dogmatical way, whereunto they confined themselves. But all their ways were but fantasies and errant opinions, without any truth of rule, especially without the rule of truth. Our blessed God hath given us a blessed way; "and as many as walk according to that rule, peace be on them, and mercy," Gal. vi. 16: a perfect rule indeed; which we have good occasion to seek, good direction to find, good encouragement to walk, good reward at the end.

Walking intends a perpetuated motion, not for a pace or space, but holding out: therefore is the wicked conversation called a way; for that is a man's way, not which he steps into, but walks and travels. Some have spoken much of the way, but out of the way; while they called every act of sin a way; for the Scripture only means it of practical and habitual sin, Prov. iv. 14. So then, to walk after the flesh, is an addiction to sin, conflate of many lusts. This is a true distinction: Every vice is a sin, every sin is not a vice: every wry step is an error, it is not a way, not a heresy in manners. Once being overtaken with wine, makes not a drunkard. Vice cannot consist with virtue, because it is diametrically opposite; but a vicious act doth not destroy virtue, whether moral or theological. Peter's denial did not destroy his faith, nor David's uncleanness his charity. These were their sins, they were not their ways; their usual walking took another course. Actions are done by the powers of the soul and body, but habits have their residence in the very powers themselves, both of the sensitive and intellectual part: as wantonness or drunkenness in the former; pride, hypocrisy, diffidence in the other. If we compare them before God, vice is more grievous than a sin, because it is habitual malice; if before men, sin is more heinous than vice, for vices are not punished by magistrates, but only sins. But they ever beget one another; many evil actions beget an evil habit, and an evil habit every day begets evil actions.

3. The specification of it. The flesh hath many ways for them to walk. Take them by couples: there is a reeling way, and a railing way. The former is the drunkard's walk, that leads him from the lake of wine to the lake of brimstone: this is he that never abstains till he be athirst, and never drinks but double, for he must be pledged. The other is the swearer's walk, that in every place sends up defiance to the Lord of hosts. He infects all company, as thunder sours wine; and often dies raving and blaspheming, that is the end of his journey. There is a ruffling way, and a scuffling way. The former is the proud man's walk: as beggars hang their rags on the hedges, to tell they have been there; so these leave every where certain monuments and flags of their arrogant folly. The devil cannot miss them, for he is sure to find them in his own walk. The other is the litigious man's walk; he passes through all the judiciary courts on earth, to the infernal court of hell. The way of peace he knows not; there is no awe in his heart, while there may be any law on his side. And when all his substance is run out in fees to his advocates, at last (without the especial grace of repentance and restitution) himself goes for a round fee to the devil. There is a burning way, and a turning way. The former is the envious man's walk; anger is but a passionate fit of the irascible part; but malice is an inveterate anger, a fiery habit. Another's welfare is his most capital offence: yet his envy, like Phalaris' bull, makes that first become a torment to himself which he prepared for others. He fires himself before he goes to hell, as if he meant to season and harden himself for that unquenchable burning. The other is the hypocrite's walk, whose religion lies in wait for the inclination of the prince; standing water, that neither ebbs nor flows, but according to the moon, the time. He is very earnest in what he undertakes, and reviles the opposite; yet he can be of any religion for a need, therefore his heart is ruly of none. Of all men, the jealous and the hypocrite are possessed with a strange madness; they are very diligent and curious, yet hope to lose their labours. There is a thorny way, and a miry way. The former is the deceiver's walk: a common purse, where the fraudulent trader, the pestilent usurer, the impudent church-robber, every day fetch their turns; conferring how to turn the commonwealth into a private wealth, and to make all priests of one order, mendicants. To speak impartially, his is a habit, men walk in it to their graves. A way it is, but none of God's ways: an end it hath, but none of comfort's ends: an answer it hath, but none of truth's answers: a reward it hath, but it is the retribution of vengeance. Men think they may do this without trouble of conscience; but God keep them from dying with such a conscience. The other is the adulterer's walk, but that it is somewhat too fast for a walk; for if his acts could answer the number of his desires, nature could scarce supply him with desired objects. Could his wishes take effect, popery might have many nuns, it should have no nuns. The flesh hath many more ways and walks, which Paul himself is fain to conclude with an &c. Gal. v. 21.

4. For our remedy, first, let us beware of walking in sin, Psal. i. 1. It is dangerous to cross their way, nortal to walk in it. Look to the habit of sin, be sure to mortify that: it is not enough sometimes to forbear the action; it will be rare, if a bad tree should not yield bad fruit. Cut thy hair, it will grow again; mow the grass, it will spring again; lop a tree, it is a tree still. Not to lust when a man is sick, not to steal while he is asleep, not to quarrel while he is in prison, not to swear while he is at church; no thanks; the root is still within. If the wicked restrain one evil, the godly will kill ten; if Saul slay his thousand, David will slay his ten thousand. He that strikes at sin, let him be sure to strike home; do not favour it, for if it escape, it will have no mercy on thee; but be so much the more exasperated, because thou attemptest, and didst not succeed it. He that hath wounded this lion at the heart, shall never fear the strength of his paws, nor teeth of his jaws, nor hideousness of his roaring. "Mortify your members that are upon earth," Col. iii. 5. First, he calls them members, because they be either as dear to you as your members, or because they are brought into action by your members, or because they are the united limbs of concupiscence, as members are parts of the body. Your, for properly our sins are our own, and nothing else. Mortify, apply something that shall make them dead. Let not sin alone till it die of itself, but kill it while it might yet live: to give it over when we can no longer commit it, is no repentance. It will put you to some pain; men do not ordinarily die without pain; and sin hath a strong heart, it is not easily killed. It is one thing to sleep, another thing to die; with small ado we may get sin asleep; by rocking it in the cradle of indulgence, and lullabying it with voluptuousness, till it stir not in the conscience. But to get it dead, that it may not live in us, this will cost anguish and trouble. Mortify these ways for two reasons. 1. They arise not from any noble part in us, from no divine principle or gracious instinct, nothing that can declare greatness and true spirit in man; they are but the base and degenerate works and walks of the flesh. 2. They only make us odious to God: it is not mean clothes, nor a deformed body, nor a torn cottage, nor homely fare, but only sin, that makes a man contemptible. Proud of vices? a leazar may better be proud of his ulcers, a beggar of his vermin, or a scavenger of his lay-stalls.

Secondly, let us learn another walk, even to walk with God and be perfect. This is no time of sitting; Christians do not lead a sedentary life, it will breed obstructions in the heart. Our Saviour himself dearly earned that voice, before he heard it, "Sit thou at my right hand," Psal. cx. 1. No time of standing still. "Why stand ye here all the day idle?" Matt. xx. 6. Why do ye stand? you have feet; walk: here, in the beginning of your journey: in the day; the night is for rest, the day for labour: all the day; one hour were too much: idle; a man may stand and do some work, but stand ye idle? There is a medium betwixt sin and glory, and that is grace, a royal road, a milky way: walk this way, or expect not this end. God did enough to bring the way to us, who could never else have brought ourselves to the way: would we have him bring down heaven and glory too? We are in the bondage of sin, as the Israelites were in Egypt: Canaan was theirs, heaven is our promised land; if neither of us fall to walking, nor admit a motion and removal, they through the desert, we through amendment of life, neither can arrive at their home. If thou think thyself too good for this journey, God will think thee too bad for his glory.

God is the God of order, not of confusion; and nature is not suffered to run out of one extreme into another, but by a medium. Suppose it now midnight, and the sun with the antipodes: he does not presently mount up to the height of our heaven, and make it noon-day. But first it is twilight, then the day dawns, then the sun rises, and yet looks with weaker eyes before he shines out in his full glory. We do not to-day sweat with summer, and be shaken with the fury of winter to-morrow; but it comes on with soft paces: the day grows shorter, the sun's force weaker; cold dews, and white frosts, precede the extremity of hardness. Indeed Christ is able, in a moment, of sinners on earth to make men saints of heaven, as he wrought upon that one dying malefactor; but he seldom doth so suddenly advance men in the degrees of sanctification. That ordinary way, whereby men walk from the state of sin to the state of glory, is the state of grace. You have seen some make sudden leaps, and of furious sinners become zealous professors in a trice. Of such we may be charitably jealous. Men do not go to heaven by a leap: holiness shoots not up, like Jonah's gourd, in a night. Few men know the instant of their conversion, as the papists proudly demand the special times of their innovations, and who resisted their errors at the first rising? But as popery crept in part after part, in every part by gentle degrees, in every degree with pretence of truth; till it advanced the banners of painted ceremonies, with a mighty noise of excommunications, louder than the cataracts of Nilus; and howsoever it came in, we find it here: so our conversion is by soft and scarce sensible beginnings, albeit not part after part, yet degree after degree; in every part by gentle soakings in of goodness, in every degree by maturity and growing up to ripeness. As we cannot see the growing of a tree, yet know that it doth grow, by the magnitude of bulk, and branches, and fruits; so we may perceive our conversion to God, which walking on must confirm.

Walking is a good ordinary pace, between violent running and lazy creeping; a moderate course, between Jehu's march and Mephibosheth's. It is better for a man to go soft and sure, than for a gird to run himself out of wind, and afterwards to stand still and breathe him. Walk not slowly, for fear of coming short; not faster than we may hold out to the end, nor slower than we may come in good time to our everlasting rest. Any traveller may be called aside a little, to speak with his friend, or to look upon a novelty, so for a step and minute be out; but still his way lies before him; whereto recalling himself, and going constantly on in the proceedings of grace, he shall be blessed.

They "despise government." It is no wonder, if they that follow the flesh condemn authority, and would have no other governor than that of their own choosing. He that hath set up this Dagon for his god, would have nothing to do with the ark, nothing for the ark to do with him. It is not enough for Egistus to abuse the bed, but also to shed the blood, of King Agamemnon. The adulterer is fit to make a traitor. Rome hath sent us too many prodigious proofs of this; that have at once lusted after the beauty of our women, and thirsted at the blood of our princes. Palpable demonstrations, that the enchantment of adultery hath begotten instruments of conspiracy. And as a Jesuit is but a new word for a traitor; so seminary and seditious are but divers terms of the same man. Who more despise the magistracy among us, than the sons of riot, that take in the freight of lust at a tavern, and then with wind and tide sail to practise it? Being questioned for this, they turn men of war, stand at defiance, and rhyme away the awe of government with the ballads of scandal. A man would think, that none who profess the gospel of Christ, should impugn the ordinances of God; or if they did despise the spiritual ones, as men that have no care of their souls, yet not the visible and temporal ones, as men that stand in fear of their lives. If there were none such, I might well have spared my sermon, yea, the apostle might have spared my text. But when this ulcer comes to be searched, many more will be found guilty, than be now suspected by others, or suspect themselves.

For method, here be two general things considerable. 1. The excellency of the thing despised, Government. 2. The pravity of such as throw contempt upon it, Despisers. The former will appear, both by the authority that ordains it, and by the necessity that requires it.

For the authority; this is from God himself. He gave man a fourfold regiment. 1. Over the creatures, Psal. viii. 2. Over himself: before his fall by a potent freedom of will he governed all his actions; after his fall some relics of this dominion appear: reason still retains some fragments of her regiment over the sensual part, though here she be but like a queen in the midst of none but rebels. In the body, some parts are made to govern and direct the rest, as the head; some to obey, as the members. 3. Over his household: the master is a little king in his family, as the king is a great master in his kingdom. 4. Over the state; whether monarchical, of one; or aristocratical, of many and those the best; or democratical, which is the popular state. All which are mediately or immediately of God, Rom. xiii. 1. "Thou couldest have no power at all against me," saith Christ to Pilate, "except it were given thee from above," John xix. 11.

Against this divine institution there be some objections; to clear all which, hold we this distinction. There is the power itself, the assumption of it, and the execution of it. The manner of assuming it may be from the devil: either by bribery, as it is likely Felix came in, Acts xxiv. 26; so that he could not sell cheap, who had bought dear. Or by cruelty and intrusion, as Abimelech ascended the throne by the stairs of blood and fratricide, Judg. ix. 5. Or by invasion, as the conqueror makes himself king. Or by usurpation, as Athaliah kept the kingdom from the right heir, Joash. So also the manner of using this power may be from the devil; as to set up superstition for religion, and cruelty instead of equity. Here neither the bad manner of acquiring, nor bad order of tyrannizing, are from God: yet the authority itself is of God. The hand doth violently extort another's good, or smite with the sword: these abuses are from sin, but the hand itself is given of God. The sight is sore, or adulterous, yet the eye is of God. The truth is plain; By me kings reign, saith the Lord, Prov. viii. 15: let us hear what error objects.

Object. 1. "They have set up kings, but not by me: they have made princes, and I knew it not," Hos. viii. 4. Ans. They chose the king without God's approbation, they set not up the kingdom without his institution. Evil princes are said to reign not by God, either in the mode of governing, when they rule the people not by that law which should rule the king; or in their mode of coming to the throne, when God calls them not to reign; or they reign for themselves, not for God; they reign not for God's honour, but their own humour. God made the member, he made not the ulcer. When the Israelites chose Jeroboam their king, that treacherous revolting from their lawful sovereign, and rebellious adherence to a usurper, an idolater, was none of God's doing, he condemns it; yet the act was his, 1 Kings xi. 35. So Hierome says of Saul's election; that it was by the error of the people, not by the will of the Lord: it is true, the manner was the people's fault, but the matter was God's purpose: he meant to raise up a king, only takes the occasion by their headstrong importunity. So still doth it happen, that bad manners breed good laws. Without question the thing was good; monarchy, the best form of government; but good things may be ill desired. So while they affected a king, they rejected the Lord, 1 Sam. viii. 7. Therefore seeing they choose to have a king, God will choose the king they shall have. As he gratifies them in the monarchical condition, so he punisheth them in the monarch's person.

Object. 2. St. Peter calls it an "ordinance of man." 1 Pet. ii. 13; how is it then of God? Ans. He calls it human, because the subject wherein this authority sticks is man; or because it is exercised in the affairs of man; or because it is for man's good. The fruits of the earth are brought forth by the industry of man, yet they cease not to be the gifts of God. The forms of administration may be of man, the original institution is of God.

Object. 3. If every power, then the tyrannical, is of God; as the Mahometan, pontifical, diabolical. Ans. The principality is, not the tyranny. Wealth is always good in itself, and God's gift; yet the unjust acquisition, and miserable usurpation, make it bad to such owners. Riches are not bad, except to the bad. And were the pope an orthodox bishop, we would not deny his authority to be of God; but his challenge of universal dominion is not power, but the ulcer of power; which he hath by his own ambition, Satan's instigation, not God's institution. And for the devil's power, it is by God's permission, not without his limitation; no other than a hangman's office, to correct and punish whom the Divine justice appoints. When he boasted of the kingdoms, They are all mine, Matt. iv. 9, this was but his lie, he had not one foot to bestow.

The power of government is then ordained of God, and that in a special manner, by direct precept. Sickness indeed and war, famine and poverty, are ordained of God, but not by commandment. "Promotion comes neither from the east, nor," &c. Psal. lxxv. 6; nor from the suffrages of people, nor lives of ancestors, nor conquest of swords; but from the Lord. By him are kingdoms disposed, kings inaugurated, crowns of gold set on their heads, sceptres and states established, angels with their wings shadowing their thrones; that their majesty may be higher by the head than the rest of the people. That one man should rule millions, restrain, constrain, correct, command; how could it be, but that God himself hath imprinted the characters of a divinity in him; but that there is a divine constitution in a human person? "It is God that subdueth the people under me," Psal. xviii. 47. Saul is in David's cave, the soldiers would now have him carve his own revenge; they allege God's promise and this advantage concurring: but take it at the worst, "Thou mayest do to him as it shall seem good to thee," 1 Sam. xxiv. 4. Now, that might not seem good to him that seemed evil to God. But their incentive to blood David makes a preservative from blood; "The Lord forbid I should do this thing to his anointed," ver. 6. Doubtless he had work enough to defend both himself and his persecutor; himself from the importunity of their instigation, his master from suffering violence. Say, he could rule his own hands, it is not easy to rule a multitude. What was the charm to allay the fury of those raging spirits? He is the Lord's anointed: nothing else, this was enough; that holy oil was an antidote for his blood. Saul did not lend David so impenetrable an armour when he was to encounter Goliath, as David lent him in the plea of his unction. Not one of the discontented outlaws durst put forth a hand of violence against him. The image and impress of that divine ordinance strikes such an awe into the hearts of men, that it makes even traitors cowards; so that instead of smiting, they tremble, like them whose office is to suffer, not to do. "Fear God. Honour the king," 1 Pet. ii. 17. There was never man that feared God, but he also honoured the prince.

For the necessity; without government we were worse than beasts. It is the bond of the commonwealth; the life-breath which so many thousand creatures draw; who otherwise would prove a burden to themselves, a booty to their enemies. In the host of heaven there is a regiment: under God the Supreme, be orders and degrees of stars and planets; without which composition it could not be called an army. There is a regiment in the body; they are luxate and palsy members, that move not but by the direction of the head. In the family is a regiment; the servant acknowledgeth his master, the child his father. Among irrational creatures is a regiment; the bees have their king, the cranes their leader, and they keep their night-watches in disposed orders. All the drove follows the principal beast, and the sheep are not led by every ram, but by their own elected guide.

Thus nature teacheth, that we are all bound to subject ourselves to government. Man is a sociable creature, but there would be harsh society among them without a ruler. None could say, This is mine; and Cheapside would not be safer than Salisbury Plain. The first rule that nature dictates to man by experience, is to seek a ruler. We may say of all other creatures, They are born their crafts-masters: nature itself was their tailor and tutor, they came in apparelled and armed; and by their estimative faculty, they are their own caterers and cooks, physicians and builders. They can at first entrance choose their own meats, build their own nests and burrows, and being distempered, skill their own medicines. But man came in without a rag to his back, or a dinner drest to his stomach, or a house to put his head in; no weapons, no ableness to use them; his understanding like white paper, nothing written on it: all which really teach him to seek a protector. Therefore a commonwealth without a governor, is like a body without a soul: where is no king, they are all kings. It were strange, if every member of the body should move by a several soul: how long could that man hang together? The son hath a great loss in the death of his father, the wife of her husband, the servant of his master; but in the funerals of princes the whole land reads not so much the prince's as their own mortality. One saith truly, While death strikes the eminent, it aims at all. I know their fame is immortal, their goodness immortal, their souls immortal, but their bodies are mortal; there is so much of man in them, that they must die. They are lent to us for our sakes, but we must restore them again for their own sakes.

"He is the minister of God to thee for good," Rom. xiii. 4. Either for our natural good, preserving our lives, which bloody men would soon ruin, who fear not so much hell as the halter; like beasts that are more afraid of the flash of the powder, than of the bullet. Or civil good, preserving our goods and possessions; else robbery were law, and men, like dogs, would try all right by the teeth. Or moral good, in commanding and commending virtue, which hath praise of the power; or in punishing vice, he bears not the sword in vain. Or spiritual good; the magistrate by coercive power enforcing men to the duties of godliness. These seats would be empty, the preacher want his relative, hearers, the sacraments would be vilipended, the service of God resigned to the service of Satan; but for government. The sabbath would not be distinguished from common days, the markets be fuller than the temples; the wicked, like sullen children, would not forsake their play for their meat, but for the rod of correction. Many saints in heaven might now confess, that they had not known God, but for the king. First, compulsory means brought them to the feast, whereof once tasting, they would never leave it. "Compel them to come in," &c. Luke xiv. 23. It is a good storm that blows the wanton and secure mariner into the haven. We could not converse together, had not God set authority over us, to repress our mutual violences.

Lewd wretches have not the fear of God, therefore

God brings them under the fear of man; that being subjected to rulers of their own kind, their outrage might be sent from temporal death to eternal. In that notorious apostasy of the Jews, when so many execrable enormities were committed, the Spirit still prefixeth, "In those days there was no king in Israel," Judg. xvii. 6. We read of a poor Levite wanting means: why? there was no king. If God had been their king, his law had provided for the Levite. If Moses had been their king, his sword would have cut out a portion for the Levite. We are beholden to government for order, for peace, for religion. For order; where is no king, every man will be his own king. For peace; he that is his own king, will be another's tyrant. For religion; every Micah would have a house of gods, beside God's house. We are worthy of nothing but confusion, if we do not bless God for regular dominion. No wonder if the Levites go a begging, while there is no king in Israel. The tithes and offerings were their due; had these been paid, none of the holy tribe needed to wander for maintenance. Where both legal and regal authority appoints the Levite his right, the wickedness of man will defraud him. But what should become of the Levites, if there were no king? And what of the church, if there were no Levites? No king, no church: no civil government, no ecclesiastical. How should the impotent child live without a nurse? It was God's promise unto his church, Kings shall be thy foster-fathers, and queens thy nurses, Isa. xlix. 23. How should not the sheep be a prey to wolves and foxes, but for the shepherd? What life or temper can be kept in the body that is headless? Therefore, that the riches we have gotten by honest industry may be assured to our posterity; that we may sit under the shadow of peace, and teach our children to know the Lord; that the lamp of our lives be not snuffed out with violence; that the good man may build up temples and hospitals, without trembling to think of savage and barbarous sacrilege to pull them down; that our devotions be not molested with uproars, nor men called from their callings by mutinies; that our temporal estate be kept in liberty, our spiritual estate improved with piety, and our eternal estate be given us in glory; that our lives may be preserved, and our souls be saved; for such a king of men, bless we the God of kings.

This truth is plain enough, no reasonable man would look for impugnors; yet we must be content to hear what the synod of hell can plead for disobedience.

Object. 1. Subjection came in with sin; but Christ hath taken away sin, therefore also subjection. Innocency knew no superior but God; and the subjection of Eve was her punishment, this could not antecede her sin. Her fault, says one, not her nature, deserved the name of slave. Ans. Subjection is twofold; servile, and civil. The vassalage of a slave, bound only to seek his master's proper good, was not before the fall; civil obedience for the common good, was. The former is a curse, such a one as Noah bequeathed to his impudent son; not in itself considered, but by reason of the fear and sorrow united to it, which innocency knew not. Civil subordination was before the fall: "Increase and multiply;" this did put a plain distinction and inequality betwixt the father and the son. Eve was subject to Adam, before either of them was subject to sin. She might have dominion with her husband, but he had dominion over his wife. Not that the Salick law accords with the Divine law, as if no queen might govern a kingdom; for the God of spirits hath often put great spirits into that sex. The queen of Sheba was a famous governess; and that masculine virtues may shine in a female head, this land cannot forget the memory of so long and sweet experience. Yet this hinders not, but that man is fittest to govern. The ruler was to bring for his sin-offering, a he-goat; the private offender, a she-goat, Lev. iv. 22, 27: to show that the male suits the ruler best, and the female the ruled. (Theodor.) Thus innocency had a superiority.

Object. 2. Every believer is even now in the kingdom of heaven, but in heaven there is no king but Christ. Ans. In this respect they are also called kings, yet the king that doth not find them subjects, judgeth them traitors. There is a spiritual regiment, standing in grace, peace, and joy, Rom. xiv. 17: here is no distinction of persons; neither father nor son, master nor servant, king nor subject, but Christ is all in all. There is a civil regiment, which cannot consist without distinctions and orders; here must be masters and servants, &c. If all were commanders and rich, every man must be driven to curry his own horse, and cleanse his own stable. As it is but a trunk which is all body, no head; so it is a monster, which is all head, and no body. But they say further, The faithful have God's Spirit their guide, therefore need not human direction. Ans. It is one thing what we do, another thing what we ought to do. Yet could we live without transgression, we could not live well without protection.

Object. 3. The children are free, Matt. xvii. 26; now if free from tribute, then from subjection. Ans. Christ there spake of himself, who was by birth heir to the crown, therefore free; yet to avoid offence he paid it. And the freedom that he gives us is from the law, Gal. v. 1, from sin, death, and hell: a liberty of conscience, a spiritual enfranchisement; not an exemption and immunity from civil obedience. Licentiousness is not liberty, but slavery: this makes the wicked to affect their own insensible bondage, and to dote on their own libertine delights; as a madman loves his chains, because they rattle, and (as he thinks) make a brave noise. He that made us free, taught us another rule by his own example: he obeyed his parents in the flesh with humility, the emperor with piety, the law with integrity, his heavenly Father to the death. So the Christian is, as Tertullian says, an enemy to no man, much less to a ruler.

Object. 4. Civil government is full of cruelty; and the sword of justice not only spills the life, but often kills the soul, by cutting off the time and means of repentance. Ans. Nay rather, the malefactor that is not moved at the sentence of death, despairs the possibility of amendment by longer life. Thievish Achan had suffered his sacrilege to lie fretting into his soul, had not the lot discovered him to death. Leisurely sickness and languishment is but the coach-way to repentance, legal doom is the post-horse. How easy is it for men to delay the preparation for death, so long as they have hope of life! Sooner do you hear of a malefactor's contrition at the gibbet, than of a usurer's in his bed: as a violent fire can thaw that ice, which lies long unmelted by a winter's sun. Cataplasms and fomentations draw not out the pleurisy, letting of blood does it. He sees, by the evidence of the fact, intelligence of the jurors, truth of the witnesses, impartiality of the judge, an image of that higher tribunal, whither his sin will send him when they have done with him. Here the gaol can hold him but to the session, the session is not long ere it come to sentence, the sentence is soon answered with execution, the suffering of death is short; all these passages take up no long time. But then comes another judgment, where his conscience gives in testimony, all his crimes appear upon record, Satan solicits justice, God cannot be unjust, the doom is certain, the execution eternal. Therefore with a humbled soul and broken heart, he cries for mercy before he comes to the seat of justice; beseecheth Christ to procure him a pardon, and God to accept his Son's satisfaction. In this assurance he smiles death in the face, is free in prison, and never felt himself truly to live, till he is come to die. Thus he that could not live innocent, dies penitent; and seeing his body cannot be saved alive, he endeavours that his soul may be saved in death. As he hath followed Satan our common enemy in sinning, so he now defies him in repenting; and by his unfeigned tears disappoints that murderer's hope of his damnation. More malefactors than that one have gone from the gibbet to heaven; and from an ignominious place, after a more scandalous fact, been received up to glory.

Object. 5. But how if the prince be bad, an enemy to truth and goodness, a ravisher, a persecutor, raising powers for the extirpation of the gospel? Here, if ever, a subject may renounce all allegiance; for here is power against power, man against God, and the subject of both left to follow either. Answer. In this strait some, for fear of the king, shipwreck their faith, and these are traitors to God; others, by a defensive sword in their hand, rebels to the king. There is no question, but God must be obeyed even against the king, when the king commandeth things against God. The one threatens a prison; the other, hell. What then? shall we resist him with violence? No, God never warrants that practice, no, not against a prince that denies him. There is an active obedience, and a passive. I may not execute his impious commands, I must suffer his unjust punishment. As one expresses it, We must obey evil rulers, when they command things not evil. The vices of men cannot frustrate the institution of God; be he never so ungracious, honour must be given, if not to the governor, yet to the government. Peruse Matt. v. 44, and Rom. xii. 17; this will tie the hands of Christian subjects. Samuel offered not to depose Saul, though the express sentence of God had cast him off, and he was excommunicated by a higher power than ever came from Rome: Saul lived and died a king.

The captive Jews in Babylon, wrote to their brethren in Jerusalem, to pray for the life of Nebuchadnezzar, Baruch i. 11. This was Jeremiah's counsel, Jer. xxix. 7, and Daniel's practice, Dan. iv. 19; vi. 21; all his speeches savoured of most perfect obedience, even to a king that not so well entreated him. Let him be a Darius, and make a decree against God; then he will enter into his house and pray, open his windows and pray, not pass many hours but pray; though every hair on his head were a life, ready to redeem his duty to God with the loss of them all. What resistance did the primitive Christians make to those barbarous outrages, but praying for the emperor's life, when under the emperor's command they were bleeding to death? Neither did they suffer because they were not able to resist; but it was their doctrine, it is more lawful to be killed, than to kill. We are not wanting in the strength, either of riches, or of numbers. So Tertullian. We have means sufficient: they filled all places of that idolatrous empire, islands, cities, castles, all but the profane temples. One night, and a few torches, could have afforded them an ample revenge. Mercy on us, had but the Jesuits such an advantage! Tertullian to these pagan tormentors, The emperor is more ours than yours; as being appointed by our God, and upheld by our prayers and obedience.

Christians never prove losers, but when they unjustly fight for their own preservation. Provide we the buckler of patience, not a sword as ready to give as ward the blow. "He that loseth his life for my sake shall find it," Matt. x. 39: here is the way, either to die by living, or to live by dying. When the decree was gone out by Ahasuerus, Esth. iii. 15, this was their refuge; prayer and tears: I shall be able to weep, I shall be able to groan. We petition, O Augustus, we do not fight. Thus Augustine. The apostles could work miracles, yet they resisted not the ordinate powers. This charge Paul imposeth on the Romans, Rom. xiii. 1, even while tyrannous Nero was their emperor; a monster, whom divers held to be antichrist. Saul is in David's cave; the soldiers think that God sent him thither on no other errand, but to fetch his death. If Saul had seen his own danger, he had given himself for death, and expected to receive what he meant to bestow. But wise and holy David gives way neither to his own passion, nor his soldiers' solicitation; but only makes this use of it, the trial of his loyalty, and the means of his peace. It had been as easy to cut Saul's throat, as his garment; but his coat only shall be the worse, not his person. Nor should the cloak have been maimed to seek his own revenge, but for a monument of his innocence. The very piece of his garment shows he meant no hurt to his person; yet this violence strikes David's heart, 1 Sam. xxiv. 5. He feels remorse for touching that, which did once touch the person of his lord. How unlike are those spirits of Rome, that teach and practise, encourage and reward, yea, canonize the violation of majesty itself! David regrets for cutting a royal robe; they make no account of shedding the royal blood, sheep to cut the throat of their shepherd.

Evil princes are indeed a punishment; I gave them in my anger, Hos. xiii. 11. How miserable it is to have an intemperate ruler, appears by the wisest preacher: "Woe to thee, O land, when thy princes eat in the morning!" Eccl. x. 16: following the pleasures that attend on majesty, and not the pains which belong to magistracy. There is a miserable desolation threatened to Israel; the staff of bread and stay of water, the man of war and the man of peace, the judge and prophet, the honourable and ancient, the cunning artificer, the eloquent orator, all shall be taken away. How comes it? "I will give children to be their princes, and babes shall rule over them," Isa. iii. 4: there is the judgment fulfilled. "Set thou a wicked man over him," Psal. cix. 6: among all other curses which he calls from heaven by the Spirit of prophecy upon his malicious adversaries, running like oil into all the joints and bones of themselves, their wives, and children, this leads the army, as Judas led the soldiers; Set a wicked man to rule over him. They that were weary of Solomon, were wearied with Rehoboam. Yet must not all this expose them to contempt: Samuel would not pray with Saul, he would grace him before the people, to continue credit to the magistracy. There is some good attained to under the worst prince. Even by the power given to the devil, Job was tried that he might appear to be righteous; Peter was tempted, that he might not presume on himself; Paul was buffeted, that he might not exalt himself; Judas was condemned, in order that he might hang himself. Such is the ordinary gloss on Job xxxiv. Julian sent his subjects to heaven in earnest, while himself went to hell merrily and in jest. But blessed be our God, we have no cause to complain; we have such a prince, whom whosoever praiseth not, either does not love him, or does not know him. Only let us bless him, and bless God for him, that we may all be blessed in him.

Conclusion. That religion then cannot be right, that pulls down princes; seeing neither Moses in the Old Testament, nor Christ in the New, nor Levite nor prophet, apostle nor disciple, either counselled or practised against government: which should decide the point, that hath cost the lives of so many Christians, and still threatens more tragedies to come. They that in this argument found the weakness of their pens, have fallen to their penknives, multiplied the school into a camp, arguments to armies, teaching all their proselytes dismal conclusions. Thus they fight against God in his lieutenant, and the root of all civil order they desire to root out. They complain of us for suppressing them, that will not let us live in quiet by them. What security can Sarah with her Isaac have in the house if Hagar and her son be not beaten out of doors? The peace of our state, nor scarce of any state in Christendom since Charlemagne's time, hath not been violated, but the pope or his ministers have had a hand in it. To say nothing of their private turbulency, what pestilences they be to the houses that harbour them, where they rule all with the lady, it is their sauciness with the crown which our state suffers under. They do but turn the text; kings over subjects, Luke xxii. 15, and they over kings. They will be Donatists, Anabaptists, Libertines, pagans, any thing, so they be not subjects. How did they more than despise, even despite that queen of blessed memory! whom strangers came to see, as the queen of Sheba did Solomon; foreigners revered, subjects loved, all princes living admired, and themselves outwardly flattered; by whose gracious hand God wrought those wonders, that the most potent kings can hardly reach. Honour filled the circle of her crown, her brow with majesty, her heart with piety, her hands with pity, her lap with plenty, her throne with equity. All those virtues centred in her breast, which severally had commended the great ladies of the former world. Yet how execrable were the treasons at home, the rebellions and invasions abroad, which they contrived against her! Now when she is in glorious peace, have they not raked into her grave, and railed on her royal name? She that lies buried, not in cold earth, but in the warm and living monuments of all religious hearts among us, is still persecuted by their barbarous violences. But as all their malice could not harm her person while it was mortal on earth; much less can it reach her soul, which is now immortal and blessed in heaven. Lord, they have not despised her, but they have despised thee: revenge thine own cause; confirm the diadem where it is, and let not the man of sin pull down, what thou the God of righteousness hast built up.

Despisers. The main antagonists of sovereignty are the Anabaptists and papists: who, howsoever otherwise they dart fire one at another, yet here, like Herod and Pilate, they shake hands; or those seditious captains in Jerusalem, fight against the magistrate as their common enemy. Thus Samson's foxes have averse heads, but are coupled together by their tails.

1. The Anabaptists did strike at the head of all government; and with the sword in their own hand, sought to wring the sword out of the magistrate's. They inveighed against authority, and yet took authority upon themselves. As I have heard a man reproved for swearing, presently rap out an oath that he would not swear. It was Munster's ordinary doctrine, that he had conference with God about it; that he charged him to kill the magistrates, to destroy the wicked, and constitute a new world. These cry down all rule; as the heathen against God's anointed Son; "Let us break their bands asunder, and cast away their cords from us," Psal. ii. 3. But at last finding themselves fooled by themselves, and that kings would not be disputed out of their dominions, yea, that themselves could not be kept in order without some prelation, they began to qualify the matter; as men that can get nothing by law, will come to composition. Regiment they will allow, if magistrates will be content with their allowance: which is not only, like David's ambassadors, half their regal robes cut off, but authority itself grubbed to the skin; not only lopping off the superfluous branches, but hewing the root till it be past all growing. That he hath his institution from God, his constitution from the people. Thus with a paring knife they so shred his government, till, like the cozening tailor that shrunk a freeze gown to a dozen of buttons, they leave him only a titular prince, and keep the principality to themselves. Let all their refutation be but a mere hissing at.

2. The papists are more moderate in show, little less pestilent in deed. Their laity shall be subject to a magistrate, but to one of their own choosing, and that only till their refusing; so authority is no sure knot, but, as jugglers, they play at fast and loose. And upon the least exception to the piety, yea, obedience of the prince, (a strange catechism, or catechism rather, that teacheth kings to obey their subjects,) they cast him out from his royalty, discharge and absolve the people from their allegiance. This practice is according to their common distinction, not differing from the former of the Anabaptists; The government from God, the governor from men: therefore they dare do any thing against the king, nothing against the kingdom. Execrable sophistry! as if he that opposed the governor did not oppose government. Would this answer pass in Rome, The popedom, as it is the succession of Peter, is of God, but the present pope is of man? Or this, God forbids me to wrong my neighbour, yet (Jesuit) I may wrong thee? This was fit doctrine, for Machiavel himself would not have been ashamed of it. But Daniel, that was a counsellor of state to two monarchies, and a private counsellor to four kings, ascribes this power of translating or entailing crowns to a family, to none but God, Dan. v. 21: it is he, not the pope.

By their rule the pope indeed is king, and all kings but his viceroys, to be placed and displaced according as they please or displease him. And for their clergy, they shall know no civil obedience at all. But were the sword as well able to plead the causes of kings in the field, as the pens of divines are in the school, their crowns would sit more quietly on their heads. "Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers," Rom. xiii. 1. If every soul, then yours also, saith St. Bernard to an archbishop: who hath exempted you from this universality? His conclusion is, If any one aims at exception, he attempts deception. Why did our Saviour submit himself to Caiaphas, to Pilate, pay tribute to Cæsar; and Paul appeal to his judgment-seat? Is Christ's vicar started above his Master? Peter's successor better than Paul himself? What an alteration did Josiah make in the face of the church, purging the idolaters, changing the office of the Levites, commanding a passover! Hilkiah was the high priest, and executed these things under him: but all was done according to the command of Josiah. Was Josiah such a king in Israel, and is not our king in England? What hath the Hilkiah of Rome to do here? So Constantine said to his bishops, You in the church are bishops, I in the church am king; you for the word and sacraments, I for authority and precedence; you overseers of the people, I the overseer of overseers. The one to preach the word, the other to bear the sword: as Paul calls the magistrate, the Lord's sword-bearer. He holds his prerogative given him from above. What one word of Christ's commission to his disciples, savours of encouragement to rebellious attempts? Go into the world, preach, baptize, bind and loose, remit and retain, feed, take the keys, receive the Holy Ghost. Go into the world, not overrun it, shaking the pillars of it with conspiracies, the foundations with seditions. Preach peace, not proclaim wars. Build up the kingdom of heaven, not thunder ruin to the kingdoms of earth. Baptize to repentance, not wash the people in their own bloods with persecution and vengeance. Bind and retain, not with shackles, prisons, and wards. Feed the lambs, not fleece them, nor slay them, making massacres of king and subjects. Take the keys, not princes' crowns. When he said, Ye shall be brought before governors and kings, he did not mean that governors and kings should be brought before you; that emperors should kiss your feet, wait at your gates, in weathers stormy enough, but not more stormy than the pontifical brows; that they should take their crowns (I say not at your hands, but) at your feet, holding your stirrups while you mount your palfreys, and eat bread like dogs under your tables. Christ refused to divide an inheritance, Luke xii. 14, yet these men will undertake to divide kingdoms. But there is a divider over them, that hath written in the book of his prescience, the final division of their universal supremacy. And as it is true of their persons, as Petrarch says, Short is the life of men, shorter that of kings, shortest that of pontiffs; so let the like breach fall upon their successions, till the seat of antichrist be razed to the ground.

3. Proud and ambitious self-admirers think themselves fitter to rule than obey; these despise government. Saul is chosen king, the most and best applauded the choice; yet some sons of Belial murmur against it, 1 Sam. x. 27. It was not the greatness of his parents, the goodness of his person, the selection of his lot, the approbation of Samuel, the sound proof of his courage, that could shield him from contempt, or win the hearts of all. They saw he chose not himself, they saw him unwilling to be chosen, they saw him worthy to be chosen; if the election had been carried by voices, and those voices by their eyes, Saul had been still the man: yet they despise him. His parentage was not inferior, his state equal, his person above his estate, his mind above his person; yet they despise him. But dogs will bark at the moon; and what all men commend, you have some Thyrists take delight to blast. Malcontents will devise slanders if they can find none, like coistrels, that first fill themselves with wind, and then fly against it. Their blood is of a yellowish colour, like those that have been bitten by vipers; their gall flows in them, thicker than oil in a poisoned stomach. But the best is, their own malice sucks up the greatest part of their venom, and therewith they burst themselves. There was never prince, to whom some Belialists took not some exceptions: it is not possible to please or displease all men; some being as deeply in love with vice, as others are with virtue. It were ill with princes, if their state depended on the good liking of their subjects. But there be none but base, that are thus censorious; and the sun will shine never the less glorious, though such sullen eyes scorn to look upon it.

4. Deniers of due homage are despisers; as, 1. Fear, Prov. xxiv. 21. Not slavish fear. It is one thing to fear because you have offended, another thing to fear lest you should offend; in the one case there is a dread of punishment, in the other an anxiety for the reward of obedience. So Ambrose. This fear is reverence. If any man fears not the king, the king hath cause to fear him. 2. Honour; not such as shall make a god of him, like Herod's flatterers, and their successors, the pope's sycophants; yet enough to advance him above all other men. 3. Fidelity, such as Ittai bare unto David, 2 Sam. xv. 21: that is an ill hand, that when a blow is coming, will not lift up itself to defend the head. The safety of the head, is the head of safety. The king is the light of our eyes, the breath of our nostrils, even the life of our lives: any man will hazard a joint to preserve his life. Subjects unfaithful at the heart, may be without suspicion of their prince, but they be held rebels in the court of heaven. We are bound to be subject, "not only for wrath, but for conscience' sake," Rom. xiii. 5. In all the time of David's prosperity, there was no news of Shimei; he looks like a fair subject. But he that smiled on David in his throne, curseth him in his flight: now his unsound and treacherous heart discovers itself, in a tongue full of venom, a hand full of stones. Prosperous success hides many a false heart, as a drift of snow covers a heap of dung; but when that white cover melts, the filthy rottenness will appear. There is no security in that subject's allegiance, that hath not God in his conscience. The nearer such are to the governor, the more perilous: and as no favourite of greatness can be without envy, (as in chess, the pawn that stands before the king is most set upon,) so the good one, like Joseph, so endears himself to the king of Egypt, that he may be gracious with the King of heaven; and the bad one, like Haman, makes use of his power to mischief; till by plotting against the church, he lose all comfort by the church. All this man's glory shows on him but as if the sun shone in a puddle. 4. Obedience, Josh. i. 17; to do what he commands, and go whither he sends. The servant that does not what he is bidden, despiseth his master. The law is a dumb magistrate, the king a living law: he that disobeys the one, despiseth the other. 5. Paying of tribute. "Render tribute," &c. Rom. xiii. 7. Render it; it is not a gift, but a payment. A man feeds the stomach, that it may nourish his whole body. Pay for the setting up of the state, lest there should happen the pulling down of it. He that feigneth himself poor to avoid a subsidy, is worthy to be made as poor as his subsidy; because he would not restore him a part, by whom he keeps all. 6. Prayer. Let prayers and supplications be made for all men, especially for kings, 1 Tim. ii. 1, 2. The heavier burden requires the more strength: Aaron and Hur must hold up the hands of Moses, if they would prosper. We have cause to desire that that river may never want water, which must relieve the whole country. No army but would have their general's good success. We call our peace, the king's peace: our peace is but the effect of his, as his majesty is a resultance from God's majesty.

What shall then become of them, that turn their prayers into curses? Exod. xxii. 23; though their wishes be but whirlwinds, which, breathed forth, return upon themselves. This was an unwilling error, that Paul willingly recanted, Acts xxiii. 5. "Curse not the king, no not in thy thought: for a bird of the air shall carry the voice, and that which hath wings shall tell the matter," Eccl. x. 20. With the mouth a wicked rebel dares not curse him, for fear of the lash; but thought is free: such is his thought, but not God's, to whom the conscience is a legible book. The birds of the air shall discover it; either by some miraculous demonstration, as just revealers; or by picking out his eyes, as just executioners: or that judgment shall be swift against them, as if it had wings. Shimei curseth his king, is pardoned by succession, by Solomon after his father: he hath now quite forgotten his sin. But at last it comes home, by his going abroad; and the tongue that cursed the Lord's anointed, now pays the head to boot. The vengeance of traitors may sleep, it cannot die. Saul had gotten victory of the Ammonites, which made him a complete king: and now the thankful Israelites inquire after the discontented mutineers, that refused allegiance to so worthy a commander, 1 Sam. xi. 12. Their sedition deserved death, however Saul had sped at Gilead: the very purposes of treason must not escape impune: that God, who hinders the action in his mercy, will punish the intention in his justice. But that happy conquest whetted them to a more eager desire of this just execution.

Certainly, of all nations in the world, we have cause to despise the despisers of our government. We that have a king, not more noble than wise, not more wise than good, how can we wish other than punishment to his contemners? We have the benefit of peace, dwelling safely under our own vines, 1 Kings iv. 25; the benefit of those riches which make a well-governed state glorious. What do we want to the consummation of our prosperity, but thankful hearts? For me to measure it, were to show you the image of a great mountain in a small ring. Religion, peace, honour, security; those four cardinal blessings to uphold a state, as the four cardinal virtues uphold a man. Now to disgrace authority, is the means to overthrow all felicity. Tribute is given to tyrants, commendation only to good princes. The justice of our governor hath not spared the greatest offenders; yet his mercy hath made us more indebted to him than his justice. May his mercy never hurt himself, we have no cause to complain. Even to his enemies he hath been pitiful, striving to overcome their malice by his goodness. Yet like those people, that in a daily ceremony go out of their doors with their faces unto the east, and curse the sun, which gives them light and preserving influence; so his adversaries, beside their cursed writings, base calumnies and blasphemies of his honour, have sought by treachery to stock up the root whereon themselves grow; sacrificing their sacraments, religion, prayer, and the holiest things they have, to execute Satan's will, and expiate antichrist's fury. They have turned massing into massacring, patres in patricidas, ghostly fathers into bloody murderers.

The huge and supereminent colossus of all, was the powder-treason; the utmost point of all villany; beyond which, it is an unknown land; no man can devise what should be between it and hell. The butchery over all France of above sixty thousand protestants, might be pictured in the pope's palace by the painter's art; but what colours could have expressed this confusion? As a learned divine hath amplified it: What stain could shadow the blood of so royal princes? What red describe the gore of so noble Christians? What black, the darkness of that day? What azure, the terribleness of that fire? What invention imitate the noise of that infernal blow, louder than many cannons; and the shrieks of so many innocents, with the misery of infants yet unborn? This was a death never to be painted to the life: nor pen, nor pencil, nor art, nor heart can comprehend it. What an infamy strikes upon our age, to bear the date of such impieties! To have it recorded to posterity, in such a time was such a treason! The earth shall not hide it from the heavens, nor the heavens abstract it from the earth; it shall be the detestable hatred of all generations to the end of the world.

Yet still hath the Lord protected our government, by preserving our governor, even against the malice of our enemies, and (which is worse) the wickedness of ourselves. Therefore let us praise God for our government, and we praise him for all: let us love and serve our governor, and we love and serve God who hath given us all. Let us serve him with our fields and vineyards for his maintenance, with our lives and strengths for his defence, especially with our prayers and supplications for his safety.

VERSE 10.

Presumptuous are they, self-willed, they are not afraid to speak evil of dignities.

PRESUMPTION is a deliberate and wilful sinning, against conscience, example, or warning. Deliberate, with premeditation; for every rash act or word is not presumption, Matt. xxvi. 74. Wilful; not when we are overborne by compulsory means, 2 Sam. xv. 11. Against conscience; not when our persuasion apprehends the thing (that is evil) for good, 1 Tim. i. 13. Against example, when men see others plagued for such offences, 2 Kings i. 12. Against warning, as Pharaoh after so many admonitions would not dismiss Israel. This is to presume. Some man sins, and thinks not of it; which is to stumble and fall on plain ground. Some man sins, and knows not of it; as he may have a mole on his back, and yet think his skin clear. Some man sins, and is forced to it; this is, as when he rows upward, and the stream carries him downward. Another sins, and is persuaded he does well; as children are sent abroad in such frosty mornings, as rather obstruct than purify: so the silly papist does his devotions before a crucifix; and too many rob the church to relieve the poor. There is a mischief done on set purpose: He that presumptuously slays his neighbour, thou shalt fetch him from mine altar that he may die, Exod. xxi. 14. Pluck him from the altar, his book shall not save him.

Presumption hath been no rare sin among men: the first stone of which demonstration, we lay in the tower of Babel; where mortal men, in the face of Heaven, dared to the combat Omnipotency itself. Multitudes and combination give encouragement to presumptuous attempts, and every one is proud to be forwardest; Come, let us build us a tower, whose top may reach unto heaven, Gen. xi. 4. They were but newly come down from the hill to the plain, and now in the plain they purpose to build up a hill. They were as near to heaven in the mountain of Armenia, as their tower could make them in the valley of Shinar; but, as if the benefit of nature were too contemptible, their ambition must have an artificial mountain of their own raising. Come, let us build: fondly reckoning without God; as if nothing could hinder what they intended to do; as if both time and earth had been theirs. Build a city: if they had taken God with them, this had been commendable; a city is the seat of order, and so could not displease the God of order. But a tower reachable to heaven! how sottish was this arrogance, how impious this presumption! who would think, that little ants creeping on this greater molehill, should think of climbing to heaven by multiplying of earth?

Korah conspires against meek Moses: he had seen others fearfully plagued for such rebellions; himself had particular warning to decline it; the people were charged to depart from their tents, Numb. xvi. 26: who would not hope, that those mutineers, seeing their adherents fly off, as from monsters, would now relent? Yea, when God proclaims a strange and immediate vengeance, howsoever before they set a face on the matter, one would think their hearts should now have misgiven them. Yet, as if Moses had never wrought miracle before them, as if no Israelite had perished for rebelling, they stand in their doors, impudently staring, as if they would outface the revenge of God. Here was high presumption. So doth pride and infidelity obdure and blind the heart, that those who are naturally cowards become unnatural rebels. So Pharaoh, being tired and undone with succession of judgments, at last lets Israel go. Gone they are, and Egypt seemed so glad to be rid of them, that they hired their departure. Yet no sooner were their backs turned to go, than Pharaoh's heart was turned to fetch them back again. It vexeth him to see so great a command, so much wealth, cast away in one night; and he will redeem it though with more plagues. There is no remedy, this presumption will not let him be in quiet; he must after them, to fetch his own destruction. Who would not have looked, that the hand of Benjamin should have been first upon Gibeah, and requited the morsels of the abused concubine, with the heads of the ravishers? yet, instead of pursuing the sin, they defend the sinners; and will rather perish in resisting, than live in doing justice, Judg. xx. 13. How horrible was this presumption, to defend a rape unto death, with arms unto blood! As if they were in love with villany, and out of charity with God, they are champions for Belial.

1. There be some that presume of safety in sin, not doubting to fare well, while they fear not to do ill: as if this world were to last ever, and the corn and tares were never to be parted; because the same ground feeds, and wind blows on them, for a time, Eccl. ix. 2. But, say they, God is merciful. He is infinitely merciful, but withal infinitely just. He is just even to those humble souls that shall be saved; and he will be merciful, while presumptuous sinners go to hell. It is to be feared, that many die with a fond presumption of mercy in their minds, as the Israelites with meat in their mouths. But Christ died for us, we put all on his reckoning. Answ. But they for whom he pays, will not presumptuously lavish on his score; not caring what they spend, because he is able to pay for all. His blood is a charter of pardon, but withal a covenant of direction: Crux Christi pendentis, cathedra magistri docentis, The cross of a Christ hanging there, is the chair of a master teaching there. He that refuseth to live as that covenant prescribes, he may perish as a malefactor, that is hanged with his pardon about his neck. But repentance makes all even, otherwise God is not so good as his word: At what time soever a sinner repents. This the common people make their neck-verse. Indeed there is that and many other gracious promises made to repentance; but in the whole book of God, which is now published complete, and promises no second edition, we find no infallible promise of repentance. He that hath this oil in his lamp, shall enter in with the Bridegroom; but he that forgets this oil, and can buy none, must be shut out. Joseph and Mary lost Christ not a full day before they missed him, yet were four days ere they could find him: some lose him forty or fifty years, yet when they are sick, hope to find him in half an hour.

2. There be some that attempt things without warrant, or expect things without promise; this is the common presumption of the world. And they that know they cannot live without feeding, nor change places without moving, yet will hope to be saved without practical obedience. Nor let us secure ourselves from this assault, for the devil hoped to have fastened it on our Saviour himself; persuading him to show a tumbling trick, for the winning of faith and credit, Matt. iv. 6. As if he had said, Here thou art in a famous city, on a glorious temple, upon an eminent pinnacle; all men's eyes are fixed on thee; there can be no readier way to spread thy glory, and proclaim thy Deity, than by this precipitation. All the world shall see and say, there is more in thee than a man: and for danger, there can be none; what can hurt the Son of God? have not the angels charge by Divine commission, to guard thee? Christ scorns to gratify him in this; but beats him with his own weapon, snatched out of his abusive hands; "It is written, Thou shalt not tempt the Lord." True, God hath taken this care, and given this charge; he will have his children kept, but not in their sins: they may trust in him, they may not tempt him: he meant to encourage their faith, not to imbolden their presumption. When there be mediate means, to cast ourselves upon an immediate Providence, is not faith, but audacious disobedience.

We have some that be called The wits; they disdain to hear a sermon, unless the preacher can teach them some abstruse learning; as if they were only to be made philosophers, not Christians. It is a wonder if they ever come to the Lord's supper, because they see no more dainties but bread and wine. Sure, if they had known of it, they would not have been baptized in the church, because they had water enough at home. Presumptuous men, are they wiser than God? Faith comes by hearing, and salvation by faith, Rom. x. 9, 17: these be the stairs for them to climb heaven, or all their wit shall never bring them thither. They know a shorter cut, have found out a new way in their wisdom; but God keep us from that wisdom. Some vulgar, not out of an opinion of their own knowledge and sufficiency, but for mere tardity and averseness from the labours of religion, make their chamber or the field their church; because the preacher can say but this, Repent, and believe; and this they do, therefore hope to be saved as well as the best. Senseless presumption! as if they hoped to keep, what they willingly cast away: as if the soul which hath been so many years gathering rust, should be found bright when death draws it out of the scabbard; or that land could bear wheat, which was never tilled. Nay, but hear, read, pray, meditate; and that with frequency, with fervency: presume not to be good by any other way than God hath promised to make thee good; lest thy soul going out of thy body, find, with wonder and amazement, how it was mistaken in the body. We may challenge God on his promise, we may not strain him beyond it: presumption is the enemy of faith.

3. There be some that take their salvation without all question, and are so sure of heaven that they never doubt the contrary; and this is presumption. Every good grace hath its counterfeit: if in the faithful there be a modest but infallible assurance of their blessedness in Christ, the carnal will be blown up with an impudent arrogance, as if their footing was as sure in heaven as any man's. Which way went the Spirit of God from me to thee? said a false prophet to a true, and smote him withal, 2 Chron. xviii. 23. Which way? Even by that injurious blow, by that proud speech, it departed, if it had been there before. "God, I thank thee, that I am not as other men," Luke xviii. 11: as if there were no question, but the Pharisee was one of God's special favourites. Will he accept of heaven without entreaty, trow we? or change places with any saint there without boot?

That we may not be cozened with this imposture, observe some differences betwixt presumption and assurance. First, presumption is natural, this assurance is supernatural: we were born with that, we are new-born to this: that was the legacy of Adam, this of Christ. Secondly, presumption submits not itself to ordinary means, assurance refuseth no means of being made better. Thirdly, presumption is without all doubting, assurance feels many perplexities: he that doubts not of his estate, his estate is much to be doubted of. Fourthly, presumption is joined with looseness of life, persuasion, with a tender conscience: that dares sin because it is sure, this dares not, for fear of losing assurance: that makes no more of sinning, but at once gets a pardon for the old and a licence for the new; this is like some sovereign waters, which not only cleanses the ulcer, but cools the heat, stays the infection, and by degrees heals it. Persuasion will not sin, because it cost her Saviour so dear; presumption will sin, because grace doth abound. The one turns grace into wantonness, the other turns from wantonness to grace. Humility is the way to heaven. The publican went away rather justified: while he durst not open his eyes to look up unto heaven, he opened the eyes of Heaven to look down upon him. They that are proudly secure of their going to heaven, do not so often come thither, as they that are afraid of their going to hell.

Let us come to particulars, that pointing the finger, we may say, This is a presumptuous man. Nathan's parable made David sensible of the sin, but he found not the sinner in his own bosom, without a "Thou art the man." Presumption hath neither the fear of the Lord, nor a regard for the world; it fears nor God nor man, Luke xviii. 2; and is here fitly ranked with despising of government. If Samson break the city gates, what withs can hold him? Those whom conscience cannot bind, man's law will hardly hamper. God knows how, when, and where to revenge his own cause; but man, whose eyes be limited, must be informed of offences, before he can find matter for justice: therefore preachers are not only to teach men obedience to God, to save their souls, but also to governors, to save their bodies and estates. I will therefore, for a taste, single out some instances of presumption.

1. Incurable beggars, such as make themselves a non obstante, and, in spite of all laws, will not be confined to any regular course. Presumptuous wretches, that have set themselves both without the covenant of God and the government of man. Silly officers are afraid to meddle with them, because they are poor; but they be deceived, for these be not the poor, but the worst robbers of the poor that be; we may rank them with usurers, enclosers, engrossers, and oppressing landlords. This is the reason that the poor indeed do want it, because these counterfeits snatch it; men that labour hard, often lack bread for their families, whilst these that refuse all work, are full. I speak not against the poor, but for the poor; not to harden your hearts, but to rectify your hands: give, and be blessed for it, but not to maintain impiety, and dishonour to your country; give to the poor, not to them that rob the poor. Let me dissect this carcass of presumption.

(1.) There is no likelihood that many of them were ever christened; if they were, scarce any of them ever come to know what Christianity means. The church and they are everlasting strangers; nearer than to the doors, at some dole or funeral, you shall not have them. They name not Christ, but when they beg of you, and know it not for any other purpose. They can marry without a priest, and divorce themselves without a canonist. There need no ecclesiastical censures, they excommunicate themselves from all churches. No minister hath the charge of their souls, for they are of no parish: all the articles of their faith be the terms of their canting language. Thus they live without Christ in this world, and, without him, perish in the world to come.

(2.) Vagrants they are, and will so remain; it is a death to them to be confined to any set dwelling: ask them where they dwell; alas, they say, they have small dwelling; yet they have the largest dwelling of all, for they dwell every where: to keep one town, is their bondage; their liberty, to roam abroad: worse than the harlot, she cannot abide long in her own house, Prov. vii. 11, they can abide long in no house. Birds fly abroad all day, but so that they may come to their own nests at night; the horse knows his own stable, dogs their own kennel: these beasts only take up the next barn: no men could make a truer description of the kingdom, were they learned, for they have travelled it over and over.

(4.) All their end of this idle life, is but because they find profit and sweetness in it; therefore they wander, because they would not work. He that before he gives them relief, sets them to labour, shall never after find them at his door. Now considering God's law, that every man should eat his own bread, and that our indulgence is the nurse of their idleness, who get more by lying still in a corner than an honest poor man doth by his labour, we make their sin our sin in maintaining them. Alms are good, but they must not be given to the dishonour of Christ; he commends to us the maimed, the lame, the blind, Luke xiv. 13, the aged and impotent, the widow and fatherless; to relieve these shall make us blessed. But they that look for a reward for maintaining the dissolute, shall be answered with, Who required this at your hands? Where find they more cherishing than in popish houses? Not to merit of God, as they teach, and we might suppose; but to make them their own against a day of rebellion, when they should use them. But as a finger being cut off from the hand is of no use, so no possible good can come to the common body by them. They laugh at others, who take great pains to leave their children small portions; whereas these leave theirs all the world to rogue in, and all the people for their fathers.

(5.) The curse of God is visibly upon them, whereby they are given over to all licentiousness. To thievery: they come to pilfer, not to beg; and only then beg, when they cannot pilfer. To horrible uncleanness: they have not peculiar wives, nor range themselves into families. To be a vagabond was Cain's plague, Gen. iv. 12, and is in its own nature a curse; yet these turn it into a blessing. "Let his children be vagabonds, and beg; let them seek bread out of their desolate places," Psal. cix. 10. In this curse they bring up their children. This is such a straggling presumption, as will not be confined but in hell. They delight to go ragged and naked, not so much in a voluntary penance, as to move compassion. But turn your charity from these, and seek out God's poor, not the devil's; impotent poor, not impudent poor; and rather give to those that work and beg not, than to those that beg and work not.

2. Popish emissaries, the intelligencers of Rome, and the factors of antichrist; that know themselves sent on the errand of hell, designed to treacheries, set in the vanguard of conspiracy, like lost men in the forlorn hope; what are these but presumptuous sinners? I deny not other attractives and inducements; but they are all the handmaids to presumption. Whether it be the opulency of our land, or the beauty of our women, or the malice they bear our nation, or the foolish affectation of martyrdom, and to be registered in the Roman rubric: it is not unlikely, they are tickled with that advantage, which the friar told his novice their priests had over their laity, to this effect: We keep their counsels, they keep none of ours; we have part of their lands, they have none of ours; we have charity towards their wives, they toward none of ours; they bring up our children, we bring up none of theirs. It is reported to be the saying of a great marquis, that he had in his country three monasteries, which were three miracles: one of the Dominicans, which had abundance of corn, and no lands; another of the Franciscans, who were full of money, and received no rents; a third of St. Thomas, whose monks had many children, and no wives. But what temptation soever brings them, treason cannot be without presumption. Their supreme head sends them like base members on such desperate services; and they must obey him, whatsoever Christ says. If he bid them seal their treason with a sacrament, they must eat their God upon a bargain of blood. St. Peter says, "Fear God, honour the king," 1 Pet. ii. 17; his usurping successor says, Fear God, kill the king. All their labour must be spent, to make Christ's coat fit to their body politic. Their vows may seem heavenly, but their employment is earthly: in meddling with the business both of church and state, they mingle together heaven and earth.

What, doth their conscience warrant them, upon opinion of merit? Can this bear them out to be false keys to open the cabinets of princes, and pry into their counsels? Did ever man hope to deserve thanks of God, by doing that which he knows will offend him? They see laws made against their pernicious attempts, and that justly; for there is no law made against the papists, but some notorious treason went before, to cause such a law. They that venture their bodies and souls in so rotten a vessel of piracy, are they not presumptuous? He that runs on high battlements, gallops down steep hills, rides over narrow bridges, walks on weak ice; and never thinks, What if I fall? but, What if I pass over and fall not? is he not presumptuous? They see before their eyes such designs continually cursed of God and plagued of men; yet what say they of the powder-traitors? Alas, unfortunate gentlemen; it seems they blame the ill fortune, not the ill attempt: had it succeeded, it had been commended. Yet they will on: what can discourage senseless presumption? show him the way where any foot hath trod, he dares follow, though he knows none ever returned. What if a thousand have miscarried, yet why may he not escape?

Thus presumptuous are they in their deeds, but how desperate in their writings! They mingle them with heresies, as Hannibal, to entrap his enemies, mixed their wine with mandrakes, whose operation is betwixt sleep and poison. (Averroes.) Or as Avicen was made away, by anointing the book with poison which he was to read. (Greg.) If they wrote nothing but lies, all would reject them; if nothing but truth, they could not deceive us. All their blasphemies and falsehoods are in the vulgar tongue, like Rabshakeh's, 2 Kings xviii. 26; but the gospel of salvation they lock up safe enough from the people. Let the best learned use their writings, as Christ did his potion of gall; he tasted and refused. Gentle writings are not so dangerous, for they be but dead errors; and a living cur will do more harm than a dead lion. What trust should be given to those men, that will presume to cast away themselves, to do us a mischief?

3. Duellists or single combatants; that more fear to have the world call them cowards for refusing, than God to judge them rebels for undertaking; blanch it with what terms of honour they please, the court of heaven will censure it presumption. Where did God ever bid a man hazard his life for his name? What seconds soever he gets, Christ will not be that man's second. Where is no commandment, no promise, what can justify that act from presumption? This is to cast a man's self out of his Maker's protection: he takes charge of us but when we are in our ways, in his ways. This is none of God's ways, therefore should be none of ours. The doctrine of Christ doth most strictly forbid it, and why should not Christ be heard of Christians? Thou shalt not revenge thyself. Thou shalt do no murder. Did he die for us, and shall we not hear him speak? Men may be overcome if they fight, they shall overcome if they fight not. How many souls had escaped going all gore-blood to their judgment, if Christ might have been heard!

But they say, We fight not so much against an enemy, as our own ignominy; the world will baffle us. Ans. What world is that, whose censure or baffling we fear? That, which God says shall not be saved? That, whereof the devil is prince? That, which reproached and condemned Jesus Christ? That, which always hated and persecuted the good? Are we in amity with that, which is at enmity with God? Do we call Christ our Captain, and march under the colours of this world? Have we not in baptism forsworn it? Shall we care more to discontent the world, than to wrong our Maker? What then is the ground of it? Mere opinion, and that of men more gallant than wise, that have more heart than brain: Facile redimunt qui sanguine famam, says Martial; i. e. that spend their cheap blood to recover that which wise men never lost, reputation. They have lost some credit in opinion, and send their souls after in earnest; as the child throws away his bread, because one hath snatched away his apple. Wine and choler beget a brawl, death and confusion must nurse it. They little think what ransom Christ paid for that soul, which (without his call) they let forth at a bloody window.

Oh that something would make the sons of men be wise, to think how poor a recompence the fame of a brave combat is for everlasting torment! Whether they thus die or kill, they have committed murder: if they kill, they have murdered another; if they die, they have murdered themselves. Surviving, there is the plague of conscience; dying, there is the plague of torments. If they both escape, yet it is homicide that they meant to kill. Whatsoever be the success, there is presumption in the offence. If men knew how sweet was heaven, and how intolerable hell, they would be more obedient upon earth. But what have divines to do with the matters of soldiers? Their profession is peace. True, but we speak from him, that is not only the Prince of peace, but also the Lord of hosts. He is the God of peace to them that seek peace; but upon them that follow courses of revenge, he will revenge too. They fight one against another, God will fight against them both. Who is the valiant man? he that dares draw his sword against the command of his Maker? he of whom his own passion makes a poor slave? No; but he that can pardon an injury, do good to an enemy, despise the world, obey the Lord; he that can master himself, and loves God's honour, not his own humour.

4. I could single out many others, that will attempt hard matters because they be great and rare, that love ventures of more hazard than use. You have heard of some that undertake a long journey by sea in a wherry; as the desperate mariner hoisteth sail in a storm, and says, none of his ancestors were drowned. Some, that rush fearlessly into infected houses, and say the plague never seizeth on valiant blood, it kills none but cowards. Some, that languishing of sickness, will drink away their diseases; and so make haste to despatch both body and soul at once. Some, that run headlong into danger, and fear not; saying, it comes with a fear. Some, that without asking leave of God, count upon trade, and gain, and purchasing, and leaving great estates, Jam. iv. 13; not measuring their intendments by their powers, but wills. If all fall right, they thank themselves; if otherwise, they do not blame themselves. No man promises himself more, nor distrusts himself less, than the presumptuous. Some, that have distilled away their estates in alembics, projecting for the philosopher's stone; presuming they shall have that which may do all the world good; and promising their friends beforehand gold in whole scuttles: but at last his glass breaks, and himself with it. Some, that presume to foretell the changes of states, the event of all the great undertakings of princes, the fortunes of war, what weather we shall have all the year; what merchandise will be dear, what cheap; (and yet for all this knowledge, themselves miserable beggars;) so familiarly, as if God had written all these things as plain in the stars, as he did the ten commandments on the two tables.

Some, that can tell the secrets of kings, the mysteries of state, and yet never were of the privy-council. Yea, some will be no strangers to the records of heaven; as if that great Master of the Rolls had given them his keys, to turn over his books and copy them out at their pleasures. This is a drunken presumption of our times. They are not few that say in their hearts, We will sin, and repent, and be forgiven: if we do well, God is just to reward us; if ill, he is merciful to pardon us. Thus it is a question, whether God be more wronged by their sins, or by their praises; whatsoever they undertake, they presume God will defend them. But while we want his word, in vain we look for his aid. In our safest and most honest courses, we need his providence; but to run into confessed dangers, without our Keeper, is sottish presumption. What God enjoins, that he undertakes, that he maintains: why should we expect him a guide in our own errors? These be the worst self-flatterers, self-deceivers, that suggest to their own hearts the false hope of Never too late: as if they could make time stand still, who waits not the leisure of princes; or command repentance, which knows no sovereign but the King of heaven, and goes not at the bidding of an angel.

How desperately presumptuous are they, that dare defer the procurement of mercy and forgiveness, till the extremest pinch, as it were betwixt the bridge and the brook! How deplorable is the false confidence of the world, when to make their reckoning at the last day, is the last and least thing that they make reckoning of! That which should be the whole business of our life, these hope to despatch in half an hour. Nothing is so easy with them, nothing so difficult with all others. To reconcile God, and make him their friend in a moment, whom they have provoked, and kept their enemy so many years, this is that which nothing but presumption durst ever yet undertake. I have heard of castles built in an instant, by enchantment; I never believed it: such castles of vain hope do these men build in the air of their own empty imaginations.

Dehortations. 1. It is a sin to which we are naturally prone; therefore the more dangerous. The house of Rimmon was Naaman's fear; Lord, keep me there. Soon is a man invited to make much of himself, hardly to his own affliction. Despair is a thing grievous to trembling nature; not often doth that archer of hell head his arrows with such displeasing assaults. Besides, this hath often turned to a hearty conversion; like a violent fever, that hath boiled up all the choler and corruption of sin, so that a man becomes the better after it. But to presume, this is sweet to flesh and blood: Ye shall be as gods, foiled innocence itself. They that undertook to build Babel, did it to get them a name; not affecting the neighbourhood of heaven, but to be famous on earth: their aim was not commodity, or safety, but glory. Satan hath not a more tried shaft in all his quiver, than to persuade men to bear themselves boldly upon the favour of God. Thou art elected, redeemed, assured; what needest thou be so strict in thy courses? Be not such an adversary to thy own liberty: thou mayst sin, and be safe. As if the grace that saves us, and the obligation of duty that binds us, were not several parts of the same covenant. Therefore as the wise man eats moderately of the dish which he best likes, because he knows there is more danger of surfeit in that than in all the rest; so let us be most shy and heedful of that sin, which we know will soonest take us, and take God from us. We are all readier to laugh with the merry philosopher, than to weep with the mourner. Pleasure never knocks twice at our door without entrance; sorrow shall not in, so long as we can keep it out. We have ten fingers, and but two eyes: our conversation admits ten sins, before our contrition lets fall two tears. Open but the door, presumption (like a bold guest) comes in of itself. Repentance, like a modest virgin, sits weeping in the streets for want of harbour; no bosom hath lodging for such a guest. Only when we feel ourselves sick, we send for her as a physician, to heal the wounds that pleasure hath made. But rather of the two, let pleasure be shut out of doors, and repentance be laid between our breasts.

2. God especially opposeth this sin, because this sin especially opposeth him: it calls the Almighty forces against it, because it bends all its forces against the Almighty. Diffidence distrusts him, carelessness forgets him, unbelief denies him, ignorance does not know him, infirmity does not see him, wantonness passes by him; but presumption resists him. Herod is blown up into a god: he did but take that title, he did not make that title; yet because he did not repel the applause of a god, the worms declare him a miserable man. There be sins that hurt only ourselves, sins that hurt also our neighbours; but this, as if it had the Syrians' charge, 1 Kings xxii. 31, lets drive at none but the King of all the world. Pride ever looks at the highest; the first man would know as God, the offspring of the new world would dwell as God: presumption regards no limits. What harm could be in laying one brick upon another; in building a city for society, a tower for safety? God had not indignation at the matter, but the manner; not that such things were undertaken, but proudly undertaken. "The soul that doeth ought presumptuously, shall be cut off," Numb. xv. 30. This is the kindness that presumption doth a man; it will never leave him till it hath wrought out his final ruin. Though Pharaoh's back were sore with stripes, yet he must still presume; he cannot be quiet without his full vengeance: as filching leaves not the pilferer with raw sides, but brings him to a broken neck. Haman can be content with no advancement, till he be lifted up fifty cubits, to his own gallows. Korah will not disgorge his haughty rebellion, till the earth hath swallowed him up quick. That rich man reckoned up a large bill of particulars, great barns, much goods, many years; but the sum was short, one night, Luke xii. 18—20. He that reckons without God, shall be sure to reckon twice.

3. It is a foolish sin. Balaam knew that he could not earn Balak's gold; yet his fingers itched, and he will go, if it be but to look upon it: so presumptuous is avarice, and presumption so foolish! Korah knew by exemplary proof, that there was no contesting with Moses, yet his proud heart will venture: so presumptuous is pride, and presumption so foolish! Aaron and Miriam knew themselves short of Moses in honour, yet by emulating him they would provoke God: so presumptuous is envy, and presumption so foolish! Those antique builders purpose a tower to reach heaven, and what if the height had answered their desire? some hills had been as high as their hopes, which yet are no whit the better. The nearer heaven, the more subject to the violences of heaven; Propius ad Jovem, propius ad fulmen, The nearer to Jupiter, the nearer to the thunder. Politic wickedness would keep out of God's fingers; it is blockish impudence that runs upon his pikes. Yet these aspirers dare venture it: so presumptuous is vain-glory, and presumption so foolish! How far will men presume in the world to get them a name; and how ridiculous that name proves when it is gotten! Diana's temple was one of the wonders of the world: one, to get him a name, builds it; another, to get him a name, burns it. Thus Athiophel hath a name, Judas hath a name, Beelzebub hath a name, the powder-traitors have got them a name, but they are famous for infamy. It were some happiness for such names if they might die, for they will stink while they live. How much better is it to do good works! this shall make our names good and honourable on earth. To believe and obey: this shall testify our names written in heaven.

Presumption is a firework made up of pride and fool-hardiness; it mounts into the air with a hissing noise, and the matter being spent, the fool's fire dies; it comes down again with a stink. It is a compound of easy credulity, apt to believe impossibilities; and of headlong temerity, apt to attempt unconcerning hazards; and of blind folly, not foreseeing the miserable events. Rash in undertaking, artless in proceeding, desperate in the ending. It is indeed like a heavy house built upon slender crutches: like dust which men throw against the wind, it flies back in their own face, and makes them blind. Wise men presume nothing, but hope the best; but presumption is hope out of her wits. The presumptuous man begins with rashness, and ends with shame; like one that gets up without a bridle, and comes down without a stirrup. It delights to sit on the top of a mast, where falling asleep, the downfall is confusion. As some wild boy, that hath gotten a horse wilder than himself, with much ado backs him, sits him in fear, and comes down with a mischief. He will sail upon that shelf, where his eyes have seen another ship perish. By arrogating the greatness which he hath not, he loseth the goodness which he had. He will offer to teach them, whose office is to teach him; and when himself is wounded, he will dress his surgeon. He looks for reverence from his betters; and that when he speaks, three women should hold their peace; and they, for noise, are sufficient to make a market.

His feet carry his heart, and his tongue carries his feet, and both leave out the head in their project. He does not care to do good, but he glories in having rule; he presumes himself to be better than others, because he sees himself higher than others. So Innocent. He forgets those to-day, to whom he was yesterday beholden. He comes to council uncalled, gives his opinion unasked. If the prince motion, who shall do such business, the devil could not answer more roundly, I am ready, I Kings xxii. 21. He censures that man ignorant; and calls him (though it be his own name) audacious, that undertakes a business without his direction. If his advice be not consulted, the design is given for lost. He is the worst Jesuit's client in the world, for he will never be brought to confession. Yet pardon the silence of his tongue, for his life speaks him. When he offers to shoot, he calls for no bow but Robin Hood's.

This is that sin which, as Cassian says, æquare angelum Deo, hominem angelo; i. e. would have deified angels, and angelized men. He makes laws when he should learn them, and vents philosophy ere he have read his grammar. He imagines to outmount eagles with the wings of a bustard, and will not tarry till he be fledged. He will be a challenger at the Olympics; and there he leaves his carcass and a base report behind. Xerxes threatens to proclaim war against Greece; one of his presumptuous familiars answers, that they would never tarry the message, but he should find empty walls when he came. Another, that they wanted sea-room for his ships, and land-room for his soldiers. Another, that his soldiers there would grow pursy and resty for want of exercise. But Damaxatus bade him not presume; Multitudo quæ tibi placet, tibi metuenda est; i. e. Thy army is too huge to manage: so accordingly he retired with dishonour and loss. (Valerius Maxim.) How did the very heathen explode this vice in their proverbial speeches! to this effect, Either less mind, or more power. Either add to your power, or subtract from your words. Speak not great things. (Plutarch.)

Presumption is a mischief made up of many ingredients, to which every vice contributes something, as the gods did to Vulcan toward the making of his Pandora. As many vices challenge part of her, as cities did of Homer. Ignorance says, She is mine. Pride says, She is mine. Temerity says, She is mine. Vain-glory says, She is mine. Cowardice says, She is mine. Impudence says, She is mine. Profuseness says, She is mine. Either presumption is beholden to all these vices, or all these vices are beholden to presumption. And yet, there is one above all, that hath more right to her than all. The devil says, She is mine; and there we leave her.

"Self-willed." The natural and unsanctified will of man is hard to tame; worse than the "wild ass, that snuffs up the wind at her pleasure; they that seek her will not weary themselves; in her month they shall find her," Jer. ii. 24. There is one month in the year to take her, but what season can rectify this? Other creatures God hath left to be tamed by man, but man he hath reserved to be tamed by himself. No prince can tame the will: he may load the body with irons, vex the sense with pains, yea, surcharge the affections with sorrows; yet still a man's will is his own: in his will he is a king, even while his body is below a slave. No bonds of law can hold this Samson: an orator here is more potent than an emperor. Temptation, like an unhappy bride, may corrupt the will; when power may command, and go without. Valentior fortuna est voluntas, says Seneca; i. e. The will can make a man's life happy or wretched, when fortune cannot do it. It is the desire of our will only, that makes us miserable, and so much the more miserable, by having that desire satisfied. The self-willed man needs no greater enemy than he is to himself. Suis ipse viribus ruit. It sets itself agoing; and when it is once on the wheels, it runs faster than Satan himself can drive it.

Stubborn, obstinate, such as will break before they bow; perverse, curst-hearted, that will do evil though they be sure to come by the worst. An inflexible heart, that disdains comparison for hardness with the nether millstone. A delight in evil, because it is evil; an habituating of errors into manners; a turning of infirmity into necessity, by a desperate custom. Hugo speaks of some that are not better by correction, some that are worse with admonition, some that promise amendment and never mean it; as if they could flatter and delude God himself.

It is distinguished from the former thus: Presumption was never before cast down; therefore bears up itself proudly, and goes on to do evil. But this is a sin that hath been formerly corrected; broken before, yet proceeds in wickedness. That was wholly presumption; this hath not a little of desperation. When a man hath made such a progress in sin, that he hopes for no pardon, he cares not what mischief he doth. As a desperate malefactor, that fears not to multiply villanous acts, because he knows he shall be hanged whensoever he is taken.

The chief cause of this sin lies in the will of man. As in the actions of God, the true cause is to be sought for in himself; and of the works of Satan, the cause is in Satan; so man's will is the cause of man's wilfulness. No man denies but God hath a suffering, forsaking, disposing hand in it, Psal. lxxxi. 12; Acts xiv. 16; but it is called a self-will, because it comes immediately from a man's self, regards to please nothing but himself, and fights against that which opposeth himself. It contradicts the will of God, with a Let my will be done. The fountain of all perverse actions is man's unholy will. This is the efficient cause of evils: but what makes the will so perverse? what is the efficient cause of that? The will forsakes the Creator, and adheres to the creature, and so becomes evil. And, as Augustine says, not so much because that is evil to which it turns itself, but because the very turning itself is depraved and perverse. Now when God lets go the will, Satan catcheth it; and then we can hardly be rid of him, who is both willing to stay, and whom we are not unwilling to keep.

But hath not every man a will to be saved? Yes, a confused and inconstant will, in general: there are none but wish well to themselves; and they that live like the children of hell, would have heaven when they die. But they do not will such a course of life as may bring them to blessedness, but rather the swing of their own lusts; therefore when they would be good they cannot. When it wishes it cannot, because when it could it would not; therefore through its will to evil it lost also the power for good. So Augustine. This is a will that addicteth itself to sin, holds it with all the powers; that does mischief with such a mind as is ready either to destroy or to perish; which would have God either not to know sins, or not to be able to avenge them, as Bernard expresses it. It would have him either unable, or unwise, or unjust, and indeed no God at all. Rather than he will leave his sensual pleasure, he could wish the justice, and wisdom, and power of God to perish. So much of devil is in this will, that it would ruin the infinite Maker.

This sin will appear in the full malignity of it, by the remonstrance of some instances. I will, for a taste, cull out seven.

1. The malicious and spiteful. Observe this in Korah and his confederates against Moses and Aaron: "Ye take too much upon you, seeing all the congregation are holy: wherefore do ye lift up yourselves?" Numb. xvi. 3. Every word is a lie. All Israel holy! In so much infidelity, idolatry, mutiny, disobedience, what holiness was there? If this were sanctity, what do you call impiety? They had scarce wiped their mouths, or washed their hands, since their last rebellion; yet these pickthanks say, all Israel is holy. And for Moses, he dejected himself; it was God that lifted him up: he was as far from ambition, as they were from sanctification and humility. He sends for them, they come not, and their message is worse than their absence. "Is it a small thing that thou hast brought us up out of a land that floweth with milk and honey, to kill us in the wilderness, except thou make thyself a prince over us?" ver. 13. Egypt shall be commended, rather than Moses shall want reproach. Injustice, cruelty, treachery, usurpation, are objected to him, that knew none of these by himself. He did not take an ass from them; was this injustice? He prayed for them while they rebelled against him; was this cruelty? Of slaves he made them free; was this treachery? God himself immediately made him their prince; was this usurpation? Moses could not be faulted, but they were self-willed. Innocence is no shelter against evil tongues: malice never regards how true any accusation is, but how spiteful. Have we none that follow this pattern? none that with venomous teeth break the bag of poison which they bear in their mouths, till it run out in scandals? If the matter were true, yet such a report is uncharitable; being not true, it is blasphemous. Little do they meditate of that quenchless fire, which must burn that tongue that knows no other language. "Thou shalt not curse the deaf, not put a stumbling-block before the blind," Lev. xix. 14. While a man cozens the ignorant, he stumbles the blind; and he that slanders the absent, curseth the deaf: there is little hope of mercy for either. This can be no other than a self-willed vice.

2. They that despair of proffered grace, and with both hands put back the goodness of God, are wilful sinners. Repentance is set before us, like a Simon of Cyrene, to ease our burdens: desperation, like an Egyptian, doth aggravate our labours. When we are plunged into the inundation of sin, hope would hold us up by the chin, despair would sink us to the bottom: he that rejects his upholder, and admits his overwheeler, is he not wilful? Hope makes a gracious concession, Repent and be saved. Despair returns a wilful answer; No, I cannot repent, I may not be saved. O miserable Judas, whom, as Leo expresses, repentance did not lead back to God, but despair drew on to the halter.

It is wicked enough to presume upon sin by the example of others; sanctified humility argues against it. Because David fell into adultery and was forgiven, therefore may I commit the same sin on hope of the same success? Pious fear concludes, He was plagued, though he was pardoned: if I sin by his precedent, I may well be plagued with him, not pardoned with him. The unthrift left his father's house, yet at last returned, and was received: but if I wilfully forsake God, it is doubtful whether I shall ever return; and if I would, whether I be ever received. Peter denied Christ, and it cost him many bitter tears; but should I deny him, what rivers were able to wash me clean? To presume, is bad; but being fallen, to despair of rising again, is worse. Others have been recovered, why not I? Is not Christ the same? It comforts a diseased man, to know that his physician hath cured others more dangerously sick of the same disease. How should it comfort us, to remember that God hath forgiven sinners as grievous! It has been said, the misery of the whole world is not so great, as is the mercy of God alone. His bounty is not shut, but our hand of faith is not open. Therefore men are not cured, as one expresses it, not because God is not merciful nor skilful, but because the patient is wilful. As therefore it is a good rule in all our undertakings, nec temere nec timide; i. e. to be neither too bold nor too cold: not too backward, like those timorous Israelites, There be the sons of Anak, Deut. i. 28; nor too forward, like those over-venturous Israelites, that went against their enemies, without asking leave, ver. 43. So in all our fallings, not to weigh our errors in the balance of contempt, lest they appear too small, and not worth our sorrow; nor yet in the balance of despair, lest they seem too great, and beyond pardon. But let us sorrow in hope, and hope in sorrow, and we shall find mercy in both.

3. Contemners of the word. "I have written to him the great things of my law, but they were counted as a strange thing," Hos. viii. 12. They were not strange or hard to be understood, but men were wilful, and would not understand them. Preaching, of all professions, hath the least hope to prevail, for it deals with the will of man. The lawyer hath only to do with reason, convincing by arguments; the physician only works upon the body, by proper medicines; the tradesman goes no further than the eye, the musician takes the ear: there is no difficulty in prevailing with any of these, because there is in them a natural propensity to receive that is good. Sound reason, fit medicine, fair metals, sweet music, every man likes. But divinity deals with the will; and that such a will, as hath naturally no disposition to goodness, yea, an opposition against it; an averseness, a perverseness in evil: yet to work this will to goodness, is her office. This is a hard task, for men are self-willed; stubborn fishes, which when we seek to catch, they catch us.

The spider was weaving a curious net to catch the swallow: she comes, and bears away net and web and weaver too. We may as well command the east wind to blow west, as convert the will from her natural course. In the law of jealousies, if the woman were guilty, that drank of the bitter waters, she would presently swell, Num. v. 27; if otherwise, she was well enough. So guilty sinners, after a draught of these bitter waters, reprehensions, will swell against the priest; innocent souls are cheered and cleared by it. The divine eloquence of Paul could not escape this affronting; Demetrius and the craftsmen made a faction against him, Acts xix. 24. Craftsmen indeed, and so most citizens may be called craftsmen; too crafty for the poor minister, if he speak against their great goddess Diana, sacrilege. What, attempt to convert men from covetousness? Persuade the will to be just, and charitable? Nay, rather perish religion, fall churches, be dumb all devotion, be forfeited all the treasures and conduits of grace, to the uttermost work of salvation, and loss of heaven to boot: men will have their wills. Against these refractory wills hath the Lord set us to fight: we are warriors, but to bear a rich conquest of wills on the point of our spears to heaven. The falcon soaring in the air, and spying her game below, strikes wing, and comes down with such a force, that the air suffers violence: the nearer she comes, the swifter she flies, and makes her point bravely when she stoops. Preachers are your servants, to halloo the game to you, the humble service of Christ, and subduing your wills to his: fly to it, follow it close; so you shall fly well, stoop well, stop well, live well, and die well, and make a blessed point.

4. Blasphemers. No excuse shall acquit common swearers from being wilful sinners. Custom says much for it, and yet that much is nothing. Children have the wit to swear rashly, before they have the discretion to speak distinctly. Oaths in young men are but the effects of hot blood, and arguments of a brave resolution. Old men swear in choler, to maintain their reputation: what they utter above belief, they borrow an oath to make credible. It is the common opinion, he that will not swear, hath not the credit of a man, especially not the spirit of a gentleman; but I am sure, he that doth, hath not the spirit of a Christian. It is held a cold and dead narration, that is not interlaced with some blasphemous mention of our Maker and Saviour. If his life, heart, and blood be not taken to grace it, there is no blood, heart, or life in it.

Is not this wilful? What gain, what delight, what advancement doth it bring us? Yet these be the common incitements of sin. Covetousness gets money, pride bravery, lust sensual pleasure; swearing brings nothing but horror and distraction. If it could procure credit to our relations, must our honour's foundation needs be laid in the dishonour of God? Did the Lord Jesus suffer such variety of pains, to minister unto men variety of oaths, or to satisfy for the variety of sins? How should they have part of that merit, which in every part they have so abused? Oh that that name, which is reverend to angels, and terrible to devils, should be tossed about among the sons of men, without fear or reverence! A complaint, which we have cause to fill up with tears, more than words. Have we so learned Christ, to swear by him only? Will neither the benefits received, nor those we expect, charm our lips from such rebellion? It is a sin, from which of all evils we have most power of abstinence, to which of all evils we have the fewest temptations, therefore what can it be but wilfulness? Let us think, first, from whence it ariseth; from the first cause of evil, Satan. Secondly, what it bringeth; as many plagues as there be leaves in the book of God, the evil of temporal punishments. Thirdly, whither it tendeth; unto the last effect of evil, damnation.

5. Liars, that speak against their own conscience. Every lie is bad enough, yet some are of infirmity. So Abraham dissembled his wife, to save his life: Isaac was taken with his father's fear, and lied to Abimelech: David to Ahimelech, being hard driven seeks to succour himself with an unwarrantable shift: the midwives of Egypt, Rahab of Jericho, lied. All these were weaknesses. But to lie, with a set purpose and malicious intent, is this self-willed sin. A liar is one practised in the trade, as was Ziba, 2 Sam. xvi. 3. So Paul calls the Cretians liars: and as much hath been said of the Grecians; Græcia mendax, i. e. lying Greece. The spawn of Rome hath the primacy for lying; truth or falsehood is all one to them, so it may make for their turn. The Jesuit seems to be ambitious of the devil's prerogative, and fain would be the father of lies. Among the Indians, he that told a lie thrice, was condemned to perpetual silence: take it on Ælian's credit. Happy were it for the church, if such ecclesiastical liars were so silenced. Now a simple lie is so evil, that it can be made good by no circumstance: no, not by the glory of God, in the conversion of a world. Whatsoever the school speaks from St. Augustine, of their peccata compensativa, compensative sins; as for a man to tell a lie to prevent a rape or murder: as the two women hid the spies of Israel, and intelligencers of David; denying them whom they had concealed, to save their bloods, Josh. ii. 5; 2 Sam. xvii. 20: these they call sins that make amends, or recompense themselves. But shall a man "speak wickedly for God?" Job xiii. 7. Is he ever driven to such a pinch, that he stands in need of our lie? Even this is evil; but to lie with a meretricious forehead, steeled with impudence; this is that self-willed sin, which shall be shut out of heaven among the dogs, Rev. xxii. 15. The whelps of that Roman litter have thus barked against all the professors of the gospel, cast frontless imputations upon them; traduced the living, belied the dead; against the truth, against the evident truth, against the truth that themselves knew; so grossly, that some of their own blushing pens have confuted their shameless calumniation. Let them have the meed of noted liars, not to be believed speaking true.

6. Perjurers. To lie is wicked, to swear is ungodly; but to swear a lie, most execrable. The Jews' oath included seven things; Let bread, water, fire, house, wife, league of grace, and sepulchre be denied me, if I swear not the truth. Others, with a stone in their hand, throwing it against the wall, and saying, Si sciens fallo, sic me percutiat Jupiter, i. e. If I wilfully deceive, thus may Jupiter smite me. All judgments created are too narrow to conceive the guilt of perjury. It dissolves all commerce among men; if there be no truth in us, there is no trust unto us. It makes God an idol, ignorant of the truth, or else a patron of falsehood. Yea, it sends up to heaven a desperate challenge of atheistical defiance, and offers to take God and truth out of the world. An oath is the end of all disputes; he that violates that, breaks open a gap for ataxy and confusion to invade the world. Wilful every way; when a man either swears that to be true, which is false; or that to be false, which is true; or that to be true, which he thinks false; or that to be false, which he thinks true.

Words were first ordained for discovery, not for concealment: they that invert the formal intent of words, do wilfully cheat. An oath is the remedy of contention, they that cancel that seal of confirmation, are sworn rebels to all goodness. Ye that be so mad of running to Rome, learn this art before you go; inure your stomachs to digest perjury; study equivocations, as young scholars do fallacies; or else, as the poet says, Quid Romæ faciam? mentiri nescio, What shall I do at Rome? I cannot lie. How intolerable is this before a judgment-seat! He that enters into a statute, conceives the extent of it to be executed on his body, lands, or goods; therefore sleeps not till he be sure to perform the defeisance and condition. An oath is a kind of statute entered into and acknowledged before the high Judge of all the world; the condition is, to say the whole truth, and nothing but the truth; this is to be extended on goods and lands, peace and liberty, body and soul. Oh how self-willed, how obstinately mad are they, that cast away all these, by casting away the truth!

Though Phalaris command, and threaten the brazen bull, no terrors should drive us from the horns of the altar; still let us hold fast the truth. The witness serves, as Augustine says, that the judge, who is not a discerner of the heart, may not make any mistake in judging. If he be false, he laughs in his sleeve to think how many wise men he hath deluded. Juvénal thought perjury a disgrace for Romans; Quamvis Cappadoce faciant, equitesque Britanni. The Asians were renowned for perjury, and it seems by the poet, there were such knights among the Britons then. Let those wilful damners of themselves take any base course, rather than this. Any thing is better, as one expresses it, than to say before the judge, I saw what you did not see. They are called post-knights; whether because they stand ready at some noted post for their hire, or because their names are set upon posts, like villains on record, or especially because they ride post to hell. Every man is one letter in the alphabet, one element in the state. Judges are as vowels. Witnesses as half vowels or consonants; to speak when others speak to them, to sound something with others, nothing with themselves. Mutes be such as cannot plead for themselves, for whom are appointed advocates. But false witnesses are diphthongs, double-tongued, that breathe hot or cold, as you bespeak them; these mar the sense, and are to be thrown out of Christ's cross-row. Oh that our land had no such monsters, that on an hour's warning can lend Jezebel an oath, to rob poor Naboth of his life and vineyard!

Perjury! why, all disclaim it; but I would to God none would use it. How do subtle tradesmen insnare themselves, when they swear with equivocation, having some secret reference to the unknown mysteries of their profession! Let them know, there is a perjury out of the place of judgment, and this is it, what shifts soever they devise to juggle with their own conscience. This is an infallible rule, what cunning phrase or ambiguous assertion soever they swear withal; God, who is the witness of the conscience, so takes it, as he to whom they swear, by common construction understands it. And the buyer departs nothing so loaden with the injury, as the seller's soul is with the weight of perjury. Sacred ever and inviolable be the religion of an oath; and do not think men are to be cozened with oaths, as children are with counters. The false swearer hath a large share in all the plagues and curses of that flying roll, Zech. v. A share! yea, it is marvel that he doth not engross the whole. So prodigious is this sin, that if it be rewarded according to its merit, it scorns any proportion under a whole volume of punishments. "I will bring it forth, saith the Lord," ver. 4. God's will, cuts off all hope of impunity; his forth, cuts off all opinion of secrecy.

7. Sacrilege is a wilful sin. Against knowledge, men know it is injustice; against conscience, their own heart tells them they do ill; against God, who made them; against their pastor, who feeds them; against the gospel, that should save them: every way self-willed. The body of this city hears this often at the public congregation. What is their answer? Alas, we so often hear it, that we never mind it. Desperate wilfulness! we expect that God should hear us, yet we will not hear him; that he should bless and prosper our estates, when we purloin his. Our churches be full, but our purses be empty. Great audiences and small benevolences, are like many sheep and a little wool. Men give us the hearing, and that is all they give us. We empty our books, we empty our veins, we empty our brains; yet we must leave our posterity beggars. Is it your praises that we hunt for? it is time that our mouths were stopped with earth, if we should think of any other end than the honour of God. If you give us any glory, you endanger us to vengeance, and so requite us evil for our good. But God forbid you should profit so little by us, as I am sure we do by you.

But sacrilege shall find no excuse at the day of judgment. I shall relate a story, on the credit of a reverend bishop of this land, who knew and saw it. There was a gentleman that had the tithes of a parsonage inappropriate, by right whereof he demanded tithe wool of a parishioner, who was very rich, and the owner of many hundred sheep. He sent him a very small quantity; the servants showed it their master, the master his neighbours, who all acknowledged that he did him wrong. He demanded more; the other denied more, and vowed in his choler, that if he were driven to pay more, he would never keep sheep more, and so deprive him of that profit. The law compelled him; whereupon he put away his sheep. After which, he presently fell into such decay, that when this gentleman was buried, (which was not long after,) he, among the rest of the poor people, stood to receive such alms as were given at the funeral. (B. Babington upon Levit.) He was not alone in this exemplary punishment; thousands have fallen to poverty for this very sin of sacrilege. So dearly doth God pay himself of those that detain his dues; yea, even while they are transmitted into profane hands. From them that will not pay the tenth, he takes away all the nine. But, O self-willedness, thou cause of all this sin and ruin; that dost still harden the hearts of men, and putteth equity out of all hope of recovery; when politicians turn good Christians, usurers build churches, and poets come to sermons, then we will hope that God shall have his tithes.

Considerations. 1. Will is one thing which differenceth a man from a beast, and makes him capable of misery or blessedness. Life, sense, appetite, do not of themselves make a man either wretched or happy; (Bern.) but only the will: therefore if the will be naught, man is in worse case than the beast; as by a good will, he is in far better.

2. Will is a rational motion, presiding over sense and appetite. Reason a director; so man had it: reason a follower; so man hath it: reason a companion; so man should have it. It is not always moved according to reason, never without reason: the will doth many things by reason, and yet against reason; as it were by its instrumentality, contrary to its direction. Reason is given to the will for its instruction, not its destruction: now if will refuseth the counsel of reason, what can hinder ruin?

3. Nothing can offend God but the will, and the will can offend him without any thing else. The good or ill which infants, men either distracted or sleeping, do, shall not be imputed to them; because, says Bernard, they are neither in possession of their reason, nor retain the use of their will; but if the will transgress, there is no excuse: since, observes Augustine, it has nothing free except itself, it is not justly judged except from itself. A dull ingenuity, a frail memory, an inquiet appetite, a heavy sense, a languishing life; none of these make a man guilty, nor their contraries innocent; because these come not from the will. But a man wills the knowledge of another's wife; he never attains it, perhaps never attempts it; yet is he an adulterer. A man would steal if he durst: he is a thief though he have stole nothing.

4. Nothing can please God but the will. Praises are but stinking smoke, except the will be good; that can make them sweet perfumes. Alms are neglected rubbish, except the sanctified will makes them precious jewels. The will supplies all defects: the tongue cannot pray, the will is heard; the hand is lame and cannot work, the will performs it: according to Augustine, whatever the will wishes to be done, God reckons as done; nothing whatever is so easy to a good will, as its own act, viz. to will: yet when all fail, this pleaseth God. But where the will is evil, it must answer for all. Whither the will driveth, the whole man flieth. (Cas. in Psal. xiii.) Let us then abhor self-willedness, and submit our wills to his will that made them. If men will have their wills, know that God will have his will too; and that will of his, which men would not fulfil in obedience, they must fulfil in vengeance. Oh how much better is it for us, that his will be obeyed, who wills all men to be saved?

5. Consider the virtues opposed to these vices; and first of the former. Presumption is an extreme, the other contrary is desperation; betwixt them both the mediate virtue is hope. Despair is hope stark dead, presumption is hope stark mad; this enrageth it, the other strangles it. Presumption does more than hope allows, desperation does that which hope forbids. Presumption asks no leave of God, despair fights against God, hope would be with God. Presumption is a braggart, despair is a coward, hope is modestly valiant. Presumption challenges the earth, desperation sinks to hell, hope is bound for heaven. Presumption is altogether for merit, despair is altogether for misery, hope is altogether for mercy. Presumption would be crowned, desperation would be condemned, hope would be saved. Presumption looks forward, despair looks downward, hope looks upward. Let us not presume, because God is just; nor despair, because God is kind; but hope, because God is good. Desperation takes the next way to hell, presumption goes a little about, but both these extremes are reconciled in hell.

Hope is a virgin of a fair and clear countenance; her proper seat is upon earth, her proper object is in heaven; of a quick and piercing eye, that can see the glory of God, the mercy of Christ, the society of saints and angels, the joys of paradise, through all the clouds and orbs; as Stephen saw heaven opened, and Jesus standing in the holy place. Her eye is so fixed on the blessedness above, that nothing in the world can remove it. Faith is her attorney-general, prayer her solicitor, patience her physician, charity her almoner, thankfulness her treasurer, confidence her vice-admiral, the promise of God her anchor, peace her chair of state, and eternal glory her crown.

6. Against self-willedness I oppose humility and meekness; a submissive heart, yielding to be disposed by God's wisdom, and to be governed by his will; throwing a man out of himself, and laying him at the feet of his Maker. He that fights against his own will, as against his worst enemy; and had rather lose his own heart, than his heart should lose God; this is a man of blessed meekness. It is not pusillanimity, but the greatest courage, for it overcomes a man's self; not that the will ceaseth to be, but to be rigid and refractory. It is better to have passions well-ordered, than to have no passions at all. Blessed are the meek; while they live they shall be quiet on earth, and when they die they shall be safe and glorious in heaven.

The self-willed is a slave to the worst part of himself, that which is beast in him governs that which is man: appetite is his lord, reason his servant, religion his drudge. His five senses are all the articles of his faith; and he had rather be a famous man upon earth than a saint in heaven. He likes nothing for any goodness, but because he will like it; and he will like it because others do not. If an unseasonable shower cross his recreation, he is ready to fall out with heaven, and to quarrel with God himself; as if he were wronged, because God did not take his time, when to rain, and when to shine. He is a querulous cur that barks at every horse; and in the silent night, the very moonshine opens his clamorous throat. All his proceedings are so many precipices, and his attempts peremptory. He hath not the patience to consult with reason, but determines all merely by affection and fancy. There is no part about him, but often smarts for his will. His sides be sore with stripes, and thank his will for it. His bowels are empty, and complain that his will robs them of sustenance. Yea, not seldom, his will breaks the covenant, and his neck pays the forfeit. He is the lawyers' best client, his own sycophant, and the devil's wax, to take what impression he will give him. To have his will upon his neighbour in a suit of law, he will hazard his salvation. Saul inquires of the Lord, and he answered him not: he seeks to a witch, and she answers him, 1 Sam. xxviii. 6, 7. He must have his will: if God will not answer him, Satan shall. Flectere cum nequeat Superos, Acheronta movebit, says the poet; i. e. When he cannot move the gods above, he will move those below. Wilfulness hath no hope to prevail with the Lord, therefore solicits the devil.

Though we be sinful, let us not be wilful. Weakness finds pity, wilfulness deserves penalty. We sin too often against our wills, too often beside our wills, too often with our wills; but let us not be self-willed. Let us subdue our lusts to our will, submit our will to reason, our reason to faith; our faith, our reason, our wills, ourselves, to the will of God. He chargeth us to keep his laws; we have not kept them: having sinned, he calls us to repent, and offers pardon: how gracious is this goodness! O let our humble sorrow, and answerable faith, at least say, Amen.

When God first made man, he set all in a perfect harmony: by one act of rebellion, all was put out of frame. To reduce this shattered family into some order, there was a council called; reason, will, memory, imagination, affection, and sense. Every one knew his office: sense was to perceive for all; affection to like or dislike for all; will to desire for all; imagination to invent for all; memory to record for all; reason to judge for all. Sense was to be the caterer; affection the taster; imagination the steward; memory the secretary; will the controller; reason the judge, to approve or disallow for all. All the rest were contented with their places, saving only the will; and she took it in scorn that reason should be above her. Hereupon they began to contest about it, and the contention grew hot. Reason gave many reasons, why she should be chief: first, because it was so from the beginning, and innovation in any state is dangerous. Secondly, if all should not be ruled by reason, there would soon be a dissolution and confusion of the family. Sense would be out of taste; affection would mistake, loving where it should hate, and hating where it should love; imagination would provide nothing but noxious things; memory would set down nothing but bad items; yea, will herself would employ all the rest to mischief, should not reason direct. But for all this, will would not be disputed out of her usurped regiment; so they fell to siding: sense and affection presently close with will; memory did not yield suddenly, but perceiving what power will had over her, and that she could remember no more than will would have her, she also takes her part.

Reason hath now none left but imagination, and that stood to it stoutly. Still the quarrel increased: crafty imagination finds out this trick; that they two should reign by turns, and divide the life between them. Will should rule all the waking part, and reason all the sleeping part. Will was contented with this motion, but reason disdains that she should have nothing to do but when man was asleep. Will knew there was no way to win imagination by force, yet she might be corrupted, being an officer that would take bribes. Temptation prevailed with her too; so that now by a general consent, will is made queen-regent, and reason but her servant.

Yet reason would not so give over her just title; but having one friend that was not called to council, she solicits her to plead her cause; this was conscience. At whose approach they all began to tremble, and by her arguments were moved to dislike their choice. But when will saw them begin to shrink, with an austere look and frowning brow, she commands them on their allegiance to obey no other princess but herself. Conscience taxeth her of pride and usurpation; because the high Sovereign had appointed reason for his lieutenant and viceroy, to govern this little isle of man. But will replies, Argue as long as you please, I am will, and I will have it so. Then she charged sense to stop the mouth of clamorous conscience, and affection to blind the eyes of reason. Thus while honesty cannot speak, and wisdom cannot see, will is crowned absolute queen.

Sic volo, sic jubeo, stat pro ratione voluntas;*

i. e. Behold the will, acknowledge your mistress, who says, So I will, so I command; the will is in the place of reason. Where reason is subjected to sense, and appetite sways conscience, and tyrant will does, undoes all; that state unhappily must perish.

This is that self-will, which rules in all men by nature: but the Supreme Emperor takes pity on some, and sends down a new governess to them, grace. She at once opens the eyes of reason and the mouth of conscience; deposes will from her usurpation; degrades both her favourites, sense and affection; does not put them to death, but makes them good and serviceable to reason; turns vain imagination into divine contemplation; changeth the disposition of will; of wild and haggard, makes it obedient and gentle. Yet is will thus decrowned against her will; often she rebels even against grace, and sometimes gets the better; and will always make one, though she cannot be alone, and chief in the regiment. Divisum imperium cum Jove Cæsar habet, as Virgil said; i. e. Cæsar shares the empire of the world along with Jove. This war is in the sanctified; in the rest, will herself, or self-will, is the great mistress, and rules all, till she bring all to ruin. How can it be otherwise, when the feminine powers are more potent than the masculine? From all our enemies, especially from our own natural wills, good Lord, deliver us.

"They are not afraid to speak evil of dignities." There is no one absolute king among men, but he that is the King of all gods. Therefore earthly monarchs must walk by a rule; which if they transgress, they shall be as surely accountable to him, as they are accountable to none but him, that ordained them. If they command unlawful things, follow Augustine's counsel, Despise the power, by fearing a power that is greater. The devil hath power, and power from God; but it is a power of permission, not one of commission; therefore to be resisted. The magistrate hath power; which if he abuse, that is by permission; but the power itself is by the commission of God. Therefore it pleaseth the Lord to officiate his ministers in this employment; with due reverence to instruct the prince in governing, as by Divine authority to conform the subjects to obedience. When Saul was chosen, because the observance of a king was uncouth, Samuel is set to inform them. 1 Sam. x. 25; otherwise, novelty might have been a warrant for ignorance, and ignorance for neglect. There be reciprocal respects between the prince and his subjects; which not being observed, government languisheth into confusion; these Samuel teacheth them. He was their judge, he is still their prophet; he must instruct, though he may not rule, yea, he will instruct him that shall rule. Conscience binds every Samuel's endeavour, to keep even terms betwixt the king and people; prescribing to the one moderation and equity, to the other humbleness and loyalty. Divinity is a mistress for the highest masters of men; and the Scripture is the best man of counsel for the greatest statesman in the world.

Now because government is then best when it hath one head and many hands, the supreme hath need of subordinate powers. It was the Egyptians' emblem, whereby they figured government, an eye and a sceptre. The prince is but a man; therefore he must see by others' eyes, and execute by inferior hands. The burden of authority is too heavy for one man's shoulders; "I am not able to bear you myself alone," saith Moses, Deut. i. 9. Therefore his father-in-law casts him a model for a polity in Israel, Exod. xviii. 21; which, howsoever at first it passed under God's correction, yet after being seen and allowed by him, and being practised by Moses, it became of good policy, sound divinity; of private counsel, a general oracle, serving for substance all times and places. Solomon was the wisest king, yet he had his grave counsel, sage, experienced men. Ahasuerus would do nothing in the removal of Vashti, but by the consent of the seven princes. The house will not stand without these pillars; and where they are sound, we may say of that kingdom, as the traveller reported that he had seen, in England a beautiful king, in France a beautiful kingdom, in Spain a beautiful senate. There may be a great sacrilege committed in Israel, and yet Joshua not know of it; some errors will escape his best vigilancy. That sin is not half cunning enough, that hath not learned secrecy. It is no blame to authority, that some sins are committed privately. Only the eye of Omniscience is able to find men out in their close wickedness. There is no family, no society, so holy, but it may be blemished with some malefactors. It is enough for the magistrate to punish manifest offences; we cannot expect that the sight of the eye or reach of the hand should be infinite.

There must be therefore counsellors of state and captains of war, peers, judges, magistrates, yea, and inferior officers; rulers of thousands, of hundreds, of fifties, and of tens, Exod. xviii. 21: as we have chancellor, chief justice, judges of assize, justices of peace, customers, constables. That instrument is not in tune, where any of these strings be false. Joseph was Pharaoh's right hand, Gen. xli. 43. Though the prince, like the sun, yield his light and comfort to the state; yet bad magistrates under him, aiming at their own private ends, like clouds or malignant stars, may hinder the influence: yea, they are like bad winds, that wither that part of the state: whereas the errors and distempers of princes have been qualified by virtuous deputies, 2 Kings xii. 2. Now, because there is no power but from God, therefore not the least of these subordinate and ministerial governors must be despised, without peril of his displeasure.

In the discharging of this artillery of hell, against the glories and powers which God hath ordained, we may consider four particulars; the bullet, the musket, the powder, and the mark. The musket is the malice of the heart; the powder, the spitefulness of the tongue; the bullet is blasphemy, disgracing of magistrates; the mark or butt is dignities.

This piece is charged with three deadly bullets; libelling, murmuring, mutinying.

1. Libellers think it a point of wit to traduce magistracy; and what they dare not own for fear of censure, they dare invent without fear of hell. Scandals of great men have seldom any fathers; they kill, and make no report. Like the Pasquin in Rome, the image on Tiber bridge; that does all. It is a base and penurious argument of wit, to disgrace those in private, whose innocency they may envy, cannot tax. In ancient comedy, the persons of men were represented and abused; but they were barbarians.

The faults of great ones are to be reproved by the reverend fathers of the church: the stage and poet, with jests and satires, may not attempt it. It is dangerous to play with that which angers God. I know that some vices are beside their malice, ridiculous; and the sottish humours and passions of men are shamed in being presented. But that is a treacherous hand, that steals away from statesmen their reputation; while they blemish their sufficiency, they covertly condemn the state that chose them. Thus may the council, the king, yea, the King of heaven, be wounded through the sides of a mean magistrate. There is nothing that the law allows, but the malcontent censures; what it forbids as dangerous, that he pumps his wit to justify. Where the gate stands open, he is seeking for a stile; and what he cannot convince, he will irritate. Thus, like a grasshopper at Christmas, he looks back upon harvest with a lean pair of cheeks, and curses that which he never had the grace to apprehend as a blessing.

2. Murmurers, though they disperse not written scandals of the magistracy, yet mutter out repining exceptions against their actions. Such were in Israel: the people want water, and instead of praying to God, they murmur against Moses, Exod. xvii. 3. Alas, what hath the righteous done? He made not the wilderness dry, nor the waters bitter. But he was their conductor; yet, as he led them, so God led him: the pillar guided Moses, as Moses guided the people; yet they murmur at Moses. How mad is impatient man, when he wants his natural desire, and spiritual grace withal! If men cannot have their wills, to invade the inheritance which the right heir keeps from them; or suppose they be injured, and may not have redress in that manner and measure themselves prescribe; presently they murmur against the magistrate. And what prince can hope to be free, when Moses could not escape? Never prince so merited of a people: he endangered himself to Pharaoh's utmost cruelty; he brought them from a bondage worse than death; he interposed himself betwixt God's anger and them: one would think, that no death could have opened their mouths to speak evil of Moses. Yet such is the hard condition of authority, that if men fare well, they applaud themselves; if ill, they repine against their rulers. Moses wanted water as well as they, yet they ask Moses for water; What shall we drink? The body cannot be distempered, and the head at ease; the king must needs feel the people's misery. If they had seen him furnished with full vessels of sweet water, while they were turned over to the bitter, there had been some colour for murmuring; but the ruler wants water no less than themselves. Murmur not ye, as they did, lest ye be destroyed of the destroyer, as they were, 1 Cor. x. 10: let their vengeance make us tremble. Be silent unto the Lord, Psal. xxxvii. 7, lest he answer you again in fury.

3. Mutineers so speak evil of dignities, that they raise up evil against dignities. Korah stirs up a faction against Moses; Why dost thou make thyself a prince over us? Numb. xvi. 13. A man could not think of an honour less worth his emulation, than the principality of Israel. They were a people that could give nothing, a people that had nothing, a people whom their leader was fain to feed with bread and water; they paid him no tribute but ill words; his command was only a burden to him, yet was it an eyesore to them; "Ye take too much upon you," ver. 3. Nothing can be more pleasing to the vulgar, than to hear their governors taxed and themselves flattered. This mutiny soon brought in a rout of rebels. He that poisons the people with a mal-opinion of their prince, is the most dangerous traitor. To rip up the faults of kings, is bold impiety; but to charge them with faults they have not, is shameless blasphemy. So Absalom spoke evil of his own father, 2 Sam. xv. 3.

No music is so sweet to the ears of the giddy multitude, as to hear well of themselves, ill of their princes. Absalom need not wish himself on the bench: every man says, Oh what a courteous prince is Absalom! What a just ruler would Absalom be! How happy were we, if we might be judged by Absalom! "Thy matters are good." It might be some monopoly, some pestilent patent of engrossing, some malicious accusation; yet all is good matter with Absalom. "There is none to hear." Their own eyes saw this to be false; daily were causes heard and judged, offences heard and punished. If some officer were so corrupt, that an appeal was just, shall the king be blamed? must the prince answer for every act that his subject does? David had more of such blasphemers: Shimei curseth him to his face, 2 Sam. xvi. 7. Durst he do thus among his armed troops? yes, it is the mark which our apostle sets on these reprobate blasphemers; "They are not afraid to speak evil of dignities." Doubtless, that clamorous tongue had secretly traduced the good king long before; therefore is now given up to the rage of frenzy; that the mischief it did owe his heart, might now be paid home. What can they look for, that slander the footsteps of God's anointed, but the name and doom of Shimei?

The greater the persons, the more censurable be all their actions. What can a prince do so acceptable to the good, but lewd men will misinterpret it? Every tongue is ready to speak partially, according to the interest he hath in the cause or patient. If a statesman have done a private person some but imagined wrong, how doth he clap, leap, and rejoice at his own downfall! It is not possible that dignities should be free from imputations; their innocence can no more protect them than their power. This shot flies not at random, like the Syrian's arrow at a venture, 1 Kings xxii. 34; but is charged and discharged on set purpose to dishonour God, in wounding the honour of his anointed.

The engine that carries this mischievous burden, is the tongue. It flies lightly, but it injures heavily, says Bernard. It is but a little member, but the nimblest about a man; able to do both body and soul too a mischief. How many on account of free tongues have chained feet! If you ask what cast such a man into prison? his lavish tongue. Paul tamed his whole body: he that undertakes such a work begins at the heart, then next of all to the tongue. Shall I think that he fears God, that tears God? or fears God, and does not honour the king? Some dogs bark not for malice, so much as for custom; yet this at best is but a currish quality. To toss the weaknesses of magistrates in common discourses, though they wish them well as they say, argues a proud heart. The disease sometimes appears not to the patient himself; yet when he talks idly, the physician knows he is sick. A man blasphemes God or the prince, scandalizeth the nobles; yet says he means well, and is friends with God and the world: but does not his talking idly declare him to be sick? will the law understand him otherwise in trial, or the Lord in judgment?

"The tongue is a world of iniquity," Jam. iii. 6. If so little a part be a world of mischief, what is the whole! Shall a man discharge his piece at an unlawful mark, and then say he meant no harm? "The tongue is a fire:" like fire indeed; for heat, it is as hot as fire; for colour, it is as red as fire; for agility, it is as nimble as fire; for ambition, it is as aspiring as fire, it hath a spite at what is above it. Like the Italian needle, that being thrust into the body, kills invisibly. Lord, keep my lips from evil, and my tongue that it speak no guile, 1 Pet. iii. 10. Keep it, who can? None but the Lord. Let the tongue pray that the tongue be tamed, says Austin. He suffers man to tame all the creatures, but man himself he reserves to his own taming.

The powder that chargeth the tongue, and carries this shot of blasphemy, must needs be malice; a tumour of curst-heartedness, the saltpetre of a rancorous hatred, boiled in choler to an extraction of mischief. This is a disease that tormenteth all abundance, and imbitters men's contentments. When Haman reckoned up all the glory, promotions, riches, banquets, graces of the king, favours of the queen, respect of the nobles, that were done him; yet he concludes, All is nothing, so long as Mordecai sits in the king's gate, Esth. v. 13. Mordecai's cap was not the cause, but Haman's malice: nothing can serve, but he must be his enemy's hangman; but though he meant it not, he built his own gallows. It is just, that malice should first hurt a man's self, as fire in his bosom burns him before it touch others. How dares the malicious come before God in prayer, that judgeth hatred manslaughter? He presents himself, if not with hands, yet with a heart imbrued in blood. The Jews gnashed at Stephen with their teeth, Acts vii. 54. This is to show the tricks of hell beforehand: gnashing of teeth; they shall have enough of it there.

This is that murderous shot, forged in the furnace of hell, and charged in the stomachs of popish emissaries, to be discharged against the honour of worthy magistrates, yea, glorious princes. Who cannot but know, that their tongues are full of this virulency, when their books are stuffed with little else? As if they would proclaim to the world, how villainous that religion makes them, and that they are bound to traduce kings. Instead of proposing the lives of saints to imitation, they are still exposing the lives of princes to suspicion, yea, to conspiracy. Do they this without authority? No, but in the name of the pope, as that Philistine cursed David by his gods, 1 Sam. xvii. 43. Yea, hath not the pope in his own name cursed them? His excommunications, execrations, rejection of princes, what is this but to speak evil of dignities? Indeed this hellish zeal hath been so hissed at, that some of them are now somewhat ashamed: therefore, like the devil in the serpent, the pope makes use of another's tongue; the Jesuit undertakes it for him, that large spoon which the Roman hierarchy devised to eat with the devil: who though he were found out since the invention of gunpowder, hath not done less mischief. The whole trade, study, and profession of that order, is to curse princes. But, Lord, though they curse, bless thou, Psal. cix. 28: thy blessing shall do us good, when their curses hurt none but themselves. Let dignities comfort themselves against these evil speakings, as David did in the persecution of Shimei; "It may be the Lord will requite me good for his cursing this day," 2 Sam. xvi. 12. It may be, yea, it hath been, and we trust it shall be, that God will bless us the more for their cursing. It may hitherto be written as a motto on the king's crown, Videntis et viventis, He sees and lives; his enemies perish, himself prospers.

The butts at which all this pestilent ordnance lets fly, the apostle calls dignities, δόξαι, glories. They are also called gods, not by nature, but by office; κατὰ τὴν ἐξουσίαν, for their calling; κατὰ τὴν τάξιν, for their order and place; κατὰ τὴν τιμὴν, for their honour and respect. God hath not only set them as vicegerents in his own room, but also enabled them with gifts for so great a designment. Though not any noble and great be called to the grace of sanctification, yet they are to the grace of administration. When God called Saul to be a king, he "gave him no other heart," 1 Sam. x. 9; he lifted up his thoughts to the disposition and pitch of a king. The calling of God never leaves a man unchanged; nor does he employ any in his service, whom he does not enable to the work he sets them about. Especially, when he makes dignities, sets them to supply his own place, and to the representation of himself. It is no wonder, if princes excel the vulgar in gifts, no less than in honours: their crowns and hearts are both in one hand; and if that did not add to their spirits, Numb. xi. 17, as well as to their states, there were no equality.

Yet when Saul was chosen, "and all the people shouted, God save the king," there were some sons of Belial, that despised him, 1 Sam. x. 24, 27. It is a vain ambition that seeks to be loved of all. When God commands us to have peace with all men, he adds, "if it be possible," Rom. xii. 18. Favour is more hard to attain than peace: many forbear to trouble us, that yet do not love us. Goodness cannot be without exceptions; therefore is not to be sought abroad, but in ourselves, and the conscience of our well deservings. But what shall we say to those men, that will be scanning of kings, and censuring all their actions, yea, charging their innocence with aberrations? How plainly hath God interdicted it! Exod. xxii. 28. How doth St. Paul disclaim it! Acts xxiii. 5. How did Solomon threaten it! Eccl. x. 20. Rulers were no Christians in Paul's time, yet how earnestly doth he persuade to obedience! With what reverence did he appeal to Cæsar! With what humility and appreciation of happiness, Let the king live; with what deprecation of evil, This dream be to thine enemies; did Daniel speak to the king of Babylon, a king that served not God! Dan. iv. 19.

How are we blessed of God, and have cause to bless God, for our government; unparalleled by any about us, unexampled by any before us! Good kings are no ordinary blessings: a worthy general is worth half an army; such as Moses and Joshua were, whose faith fought more for the camp than the camp fought for them.

Government is not only civil, but ecclesiastical; not only Moses must be obeyed, but Aaron must not be despised. I would to God, these dignities did never disgrace themselves; that they would not be forward to rob the church who are set to patronize it, and make themselves examples of sacrilege. Oh that our consciences could say this is false, or that demonstration made it not too true! Thus they that are set in judicatory places, grow into contempt, by doing things contemptible. Yet may not their dignity be despised, under pain of a higher censure than theirs, even of God himself. The Lord hath often done good to his church, even by those instruments whom for their sins he means to cast into hell-fire. It is hard indeed to find bonum judicem and malum hominem, a good judge and a bad man, under one skin: if they could be joined, yet when the bad man goes to hell, what shall become of the good judge? But personal corruption cannot bar primitive institution. The sins of governors are their own, the government is God's, and must not be despised.

Yea, there is an inferior dignity, yet a dignity; every minister is, or at least should be, a governor of his flock. But now the sheep are such perilous beasts, that they will govern the shepherd; children will teach their fathers to speak, and rectors must be regulated. Such is the contempt of this dignity, that it is a high favour if the preacher may be heard in the pulpit: out of it, there is not the most illiterate mechanic, but thinks himself a wiser and a better man. In all things he is held the meanest of the parish, till it come to any payment or tax, and then they will honour him so far as to rank him with an alderman. But for his government over his charge, this is held but a mockery: when they speak of a minister, the ordinary question is, Where doth he serve? But, Where doth he govern? this would be a nonsense in the world's opinion. Indeed we are your servants for Christ's sake; yea, we will be your foot-stool, or if you can, devise a vassalage lower. But let us tell you the truth; If you honour Christ, you cannot despise us; and if ye do despise us, you do not honour Christ; and if ye honour not him, he will never honour you. And while you calumniate our persons, or abridge our just means, you are so far from honouring us, that you rob us; and while you rob us, you rob Christ of his glory, and your own souls of comfort: and you shall sooner blow up hell with trains of powder, than break the chain of this dependent truth.

Inferences. Glories they are, why then should they not be glorious? Let their pomp, their apparel, their diet, their dwelling, be all magnificent; let nothing be wanting to their state, upon whom depends the state of all. They come within this compass, that speak evil of these things: they curse the king, who curse royalty. Again, dignities they are, therefore should be worthy; and that in two respects; worthy of their admittance, worthy in their performance.

1. Worthy of admittance: when they be chosen to govern others, that have not learned to govern themselves, the republic rues it. "Woe to thee, O land, when thy king is a child!" Eccl. x. 16. "I will give children to be their princes, and babes shall rule over them," Isa. iii. 4. Children in understanding, not in respect of innocency. A fool cannot be harmless; they are truly good, who best know why. In the election of magistrates, let God be consulted; without whom, Samuel himself will take seven wrong before one right. Do not think every one sufficient, that thinks himself so. Ambition is an argument of unworthiness: the olives, vines, and fig-trees refuse this honour; brambles will catch hold on the sleeve for preferment, Judg. ix. 9—15. Let him never speed that sues. They that are worthy must be sued to; they are sooner found in retirement, than popularity; as Gideon was in the barn, David at the fold. They know offices to be callings, and will not meddle with them till they be called to them. Let such be preferred, not as would have places, but such as places would have.

But, O misery of our times! dignities be made, not by the worth, but by the weight; not who deserve best, but who bid fairest. Money can provide a man a place, no matter how he be provided for the place. If you ask a thief in an office, How camest thou in hither? he must answer with that Roman burgess, With a great sum of money, Acts xxii. 28. Churchmen are condemned for buying of benefices, and that commonly by those that are the sellers of them. They make that punishable in us, which they hold allowable in themselves; as if they would compel us to go to heaven, while themselves are content to take the other way. I know it is fearful enough, to have the charge of souls bought and sold, with a Who gives most? But is the fault only in benefices? do not lawyers buy offices and civil dignities? This is not simony; is it not worse? That wicked precedent of corruption had two names, Simon and Magus: if the buying of benefices be simony, the buying of offices may well be termed magic. These places prepare for judicature, and so it lies in them to hasten or delay justice, to guide or misguide the proceedings. He that hath bought his place dear, will hardly afford the client a reasonable pennyworth of justice. This is not to come in at God's door, but at the devil's window. Such be unworthy dignities.

2. Worthy in their performance, and executing the place. They must be, first, no dastards: they had need be heroical spirits, that must oppose the current, yea, the torrent of vices, and do justice when a great man says, No. How was Gideon's army diminished! upon the proclamation, Let the fearful be gone, two and twenty thousand slunk away, Judg. vii. 3. Yet this is not enough; more cowards must be cashiered. If ours were so served, I fear of so many thousands there would scarce be three hundred left. The Athenian judges used to sit in Mars-street; to show, that though they wore Apollo's robes, yet they had martial hearts. Constantine was termed that man child, Rev. xii. 5, for his courage and resolution for the truth. A soft and flexible nature is not able to say injustice nay, when it comes with high looks. Cowards are slaves to those above them, sycophants to those equal with them, tyrants to those under them. Commonly, courage comes from blood and breeding; eagles produce eagles. Blessed is the land, whose princes are the sons of nobles! Eccl. x. 17. Not but that God can alter this, and raise as worthy men from cottages as from palaces. Gideon was a thrasher, David a shepherd, yet both mirrors of valour, reckoned among the worthies. But a timorous magistrate is a hare in a lion's seat; the frown or check of a great one is able to fright him from his conscience. So we have seen a natural tied to a post with a straw, which he durst not break. These dare meddle with none that dare meddle with them.

Next, not proud and disdainful. Some when they have got an office, look big upon their old acquaintance; as if their dignity were a dropsy to puff them up. Now they think, they may swear by authority, and oppress by licence; their place will bear them out in it. When we see such a one upon the bench, we may think truly, he would better become the bar. These hold religion a disparagement to gentry, and fear nothing more than to have a name that they fear God. Their place to such is held a chair of honour, and a stool of ease, and a farm of commodity, and a sword of revenge; not a calling of labour, wherein they must do much good, or receive much blame.

Lastly, nor must they be covetous; it is too base and sordid for honour to be covetous. What is not cheap with him, to whom money is dear? He will sell the truth, sell his friend, sell his country, with Ahab sell himself, for money. Such, if they be officers, study new pulleys and winches to derive larger fees: their words be casting nets, no fish escapes them. If lawyers, they will sell both their speech and silence, their clients' causes and their own consciences. While the golden stream runneth, the mill grindeth; when that spring is dry, they advise them to put it to compromise, and let their neighbours end it: the fools might have done so before. (Bern. to Eugen.) But let dignities take care that the people may grow rich by them, and not they by the people.

The good magistrate sits on the judgment-seat, with as great (though not so slavish) fear, as Olanes did on the flayed skin of his father Sylannes, nailed by Cambyes on the tribunal; or as the Mahometan council, when they think the great Turk stands behind the arras, or at the dangerous door. When greatness of power, or nearness of friendship, brings an unjust suit before him, requesting his favour in it, his heart replies within him, How shall I judge so, and answer the Lord when he comes to judge me!

Thus should dignities walk worthy; as Paul said to Timothy, See that no man despise thee. As they would not be contemned, they must not deserve contempt; if they do, God can pour contempt upon princes. The lowest officers are not here excused; for if the inferior fail in their duties, it will trouble the supreme to repair it. The fixed stars be the greatest and highest, and have their light and influence; yet is it the sun and moon, the lowest and nearest orbe, that govern the world. Be the bishop never so learned, if the parishional priest be negligent or ignorant, the people are still untaught. What can the eye do, if the hand be unserviceable? It is the ground-wind, not the rack-wind, that drives mills and ships. In the clock of justice, the least pin or wheel being irregular disorders all.

Conclusion. Dignities be difficulties; and the rent of labour considered, the good man hath but a hard bargain of his honour. I wonder not, if the wise man be rather haled out of his privacy to such preferment; for he weighs the charge as well as the credit, the danger more than the gain, of high places; knowing the chair of honour to be as ticklish as Elf's stool, off which he may easily break his neck. I cannot blame Saul for hiding himself from a kingdom; especially so troublesome a one as Israel then was. Honour is heavy enough when it comes on the best terms, much more when all men's cares are cast upon one, most of all in a distempered state. To put to sea, is not without danger at any time; but what safety can he expect that launcheth out in a storm? The quietest throne is full of cares, the unquiet of perils. These drove Saul into a corner, to hide his head from a crown, that he chose rather to lie obscure among the baggage of his tent, than to sit gloriously in a chair of state. Dignity in such a condition is compelled to fear, as well as to be feared, as Cyprian saith. They often drink wormwood in a cup of gold, and lie in a bed of ivory upon a pillow of thorns; that they may say of their glory, as he did of his robe, O nobilem magis quam felicem pannum! O noble rather than lucky rag! If the ambitious knew what cares, fears, and dangers dwell within the hoop of a crown, though it lay at their foot, they would not stoop to take it up. But the Divine arm that sets the diadem on their heads, doth there maintain it. If they uphold his kingdom, he will uphold theirs. If they will have God to be mindful of them in his mercies, Neh. xiii. 22, they must be mindful of him in their business.

VERSE 11.

Whereas angels, which are greater in power and might, bring not railing accusation against them before the Lord.

HERE is an argument a fortiori, against them that inveigh against authority; in that they take more upon them than the very angels themselves. First, they are weak; the angels are powerful. Secondly, they are wicked; the angels are holy. Thirdly, they are bound with the fetters of mortality; the angels cannot die, and are at perfect liberty. Fourthly, God hath subjected them to magistrates; the angels know no superior but Christ and God himself. Yet these men rail against rulers, the angels do not; these dare, the angels dare not. The impotent are most audacious.

But this seems marvellous, that the apostle should acquit them from being contumelious against magistrates. For why should they be enemies to that sacred order, whereof they know God to be the Author? Why should they rise up against that power, which is joined with themselves in the same ministry and deputation?

These doubts have made some of opinion, that this is meant of the evil angels. But that exposition must needs be full of absurdity; for why should he excuse devils from blasphemy, whom he knows to be the fathers of blasphemy? or make Satan so favourable and modest, as if he durst not meddle with kings? Whereas his malice is deadly against all men, but most impetuous and violent against princes. Every kingdom on earth is an eyesore to the kingdom of hell. Government conforms men to civil obedience and peace; both which are hateful to the fountain of sin and sedition. It is his main policy, to bring in anarchy and ~~anarchy~~. Give him but way to break our ranks, he will soon rout and ~~vanquish~~ all our forces. He fears not to curse nor cross any king upon earth, that is not afraid to blaspheme the King of heaven.

It must therefore be understood of the good angels. But why are they justified from the blasphemy of princes? Kings are their special charge, they are the invisible guard of majesty: protection they afford, never malediction. Ans. Let us distinguish of the time, and all will be easy. In those times, the magistrates were cruel, bloody, savage wolves, sucking the gore of Christians, haters of the gospel, enemies of Jesus Christ. Now the holy angels had the custody of the church, the tuition of every believing soul. Therefore those tyrants, that so persecuted their charge, must needs be hateful to them. Yet they so qualified their just displeasure, that while they abhorred the princes, they honoured the principalities: they hated the men, as the instruments of the devil; revered the dominion, as the ordinance of God. This moderation is in the blessed angels; yet such fury is in human, or rather inhuman, beasts.

This I take to be true sense. For the power and might of angels, how far one is more puissant than many men, and how innumerable those armies be, I refer you to some of my former tracts. (On Heb. xii. 22.) Their power makes for our comfort, being exercised in our protection. In our infancy, devils assault our cradles; but angels beat them off, as Abraham drove the fowls from the sacrifice. In our strength, devils strive to pervert our goings; persuading us to leap from pinnacles, to attempt impossibilities or dangers: angels then keep us in our ways, Matt. xviii. 10; Psal. xci. 11. Devils would devour our substance, children, servants, as they did spoil Job; angels defend us from their rage, as they did defend Jacob, Gen. xxxii. 1. The pestilence rageth in the streets, angels keep it from the tabernacles of the righteous. Devils seek the ruin of kingdoms; it was Satan that tempted David to number his people, by which he lost such a number of his people: angels fight for their defence, as that angel did for Israel against the prince of Persia, Dan. x. 13. Angels were the ministers of the law, an archangel the messenger of the gospel; he that was Gabriel, which signifies, the strength of God, came to bring news of the God of strength. One angel slew one hundred eighty-five thousand enemies in one night; one angel cheered millions of souls by the tidings of one day. This is their might, and this is their ministry ordained for our good by the God of mercy.

"Whereas angels," &c. Angels do reverence to the institution of God; and are so far from accusing bad governors before the Lord, that they honour their principality in the world. Indeed evil magistrates have plagues enough waiting upon them; more than pleasures or flatterers. Heliogabalus thought by the policy of his head, to prevent the extraordinary hand of God; he provides himself silken ropes, golden swords, poison in hyacinths, a turret plated with gold, and brodered with precious stones; thinking by some of these engines to have ended his irksome life; yet he died the death that God had appointed him. But angels are not enemies to sovereignty; there is order among themselves, some are higher, some lower; and they obey one another, if not from commandment, yet from counsel.

The world could not consist without order: this sublunary globe depends on the celestial; superior causes guide the subordinate. At the first was one confused heap of materials, but then it could scarce be called a world. God's fat, which did put an order, visibility, and harmony to things, made it a world. Inequality is the ground of order; "one star differs from another star in glory," 1 Cor. xv. 41; and this was with God's ~~approbation in the review~~. If the elements were of equal force, none more operative than another, the world would be like a sea becalmed; fire should have no predominance; nor heat, the parent of generation, above unactive moisture; nor summer be distinguished from winter. There must be a disparity among men; all may not be rich, nor all rulers: but some to command, some to obey; some for the throne, some for the mill. Unisons make no good music, nor is equality any degree to perfection. The host of heaven knows and keeps the rules of subjection and superiority: there be two great lights; the sun to govern the day, and the moon the night. But for this orderly disposition, all would fall to ruin.

The angels "bring not railing accusation against them before the Lord." Of this that our apostle sets down here generally, St. Jude gives a particular instance: "Michael the archangel, when contending with the devil he disputed about the body of Moses, durst not bring against him a railing accusation, but said, The Lord rebuke thee," Jude 9. Give me leave a little to insist on this example. The occasion of this strife was about the body of Moses. Why, what did Satan care for the body of Moses, when his soul was gone to glory? That old politician had a reach in it. Moses, though he were often despised living, was highly revered being dead; and they that said of him while he was in the mount, "As for this Moses, we know not what is become of him," Exod. xxxii. 1; could wish, when he was taken to the mount of heaven, Would we had our Moses again. If therefore the devil could have found out Moses' sepulchre, he would have brought a number of idolaters to the worship of his bones.

From hence arose this disputation betwixt the lost and the blest angel: Satan examining the cause, why the body of God's so famous servant should be buried in oblivion, offering himself to the search of that holy dust; Michael withstands him, and reproves his sauciness in seeking for that which God's infinite wisdom had concealed.

Moses, doubtless, was buried with honour; the same God, that by the hand of his angels carried up his soul to glory, did also by their hand carry his body to sepulture. Angels bear up innumerable souls to heaven; we never read them (unless probably here) the bearers of human bodies to their graves. Yet thus was Moses honoured: those hands that had taken the law from God himself, those eyes that had seen his presence, those lips that had so often conferred with him, that face which did so shine with the reflection of his glory; may not now be neglected, when the soul is gone. God took charge of him enclosed within his mother's ribs, kept him from those Egyptian butchers in her arms, preserved him among the bulrushes, maintained him in the world; therefore he will regard the carriage of him out of the world. None of his friends shall be troubled about his funerals, God himself will be at all the cost. Such is his love and care of his own, that it never ceaseth, neither in life, nor in death, nor after it. Herein he directs us by his own example, to bring the bodies of our friends to the grave with honour. Birds die; we find not many of their bodies; it is likely that they go into holes, and there end. Nature requires burial.

If men had been employed in making this grave of Moses, the place might have been known. But he dies in the mount alone; angels wrap up his corpse, dig his grave, cover it again; and, it is likely, perform his obsequies with the solemn hymns of heaven. God purposely conceals this treasure, both from men and devils; that he might both cross their curiosity, and prevent their superstition. Yet that Divine hand, which locked up this jewel, keeping the key himself, afterwards brought it forth glorious. When Christ was transfigured, this body which was hid in the valley of Moab, appeared on the hill of Tabor, Matt. xvii. 3: to give us assurance, that the bodies of saints, when they are deposited, are reposed; and shall be as surely raised in glory, as they were laid down in corruption. Let all this teach us four things.

1. That Satan is so far from having power over us living, that he cannot touch our bodies being dead; yea, he cannot find them, when God will conceal them. How tame and poor a thing is that roaring lion, when the Lamb overawes him! He cannot touch a beast of our herds, nor a hair of our heads, nor a dust of our bodies, but by permission. He must first beg leave, and the Lord will give him no leave to do any harm to his chosen.

2. As the angels did wait at the sepulchre of their and our Lord, so I doubt not but, for his sake, they also watch over our graves. With how joyful arms do they take up our souls, that have care of our insensible ashes! O, let us not defile these our bodies in life, which even in death are thus honoured.

3. Satan is the author of superstition. God forbids it, his holy angels hinder it; who be they that maintain it? If the Lord had liked the adoration of his servants' relics, he would never have hidden the body of Moses. There could not have been a fitter object for such a devotion than the body of such a saint. Judge then, with what impudence the church of Rome defends her idolatry to shrines and fragments. God is careful to keep his children from it, they are zealous to persuade their children to it. He hides the whole body of a saint; but if they can get but the finger, or the toe, yea, a nail, a hair, a very straw, they call in their blind customers as to a fair, and happy be those lips that may kiss it. How ridiculous is it, that a shaving of our Tyburn should be so reverend at Tiber; that a piece of the contemptible gallows should be worshipped at Rome! Justly herein are they become the spectacles of folly to all the world. John Baptist hath so many heads, that they cannot tell which is the right. God made him but one, Herod left him none, the papists (as if he were another Hydra) have furnished him with a great many. Christ's cross is so multiplied, that that which one ordinary man might bear, if the pieces were gathered together, would now build a pinnacle of a hundred ton. Yet they will tell us, that every shiver came by revelation, and hath done miracles: but this to me appears the greatest miracle, that any man should believe them. It is folly to place religion in those things, which God on purpose hides from us. It is not his property to restrain us from good. If relics had been allowable, Moses' body should have been public to all visitants.

4. After all this, the angel does not revile the devil, nor curse him with execrations; but remits revenge to the owner, puts over his payment to his Maker; "The Lord rebuke thee." Now if an angel will not curse a devil, a professed and malicious enemy of goodness, of whose amendment there is no possibility; how shall we dare to blaspheme those, who (though for the present sinful enough) may be brought to repentance, and find forgiveness!

They "bring not railing accusation against them before the Lord." From this angelical moderation, we learn three things: First, not to accuse. Secondly, not to rail. Thirdly, to be afraid of such sins.

1. Not to accuse. This is one of the most significant names of the devil, to be an accuser of the brethren. Love covers a multitude of sins; malice discovers what should be concealed. Ham makes sport with his father's nakedness; Shem and Japheth will hide from others what they will not see themselves. These are the sons of Noah, yea, of God: Ham is not worthy of the one, and hath quite lost the other. Not content only to be a witness of his unnatural sight, he proclaims it, and accuseth his own father. Sin doth ill in the eye, but worse in the tongue. Cur aliquid vidi? i. e. Why saw I any thing? was the poet's complaint: his tongue had not thus complained of his eyes, if the trust of his eyes had not been betrayed by his tongue. To have conscientia lumina, i. e. conscious eyes, might be his fate; but to have patula labia, i. e. open lips, was his fault. Ungracious Ham saw, and laughed: his father's shame should have been his. He is a graceless man that makes sport with the cause of his sorrow. This was bad, but to blab it was far worse: as all sin is a deed of darkness, so to be buried in darkness.

Howsoever, it is our fashion to make ourselves merry with the sins of our brethren, yea, (which is more unnatural impiety than Ham's,) to publish the nakedness of our spiritual fathers to their enemies; and it is a rare merriment that breaks up without some jest or tale of a priest: yet our tongues offend more in this, than did their hands; the report of sin is often as bad as the commission. A Christian sees his brother fall with sorrow and silence. Shem and Japheth hear and grieve, but dare not see; they will not go forward to behold it, but backward to hide it; and without daring to look back, they will rather adventure to stumble at their father's body, than to see his shame. Grieve they did to think that they who had so often come to their holy father with reverence, should now in reverence turn their backs upon him; and clothe him in pity, who had so often in love clothed them. But such was their goodness; they did it, and said nothing. As this commends them, so let it teach us. The sins of those we love and honour, we must hear of with indignation, believe with unwillingness, acknowledge with grief, hide with honest excuses, and bury in silence. For commonly they infect others by example, but always prove us to be uncharitable.

But is it lawful for no man to accuse? Enormities may then pass without censure among us, as murders do in some states without apprehension; where no man will stop the homicide, for fear of being counted a hangman. Yes, there be some deputed for this purpose. Paul mentions the house of Chloë, from whence he had information of the Corinthian disorders, 1 Cor. i. 11. Answerable to which, we have the office of churchwardens; they are the house of Chloe, bound by oath to present misdemeanours, that sin may have a just censure. I know that this place may be abused, not only by connivance, but spleen. He that with a particular heart-burning presents his neighbour, though his accusation be just, his affection is unjust; and in doing that he sins, which he had sinned in not doing. The complaint may be true, and the complainer false. The one is punished, the other cannot be commended. When Paul bade them salute with a holy kiss, he implied, there is a kiss that is not holy. Informers of penal statutes make often just complaints; but because their end is not the correction of faults, but fishing for the mullets, or wreaking their spleens, they do the office of devils. Yea, there be false Zibas, that unjustly accuse honest Mephibosheths, to get away their lands and places. These outdo mischief itself.

But let them accuse to whom it belongs; yet alas, there is an All is well, that swallows all vanities. Drunkenness, uncleanness, swearing, profanation of the sabbath, go abroad all the year; but when the visitation comes, they are locked up with an All is well. This is not that charity which covereth sin, but a miserable indulgence that cherisheth sin. In the creation there was an Omnia bene, all things were exceeding good: in our redemption was an Omnia bene, He hath done all things well; he hath made the blind to see, and the lame to go: here was an Omnia bene indeed; but there never was an Omnia bene since. But for private men, falsely or maliciously to accuse their brethren, is to be Satan's deputies. We have a proverb, it is a shame to belie the devil; but they are past shame that belie the saints. If we will accuse any, let us accuse ourselves. It is for a Pharisee to accuse the publican, I am not as this man; the publican doth not accuse the Pharisee, but himself. Satan doth continually accuse us to God; if we humbly accuse ourselves, his bill shall be thrown out of the court.

2. Not to rail. This is indeed properly the language of hell. Angels do not rail, devils do: angels do not curse, devils do. You need no other proof, who be the children of Satan, than railing invectives. You may know what countrymen they are, as the maid said of Peter, for their speech bewrayeth them. The language of heaven is praise and hallelujahs, no execration was ever heard there. The language of hell is cursing and gnashing of teeth. Alas, that such a language should be heard upon earth! Think of it, ye inhuman scolds, and graceless blasphemers; who are able to turn the calmest Thames to a tempest; who, as if you had been bred only among bears, know no other dialect than roaring, cursing, and banning one another: it is the tongue of hell you speak, as men beforehand learn the language of that country whither they mean to travel. Ishmael was a foe to all men, and no man was Ishmael's friend. You have abused all; sworn away the fear of God, the love of man, the guard of angels; what friends can ye now expect, but they that speak like you, devils? If a man be evil, why do ye curse him? It is Satan's desire to wish a man worse; and it is your own common saying, Do not curse him, he is mad enough. If he be good, why then do ye curse him? Your curse is an arrow shot against a stone, it shall wound yourselves. Some having begun to curse, though they meant it at man, yet suddenly livert it to Satan; but let them read and tremble, 'When the ungodly curseth Satan, he curseth his own soul,' Eccles. xxi. 27. The devil delights to hear is curse him; that fox never fares better than when he is cursed. But put away all bitterness, and if you must be bitter to some, be bitter to your own sins. Rend your hearts, whose tongues have rent the glorious name of your Maker. Remember the penitent publican, Luke xviii. 13; because he had thought sin, he smote his breast; because he had spoke sin, he taught his tongue to confess; because he had acted sin, he struck with his hand, the instrument of action.

Now, if it be so wicked to revile equals, what is it to rail at princes! which is the heart of the text. Will you see the odiousness of this sin in one example? Shimei cursed David, "Come out, thou bloody man, and thou man of Belial," 2 Sam. xvi. 7. It was bad to curse, worse to curse a king, but to curse an afflicted king worst of all; to add weights to him that was weighed down, and to persecute him whom God had humbled. Every word was a slander: he calls him a usurper, a man of blood, and that of Saul's house; how false! God sent for him out of the fields to be anointed, how was he an intruder? The man after God's own heart, is branded for a man of Belial. He that regretted for but the cutting off Saul's garment, is reproached as a man of blood. If his hands were stained with blood, it was not of Saul's house. It was his servant, not his master, that bled by him. But malicious men care not for truth, but for spite. Did not David shed the blood of that Amalekite, who did but say he shed Saul's? How did he bewail the death of so bad a master; wishing that no dew might fall where that royal blood was poured out! 2 Sam. i. 21. How indulgent was he to the house of Saul! How did he honour Mephibosheth at his own table! How did he revenge the blood of Ishbosheth, though his rival, upon his murderers! Who could less deserve these aspersions than David? Had Shimei been other than a dog, he had never so rudely barked at a harmless passenger. That head deserved to be tongueless, that body to be headless, that thus blasphemed the Lord's anointed. Cursing is for hell; but let all those learn to bless, that look to be heirs of the blessing.

3. We must be afraid of these impieties, as being away before the Lord. A good man would not admit them, were he sure that God would never take notice of it; but before the Lord, who dares rail on his delected image? There is a fear from entire nature; this was in Christ: every creature fears the ruin of itself. There is a fear from corrupt nature; which is a slavish dread of the punishment, not of the sin: this is in reprobates. There is a fear of grace, which works in all, men and angels, a care to please their Maker. Corrupt fear dreads the penalty, loves the sin. Gracious fear dreads the sin, and escapes the penalty. The fear of the Lord is pure, because it keeps the heart from being defiled. When God said, Who shall seduce Ahab? 1 Kings xxii. 20, not one angel in the whole host of heaven gave him an ill word, though he were a wicked prince; not one is willing to undertake this office. Only the father of lies puts himself forward, I will do it.

The good angels fear to do evil, yea, the very devils believe and tremble, Jam. ii. 19; and shall not man be afraid to sin? Shall a piece of mortal dust be thus insolent? O we want their eyes, to behold the infinite majesty of that God whom we offend. We know not the sweet pleasures of heaven, and the beatifical vision of the Trinity, as the angels do: if we did, how would we fear to lose it by our sins! We know not the torments of hell, the eternity and extremity of that fire, as the devils do: if we did, we would fear to incur it by our sins. If the king threatens a malefactor to the dungeon, to the rack, to the wheel, his bones tremble, a terrible palsy runs through all his joints. But let God threaten the insufferable tortures of burning Tophet, the wicked (as if either they were just, or this were false) stand unmoved. Be not deceived, "It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God," who is even "a consuming fire," Heb. x. 31; xii. 29. Hear this, ye that dare rail, and not be afraid; that dare blaspheme, and not tremble; that dare rebel, oppress, riot, adulterate, plot revenge, and what not, without fear. The angels are afraid, yet they are in heaven, and sure of the best; the devils are afraid, yet they are in hell, and know the worst; you are betwixt both, and know not which of both shall be your receptacle. O "pass the time of your sojourning here in fear," 1 Pet. i. 17: fear the works of darkness, as you fear the place of darkness; fear the Lord, that he may love you, and love him, that he may delight to do you good.

VERSE 12.

But these, as natural brute beasts, made to be taken and destroyed, speak evil of the things that they understand not; and shall utterly perish in their own corruption.

WHEN sin grows insolent, it is time for preachers to be fervent; sinners must not live like beasts, and be flattered like men. If the princes of Israel pamper their flesh with the food of riot, the prophet will not stick to call them the fat bulls of Bashan. The apostle is not afraid to put the deserved title of brutes upon these graceless deceivers. Never was that man mealy-mouthed, that was full of the Lord's errand. Do we herein displease any? Should we please men, we were not the servants of God, Gal. i. 10: should we please beasts in the shapes of men, we were the servants of Satan. Shall we walk in the spirit of falsehood, and prophesy of wine and strong drink? Micah ii. 11: this were to be a beast for company. But, as we hope you have no will to be such hearers; so, blessed be God, we have no skill to be such preachers. Bishop Latimer in his ultimum vale to the court, protested that if he should say nothing the whole hour together, but the very words of his text, Beware of covetousness, his sermon might be thought witless, not needless. We may say the like of the vice in my text, intemperance; it were not lost labour, nor mispent time, to say nothing else, till we had all amended that. But as some seed is sown among thorns, which prick the sides of the sower; so, much by the high-way, which, for want of mould and root, the fowls of the air, boon companions, peck up. "The bellows are burned," Jer. vi. 29, but the wicked are not turned. It seems, the prophet had burned a hole in his bellows, gotten the consumption of the lungs, spent his spirits, and lost his labours. This is our unhappiness, but more yours. Ministers (as Christ did to the Jews) offer the world wine; and the world (as the Jews did to Christ) return them vinegar. What we give with the right hand, they take with the left: we are born for the good of many, few are born for the good of us. But howsoever we speed, God's message must be delivered: we dare not but call sinners by their names, unnatural men, natural beasts.

These damnable seducers are here described further, by Their resemblance, As natural brute beasts.

Their ordinance, Made to be taken and destroyed.

Their ignorance, Speak evil of things they understand not.

Their vengeance, Shall perish in their own corruption.

First, for their resemblance: wherein I consider two things; what they are like, Beasts; wherein they are like them, In sensuality.

1. What they are like, Beasts. The wicked have many homely comparisons in the Scripture. Sometimes to reprobate silver, Jer. vi. 30, which will buy no commodity: sometimes to doted trees, good for nothing but the fire, Jude 12. To dung; yea, they are not so useful; for it serves to manure the ground, they to infect it. Often to beasts; wherein the Divine justice shames them, flinging filth in the faces of his degenerate creatures. Pejus ilia comparari, quam esse, as it is said; i. e. it is better to be a beast, than a man compared with beasts. The spirit of beasts is made of the air, and into air it resolveth; it knows nothing but the present, makes no reckoning of hereafter, nor shall hereafter be called to a reckoning for it. They have grovelling faces, earth is their ultimum, or final end. Man's body is of a nobler fabric, his very constitution naturally erects him to a higher aim. Besides, his soul, a particle of the Divine breath, is able to discourse, argue, conclude, infer; conceives by reason a future life, to which this but prepares, and which it begins.

Let a beast do a mischief; suppose a lion kills his prey, he retires to his den, and quietly feeds, without fear of answering for this fact. When man hath done a murder, there is a fury within him, louder than cracks of thunder, sharper than stings of scorpions, a conscience awaked by the cry of blood: no beast ever knew what conscience was. Thus man, having more noble endowments, shames his creation by living like beasts. You have read many fables and apologues, wherein beasts are feigned to speak like men; but who would endure that theatre, where men be seen to play the beasts? Such is the power of sin, it can transform men into beasts: so, in a moral sense, are all those metamorphoses to be understood, wherein the poets transshaped men into beasts. While idolaters turn beasts into gods, they turn themselves into beasts.

2. They want not their resemblances, and the similitude holds both generally and specially. Generally, in three things.

(1.) The whole intendment of the beast is sensuality; so wicked men are wholly led by sensuality. Their soul is made a slave to their sense; and while this rebels, she that worst may, must hold the candle. She thinks of praying; but if the flesh will have it so, there must be singing and dancing: she persuades to fasting, but the flesh hales on to rioting. All her morning care must be to provide the body's dinner: nor is she only made the body's caterer, but even too often his pander.

(2.) Beasts cannot foresee the future, nor provide for the future; they have no providence; but the expectation of the day ends with it: they count not of weeks and years, but only rise and roost with the sun. So these brutish animals make no other provision. If you say, they can lay up victuals for tomorrow; so do divers beasts; the little ant fills her granaries in harvest for the winter store. In this they are but even with beasts; and for the foresight of vengeance to come, they are no better. Yea, some beasts can prognosticate a storm, and run to shelter: these men provide no refuge, but think to bear off the judgments of God with head and shoulders. Hares have their muses, and foxes foreacquaint themselves with burrows, whither being hunted they run for succour; these have not a hole to hide them heads. Therefore when conscience begins to thunder, and the torrent roars with an inundation of sorrows, they fly to the fiddle, to the tavern; which is as if, when it rains, a man should run into the Thames to keep him dry. They know no more how their time passeth away, than a beast is able to tell the clock. Therefore commonly their departure is so sudden, that when they look for a pleasant peal, behold it is their passing-bell.

(3.) Beasts are not ashamed of their deeds: where is no reason, there is no sin; and where is no sin, there can be no shame. These have reason, yet are not ashamed of their abominations, Jer. viii. 12; and therein are beasts, or worse. Yea, the very dog, though he cannot blush, will go away as if he were ashamed, when he hath done a shrewd turn, and is taken in the manner. But these have a mercerious forehead, stupid and steeled with impudence, shame-proof: there is not so much blood of grace in their hearts, as will serve to make half a blush in their cheeks. Their end will be worse than frontless Gehazi's: for want of red, his skin was spotted with white: he strove to outface Elisha, let him try to outface the leprosy.

Specially, for some particulars; there is a near similitude of their conditions. As they have matched themselves, so take them by couples.

(1.) The goat and the whoremonger, a pair of unclean beasts, fit for no place but the ragged mountains and deserts. They think wantonness nothing else but the mere appetite of nature. But who be they that shall be set on the left hand, with a Go, re cursed? Goats.

(2.) The hog and the covetous, a pair of odious beasts. They are both rooting in the earth, that is their felicity; both rooting up the earth, that is their mischief: both love to wallow in the mire; one so sordid as the avaricious: both will break through all fences, if they be not yoked: both are runting and insatiate: neither of them both do good while they live, some good may be got from them both when they are dead.

(3.) The wolf and the oppressor, a pair of ravenous beasts. Both love to suck the warm blood of innocent lambs, both to fill their holes with rapine; both mark at the moon, any light that may discover their mischiefs; both are greedy to swallow more than they can digest; both howl when their hopes are disappointed; both live by the spoil, the wolf of other beasts, the oppressor of his own kind: both do so well match together, that it was good for the land if they were both hanged together.

(4.) The palfrey and the swaggerer, a pair of unriddled beasts, Psal. xxxii. 9. The horse will cast his rider, and being down, give him a farewell with his heels. For men being reproved, to kick at the messengers of God, is a gallant, yet but a jadish, quality. When a bridle of prohibition is put into his jaws, he frets and fumes, as if he were so great that God must not cross him. But all he gets by it, that when a snaffle cannot rule him, a stronger it shall be put into his mouth. As we have seen a roud horse, that will not be stopped in his career with the sharpest bit; but runs on headily till he comes to some wall or ditch, and then stands still and trembles. Death is that terrible ditch which will stay his fury; he is a headstrong beast whom that ghastly foe cannot break.

(5.) The fox and the cheater, a pair of crafty beasts. Both love to do mischief, neither loves to win it: robbery is both their trades; they live by it, either indeed can they live without it. The fox will stand by the river, and let his tail play in the water, till the fishes come flocking about it, and then with a jerk he swoops them out. His hole is his study, and the fold his stage, where he plays his part. Herod was such a fox, but Christ could hunt him out. The Jesuits are such foxes; they will not look towards the booty they aim at; yet all their labour about your conscience is but to get a benison to their own college. There should be no robbing of the living, to give the dead; (Chrysost. in Luke xi.) but these foxes will allow you no rest, till you give something for requiems: if a rich papist do not buy some souls out of purgatory, they doom him to hell. This with them is a pious fraud, but by the same reason the fox is a pious beast. Would many of our shops were not the burrows of such foxes: there is no subtlety like that, which deceives a man, and hath thanks for the labour.

(6.) The bear and the harlot, a pair of cruel beasts. Both lie at stake, both are to be baited by officers of justice: both their flesh is sold for money, both are to be avoided as dangerous to society; the poor beasts have but abused bodies, the one withal a torn conscience, for their pains. A harlot in her malice, is worse than a she-bear robbed of her whelps. She is a thief in her pleasure, but a devil in her anger. She sets a price on her body, she sets no price on her soul: that she sells, this she gives away for nought. Both these beasts stand in fear of punishment.

(7.) The viper and the traitor, a pair of pestilent beasts. Such a generation of vipers were the Pharisees, who wounded the church with their stings, wherein they were bred. Jesuited emissaries had first their birth and breeding in the indulgent bosom of England; yet, most unnaturally, they betray their own mother to misery and ruin. They are infectious plagues to the families that harbour them; the bane of many poor souls, beside their own.

(8.) The asp and the slanderer, a pair of stinging beasts. So the Psalm matcheth them, "The poison of asps is under their lips," Rom. iii. 13. The asp sucks not her cacochemical poison from her food, but hath it bred in her own nature. The calumniator derives not his railing venom from the object, for that is commonly good; but makes it in his own bosom. Slanderers are also compared to scorpions; to avoid whom, men use to place their beds in water; yet the politic serpents have a device to reach them. They get up to the top of the house, where one takes hold, the next hangs at the end of him, a third upon a second, a fourth upon the third; and so making a rope of scorpions, they at last wound the man. (Ælian.) Among scandalizers, one begins a whisper, another makes it a report, a third enlargeth it to a dangerous calumny, a fourth divulges it for truth. So the innocent man's credit is maimed, and he cannot find out the villain that did it.

(9.) The frog and the murmurer, a pair of croaking things. Both of them are bred of the mud, they come from no noble matter. Some write that it raineth frogs: we might think so too by the number of our malcontents; men that will find fault with every thing, whom God himself scarce knows how to please. No fair weather nor rain, peace nor war, can satisfy them. There is no work of God, but opens their clamorous throats. When Bacchus was sent to fetch the worthier of Euripedes or Æschylus out of hell, as he passed in Charon's wherry, he heard nothing but the croaking of frogs: whereby the poets insinuate what a number of querulous and litigious persons be in hell.

I might add many more; as, first, the spaniel and the flatterer, a pair of dissembling beasts: both feed their master's humour, that he may feed their hunger; both bewire a man with fawning on him. But let the great one use his sycophant, as he does his spaniel, and try if he will love him the better for beating him. Secondly, the squirrel and the busy-body, a pair of nimble and pragmatical beasts; but the squirrel is the nimbler and wittier: some write of her, that because she cannot swim well, when she would cross a brook, she gets a piece of the bark of a tree, puts it into the water, and herself into it as in a boat; and then holds up her bushy tail instead of a sail, that so the wind may drive her over. The pragmatical hath an oar in every man's boat, an eye in every man's window; is here, and there, and every where, but where he should be; is still busy, yet never hath thanks for his labour. Thirdly, the civet-cat and perfumed gull, a pair of sweet beasts: only this scent is natural in the one, in the other artificial; and what the one beast disburdens in scorn, the other takes up in pride.

I might couple the tiger and the persecutor, the boar and the church robber; or tell you of tumblers, beasts that have brought up their bodies to show tricks; of lurchers, that live by pilfering; of setters, that will bring the booty to the thieves' hand, panders of filthiness. There be moles, blind, earthy muckworms; weasels and vermin, and innumerable human beasts, or bestial men. But who would dwell long among beasts? I am weary of this brutish comparison. Only there is one among men, for whom I can find no sample among beasts; the drunkard. I know not with what beast to match him; he is such a beast, that no beast will keep him company. The nearest to him is the swine, let them two be yoked together.

Now if men think scorn thus to be compared, let them forbear to deserve such a comparison. Yea, let me further aggravate their shame: there be men that exceed even beasts in sensuality. Beasts drink not but when they are dry: the drunkard never taries till he be athirst. What beast, but he, pours in more, when he hath already too much? Incontinent man knows no limits, but is infinite in his desires. In many things men are so much worse than beasts, as they ought to be better.

How well soever we think of ourselves, the Scripture sends us to divers beasts for our learning. The very ants are our schoolmasters, to teach us providence. The dog is loving to his master, and watchful for his safety. The horse is valiant, startless at the drum, neighs at the trumpet, is forward to the battle; to shame our cowardice. The lion is a precedent of temperance; after a full meal he ties himself to a three days' abstinence: he is liberal, and leaves part of his prey for inferior beasts; condemning those churlish men that eat their morsels alone, and put the reversion in their cupboards. He is full of nobleness, he scorns to seize upon the yielding; whereas men prey on prostrate fortunes. So moderate in his revenge, that he will do a man no more injury than he receives from him, as some write. The ape is quick of apprehension, apt for imitation: lewd men will not learn to do good either by precept or precedent. The elephant is kind; if he meet a man that hath lost his way, he will both guide him, and defend him. (Plin.) The ox knows his feeder, to teach us thankfulness. Thus, if they may not be guides, to direct us; they shall be, after a sort, judges, to condemn us; as the dogs condemned that rich man, who were less covetous of their kindness than their master, Luke xvi.

Sensuality is the vice here condemned; a brutish conversation of men; who only desire to live, that they may eat and drink; which is indeed to live more belluino. He that hoards corn in the time of dearth, shall be cursed, and he deserves it; yet his winnowed store shall at last break forth: but drunken engrossers diminish our plenty, and stow it where it shall never do good. How many thousands, hard driven with poverty, or by the exigence of war, might be relieved with that which these spend like beasts. How just a punishment is famine after such a satiety, and pestilence after famine; turning the sanctuary of life into the shambles of death! Lam. iv. 10. Lycurgus, to cure the people's drunkenness, caused all the vines to be cut down; he might better have made a well in every vineyard, and married in every cup a watery nymph to fiery Bacchus. Immoderation makes wine poison; yea, worse; for the worst poison helps some, but the drunkard's potion hurts all. Some plead that they are able to bear it out; but to be a strong drinker is but to be a stronger beast. The excess is a sin, whatsoever the success be. Whatever be the purpose before, or the event after, yet not the strength in bearing it, but the abstinence from taking it, is praiseworthy. How foolish is it, for a little tickling of the palate, for a running banquet, to hazard eternal comfort!

"Made to be taken and destroyed." A fearful saying! what, created to be destroyed? If we understand it only of beasts, the matter is not great; for they can perish but once, and from their destruction ariseth our preservation. If they be noxious, we are preserved from their mischief; if edible, by their nourishment. When they spend their lives in our service, this was but their end; they were made for the purpose. But that man should be made to be marred, created for destruction; this is terrible, and (if not warily understood) uncomfortable. Some beasts are made to be taken, not destroyed; some to be destroyed, and not taken; some both to be taken and destroyed. 1. We take the horse and ass, we destroy them not; but teach them to carry us, or provision for us. We put their backs to the burden, not their throats to the knife. 2. There be ravenous beasts and venomous serpents, hostile to man, malicious dangers of our life; we seek to destroy them, not to take them. We send our bullets and arrows, the messengers of death, into their bowels: we abhor their carcases. 3. There be beasts for eating and using, as sheep and kine; these we take and kill: the pasture feds and fits them for the table; we feed them, to feed on them. Reprobates are ordained for both: when they have done the devil special service, drawn in his yoke, wrought out their own perdition; then that merciless butcher cuts their throats, and makes himself a meal of their souls.

But let us hold this conclusion; as God made no man for sin, so nor immediately for hell. As one says, Deus hominem condit, homo se perdit; i. e. God creates man, man destroys himself. But how then is it said here, "made to be taken and destroyed?" This is a point that I did not willingly seek, nor unwillingly find; it stands in my way, and I durst not pass it by unnoticed. For method, 1. I will lay down some infallible grounds. 2. Answer the objections that quarrel with them. 3. Give the sum or clear conclusion. 4. Lastly, apply it to ourselves.

Grounds. 1. God is an absolute Lord over his creatures, and hath as just right of their disposition, as he had power of their creation. Is it not lawful for him to do what he will with his own? Matt. xx. 15. Man challengeth authority over his goods, and he may set this vessel on his cupboard, that other on the dunghill. We are God's vessels, he made us, he owes us, hath an incomparable right over us; may he not then dispose us? Man in his family, takes in this servant, turns that out of doors; and this, because he will do so: it were then desperate boldness to deny God the same faculty in his own house. In the world, man kills this beast, lets alone the other, yet is not counted unjust: now a fly is more worth in respect of us, than we can be in respect of God. In a heap of clay, the potter sits working, and makes of the same lump in his hand, one part a cup for honour, the other for dishonour. Far greater is the liberty of God's perfection, and the perfection of his liberty.

2. God is always most just, nor can he do other than what is perfectly good. Goodness is not the rule of his will, but his will is the rule of goodness. As a father expresses it, He does not will a thing because it is good, but for this reason it is good, because he wills it. His judgments are sometimes manifest, often secret, always wonderful, never unjust.

3. The will of God is the cause of all causes, in which we must make a stand; and neither beyond it, nor without it, seek for any reason. It is so; why? because he would have it so. Why would he so have it? There is no cause of the first cause. The sea, be it never so deep, hath a bottom; the heavens, be they never so high, have a top; but of the will of God there are no limits, no confines. God in all his works seeks for no cause out of himself. The rich man chooseth the object of his charity at his own pleasure; this beggar he makes his heir, not that; and without injury. Yet here may be some cause out of himself; the person whom he adopts, may be more pleasing to his eye, or obsequious to his commands. But the Lord's choosing hath no impulsive cause out of himself; he did not elect men because he foresaw they would be good, but they are made good by his election. Nor did he reject others without respect to their sins.

4. The Lord hath purposed to pass by some men, for the manifestation of his justice in their deserved ruin: it is his will to suffer some to fall into sin, and for their sin to condemn them, 1 Pet. ii. 8. That which is against the will of God, comes not to pass without the will of God: he willeth that to be, which he willeth not to do; and though he esteem not evil to be good, yet he esteemeth it good that there should be evil.

5. He hath not ordained any to destruction without the respect of sin; for look what condemneth men in the world, for that did God purpose to condemn them before the world. Not that sin is the cause of this decree, but that this decree is not separated from the regard of sin. He doth not simply and absolutely ordain his creature to hell, but he decreeth punishment with relation unto sin. So then this conclusion is firm, Man is not condemned because of God's decree, but because of his own sin.

Objections. 1. If the will of God be the energetical, operative beginning of all things, then also the beginning of sin. Ans. God's will is the cause of all things being and existent, Eph. i. 11: a thing is not first, and afterwards God wills it; but he decrees it first, and therefore it is. Now sin is not properly an existence, being, or action; but a defect. There is a being, or existence, really and positively; and one that is in reason only; under which are contained not only notions and relations, but also privations. Sin hath not a positive being, yet is it not nothing; but necessarily follows the absence of righteousness. God made not sin, yet he justly condemneth for sin.

2. But if God suffers man to do evil, is he not the author of that evil? Ans. No, for he is not bound to hinder it. He doth not give grace; who can challenge him? Is it not his own? He doth not infuse corruption; he doth not withhold the occasion. The rider gives his fiery horse the reins, we say he puts him on: the hunter lets slip his dog, we say he puts him on the game. A house is ready to fall, leans on some outward supporters; take away these, the house falls of itself. God forbids sin, the wicked are the more eager on it. As in the middle region of the air, the heat grows stronger by the antiperistasis or revulsion on every part, and from hence proceed the thunder and lightnings; the clouds being condensed by the heat round encompassed. So the wicked heart, struggling with the good law, becomes more turbulent and fiery in sin.

3. If God have decreed some to destruction, it must follow of necessity, and so man is condemned against his will. Ans. No, for God's decree doth not impose a necessity upon the will of man. Indeed there is a hypothetical necessity, of consequence: if God deny men his grace, they will sin and perish; but this is their own will: those whom he hath chosen, shall never be damned; yet with their own will they are saved. The elect angels do necessarily obey God, yet not by constraint, but willingly. It is one thing to throw a sheep into the river, another thing to show her grass on the other side, and allure her to swim to it. God, says one, does not compel that to be done, which he condemns when done. God's decree doth altogether order every event; by inclining the will gently in things that be good, and forsaking it in things that be evil. If men will offend, he is just to punish; if they will return, he is merciful to forgive. As he saves none but in respect of Christ, so he condemneth none but in regard of sin. That all mankind was lost, we may thank ourselves; blessed be the goodness of God, that any be saved in Jesus Christ.

4. The Scripture speaks of the salvation of all men; how then are some made to be destroyed? They urge these places, John i. 29; iii. 17; 2 Cor. v. 19; 1 John ii. 2. To which we oppose, 1 John v. 19; John xvii. 9. These we reconcile out of St. Augustine, The "whole world" is the church, and the whole world hateth the church. The world hateth the world; the malignant world hates the reconciled world; the damned world the saved world. But "God will have all men to be saved," 1 Tim. ii. 4. Ans. All is taken either distributively; then it signifies every particular person. "All," that is, every one, 2 Thess. i. 3. Or collectively, and then it signifies any one, not every one. Christ healed every disease, Matt. ix. 35, that is, any disease, or every kind of disease. Every man is a liar, saith the prophet: now if every man be a liar, then is he a liar that speaks it; and if he be a liar that speaks it, then is it not true which he speaks; so, in that sense, to say that every man is a liar, must be a lie itself. Or, God wills all to be saved, that is, of those that are saved; for none are saved but by his willing it. (Hieron. in Eph. i. Com.) Or Paul in this, and such other places, speaks according to his own affection, and charitable judgment; as he calls them in divers churches, men elected; which was his charity, not his certainty. But still God hath his peculiar people, Tit. ii. 14; therefore the rest are common: and at the last day many shall be turned back with an I know you not, Matt. vii. 23. He is lost who is born; no one is saved who is not born again. (Austin.) Hell was not made for nothing; some must perish.

Conclusion. This then be the sum; God did not make any man for the only purpose to destroy him; but these speeches must be understood by way of consequence and effect. I came not to send peace, but a sword, and fire, upon earth, saith Christ; and to set men at variance, Matt. x. 34, 35; Luke xii. 49. Yet, certainly, this was not the end of his coming; neither sword nor fire was his intent, but peace: these are produced by accident; and through the malice of Satan and men, do necessarily follow it; therefore he saith, I came to send fire. So the apostle, seeing men so desperately wicked, speaks of their making, according to their present being: as when we see a man perishing, we say, he was born to this fortune; yet his mother did not bear him to such a purpose. This ordinance he setteth down either by revelation, the Spirit of God so informing him; or by probable conclusion, reason so leading him: "They that do such things, shall not inherit the kingdom of God," Gal. v. 21. But for us, we must not peremptorily conclude the destruction of any man, though obstinately wicked; because God is so indulgent to the intervention of repentance. In those dreadful thunders of the law, where every sentence sounds like the sentence of death, every line is an axe laid to the root of the tree, every word able to affright the reader; even there, repentance creeps into the text, and makes room for herself among all those terrors. In the midst of all those astonishing curses, she finds a merciful place. She turns the stream of anger, the torrent of plagues; and like a strong east wind, divides the Red Sea of God's wrath, till his judgments, like those waters, stand on heaps, while repentance walks through the midst, and escapes. This is that secret reservation, which the Divine mercy hath wrapped up in his menaces; an exception to the general rule of his justice. This suspended Nineveh's doom, Jer. xviii. 8, and stretched out her respite of forty days to the allowance of forty years. A prophet tells a king, "Thou shalt die, and not live," Isa. xxxviii. 1; a Hebrew pleonasm, for sureness' sake: who could conceive a more absolute speech? Yet was there a condition involved, and his days were lengthened. God said to Abimelech, "Behold, thou art but a dead man, for the woman which thou hast taken," Gen. xx. 3. Yet the event was otherwise, to show that there was an exception enclosed, Unless thou restore her undefiled. To apply all to ourselves:

1. We were never admitted into God's registry, to turn over his rolls, and to see what names he hath written for death, and what for life. Therefore because we know the doom of none, let us pray for all. And (to show how mercifully our Maker means to comfort our hearts) we may be sure of our own election, sure of others' salvation; we can be sure of no man's reprobation. We cannot say, This man is ordained to be destroyed: we may say of him that brings forth good fruits, This man is ordained to be saved. We may be sure of others' salvation by charity, of our own by faith; of others' by their fruits, of our own by the witness of the Holy Spirit. It is true indeed, that neither can apostasy, or turning unto sin, alter God's decree for evil; as the papists make God's election to depend on man's work: as if he should say, Indeed I determined you to salvation, but had I known you would have proved so wicked, I would never have done it; now I reverse it. Nor can repentance or turning from sin alter his decree for good: I meant you lost men, but now I see you return, I will accept you to mercy. Far be both these thoughts from us. True conversion may change his sentence, it can never change his purpose.

2. Let this humble our proud hearts, and teach us to pass the time of our sojourning here in fear. "They were broken off because of unbelief, thou standest by faith. Be not high-minded, but fear," Rom. xi. 20. Thou speedest well, insult not over him that speeds otherwise. Uterque meruere vindictam, tu non meruisti gloriam; i. e. Both have deserved vengeance, thou hast not deserved honour or mercy: if either be spared, it is altogether of mercy, without merit. Charity is the fruit that grows on the tree of election.

"Put on, as the elect of God, holy and beloved, bowels of mercies," Col. iii. 12. We are adjudged by our election, selection, dilection, to be merciful: elect before time, holy in time, beloved at all times. God hath chosen the humble: "He regarded the low estate of his handmaiden," Luke i. 48. Humility was not the cause of this choice, but this choice comes not without humility. I will mistrust that heart, which in a haughty contempt of others, magnifies himself: it is likely, that man hath chosen himself, not that God hath chosen him. When the lots were cast for a kingdom, many an Israelite stood fair, and flattered himself, Why not I? Modest Saul hid himself, yet God gave him the crown. It ill becomes a man, even that hath merited honour, to be proud of either his honour or merit. But when an undeserving beggar is picked out, and graced above his fellows, if he be proud, his honour will sit unhandsonely on him, because his beggarly heart is still in him. Generally, he that presumes most, speeds worst.

"Work out your salvation with fear and trembling," Phil. ii. 12: not with pride and insulting, nor with horror and despairing; but with fear and trembling. By humility in good deeds, and fear of evil deeds, a man may work out salvation: the other will work him out of salvation. It is the devil's most dangerous assault; You are sure of your election, know your own name to be written in heaven, and by that title are better than princes; why do you not take it more upon you, and bear up your head higher? No, Satan, pride cast thee down from heaven, it will never lift me up to heaven. "Blessed are the poor in spirit; for theirs is the kingdom of heaven," Matt. v. 3: the proud in spirit have no such interest; yea, theirs is the kingdom of hell. "I am not as other men are," saith the Pharisee, Luke xviii. 11; and the clock of his tongue went truer than the dial of his heart: not like other men indeed, for he was like none that should be saved. God hath chosen the weak to confound the mighty, 1 Cor. i. 27, not the mighty to domineer over the weak. An angel was sent to a city of Galilee, Luke i. 26: this is God's fashion, to seek out the most despised, on whom to bestow his favours and honours: the cottages of Galilee are preferred to the palaces of Jerusalem. Pride hatcheth its own ruin; there is never any danger in humility. (Bern.) A tall man comes in at a high door, and he stoops: the door is far higher than the man, yet he stoops: you will say, he needs not stoop: but I hope there is no harm in his stooping. A man may easily bear himself too high upon God's favour, but his humility shall never hurt him. "The foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal, The Lord knoweth them that are his," 2 Tim. ii. 19: and upon this foundation thou standest; yet "let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall," 1 Cor. x. 12.

3. Let us shun the means that may bring us to condemnation. Let God alone with his counsels, look we to his oracles. What he wills us to do, let us do it: what he wills us not to know, let us not seek it. There be three courses which may bring a man to the sentence of reprobation. I speak not so much of God's purpose before the world began, as of his sentence when the world shall end. First, infidelity: he that will not believe, deprives himself of all possibility to be saved. Nor is it enough to believe that God sent Christ to save the world, but also to save me. Historical faith may overcome ignorance, but it is applying faith that can deliver us from vengeance. Every one that says he believeth, is not sure to be saved; but he that never will believe, is sure to be damned. Secondly, impenitence: even believers do sin, but repentance is always blest with forgiveness. But they that live in known sins, without relenting hearts, cut themselves off from the hope of mercy. He that plays on purpose to lose, is not likely to win. Be resolved against transgression, as you would be resolved of your salvation. We are chosen to be holy; they that never come to be holy, were not chosen. Thirdly, apostacy: if men turn wholly from God, it is an argument that God did never wholly turn to them. There is a double apostacy: first, of faith; and this is desperate; that man was made to be destroyed. There remains no more sacrifice for his sins, Heb. x. 26; because he hath sacrificed his sacrifice, abandoned his expiation. Secondly, of obedience; and of this backsliding who is not guilty?

There be three forsakings condemned by the canons and councils. When a soldier forsakes his captain, a wife her husband, and a priest his charge. Which made St. Ambrose and Augustine resolve, that they would never commend a wife to a man, nor a soldier to a war. Now we are all these respects to God. Christ is our Captain, we his sworn soldiers, that have in baptism took his press-money: if we forsake his colours, we are perfidious, and worthy of martial law. He is our Husband, we his spouse, solemnly betrothed before men and angels; we have vowed our loves to him, and to him only: if we break this covenant, and admit adulterous embraces, we have merited a divorce. His commandments are our charge, he hath made us spiritual priests to his Father. Now if, instead of this holy sacrifice, the calves of our lips, the incense of our hearts, the charity of our hands, we shall offer to other gods; either idols of the water, sensual lusts; or idols of the fire, malice and revenge; or idols of the air, vain honours and secular glories; or idols of the earth, worldly riches; how fearful is the end, even to be destroyed! But let us hold our colours, keep our vows, be faithful in our charges; so (surely) we are made to be saved.

4. Let us be charitable in all our censures of all Christians, yea, even of living pagans, for they may be called. Paul was guilty of Stephen's innocent blood; the church had then small hope of his conversion. Yet even he that sent Stephen before, was ordained to follow after. For this Stephen prayed, "Lord, lay not this sin to their charge," Acts vii. 60. This prayer was heard, that St. Augustine is bold to say, If God had not been so entreated by Stephen, the church had not been so blessed with Paul. And Fulgentius: Whither Stephen went before, killed by the stones of Paul, thither Paul followed, aided by the prayers of Stephen. Paul helped to make a martyr, and he was made a martyr: he that consented to another's blood in zeal against Christ, did after yield his own blood to be shed in zeal for Christ. Of whom then should we despair? we know not a greater sinner than Paul was by nature, we know not a better saint than Paul was made by grace. The foulest rags on the dunghill may be made white paper. A leprous sinner, more spotted than Naaman, may, by washing in the Jordan of penitent tears, become like an innocent child. The barren fig-tree may be recovered; the wild olive, by a new grafting, may bear excellent fruit; the unhappy boy may make a good man; a foul morning may prove a fair day. There is no wound so desperate, but it may be healed, if the Physician of heaven will undertake it. Lord, make them good that are not, and them better that are, through the goodness of him that is best of all, and sufficient for all, even Jesus Christ.

5. Let us make sure our own election, and we are happy. This we cannot do without a gracious life, and the holy fruits of obedience: other persuasion is but presumption, and all certainty but a stupid security without this. Esau hath killed venison, and now comes in blowing and sweating for his reward: he makes himself sure of the blessing, as if he had it before he kneeled for it. What cares he now for selling away his birthright, which he shall doubly redeem with the blessing? He sold that in hunger, he shall buy this with pleasure: he parted with that for pottage, he shall recover this with venison. But what does all this blustering confidence come to? where is his recompence? His father's answer is no more but "Who art thou?" He looks for a benediction, and finds nothing but a repulse. Wicked men, when they think they have earned God, and come proudly to challenge favour, receive no answer but Who art thou? The hopes of the wicked fail them when they are at the highest; whereas God's humble children find those comforts in extremity, which they durst not expect. An Esau may come in full of the hope of the blessing, but Jacob goes away full of the joy of the blessing. When Joseph brought his two sons to his father for a blessing; and set the elder by his right hand, the younger by his left; he wittingly stretched his right hand to the younger, his left to the elder, Gen. xlviii. 14. The wicked, like Manasseh, press to God's right hand; but he, like Jacob, crosseth his hands. So God dislikes a peremptory presumption, so he blesseth a humble persuasion. No man can be perfectly confident; as no righteousness can be perfect without sin, so no assurance can be perfect without doubting. Take the evenest balances, and the most equal weights; yet at the first putting in there will be some inequality, though presently after they settle themselves in a just poise. Sin is a cloud that often hinders the sun from our eyes, yet is it still a sun: the vision or feeling of this comfort may be sometimes suspended, the union with Christ is never dissolved. God will make us feel that we have offended him; but after that sense and humiliation, he will show himself pleased with us in Jesus Christ.

They "speak evil of the things that they understand not." Not to understand, is the infirmity of a man; to speak of that he understands not, is the part of a fool; but to speak maliciously evil, is the part of a devil. They will not understand, they will not be silent, they will not speak well. If they will not know, let them hold their peace; nay, they will speak: but then let them give good words; nay, they will speak evil. To be ignorant, and to speak evil; these be both bad single and asunder; but much worse in composition, when they are found together. First, I will consider them apart.

1. Ignorance. What is there that differenceth a man from a beast, but reason? No wonder, then, if these be here called beasts by the apostle; they were so termed long before by the prophet: "Man that is in honour, and understandeth not, is like the beasts that perish," Psal. xlix. 20. He had the honour of a man; but by losing his knowledge he becomes like a perishing beast; when his knowledge degenerates from reason to sense, from man to beast. Knowledge is threefold. First, natural, which is common to man and beast: this consists in seeing, feeling, and such sensitive apprehensions. By this the beast hath as prudent an election as man: he skills his own diet, his own physic, builds his own house, avoids noxious things, always as well, often better than men. Secondly, rational, which is proper to man; a light of understanding, joined with an election of will; by which he is not only able to choose or refuse, but also to discern the civil or uncivil use of things. Thirdly, spiritual, which hath a higher fountain, even the Spirit of God. Sense is a mere beast's, reason a mere man's, divine knowledge is the Christian's. This man clearly knows the Author of his creation, the means of his redemption, distinguisheth temporal from eternal things; and there sets his heart, where time is no more able to remove it, than the things of time are able to fill it.

Supernatural things are far from these men's understanding; and because they are unwilling to understand the things of grace, they shall fail to apprehend those of nature. A just plague! He that refuseth the wisdom of a Christian, shall lose the prudence of a man. These foolish monsters are not rare: often do we see asses, whose backs be laden with gold, feed upon thistles. A beast (I dare not call him man) hath thousands in his purse, yet stints himself to a threepenny meal, and starves his family; that instead of their living, they have their dying from him; they are famished. Yet no beast will pine while his den is full of meat. How horrible is this curse! because he would not know as a Christian, he shall become more sottish than a man, yea, than a beast. The philosopher being asked, what was the heaviest part of the earth? answered, That which bears an ignorant person. Better unborn than untaught. Come that ye may hear, hear that ye may learn, learn that ye may practise, and pray that ye may do all.

2. Evil speaking. Good words never hurt the tongue; and this is a proverb even in their mouths that have not many more good words to say. Evil speaking discovers an evil heart, as the striking of the clapper doth a broken bell. In much speaking there is foolish speaking: a fool can never be concealed but by holding his peace. But the dog that snarls and barks where he should fawn, is beaten out of doors for a cur. David sent messengers to salute Nabal, and he railed on them, 1 Sam. xxv. 14; "Who is David?" Good words, Nabal; there is nothing more cheap. But how should Nabal appear what he was, but by his foul language? He that considers the quality of David's followers, must grant it worthy of a fee, that Nabal's flock lay safe in Carmel; but more, that David's soldiers were Nabal's shepherds. That his sheep were safe, he might thank his shepherds; but that his shepherds were safe, he might thank David's soldiers. This kindness deserved part of the feast; yea, even to be set at the upper end of the table, as his principal guest. Not to touch his flocks, was a favour; but to keep them, a merit. Our preservers are a second kind of creators, and well may we afford our superfluities, where we owe ourselves. Yet Nabal refuseth to give any thing but what he was wont, bad words. David asks him bread, and he gives him stones. If he would not part with his riches, yet he might have yielded fair speeches, and been never the poorer. But how should he speak any other language, to whom blasphemy is his mother tongue? When poor wretches beg of such men, this is all their alms. Yet better fare they that can say, Be warmed, be filled, Jam. ii. 16. But if those verbal almoners shall hardly answer for their uncharitableness, what shall become of them that curse and rate the needy souls; whose charity is cruelty, trampling upon those that God hath humbled? If they be thus punished that heal only with good words, how shall they be tormented that wound with evil!

3. Combined: they are both bad enough asunder, but together most mischievous. Bitter censurers are either proud, or guilty, or fools. Proud: I am not as this publican, Luke xviii. 11. What had the Pharisee to do with the publican? O, his own jewel of sanctity wanted the due lustre, till such a foil set it off. Guilty: they that accused the woman apprehended in adultery, had not been so hot, had themselves been innocent, John viii. 9. But now, their mouths were full of her iniquity, and empty of their own; till Christ wrote them deeper in their consciences than his finger did those characters in the dust. Fools, as here, blame what they know not. The truth of God shall never want enemies, while the father of falsehood wants not blasphemies. Where did Christ's ministers ever set their feet, but the devil also landed his soldiers to encounter them? Old father Simeon might truly think, that as all eyes before had not been like his eyes, waiting for the consolation of Israel; so nor all arms afterward should be like his arms, ready in the temple to embrace it. No, Christ was appointed αἰς ὀμνῆσαι ἀντιλεγόμενον; i. e. a sign that should be spoken against, for a mark of contradictions. This was no news in Stephen's time: that noble Protesilaus in the Grecian fleet, the foremost champion of the Christian church, that fought for the name of Jesus unto blood, told them to their faces, that they had always resisted the Holy Ghost, Acts vii. 51. The tongue is a sword still unsheathed; and many will speak that dare not strike. Take here two observations.

1. The nature of truth, and the nature of man's intellect, are agreeable, if this latter be not forestalled with prejudice. But, as Augustine says, To an unsound palate bread is bitter, which to a sound one is sweet. He that is resolved to be ill, refuseth to understand goodness; therefore dislikes it before he knows it; as one censures a book before he opens it, or reads a sentence. These deceivers had read the rudiments of licentiousness with the spectacles of self-love; and now to hear of authority and civil government, and above all, that the Holy Ghost should sit in the chair, to cross and unteach their principles, this makes them fret and chafe. Would they but yet allow it a day of hearing: no law condemns a man till he comes to his answer: no, they will speak evil, they will not understand. These be they that stare upon the ministers of the gospel as prodigious, hiss at them as ridiculous, shun them as infectious, account them pious, pestilential, execrable fellows: "but Wisdom is justified of her children," Matt. xi. 19. The Lord will show, with great advantage of glory, through all this reluctance, how little he needs the help of his friends, or cares for the malice of his enemies. Those who are unwise in sin shall be made wise enough in punishment: the eyes that wilful malice hath shut, hell-flames shall open; and the tongue that would condemn what it knew not, shall feel what it would not.

2. This is a most unhappy fault, when the tongue overruns the eyes, speaks and never takes advice of the heart. The Jews thought the gospel a stumbling-block; the Greeks foolishness, 1 Cor. i. 23: the first, that it did block up their way; the other, that it was too poor for their learning: yet neither of them knew what it was. The golden Indies were offered to divers princes; they vilipended it, and never saw it; yet the wealth was worth their labour that undertook it. The gospel is a hidden treasure, the world scorns it: alas, the world never understood it: they that have found it, do justly scorn the world in comparison of it. Some think it will impoverish them; they know not that, beside the kingdom of glory, it even centuples their estate here on earth, Matt. xix. 29. Others think it makes men melancholy; they know not that it rejoiceth the heart, Prov. xii. 25. This was the rashness of Rome, and the shame of their Tridentine council; that they condemned the protestants for heretics, and yet never would hear what they could say for themselves. What is this, but to speak evil of the things they understand not? In the fourth session it was decreed, that no man should give any other interpretation of the Scriptures, than what was consonant to the doctrine of the Roman church. Thus instead of measuring their doctrine by the rule, they measured the rule by their doctrine; and condemned they knew not what. When we teach, that it is impossible for man to merit of God, or before him to be justified by his works; they cry out that we condemn all good works.

Thus sin doth not want entertainers: he that will be sober when others bezzle, that will pray when others play, or reprove a swearer, is branded with the name of puritan: alas, they speak evil of that they understand not. Shall this indignity cast upon holiness make it vile in our eyes? No, but as Tertullian reasoned, That must needs be good which Nero persecutes; so, it must needs be excellent that such malicious fools would disgrace. They have sworn to keep the commandments, and to deny the world; yet are not content with their own disobedience, unless they cast aspersions upon them that obey. God either open their eyes, or stop their mouths, that they may cease to speak evil of the things which they understand not. Let this teach us,

1. To seek understanding above treasures. Indeed doing makes a man blessed; and though he were able to dispute about every conceivable thing in existence, knew all that is knowable, secrets of state, rules of policy, mysteries of science; yet he might bless himself, without being blessed of God. But still the foundation of obedience must be laid in knowledge; for if a man take his mark amiss, he may shoot wrong all the actions of his life. Happiness is like a stake set up in the midst of a field, which blinded men grope after, to make the beholders sport in their wanderings. Knowledge must be the pilot of devotion; superstitious works are but the whelps of ignorant zeal. As Christ said of his murderers, Lord, they know not what they do; so our apostle here of the truth's adversaries, Lord, they know not what they say. He that knows what he does, and does what he knows, is likeliest to be accepted with God.

Worldlings cry up practice, to cry down knowledge; as cunning papists will extol St. James only to disparage St. Paul, or as idle protestants commend reading to disgrace preaching: they talk of a good meaning, when they are the worst doers in a country. This is the devil's sophism; if he can put out our eye of knowledge, the more we do the better he likes, as knowing all such works to be his own service. Knowledge indeed covers our earth, as waters the sea; but yet are there no dry rocks in the midst of the sea? The greater number are not unlike the horse in the story; which a man seeing in the market, liked, for his proportion, his pace, his colour; and having bought him, desired to know what fault he had. The cunning courser told him, none but that he was a dark grey: he meant that he had bad eyes; his colour might be grey, but the horse was blind. So many men have pace enough, if it were in the right way: their feet are swift, but to shed blood; their proportion is answerable, they are able to do well; their riches and means are sufficient; and they colour for it, having a form of godliness, a show of devotion: but their eyes be bad, dark and mopish to understand that should make them truly blessed.

2. Seeing they speak evil of that they know not, let us speak well of that we know. It is a shame that our zeal should not be as courageous to defend the truth, as their malice is violent to oppose it. He is a coward, that lets a good cause fall, when he sees another resolute in a bad. A reprobate may sometimes lend the truth his voice; but either he higgles with some hollow reservation, or lispeneth with some faltering equivocation; or if his lips be of his heart's opinion, it is an extorted testimony; God hath wrung it out of him, by some conflict, arrest, racking, and conviction of his conscience. So the magicians of Egypt were forced to confess, This is the finger of God: so Julian was compelled to cry, Galilean, thou hast overcome. They that will speak the evil they should not, shall be driven to speak the good they would not. Caiaphas shall approve that Christ in the chair, whom he condemns on the bench. Balaam shall bless those for nothing, whom he was hired to curse. Such transient revelations may glide through them; themselves in the mean time as wise as trunks. But this is a forced confession, the Almighty's advantage: "For their rock is not as our Rock, even our enemies themselves being judges," Deut. xxxii. 31. If they speak well of goodness, it is against their wills; but naturally they blaspheme it. For old physic to find fault with the new way of Paracelsus, or the old astronomy to be displeased at the opinions of Copernicus, there was some colour; for the professors of the former understood the errors of the latter, and could pick just quarrels against them. But for corrupt nature, called the old man, older in every one of our acquaintance than religion or reason, to condemn the doctrine of salvation before it be examined; this is that brutish malice here worthily exposed to contempt.

A free, voluntary acknowledgment of the truth, becomes the mouth of a Christian. Such as Peter's was, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God;" which was the revelation of God, not of flesh and blood, Matt. xvi. 16, 17. He that opened Simon's heart, to pour in that happy learning, untied Simon's mouth, to pour forth that happy language. As no man can see the sun, but by the light of the sun; so no man can call Jesus the Lord, but by the Holy Ghost, 1 Cor. xii. 3.

They "shall utterly perish in their own corruption." This is the common term of sin: what compasses and aberrations soever it fetcheth, this is the centre of it, destruction. There be divers circuits, thwartings, and contrarieties in sin; yea, all wickedness is in the extremes. Nothing is more opposite, than gripulous avarice and riotous profuseness, than cunning hypocrisy and notorious profaneness, than pride and nastiness, than presumption and despair, levity and obstinacy; yet are all these reconciled in one place, like men that go about several businesses in the morning, yet meet together at night. One kingdom is too narrow for them on earth, a little corner of a dungeon confines them together in hell. As several malefactors have done several facts, in several places; one hath stolen, another slain, a third ravished; one robs by land, another by sea; yet they are all brought to one prison, and executed on one gallows; the same destruction devours them all. There is but one, and that a narrow path to heaven; innumerable, and those broad ways, road ways, to hell. One of these iniquities might have served the turn, to bring these reprobates to perdition. Uncleanliness would have done it, they needed not have been rebels: presumption would have done it, they needed not uncleanliness: self-will was sufficient, without presumption: their ignorance, without their malice: their brutishness would have spared all the rest; any one was enough to do it. Only the number and measure of torments is according to the multitude and magnitude of offences.

Some go to hell upon the rack, others on a down-bed: the former suffer much, that they may suffer more; as bulls are first baited, that afterward they may be killed. As the godly through many tribulations enter into the kingdom of heaven, Acts xiv. 22, so sometimes the wicked through many tribulations enter into the kingdom of hell. What a deal of pains doth the covetous man take for his own damnation! He scarce wears a good garment, or eats a liberal meal, or takes a quiet sleep; but torments himself to get that, for getting whereof he shall be tormented. Some slide thither on a bed of roses; they will pamper their bodies while they have them, suffer their affections to want no indulgence, will not give their conscience leave to speak, but drown it with the noise of jollity. But what benefit is it, to have one's throat cut with diamonds, or to be shot to death with pearls, or smothered with cassia. Destruction is too dear a price for any sin. The condemned man will scarce eat the best dinner with a cheerful stomach. Yet this is the impenitent sinners' dire catastrophe, utterly to perish in their own corruption.

All I purpose to observe from it, may be reduced to these three conclusions. First, that sin naturally begets punishment; if they do these things, they shall be destroyed. Secondly, that forbearance is no acquittance; if not presently, yet they shall perish. Thirdly, that wickedness makes their own scourge; they shall perish in their own corruption.

1. No cause doth more necessarily produce its proper effect, than sin doth naturally beget punishment. This David could easily presuppose, when the land was plagued with a three years' famine, 2 Sam. xxi. 1; never came judgment from God, but some provocation from man went before: therefore seeing the plague, he inquires for the sin. The hand of Divine justice never makes man smart without cause. When we suffer, our question should be, What have we done? teaching our repentance to examine the foundation of all our evils. When famine is upon our land, one complains of hoarding, another of transporting, the almanac talks of planets and conjunctions; but the Christian complains of sin. He looks higher than the constellations, and sees a just hand scourging rebellious wickedness, overruling all second causes to be his executioners. Natural men are moles to spiritual objects; but the weakest regenerate eyes can pierce the heavens, and espy God in all earthly occurrences. Famine never cleansed the teeth, that were not before furred and fouled with excess. The pestilence never raged, but blasphemy, uncleanness, and such noisome sins begun the infection. The sword never prevailed, but sin did set an edge upon it. The fire never consumed, but sin blew the coals. God indeed is the Judge of all, but sin is the cause of all.

The wicked, here, are the beasts to be hunted, sin is the game; when that game is up, the takers are ready, and wait but the word; those blood-hounds are under collar, if God let them slip, they are instantly on.

(1.) Temporal misery is one taker; in whose terrible army march fear, disquietness, poverty, sickness, and innumerable sorrows. This often takes a man, when it does not destroy him. When it takes an elect vessel in hand, it scourges him like a quartern ague, shakes every joint, tames his proud heart; but withal consumes up his surfeits and corruption, and restores him a weaker sinner, but a better man. But it takes the wicked, like the stone or the racking gout; and that without both strength of resistance, or provision of patience.

(2.) Death is the next taker, compared to a horse, Rev. vi. 8; a fierce, strong, warlike, and speedy creature; whose neck is clothed with thunder, and he swallows the ground as he goes, Job xxxix. 19. 24. Hazeel could not outrun him; Absalom could not outride him; Pharaoh's chariot-wheels fell off in the chace. Jonathan and Saul, swift as eagles, strong as lions, yet were slain by this taker. He takes any man, at any time, in any place: in bed, he takes men before they can rise; abroad, and gives them not leave to come home: he often takes the drunkard at his cups, the worldling telling his monies: and these he takes with terror; even by the throats, as that unmerciful creditor arrested his fellow, "Pay that thou owest," Matt. xviii. 28. But you say, death takes also the godly: indeed they rather take him, for Christ hath made him their vassal.

(3.) Satan is the last and worst taker. Misery takes from prosperous sin, sickness takes from misery, death takes from sickness, Satan takes from all. Thou fool, this night shall they take thy soul from thee, Luke xii. 20. Oh who can tell the horror and astonishment of that soul, which no sooner leaves the body, but is apprehended by this taker. If we could conceive the least pang of that fever, how odious would our most pleasing sins appear to us! For a living man to be cast into a nest of vipers, asps, or scorpions, is terrible enough; yet, alas, all their stings be but as gentle ticklings to these dragons. This is that perishing, that utter perishing, which is here the wages of obstinate sin.

2. Forbearance of punishment is no argument of immunity; though not presently, they shall perish. The judgments of God are sure, if they be late; and as they are made for the taking, so they are destined to the very hour of taking, which they shall not escape. David made a road upon the Geshurites and Gezrites, destroying them with such a universal slaughter, that he left none to report what he had done, 1 Sam. xxvii. 9. How many hundred years had that brood of Canaanites lived securely in their country, since God had commanded their rooting out! The Israelites had their hands full, and could not meddle with them; the Philistines were their friends, and would not meddle with them; and now knowing no grudge betwixt them and their neighbours, they promise themselves a certain peace. Lo even then, least suspecting it, are they cut off by David's sword, and none left alive to tell the news. When the oracle of God was inquired for the reason of that long famine, the answer was, "It is for Saul, and his bloody house, because he slew the Gibeonites," 2 Sam. xxi. 1. Israel was full of sins besides those of Saul's house, Saul's house was full of sins besides those of blood, much blood was shed by that house besides this of the Gibeonites: where the causes be infinite, God doth justly pitch upon some; it is favour not to punish for all. Joshua had sworn a league with Gibeon four hundred years before; Saul breaks this league and oath: Saul dies, and forty years have passed since this injury; yet now the Lord calls them to a reckoning for it. That sin is not yet expiated, and so occasioneth this late vengeance.

How vainly do men hope to go away with their sins, because wrath is delayed! as if the Ancient of days, to whom all times are present, could forget them. No, when we have forgotten our sins, when the world hath forgotten us, he begins the suit for our arrears. With men, delay wears things out of memory, and cools the heat of anger; violent passions, like violent motions, are weakest at the furthest; but with God, there is nothing gained by pro-faction. Sinners may make a truce with heaven, and a league with hell; but the Lord laugheth at them, for he seeth that their day is coming, Psal. cxxvii. 13; and is not the further off, because they do not look for it. Sacrilege steals, and goes away merry with it: it never troubles men, that they are privy to this injury; the law cannot touch them: so they live, so they die. But doth God forget it? If they can blot it out of his sight, there is then safety in prorogation. But as the slaughter of the Gibeonites was the sin of one generation, yet required in another; so doth God often make the posterity pay for the iniquity of their forefathers. Therefore our church teacheth us to pray, "Lord, remember not our iniquities, nor the iniquities of our forefathers." When these God-robbers are dead, and mouldered to dust, this shall be exacted of their children. Men owe us money, they die and leave it unpaid; we sue their heirs and executors for those debts, and do not think it injustice so to recover them. Take heed, ye parents, at least you that have grace enough to love your children; you bequeath them legacies of ruin, while you make up their portions with that unrighteous mammon, which you have gotten from the poor minister or neighbour. The torments of hell God will inflict only on the peccant person, but with temporal plagues he visits the succession.

The whole family of Eli was threatened with sickness, short life, and beggary, 1 Sam. ii. 36. This took effect apace, yet Abiathar is left; through the reigns of Saul and David he escapeth: hath God forgotten his sentence? No, even Abiathar shall be deposed by Solomon, and sent to Anathoth, and it is well that he escapes so, 1 Kings ii. 26. It was four-score years since that sentence was denounced, yet now it comes to execution. Abiathar is the last of that line; and he shall find that the sin of his father's house can neither be purged with sacrifice nor obliterated with time. Delay of the judgment that shall come, is neither any hinderance to God's justice, nor comfort to men's miseries. Shimei had reviled David in the conspiracy of Absalom, yet he pays for this in the reign of Solomon. Abishai would have requited him while the wound was green, and might not; Benaiah is commanded to do it now after long feasting. Still the stones which Shimei threw at David, were to rebound upon Shimei, and split his heart. He was an example to these, as these are to us: he railed, so do they; he blasphemed the king, these speak evil of dignities; he perished for it, so do they. And if God so plague the insolences against his deputies, how will he revenge blasphemy against himself! Tremble, ye cursers and swearers; so execrable is your sin, that God hath vowed not to hold you guiltless. If God pay slowly, yet he will pay sure.

Sometimes he allows iniquity a shorter breathing; and even while the viols call to dancing, or the trumpets to drinking healths, Belshazzar hath his sentence. No sooner were Adonijah's guests full of meat, but their ears were full of clangour, their hearts of horror: the trumpets at once proclaim Solomon's triumph, and their confusion. The feasts of the wicked end in terror; after the meal is done, ever comes the reckoning. No doubt but many a health was drunk to Adonijah, many a confident applause of their prosperous design, many a scorn of the adverse faction. But now the voider that takes all away, is fearful astonishment, and expectation of just revenge. How suddenly are all their hearts cold, all their faces pale! every man hath but life enough left to run away, 1 Kings i. 49. God can as easily prevent the mirth of the wicked, as mar it; but he suffers them to please themselves in the vanity of their own courses for the time, that their conclusion may be more grievous. Bravery is but a poor target to bear off judgment.

3. Obstinate sin would make its own rod, were there none prepared. He that enters into a statute, and performs not the defecation, we say, his own hand hath undone him. When we look upon the sin first, and then on the punishment, we confess the latter to be but the counterfeit of the former original. This is such a man's own child: why? it is so like him. Pharaoh had groaned under plagues enough; he saw his cattle struck dead with a sudden contagion, he saw his sorcerers (after all their contestation) struck with a scab in their very faces, yet his heart is not struck with repentance. Who would think it possible, for a heart of flesh not to yield at these judgments? We cannot tell whether to wonder more at the plagues themselves, or their success. The grace of God resisted, turns to desperateness; and wicked men, like some beasts, grow mad with baiting. They cannot be quiet, till they have wrought out their full destruction. Therefore the fearfullest plagues God reserves for the upshot; all the former do but make way for the last. Goliath might have fought in the battle, and escaped; but he must needs challenge his own ruin, by defying the host of God, yea, the God of hosts. His own sword shall serve to behead the master. What need David load himself with an unnecessary weapon? one sword can serve both Goliath and him. Goliath had a man to bear his target, but David had Goliath to bear his sword. So just is God, to turn wicked men's forces against themselves, and to make his enemies carry about with them their own destructions.

The Amalekite, a pickthank, thought to curry favour and to insinuate himself to the heir apparent, by bringing the news of Saul's death, 2 Sam. i. His thoughts project thus: To report the fact as done by another, were but to go away with the recompence of a lucky post; whereas to take the action upon myself, to say, I am the man, must needs endear me to him: David is beholden to me for the kingdom; my requital cannot but be richly honourable. Thus he laid a plot to destroy himself: his hand was not guilty, his tongue was; and he dies for it. If he did it, his fact was capital; if he did it not, his lie was capital: howsoever, for an unjust practice, he received a just sentence; yea, his own mouth condemned himself. Men think it a dainty cunning to beguile others, the fine policy of a pure and clean wit to do unsuspected mischief; as if this were not to carry brimstone to their own fire, and to make their own bed in hell. As the godly work out their salvation with fear and trembling, so the wicked work out their own confusion with lust and presuming. Yea, naturally all run on to their own ruin, unless they be supernaturally prevented by the grace of God.

To conclude; as we tremble at these judgments, let us abominate the sins. These reprobates are our examples; if we do as bad, we shall speed worse: and they will welcome their imitators into hell. You come after us, but you shall be preferred before us; and bear so much more torments than we have, as you received more warnings than we had. First, they were proud; and as pride is the highest sin, so it shall have the lowest fall: the proud scorn to be like men, therefore make themselves like the apostate angels. When they will not be men, they become devils, saith Chrysostom. Are there none such among us? Yes, their very habit discovers them: they that have put off modesty, will put on any garb of apparel. We should not lie in our words, but painted Jezebels lie in their very faces. As pride is the first step downward to hell, so humility is the first stair upward to glory. Secondly, they were rebellious to magistrates; let us be obedient. Even the highest prelates of the church must stoop to him, whom God hath set above all. The Lord hath committed the souls of princes to his pastors, but the bodies of pastors to his princes. Thirdly, they were drunken and sensual beasts; let us be civil men at least. But, alas, happy temperance, whither art thou fled? Sobriety is scarce to be found in the world, but in books. Fourthly, they were unclean; and what nitre shall wash us? were every river of our land a Jordan, they could not cleanse it from this leprosy. But, alas, we can but plough the ground, it is God that must sow the seed: we do but soften the wax, it is he that sets on the seal. We have sinned, what should we do but repent? If we cannot, like the poor woman at her purification, Lev. xii. 8, offer a lamb, innocency of life, yet let us bring at least a pair of turtle doves, two mourning eyes. That we who have grievously erred by multiplied sin, may be received again to mercy by unfeigned sorrow.

And shall receive the reward of unrighteousness, as they that count it a pleasure to riot in the day time. Spots they are and blemishes, sporting themselves with their own deceivings while they feast with you.

God is a just Master, and will pay all men their wages according to their work. They that do the business he sets them about, shall have a blessed recompence: none of his servants were ever losers by him. The ungodly indeed set themselves on work; yet, howsoever, he will pay them their wages, but it is such a reward (Rev. xxii. 12) as they would thank him to go without; a righteous wages, for an unrighteous service. God shall pay all: Satan may be his executioner, but God is the Judge. The executioner cannot lay on a stroke more than the Judge appoints. Wicked men, properly, do pay when they are paid: when God pays them, he pays himself of them; and this shall be to the uttermost farthing, Matt. v. 26. So the unmerciful servant was bound over till he should pay all his due, Matt. xviii. 34. At once they both receive their wages and pay their debts.

Wages is understood to be an equal retribution, a reward proportionable to the work; and is either ex pacto, what is covenanted, "Didst thou not agree with me for a penny?" Matt. xx. 13; or ex merito, what is earned, "The labourer is worthy of his hire," Luke x. 7. Equality of recompence defines wages: if it be too much, and above desert, it is munificence; if too little, and short of desert, it is injustice. The Jews might give forty stripes; they would give but nine and thirty, for fear of excess. They were commanded to restore fourfold; some of them, as Zaccheus, did quintuple it, for fear of the defect. But there is neither defect nor excess in a just reward. Man may fault in this, God cannot; he pays just wages, not a dram too light, not a scruple too heavy. Every man shall receive according to his works. "With the same measure that ye mete, it shall be measured to you again," Luke vi. 38.

This wages of unrighteousness must be considered: Such, for the quality; So much, for the equality. In congruo, for the fitness; In condigno, for the fullness: not an arithmetical portion, every man alike; but a geometrical proportion, every man his due. So that we have two things; the manner, and the measure, of this wages.

The Scripture is copious in these retaliations. Nilus was instead of heaven to Egypt; the clouds did not so much favour them, as the river; this did moisten their ground, and quench their thirst; and their confidence was not in heaven, but in Nilus. Lo, Nilus was turned into blood, Psal. cv. 29: that which was their succour shall be their horror. He that measures the sea in his fist, scorns that a poor river should be his rival. In this element was the whole trust of their provision, and now this cannot be endured for the corruption. When their palates would taste it, their eyes abhor it. Their drought calls for the moisture, their stomachs cannot brook the annoyance. They are thirsty, yet cannot tell whether they should die or drink; die with heat, or cool that heat with blood. How fit is this wages! they made that one element their god, and by the loss of that one element they become miserable men. The fish was no small part of their sustenance; those die with infection, and infect more by being dead. But was this all the similitude? No, they had polluted that river with the blood of infants, and now it appears to them in this colour. As if it should say, Am I bloody? thank your own murderous hands that made me thus. It is your sin that hath turned my clear streams into this sanguine hue. The very waters will no longer keep their counsel. Never any man wilfully shed blood, but he had enough of it ere his end. If they look upon the waters, they see nothing but blood; when they drink, they taste nothing but blood. They shed some few streams, but are requited with whole rivers of blood. As if the Divine justice had said to them, as Tomyris did (afterward) to Cyrus, Sanguinem sitisti, sanguinem bibe, Thou hast thirsted for blood, drink blood. A red river was one plague, but a Red Sea, the greater. That annoyed, this overwhelmed them; that slew their fishes, this drowned themselves. For a water bloodied with innocents, to have a river turned into bloody waters, a Red Sea made redder by the whole host of Egypt, how fit a wages of unrighteousness was this! The corrupted river was both a monument of their former sin, and an image of their future vengeance. God paid them in specie, their own money.

Such another instance we have in that fat king of Moab, Eglon, whom Ehud slew, Judg. iii. 22. He had made his belly his god, and God sends a message into his belly: "I have a message from God unto thee." This he thought to have heard with his ears, and he feels it in his bowels. A message indeed, but such a one as did neither require nor admit an answer: no reply, but a groan and a gasp, and then everlasting silence. His sin had pampered those parts, and swelled them to an unwieldy grossness: in those parts his destruction enters to let out life. Many delicate morsels, and choice creatures, had been buried in that bulky vault: Ehud's dagger is a hard and cold bit to close up his stomach. He can never digest this: now he pays for all his gluttony; this was the wages of unrighteousness.

This law of retaliation hath fallen upon the dear saints of God. Samson's eyes were the first offenders, and they are first pulled out, Judg. xvi. 21; they betrayed him to lust, and lust betrays them to darkness. In Gaza he was first captivated by a woman, and thither he is led captive in triumph. He that was grown blind in his understanding by doting wantonness, is now doomed to his own perpetual night. Because he trusted his locks in the lap of a harlot, he riseth up shorn and weakened. He that was a terror to armies, becomes a scorn to boys. Eli could not have devised a way so much to plague himself and his sons, as by his partiality to their sins. He receives a variety of judgments, yet every one a just wages for his faults. First, his sons had despised God, therefore God lightly esteems them. Secondly, old age is commonly choleric, old Eli was indulgent, therefore not an old man shall be left of his house for ever. Because he had been faulty in his old age, therefore all his family shall die in their youth. Thirdly, his sons were enemies to God in their profession, therefore he shall see his enemy in the Lord's habitation. Fourthly, because he so misfavoured his offending children, as not to punish them, therefore they shall be to consume his eyes, and grieve his heart, even to punish him. Fifthly, because he esteemed their life above his Maker's glory, therefore they shall die with dishonour. Sixthly, the authority which he had abused by connivance, shall be translated to another. Seventhly, because his sons were saucy, and of so wanton an appetite, that they durst take meat from off God's own trencher, therefore the remainder of his household shall come to beggary. Lastly, because he forbore to take vengeance on their iniquity, God shall revenge himself on him and them, and that severely, 1 Sam. ii. 30—36. Consider this, ye fond parents, that prefer the vanities of your children before the will of your heavenly Father; you cannot devise a speedier way to ruin them. Thus to be kind to them, is to be cruel to yourselves and them; to make their sins your own. God might have pardoned them, had you not pardoned them; now your indulgence makes way for his vengeance. We read not of any fault Eli had but this; yet which of the notorious offenders was plagued more? A man needs no more to make him and his posterity miserable, than sparing the rod. How just is this, when men will not see the faults they should, to feel the punishments they would not!

Absalom was fair, and he knew it well enough; the glass and flattery had made him acquainted with his own comeliness. His beauty was the matter of his pride, and his hair was no small piece of his beauty. Once every year he used to cut it; not as weary of the length, but of the weight: his pride could have brooked it longer, his neck could not. Now those locks which had been his glory, become his hangman. He had curiously plaited those tresses for his ornament, therefore God makes use of them for his halter. The part which man's unrighteousness abuseth to sin, God's justice employs to revenge. When it hath served our turn to offend God, it shall serve his turn to punish us. This latter service makes amends for the former trespass. The dishevelled hairs that loosely hung on Absalom's shoulders, shall do him the office to hang him. He came out of his father's loins, yet turned traitor to him; his hair grew out of his scalp, and turns traitor to his own head. When he was thus mounted to his unexpected gallows, his beast leaves him: it had done him service enough, to bring him to the tree of justice, and there resigns that unnatural burden, 2 Sam. xviii. 9. He reared a pillar, and called it by his own name; either because he had no sons, no living images of himself; and so to supply nature, he thought to survive in dead stones. But it had been great pity there should have been any of his breed: he that robbed his father of a son, slew Amnon, and would have robbed himself of a father, his father of a kingdom, deserved to die without issue. Or to preserve the memorial of himself; that the world, when it saw the stately pillar, might be occasioned to remember the goodly person of Absalom; as if the generations to come were wronged in losing the mention of Absalom. The world esteemed him highly; and he had a higher opinion of himself; and he was famous, but for infamy: not that arched pile, but a rude heap of stones, cover his carcass. One death is not enough for him; he is hanged, pierced, mangled. He had lifted up himself against his own royal father, therefore was lifted up to a tree of execution. He had pierced his father's heart with many sorrows, therefore he is pierced with many darts. He had dismembered and divided Israel, therefore he is mangled and torn in pieces. He that cursed his parents, according to the law was stoned to death: he had done worse, even attempted to kill his father, therefore was buried under a heap of stones. Behold with terror the just wages of unrighteousness.

How righteous art thou, O God, in thy retaliations! Non invenit guttam, qui non dedit micam; i. e. The rich man would not give Lazarus a crumb, Lazarus shall not bring him a drop, Luke xvi. Saul slew the Gibeonites: nothing can expiate the blood of these heathen fathers, but the blood of the persecutor's children, 1 Sam. xxi. 5. Because they knew God, and would not glorify him, therefore their foolish heart was darkened, Rom. i. 21. Because their knowledge would not retain God, they shall not retain their knowledge. Men profane God's name, and he makes their names to stink. Why should they be mentioned with honour, that do not mention their Maker but to his dishonour? So we read of Lot's wife, Job's wife, the rich man, but no name; as if God had said, "Let their name be blotted out," Psal. cix. 13. Idolaters will set up a false god for the true, therefore the true God gives them over to the false. We forget duly to bless God on the sabbath, therefore go unblest all the week. "If mine heart have been deceived by a woman, then let my wife grind unto another," Job xxxi. 9, 10. Few dare take such an oath, or make such a wish. We rob the ministers, and therefore commonly we are robbed by the lawyers. "Whoso stoppeth his ears at the cry of the poor, he also shall cry himself, but shall not be heard," Prov. xxi. 13. In vain they cry to us for charity, and for mercy we shall cry in vain to God. The measure we mete to others, is with much equity remeasured to ourselves. In every grievance of your sense, read the characters of the cause. When you receive your wages, consider your work: so you have done, so you are undone. When the dropsy invades the drunkard, it is but his wages. When the pestilence rageth in our streets, blasphemy and execration must confess that they have their due wages. Poverty is the wages of dishonesty. Blasphemers live swearing, and die raving; it is but their wages. These things if we preach, we are hated; if we do not, we shall be condemned: it is a woeful strait, when we must either incur the world's mal-opinion, or the Lord's malediction. But certainly, if men do these unrighteous works, they must expect this righteous wages.

The measure follows; no temporary suffering can be a sufficient wages of sin. Nothing but death can expiate some offences among men, blood must have blood; but death itself cannot satisfy God. All sin is infinite; not in respect of itself, but of the Majesty which it offends: now an infinite work must have an infinite wages. Through the creatures' incapacity, this cannot be infinite in intension, therefore must be so in duration. The quantity of this wages is begun in death, Rom. vi. 23, accomplished in torment, Matt. xxv. 46.

1. In death. There is but one door to come into the world, a thousand to go forth. Death hath his choice of ways to let out life; and while we are busily watching at one door, he comes in at another.

A furious horseman, with a pale and ghastly look, Rev. vi. 8: pallida mors, pale death; symbolizing that effect which he works both on the living and on the dead. On the living. I know, that many can talk of death without fear, because they think it out of hearing: they make a league with death; as the frantic merchant alone, would sell this commodity, and buy that, and make matches for hundreds and thousands, when there was nobody by to deal with him. Thus it is reported of an earl of Kildare, that playing at the board's end, and seeing his warrant of execution brought in, threw his cast, and said, Whatsoever that is, this is for a hurdle. Many have feigned to die in jest; but I doubt whether their heart and face were both of one piece. Some call for it, as the poor wearied man in the fable; but when it comes in good earnest, they have another errand for it, and are not able to look it in the face with the blood in their cheeks. When it gave Belshazzar that fatal summons, all his courtiers and concubines could not cheer his heart, nor all the wine in those holy bowls fetch colour into his countenance, Dan. v. 6. How do we see prisoners at the bar even die at the sentence of death, as if they could not live to the execution! Some Stoic would fain set a good face on the matter, and says in a bravado to his neighbours, he fears not death; and all, that the world may witness he is no coward. So Jezebel painted her face, and affronted Jehu out of the window; but had that artificial visage been off, a pale cheek would have appeared underneath it. Whatsoever is pretended, there is no unrighteous man but is afraid of this wages.

On the dead. It bereaves the body of blood and colour, spoils the complexion, whether it be of art or nature, renders a lifeless and wan carcass, lays it rotting in the mould, exposeth it a feast for worms, alters the fashion, consumes the beauty, turns the whole proportion into deformed rottenness. There lies the body in blended dust, receiving that insensible wages, which the sin of life earned; till the archangel's trumpet, together with the summons of the Judge, gives it a "Rise." Even this is a fearful wages, when it is paid in the proper coin, without the alloy of Christ's death to qualify it. As death is the contrary to life, so commonly they that live like Laban, die like Nabal, which is but the same word inverted. The very mention of death is irksome to them; as Louis the Eleventh straitly charged his servants, when they saw him sick, not to dare once so much as name that bitter and unwelcome word, death. Thus, like insensate stones, they sink down to their centre, and rather choose to feel what they fear, than labour to avoid what they must feel. So cowards wink and fight; yea, they wink and suffer, and fight not: a dismal wages!

2. Hell, and that in the worst sense; not the grave of the body, but of the soul. There is hell, a sinful life; and hell, the horror of conscience; and hell, which is hell itself, the local prison of the damned, as heaven is the triumphant mansion of the blessed. This is the full wages of unrighteousness, into which the desperate madness of ungodly men doth fall blindfold. There be some, that thank philosophy and their own reasons, they fear no such fable as hell. Socrates and Plato were great philosophers, yet they believed a hell, and hissed the contrary opinions, as belluine, out of their schools. Yea, the very savages and infidels confess it: the instinct of nature, and a Divine impression, extorts from them this acknowledgment, that souls live after their bodies, either in bliss or pain. What are they but monsters, that seek to obliterate these indelible characters, and so dance hoodwinked into perdition?

O were it allowed to the desperate ruffians of our days, that swear and curse, as if heaven were deaf to their noise, or as if they would make it deaf by their noise, to have but a sight of hell; how would it charm their mouths, appal their spirits, strike fear and astonishment into their hearts! The church and they would be better acquainted, which are now perpetual strangers. Superstitious recusants, irreligious profaners of the sabbath, that never serve God but once a year; their bed, or their boat, or the tavern is all their temple, except we see their faces at Easter; would they do thus if they understood this wages? No, could we foresee death and hell in their proper shapes, we would foreappoint ourselves, not to avoid the first death which we cannot, but to escape the second, which we may, through repentance and faith in Christ.

The devils besought Christ, that he would not cast them into the deep, Luke viii. 31. What is this deep, but hell? First, for the utter separation from the face of God, never to see his favourable countenance; then for the impossibilities of passage to the region of rest and glory. The very devils fear this deep; they feel themselves bound in chains, and reserved to this torment, expecting a further degree of vengeance. They know this to be the wages of unrighteousness: now the wages is not paid till the work be done. Still they are tempting men unto sin, and still they sin in that temptation; the misleaders into evil sin more than the actors; therefore the full measure of their damnation remains to the upshot of their wickedness: the day of judgment shall confine them to the deep for ever. This day, this deep, they tremble at; yet sottish men slight it. Were their understandings sensible of that burning lake, where soul and body must be crowded into a fiery dungeon, with torments intolerable and interminable, which can neither be endured nor avoided, durst they so boldly rush into sin? Who will thrust his hand into a fiery crucible, to fetch out the gold? Can the metal recompense the burning? We durst not continue our licentious and wilful sins, if we did truly believe the horror of those infernal and eternal flames.

Believe there is a hell! who does not? Yes, very many that say they do: it is hard for men to believe their own unbelief. They that be most dangerously sick, are least sensible of their own sickness. We their physicians perceive it, and tell them of it, and they hate us for it. But as when the seminary in Lancashire lost his glove, riding in his disguise, and one that found it rode apace after him to restore it; he mistrusting him for a pursuivant by his speed, (but most pursued by a guilty conscience,) quits his horse, leaps over a hedge, plungeth into an unseen marl-pit behind it, and was drowned: so men flee us that mean them no harm, and rather hazard themselves into destruction, than suffer the word of exhortation. I know that love should win us to goodness, rather than fear; yet fear is often the door that lets in love, as love casteth fear out of the door, 1 John iv. 18. Even the fear of hell hath made way for the love of Christ, and the love of Christ hath taken away the fear of hell. There is a story of one that gave a young gallant a curious ring, with a death's head in it, upon this condition, that for a certain time he should spend one hour every day in looking and thinking on it. He took the ring in wantonness, but performing the condition with diligence, it wrought a wonder on him; and of a desperate ruffian, he became a conscionable Christian. Imagine this discourse a ring, the wages of unrighteousness a death's head; yea more, a map of hell, an emblem of destruction: spend but one half-hour fixedly every day on these meditations, and (I doubt not) by God's grace thou shalt find such an alteration in thy heart and life, that there shall be gladness in the church, peace in thy own conscience, and joy before the angels in heaven for thy conversion.

"As they that count it pleasure to riot in the day time." There is no greater danger in the world, than to live in the danger of the world. This is a care that troubles but few: how to get it, not how to use it, is the common study. Many waking hours are spent on the bed, how to be rich, how to be glorious; not how to be good. God hath written divers books of holy instructions, and they are able to make a man wise to salvation: these contain rules how to be holy and happy, not how to be wanton and wealthy. Solomon had his ethics, his politics, his economics; for the government of behaviour, of commonwealth, of family; not one book of secular mysteries, though his wisdom were incomparable even in that kind also. Not a leaf in the sacred volume but hath matter against a voluptuous life; none for it. To please flesh and blood is the doctrine of the devil; this, man hath learned by nature; he is born with this knowledge; and the whole contents of the Scripture is by the law to forbid it, by the gospel to mortify it. Certainly, if it had been good to live in sensual pleasure, among so many divine rules, some direction would have guided us to this. But all that God says about it, is to forbid it, to threaten it, to condemn it, to cast it into hell. Indeed he neither condemns our affections, nor these objects, asunder; but their composition, as they are married together. A man may covet (so as it be) the best gifts, 1 Cor. xii. 31. Desire more grace, seek more, never think you have enough; be still poor that you may be rich, rich that you may be full, full that you may be glorious. You may desire worldly things long enough without finding any content; but covet after righteousness, and you shall be satisfied, Eccl. v. 10; Matt. v. 6. Be merry, pleasant, rejoice, but in the Lord: Christianity does not take away our joy, but gives it. It is the ram that dies, Isaac (our laughter) escapes. Be ambitious of favour, of honour, of a kingdom; but of God's favour, of the honour of saints, of the kingdom of heaven. But to take pleasure in riot, as if a man's heaven lay in his stomach, and paradise were nothing but the delight of his sense; this is that brutish opinion, the faith of epicures, which sends many, with that rich churl, from their delicate tables to eternal flames.

To riot is belluine; there is their sensuality. In the day time, is desperate, for that is a work of the night; there is their impudence. To count this a pleasure, (many have been overtaken with intemperance, but it was their sorrow and vexation, to these it is a pleasure,) there is their voluptuousness. They think it so, they do but think it so, they shall not so find it; there is their sottishness. Their wickedness appears here like a conjuration. First, the spirit raised is riot. Secondly, the circle wherein it is raised is the day time. Thirdly, the sorceress that raiseth it is pleasure. Fourthly, the charm or illusion is conceit, they think or count it a pleasure, &c.

"Riot." This is the spirit: the grossest devil of all is the eating devil; surfeiting stomachs turn men into beasts. We borrow pride from the lion, covetousness from the hedgehog, envy from the dog, wrath from the bear, gormandize from the wolf, sloth from the ass, riot and sensuality from the hog; such be called boarish men. God sent them into the world men, and they come forth beasts. Only the beasts are in better case; because they want the reason of election, and shall receive no sentence of condemnation. Drunkenness is so apt to misde-meanours, that even against the violence of men not drunk, there lies an action called a riot.

There is riot in many things. First, riot in drink, when men drink in measures, without measure. We may change the verse;

*Non habet ulterius quod nostris potibus addat

i. e. Posterity has nothing more which it can add to our potations. Peace hath made many countries sick of a surfeit, but (were the assizes come) God would find this whole land guilty of a riot. Crates threw his money into the sea, resolving to drown it, lest it should drown him: the drunkard casts his money into a deluge of drink, both drowning it, and himself with it. Herein the miser and the rioter are opposites; the one so loves money that he will not afford himself good drink, the other so loves good drink that he scorns money. Cornua Bacchus habet, says the poet; i. e. Bacchus has horns: the riotous must be quarrelsome; therefore some quarrels are called riots. When the iron is hot, the smith can fashion it to his pleasure: wine tempers the heart like wax for the devil's impression. Secondly, there is riot in meats: "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we shall die," saith the epicure, Isa. xxii. 13: one would think it should rather be, Let us fast and pray, for to-morrow we shall die. The poor man's labour is to get him meat for his stomach; the riotous only care to get a stomach for their meat. Their whole vicissitude of studies is but meat for the belly, and the belly for meat; as brewers provide barrels for their drink, and drink for their barrels. What wonder is it, if they in hell be most tormented in their tongues, that have most offended in their tastes?

Riot is of a great latitude. To abuse any riches of nature to wantonness, is riot. So a man may riot in apparel: divers men are in all other things miserable, yet prodigal in their clothes; and these shall be indicted of a riot. The daw values himself by his cockscorn, the fool by his garded coat; and these take state upon them according to their garments; and after a little custom persuade themselves that they are such indeed. The case of an instrument keeps it from soil, the cover of a glass from dust; but gorgeous attire can neither prevent age, for they soon wax old themselves; nor save from soil, for sin bred them, and they breed sin. Pagans over-gild their blocks, that they may be worshipped; and men garnish their bodies for the same purpose. The dress of proud women is but Democritus's brazen shield set up against the sun, to amaze the eyes that behold it; but faggots to the furnace of lasciviousness: in their best interpretation, they are but bushes which should signify beauty to sell; for why is a sign hung out, but to invite men to buy? as in Italy, the beasts that are to be sold, are decked with blossoms and garlands. But that which is worse, the plastering of their faces, ensparbling their eyes with spiritualized distillations, touching their lips with drinkable gold, filling up frets with fresh colours, as men keep roses all winter in covered vaults; this is horrible riot. It seems they think God was a bungler, not his crafts-master, and that they are able to correct and mend his workmanship. But do they not lay on their colours so thick, that they size into their souls? Does not a black soul often dwell under a white roof? Methinks they should be jealous, lest the devil should come to them in the disguise of a tailor, tirewoman, or complexion-seller.

There is riot in play, where the greatest winner is in danger to lose the game. The Romans built a temple to ill fortune on a mountain hard by, that it should not plague them at cards and dice. God made no man for play, but all for work: they that play when they should work, shall work when they might have rested. Not seldom doth riot break forth into wantonness and carnal delights; a sin so trite and customary, that it serves the city for an afternoon's recreation. Common strumpets are said to have no common patrons; and if lesser magistrates put them in hold, they have greater persons to fetch them out. Either authority is connivant, and will not see the faults; or corrupt, and loves to feel bribes; or, which is worse, doth not punish the sinner, that they may sin with her; which of all bribes is the basest. There is riot in any excessive delicacy; so the word here used is, to enjoy, not to use, pleasures: a sin hard to describe, because it hath so many shapes. In women it reigns most, because they have least to do. They must have delicate houses, rubbed and glazed, as if, like Abraham, they were to entertain angels; whereas, too often, it is but for their wanton lovers. The floors are so glistening, as if they would walk upon looking-glasses. They have delicate paces, going on the earth as if they went upon snakes, and feared to tread hard lest they should turn again, Isa. iii. 16. This is truly to riot by a delicious life; when every thing about them is so resplendent and contentful, that they have no mind to go to heaven. This is to fortify themselves, not against mortality, but against the thought of mortality; to quittance a heaven out of earth, yea, to exchange a true heaven for a counterfeit. How many souls have these artificial paradises beguiled! Through a hell upon earth God brings many to heaven, and through a heaven upon earth many bring themselves to hell. In the forenoon riot is merry, in the afternoon drunk, at night it goes to bed stark mad, but in the morning it riseth sober, in everlasting sorrow; that is the farewell of it.

"In the day time." This is the circle; whether we read it, per diem, ad diem, or in diem: here be three readings, and three senses. Per diem, that is, continually, day by day. Day and night is often taken for incessantly, Josh. i. 8; Psal. i. 2; 1 Thess. ii. 9: now the day includes the night; when we beg our daily bread, we desire provision both for day and night. It was a foolish superstition of them that refused the Pater-noster going to bed, because they thought it absurd to say, "Give us this day," whereas it was night. "Come, we will fill ourselves with strong drink; and to-morrow shall be as this day, and much more abundant," Isa. lvi. 12. It is never night with them while the drink lasts, or their eyes can wake to guide the cup to their mouths. There is great difference betwixt infirmity and vice: the former is but an ague, neither mortal nor perpetual; the other dropsy, that drinks till it rots, and rots till it dies. There be sins in the righteous; there is nothing but sin in the riotous. If Xantippe's scolding so troubled Alcibiades, that heard her but seldom, what an affliction was it to Socrates, her husband, that must bide by it day and night! When a citizen complained what a pitiful journey he had in a moorish fen-country, a countryman replied, God help them that dwell there, as I do. A traveller often drinks that liquor with offence to him, which his host swallows with pleasure. This made the friar, that had drenched himself for experience, to impose it as a sore penance on them that had confessed that sin, Go and be drunk again. Custom makes that a pleasure, which is a torment: many do that in a day, for which they weep all their life.

Or ad diem, i. e. for a day; and this is indeed the term of all sinful pleasure; it is but a flash, a puff, and it vanisheth. It is expected with desire, with delight entertained, and departs with discontent. Like some sprightly music, that advanceth a man's mind while it sounds, and leaves him more melancholy when it is done. A countryman observing the preparation for a great triumph, among many other questions, about the labour, the cost, the study, demands how long it should last: he was answered, For an hour: but he replied, Then the lease is very dear. Could they drink, with Cleopatra, the riches of Egypt at a draught, yet it is but a draught, and quickly down the throat. Turn but the candle, and that which keeps me in, puts me out.

In diem, i. e. during the day, so the word properly imports: this is impudent. "They that sleep sleep in the night; and they that be drunken are drunken in the night," 1 Thess. v. 7. And he that doeth evil hateth the light. But, alas, that is cowardly sin with them, that is ashamed to show its face. They dare the day to witness their ungodliness, and do their villainies, as the Pharisees gave their alms, and said their prayers, to be seen of men. As if they were ambitious to be like God, to whom the day and the night is all one, Psal. cxxxix. 12. The apostle intends it, not as a qualification of their naughtiness, but for a more full expression: In the day time, when others are at their labours, they then roar with riot. The day is made for work, the night for sleep: our lawful work in the day, is God's service; our natural sleep in the night, is our own indulgence: he that steals an hour from his sleep, robs but himself; he that trespasseth upon the day, injures God. If you say, rest enables us for work, yet work is the end, and the end is more noble than the means.

Again, all sin is the work of darkness, therefore most proper for the time of darkness: the riot that is bad at any time, is worse in the day time. In the night it only makes the devil sport; none but fiends are spectators at that interlude; sin is then but like a poor watchman in his night-gown. In the day it ruffles it like a swasher, marches with drum and fife, and bids defiance to authority. So it offends the good, enrageth the bad, and infects the indifferent; and that which might have escaped with forty stripes for the mere evil, shall have a hundred for the example. Sin at first was a single woman, and kept home; but by union to Satan she has two children, Temptation and Example. Ever since she cannot stir out of doors, but these imps haunt her: when she would delight herself, either Temptation gets some to sin with her, or Example teaches some to sin after her.

Lastly, day sins are done with less shame, therefore more impious. Many that care not for honesty, yet stand upon their credit, and would not be detected of that they love to commit. But they are frontless Zimris, that bring harlots to their tents in the face of all Israel. Noah was uncovered, but in the midst of his own tent: sin is bad enough, though no eye see it; and unknown sins are attended with known punishments: secret faults have their secret guilt and shame. But four eyes saw the adultery, ten thousand millions shall see the torment. But that man is past all goodness, that is past shame. Sin bred shame, yet the mother is often curbed by the daughter; she dares not play her pranks so boldly while shame is by. Sin would kill all the agents of goodness in us, but that shame hinders her. Shame holds them in, though sin holds them under. There is some fear to offend, some knowledge of good and evil, some remorse, some conscience, while shame lasts. But if shame once departs, knowledge goes, and fear goes, and remorse goes, and conscience goes; none will tarry behind shame. Alas, for our age, to bear the date of such impiety, that it should be said, In such a year, when yet there was no plague, Shame died! Honesty died long since, and was buried in the suburbs; Charity lived not long after, and was buried in the city; Plain-dealing died then too, and was buried in the country; and now Shame is dead also: these sepulchres of suburbs, city, and country, being taken up by Honesty, Charity, Plain-dealing, what room is left for Shame's grave, except the waters? And it is thought, that amongst the watermen she first caught her death. If any man can find a place to bury her, I will bestow a sorry epitaph upon her:

If any man require my name,
Say, blushing tomb, that it was Shame.
When I did in a cheek appear,
Men did conclude that grace was there.
I many kept from doing ill,
Therefore ill-doing did me kill.
The swearer, liar, whore, may lead
A bolder life; for Shame is dead.
But when all dead rise from their places,
I, Shame, shall then sit on their faces.

"In the day time." Perhaps they slept a-nights; and followed the business so close by day, that they despatched it before night. Or it may be, they would husband their bodies, that they might hold out; for riot is a soaker, and it would drench them to follow it day and night too. Sin is the greatest folly in the world, and yet there must be some art and cunning to maintain it. The house that grows sere, needs supporters. But now have we none worse than these? The day contented them to riot in; day and night too is too little for some. Often do they curse the clock for haste, never blame themselves for lingering in riot. Revel they never so long, their last dance is loth to depart. They are angry, that they cannot, with Joshua, make the sun stand still, or keep the moon from going down, Josh. x. 12, not till they confound the Amorites, but till their Amorites work their confusion. They wish that the day might be corrupted, and that the night would take bribes. There be some feasts, where the guests think they are slighted, if they be not sent away drunk; and Time is no pleasing host to these if he will not allow them to surfeit.

But the night, the night is the guilty time; it would be a long assizes, only to take the confession and indictment of candle-light. This would tell of doors ready to let in the adulterer; of thieves watching to break into houses; of Fauxes, with their dark lanterns, ready to blow up states; of unthrifths revelling and drinking, till their monies and their wits be both spent together; of age-decayed dames baking on their colours, and spending many pounds of candles in pinning and trimming their dresses, that will not bestow one minute's light in reading any good book. Murder, treachery, conspiracy, felony now follow their business very close: many owls that cannot endure the light, now flutter abroad, and keep a hooting and routing in the dark. Those dare now frequent taverns and brothels, quarrel in the streets, rage and domineer, who would appear contemptible in the day. The sun, that eye of heaven, does scarce see so much villany as candle-light. Wittily conceited was that Italian, who wrought the supplication to candle-light, desiring her to disclose to him the rare secrets which she saw in her empery. The day would scarce believe what deeds are done by night.

I conclude. Both day and night let us banish intemperance out of our coasts: it will beg for some indulgence, but let a shameless beggar have a strong denial. If we will not grant it the day, it will crave but the night; sin hath no right to a moment of time, therefore will take any; but when thou hast once allowed it a part, it will proudly challenge all. He that shall duly consider his sins, will find that he hath time little enough for repentance, none to spare for intemperance. Instead of rioting ourselves, we have cause to mourn for the riot of others. But, alas, all mortification is censured by the name of superstition, and he that forbears excess, is held an irregular, melancholy person. The most men's sorrows are like the mournings of an heir, who then smiles in his heart, when his eyes let fall forced tears. We may say of this kind of evil, as Christ said of that kind of devil, it will not out with prayer alone, but with fasting and prayer. It is not only human, but heavenly policy, to weaken our enemy before we fight with him. The lust that is fed with riot, will be too strong for us. Inveterate wounds or ulcers must have corrosives to eat out the dead flesh, ere they can be cured. We are ordained for holiness, not for licentiousness: the jollity of this world is so far from saving us, that it keeps us from being saved. O let not all the showers of sermons fall like rain in the horse-fair, or high-ways, to breed nothing but mire and puddles; hear not to become worse. But judge every hour worthy thy sorrow, which thou hast mispent in vanity: flee the sins against which I have spoken, and I have spoken not in vain.

They "count it pleasure to riot." Pleasure is the sorceress that raiseth up the spirit of riot; that special harlot of hell, which the devil hath dressed up to tempt the sons of men. She hath a melodious tongue, to enchant; a face of artificial beauty, to allure; eyes that roll with invitations, to bewitch; arms of wanton provocations, to embrace. She courts all men in the language of Absalom, but her heart is full of treason; and her project is to deceive them of the kingdom of heaven. Will for reason, is the usurper's tyranny; and pleasure for religion, is the epicure's divinity, whose belly is their god. Pleasure guides them in all their actions and courses: demand of a voluptuous man the reason of his doings, he will answer, It is my pleasure. Two questions would here be examined, for direction of our minds about pleasure.

1. Whether a man may take any pleasure in this world or no? Yes, certainly; one special use of wisdom stands in tempering our pleasures: to be delighted is not evil, but to be delighted in evil. As Paul says, "Be angry, and sin not;" so, Be merry, and sin not. Why hath God given man such choice of earthly commodities, but for his use? The whole world is a well-furnished table; if we shall wilfully fast, we shall be held for sullen guests. Some to avoid the danger of pleasure, have run from the world, changing populous cities for solitary mountains, and the society of men for beasts. As if the world were not in the desert, or the desert not in the world: as if a hermitage could hide a man from the devil, or he could not be tempted while he was alone, or an æstuant desire could not be in a neglected body. Did not Hierome find Rome in his heart, when nothing but rocks and bushes were in his eye? Do we not naturally more affect those delights which are restrained? Is not solitariness a main help to the speed of a temptation?

There is certainly a nearer and a fairer way than this. The wise man will be a hermit at home, and seeks rather to turn the world out of himself, than to turn himself out of the world. He can distinguish between the love of pleasure and the use of pleasure; and while others serve delight, he teacheth delight to serve him. If we see vanity, must we needs dote upon it? Our Saviour saw the glory of earthly kingdoms, yet despised it. The angels see the affairs and proceedings of us mortals, but as strangers. Lot reaped profit from the goodly meadows of Sodom, he meddled not with their sins. Moses was in the court of Pharaoh, the confluence of all pleasures, yet his heart was suffering with his afflicted countrymen. Elisha saw the secrets of the Syrian state, but as an enemy. David is in the court of Gath, but as his refuge; he was no friend to the Philistines. The world looked upon Abraham, Job, and many other saints, and they contemned it; and cannot we look upon it, but presently we are bewitched with it? Can we not warm us at the sun, but we must make an idol of it? Must we needs either hide our faces, or bow our knees? either renounce all pleasure, or be the slaves of pleasure? What extremes are these! we may be merry, without being mad: let these contentments go and come like strangers: true pleasures be ours, if we be Christ's.

2. How may a Christian take pleasure in the world? By having respect to three things; whether it be lawful, expedient, or becoming. The pleasure must be lawful, there can be no safety in a sinful delight. That which is absolutely evil, can by no circumstance be made good. Poison may be qualified, and become medicinal; there is use to be made of an enemy; sickness may turn to our better health, and death itself to the faithful is but a door to life; but sin can never be made good. Pleasure therefore first must have the warrant, that it be without sin; then the measure, that it be without excess. If the cup be evil, we may not taste it; though good, yet not carouse it. Reason forbids us both to touch known poison, and to be drunk with wholesome wine. Pleasure is like sauce to our meat; we must not be too saucy. A little honey is sweet, much fulsome. We are not born to play or sport. Nor is the lawfulness only observable, but the conveniency; a man may wear good clothes unhandsomely. The stuff may be good, yet while the fashion of the garment does not become him, it appears ridiculous. The place, the occasion, the company, the opportunity, all must be fit. The house of mourning is not for mirth; soon did Christ turn the musicians out of doors, Matt. ix. 23. In the time of visitation, while the plague or famine lies sore upon our neighbours, shall we give ourselves to sport and jovisance? Isa. xxii. 12, 13. Let us be sure that our delights exclude not the presence of God. (We love the medicine, not for its own sake, but for the health it brings us.) The angels are sent about God's messages to this earth; yet they are never out of their heaven, never without the vision of blessedness. We may be merry, though God be by; we may please ourselves, so long as we displease not him. He that desires pleasure for itself, and is taken up with the sweetness of it, is already drunk. Whereas he that rests not in it, but looks through it to the Giver, referring all to the highest good, is safe, and as far from sin as from sorrow. It is not the use, but affectation of pleasure that offends; therefore all the danger or safety is from within. The body may be a recluse, and the heart a wanderer. I have observed some to look carelessly and strangely on such objects as transport others, and answer questions far from the purpose; it seems they did mind some other thing: it is happy for a man not to mind the world. We eat and recreate, not because we would, but because we must; and when we are best pleased, let us be most suspicious. Let us use pleasure in God, from God, to God: in God, lawfully; from God, thankfully; to God, that is, to his glory.

Now there are also two other queries; Why should men, why should Christian men, riot in pleasures?

1. Why should reasonable men delight in riot? It makes them the worse, the unhealthfuller, the poorer, none the better. It is every way expensive, and cannot quit the cost. First, to the estate, voluptuousness is a waster: that merchant is likelier to grow rich, that turns his gallery into a warehouse, than he that turns his warehouse into a gallery. Honesty, Utility, and Cheerfulness, keeping house together, Honesty was to govern all, Utility to provide for all, and Cheerfulness to dress or prepare all. They had a great household, yet maintained their charge, relieved the poor, and laid up somewhat for their posterity. All things went sweetly on, while Cheerfulness was the cook, Thriftiness the caterer, and Honesty the steward. If any of the family were disordered, Honesty reformed them; if any lavish and unthrifty, Frugality recovered them; if any melancholy, Cheerfulness revived and cheered them. But after awhile, this Cheerfulness getting a little head, begins to exceed in mirth, and falls out with Utility for short provision: he had invited a number of fiddlers, jesters, players, tumblers, dancers, and must have extraordinary cheer for them. Utility refused to allow it, Cheerfulness would have it, and the quarrel grew hot: while Honesty was called to moderate the matter, this rabble came in, took Cheerfulness's part, snatched the keys out of Utility's hands, ransacked the coffers, exhausted the treasure, turned Honesty and Thrift out of doors; sung, danced, and drunk, and threw (as they say) the house out at the windows. Thus the family broke; for just as Honesty and Utility went out, Beggary came in. Only these two erected a new house, repaired their estates; to whom, not long after, poor Cheerfulness came a begging; but might not be admitted as one of the family, only was sent for sometimes to make them merry, and lived on their alms. You see the moral of this apologue. Cato said, that was a pitiful commonwealth, where a trout was dearer than an ox; and I may say, that is a lamentable state, where a fiddler and a dancer is better maintained than a preacher. Not a few families have thus been ruined, I would the rest would take warning. Secondly, it undoes the credit; who will trust an unthrift? As it is true of spiritual, so of worldly things, To him that hath, shall be given. When Death, Love, and Credit would part, they appointed places to find one another. Death says, You shall be sure to find me in great battles or epidemical plagues. Love says, You shall find me among shepherds, where is no talk of dowries. But Credit told them plainly, They that once part with me, shall never find me again. I need not add, how it overthrows the health; to rot and to riot, differ but one small letter. Howsoever the voluptuous flatter themselves with having the merrier life, I am sure they have the shorter life. They are but crazy, that have a fen about them; how rotten are they that have a fen within them! He is a right spend-all, that besides all spends himself. The philosopher that would ask of the frugal citizen but a penny, begged of the prodigal a talent; and he had his reason for it; because of the one he might beg often, of the other he was like to receive but once, so soon would his estate vanish. The temperate may die, the riotous cannot live: sickness is the daughter of intemperance. Yea, the inordinate life is scarce patient to tarry for sickness, but perisheth by misfortune; often in a brutish manner they go sleeping and senseless to hell, having neither reason, grace, nor time to repent, or so much as cry, Lord, have mercy on us. There is no sin which hurts not the sinner, but of all, riot is the most despatching; so soon doth it bring men to their end, so often doth it kill them in the act of sin!

2. But more; why should Christians seek pleasure in intemperance? We have not so learned Christ,

Paul tells us of them weeping, whose belly is their god, Phil. iii. 18. We cannot speak of them without passion and compassion; oh that our prayers and tears could recover them! Why should we seek the pleasures of the world, that have a world of pleasures without it? One delights in turning over a white and red dross, another glories in his vain tales; one takes pleasure in a dainty dish, another in a witty jest; one in a kite, another in a dog: shall these pleasures be our envy, or our scorn? Why do we call ourselves Christians, and rejoice like worldlings? That man solaceth himself in his earthly possessions, because he hath not a foot of inheritance in heaven; another sports with his hawks and hounds, because he hath no fellowship with saints and angels; a third tells over his bags of gold, because he hath no graces to number; another studies delicate dishes, and provides him sweet wines, because he never tasted the cup of salvation; another prides himself in his tular dignity, because he hath no hope of future glory; a last hunts after nothing but mirth, and is hence farthest from it, when he thinks himself deepest in it: he cares not how vain his sport is, so it be pleasant; and if he can while away the time, and chase off melancholy, he thinks that day spent happily. If the world be a man's god, pleasure must needs be his religion.

But shall the Christian be thus cozened? Shall we disdain these frivolous and lawless delights, that have solid and everlasting comforts? Far better were it to spend our time in tears, than thus to be ransported with wanton pleasures. To a holy soul, earthly pleasure is like an importunate fiddler, that without invitation impudently thrusts himself into his chamber, draws and plays, and will not be denied. He may give it the hearing, and that is a high favour, but he dares neither reward nor commend it; yea, he thinks it harsh music, and in his heart secretly condemns it, because he hath far better of his own. When he hath tuned his soul with meditation, he feels a sweet consort within, betwixt God and himself; his part being praise and obedience, and God's part toward him the peace of conscience. This world is like a bad fool in a play; the gross spectators laugh at those jests, wherewith the wise man is ready to hiss: he entertains that with scorn, which the rest do with applause. We have the true fountain of joy, let us never stoop to these riotous puddles. Our ends are not the same, why should our ways be so? Some have God, not the world; some have the world, not God; some have neither God nor the world; and some have both. First, some have God, not the world, as Lazarus; his heart was full of divine comforts, while his body lacked crumbe. Secondly, some have the world and not God, as Nabal, who possessed a world of wealth, not a dram of comfort. Thirdly, some have neither God nor the world, nothing but misery here, nothing but torment hereafter. Fourthly, some have both, as Abraham, who was rich while he lived on earth, and dying was glorious in heaven. Let us use the world, but enjoy the Lord; be thankful for these blessings, but rest our hearts on Jesus Christ.

They think it a pleasure, they shall not find it so. Conceit is the charm. Wicked joys are like those locusts, upon whose heads were (not crowns, but) as it were crowns (not of gold, but) like gold; their faces were (not, but) as it were faces of men; their hair (not indeed, but) as the hair of women; their breastplates, as it were breastplates of iron, Rev. ix. 7—9: all these, shadowy, and similitudinary: but, there were stings in their tails, ver. 10; not as it were, but true stings indeed. These idolatrous parasites offer sacrifices to the world, as the Philistines did to their Dagon; "Our god hath delivered into our hands our enemy," Judg. xvi. 24: they did but think it was Dagon that helped them, it was not. Let us resolve things to their first matter, and so consider them. What is a sumptuous building, but a little burnt earth, or hewed timber? What is a beautiful creature, but the same earth we tread upon better tempered? What is gold, but a vein of the ground better coloured? What, rich apparel, which man takes up in pride, but that the worm hath egested in scorn? Fame is but smoke, metal but dross, and pleasure but a short vanity. Howsoever too many think all this to be but the voice of a melancholy scholar, yet they shall feel and confess it undeniable truth. The devil is like a juggler, that puts the world, like a piece of money, into thy hand, and bids thee hold fast; whereas he by a legerdemain hath formerly got it away, and when thou openest thy hand there is nothing.

We have seen some as happy as the world could make them, yet of all men the most discontented. Large possessions, goodly houses, beautiful spouses, hopeful children, full purses; yet their life hath been neither the longer nor the sweeter, nor their hearts the lighter, nor their meals the heartier, nor their nights the quieter, nor their cares the fewer; yea, none more full of complaints. Among men generally, the poorer the merrier. While I see men at once find wealth and lose their mirth, as if they could not cease to be poor but withal they cease to be happy, I cannot but conclude, that riches and content are like two buckets, while one comes up full, the other goes down empty. Yea, I account none so miserable, as they that grow rich by sin, or great by flattery. When wealth comes on the best terms, it is but vain; when upon ill conditions, it is a curse. What is a silken coat, when there is a stinging conscience within? or a high title to advance the name, when there is a hell in the soul? Oh that men could see, how much better it is to be poor than evil, and that there is no comparison between want and sin! It was a Christian choice of a reverend man, Let me rather be in hell without sin, than glorious and wicked upon earth. Vain pleasures, if they could be sound, yet are short; if they could be long, yet they are not sound. Their best is but as a good day between two agues, or a sunshine betwixt two tempests. Laughter concludes in tears; a little pleasure for so much repentance is but a hard pennyworth. The voluptuous man's ground bears no flowers, but either they prick the fingers or offend the nostrils: if they be sweet, they have their thorns; if fair, yet not without annoyance. The worldling speaks of the Christian, Alas, poor beggar! but the Christian finds him rather worth his pity than his envy; Alas, poor worldling! Moses rather chose to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasure of sin for a season, Heb. xi. 25. I wonder at the faith of Moses; but presupposing his faith, I wonder not at his choice. When the devil shall make this proffer, All these will I give thee; return him Peter's answer, Thy gold perish with thee. "They that sow in tears shall reap in joy," Psal. cxxvi. 5; but a world of sensual joys shall never bring man a good harvest. They rejoice, saith one, in false pleasures, they perish in real torments. Men call for pleasure, as the Philistines did for Samson, to make them sport; and it pulls down the house upon their heads. Youth, Health, and Wealth being met, would have a dance; and Pleasure must be their minstrel: but in the first change, those three wanton damsels were taken up by three unhappy mates, Age, Sickness, and Poverty: Youth was surprised by Age, Health by Sickness, and Wealth by Poverty; at which sight, Pleasure fled away, and Time delivered them over to Sorrow.

Uses. 1. Let us think upon this world, as it deserves, with contempt. How little can it do for us, and that little with what deceit! What is thy heart the better, what the merrier, for all these pleasures wherewith it hath befriended thee? When did it offer honey, but a sting withal? milk and slumber, without a nail and a hammer? Pleasure is like a flattering host, that promiseth good cheer, but the reckoning pays for all. He that compares the welcome with the farewell, shall find he had better have fasted. Believe them that have bought their experience dear; it is better to avoid sin before we have tasted, than after we have surfeited. Look we up to that heaven which God hath promised and Christ hath purchased: being but one-half upon earth, let the better part converse above; from thence it came, and thither it is ordained to go. Let us get that resolution, that we are only willing to live, because our time is not yet come to die; pitching our desires upon those pleasures, which have neither bounds nor end; which are certain, though future; while these are fickle, though present. Man's heart will not be empty of thoughts; if heaven have taken up the rooms, the world is disappointed. We confess the happiness of salvation, and wish it; but we fasten on this world. We fill our mouths with heaven, but our hearts and hands with earth. Paradise is a joyful place; yet when death comes, we are loth to go thither. But if a man were travelling a miry way, on a rainy day, in tempestuous weather, were he not mad that had rather go on still, than yield to be at home? The more hold we take of this world, the more we lose hold of the Lord. Tene certum, dimitte incertum; i. e. Hold fast what is certain, let go what is uncertain. Let us turn from vain pleasure that seeks us, and seek that pleasure which shall for ever content and never cloy us.

2. Instead of taking pleasure in riot, let us rejoice in Christ. Worldlings offend, that laugh when they should mourn; and Christians offend too, if they droop when they should be cheerful. God hath done great things for us, wherefore we rejoice; and we sin if we rejoice not. They err in false mirth, and we in causeless heaviness, if, while we enjoy the God of salvation, we are sorrowful. Is there any joy without God? And where can God be without joy? When the Lord hath made us happy, he will not thank us to make ourselves miserable. Shall we freeze by a warm fire, or starve at a feast? We find God reconciled, Christ our Advocate, the Holy Spirit our Comforter; we have peace in our conscience, in heaven an inheritance; we should be both angry and ashamed at ourselves, to ask our hearts that question, Why art thou sad, O my soul? If we be in Christ, our very bread is a symbol of the bread of life; and our wine, of that cup we shall drink in heaven. What should discomfort us if Christ be with us? All our joy is not reserved for the next life, some is afforded us on earth; God's greater light doth not extinguish the less. Friends, children, wine, oil, health, liberty, competency, are not given us for discontent. We may not make them God's rivals, but rejoice in them as God's blessings. In themselves they are nothing, in him they are worth our joy. If God had not thought them blessings he had not bestowed them; and how are they blessings if we delight not in them? Because we may not take pleasure in every thing, shall we therefore take pleasure in nothing? They wrong Christians that forbid them mirth: the gospel is not such dull metal, but the tidings of joy to all believers.

"Spots they are and blemishes." In every sin there is not only guilt, that binds over to punishment, but defilement; which makes the sinner not less filthy than guilty; and even when the guilt is remitted the filth remains still. A child by his own unruliness hath gotten a hurt or maim; upon his prayers and tears he is spared the punishment; his father may forgive him, but it requires time before the surgeon can heal him: the hurt is not so soon cured, as the fault is pardoned. David cries, I have sinned, and God answers, I have taken away thy sin, 2 Sam. xii. 13; yet there still abides a spot for David's tears; which he must weep thoroughly to wash off. Spots and blemishes; the words are but two, put together with a conjunction, and I will not put them asunder with a division. The argument of my discourse is corruption, putrefaction, sores, and diseases; so that it may be called a spiritual sermon. No man looks upon ulcers with pleased eyes, yet the surgeon must see them. We love to behold goldsmiths' stalls well adorned with choice of plate, of jewels; not dunghills: yet the cock in scraping the dunghill found a jewel. We like to see beautiful creatures, not horrid beasts and serpents; yet the painter made a famous piece of Bucephalus, and the crocodile was so curiously shadowed, that in Egypt it was taken for a god, and worshipped. We delight to view flowers of various forms and colours, not weeds: yet to paint a weed to the life, is held a good art. Whatsoever I want of the art, I shall do my endeavour to resolve this short character into divers conclusions.

1. All men are spotted, originally from their parents; of actual spots themselves are the parents. So foul are all by nature, that they can neither be good nor see good. If thou ask how thou camest by it: thou art beholden for it to thy father, he to his father, all to Adam, Adam to Eve, and Eve to the devil. There is no evil which our natural uncleanness would not admit, if God restrained not. Every actual sin is a spot to the soul; a lustful look is a spot to the eye; a bribe taken is a spot to the hand: he that unjustly gets or keeps away another's right, is worse than a thief burned in the hand. Church dues detained is a spot to the estate, that cannot be washed out from the sacrilegious man or his heritage; every oath or lie is a spot on the tongue; every malicious thought is a spot on the breast; every riotous draught is a spot on the throat; every idolatrous cringe is a spot on the knees. You will say these spots are not visible, not seen on the body. No, for hypocrisy is a white skin drawn over them, which from our dull eyes hides their appearance. But to God they are visible, to whom all hearts are more transparent than any diaphanous glass is to us. And at the last day, all these spots shall show themselves (when all secrets shall be legible) in their odious forms. Now as it is in some mortal infection, the spots appear not in the flesh, but strike inward to the heart, and kill it. If all our internal spots should break out, we could not endure one another. The whole world would be an hospital, and every man a leper. God calls for sacrifice, the priest presents it, but it must be without blemish: we have no sacrifice to offer but ourselves, and how will he accept a spotted man, that required an unspotted beast? This is one step.

2. The whole world is spotted, that is another step: in the universal blemishes of nature let us read our own. When I consider the great and good work of God in the creation, making all things for man, and man for himself, I think of the people's acclamation to the same Workman, in a new and greater work of our redemption; "He hath done all things well," Mark vii. 37. He hath done, such is his power; all things, such is his wisdom; well, such is his goodness. First, we have the work of Christ, He hath done; then the universality of the work, all things; lastly, the nature of that universality, well. When I look upon the present world, I find a great alteration; foulness and corruption in those creatures, which were from God of so pure a constitution. He made the world so fair, that he loved it; but when man had took it in hand, he began to loathe it. "All flesh had corrupted his way," Gen. vi. 12. Corrupted, that is the turpitude; all flesh, that is the latitude. The morning saw all things very good, the evening of the same day saw spots and blemishes in all creatures. To charge God with this degeneration, is the highest blasphemy: coldness may sooner arise from fire, than any evil from the fountain of goodness. Indeed there is a penal evil; and this he acknowledgeth his own, Amos iii. 6: there is a criminal evil, which we call a radical, causal one; this is ours. This last is an unrighteous action, which pleaseth man, and displeaseth God; the other is a just suffering, that pleaseth God, and displeaseth man. The punishment of sin is not properly an evil, but a good action of justice; dishonouring the guilty creature, to honour his holy Maker. As we say of war, it is a destroyer of nature individually, but a preserver of it universally.

Of this foul and spotted evil, God is not the author, but the avenger. How then came these spots? "An enemy hath done this," Matt. xiii. 28, sowing tares upon the wheat. Which shows, first, that good was before evil, for it is superseminatio, i. e. a sowing upon: good had the priority, though evil hath now got the superiority. Next, that evil is an accident, not a nature; but such an accident as hath quite spoiled nature, as rust mars the gold. That as we say of a prince, though he be a god on earth, yet he is but an earthly god; though a god before men, yet but a man before God: so our whole natural condition, which was angelical in respect of the beasts, is now but (as it were) bestial in respect of the angels. I do not intend by this, according to the dotage of some new philosophers, that every irregularity on earth puts a star out of order in the firmament; that every adulterous act here, sticks a blot upon the moon there; that our pride and ambition hath brought the sun lower than it was, that he either slacks or mends his pace as we grow dull or forward in God's service. For the stars keep their courses, Judg. v. 20; the moon hath no more blemishes than she had a thousand years ago; the sun is neither come nearer, nor gone further off, but keeps the same line wherein God bade it run at the first: the heavens are as clear, and the planets as regular in their courses, as ever; the celestial bodies admit of no qualities. If all our sins were set as spots on the sun, it had been as black as pitch before this time. But this I say, the whole creature groaneth under the bondage of our corruption, Rom. viii. 21, 22: and the world was once so foul with our iniquities, that the Maker scoured it with an inundation of water; and again, it is grown so filthy, that he will purify it with a deluge of fire, in the day of judgment.

3. But if every man be spotted, who shall then enter into heaven, seeing into that city no unclean thing shall come? Rev. xxi. 27. This is true, yet many that have been unclean persons, are since admitted. They went not in impure; Such ye were, as could not enter,) but ye are cleansed, saith Paul to his Corinthians, 1 Cor. vi. 11. They were all naturally unclean, yet many of them are now in heaven; but before they entered, they were washed. I list not to uncover the spots of God's saints; let them be buried in the dust with their bodies: yet their souls are in heaven; how got they thither? They washed them and made them white in the blood of the Lamb, Rev. vii. 14. Washed, therefore they had been foul; made them white, therefore they were of a stained colour before. If God should look for a spotlessness here, whom should he look upon? Is any man's heart pure? no, he shall have cause to his death-bed of redoubling that prayer, "Create in me a clean heart, O God," Psal. li. 10. And his confessor may still preach to him that text, "Wash thy heart from wickedness, that thou mayst be saved," Jer. iv. 14. And who can say he hath clean hands? Say his heart were clean, say his hands, yet be his feet clean? They stand next the earth, therefore are aptest to soil. For this purpose Christ washed his disciples' feet, and thus commented on it, and interpreted his own action; "He that is washed needeth not save to wash his feet," John xiii. 10. Out of the bath a man comes washed all over, yet some gravel will stick on his feet.

He is not of an earthen constitution, that hath no earthly affection. Christ took our flesh, took it without spot, without spot he kept it; no man else ever received it so, or kept it so. Hate the garment spotted by the flesh, Jude 23; yet the flesh itself is this garment, and it spots itself with itself. Job was a holy man; yet he confesseth after all this washing, that his own clothes would make him abhorred, Job ix. 31. David holy, yet he desired to be purged with hyssop, Psal. li. 7. The church is said to have no spot, Cant. iv. 7; yet every particular limb of that fair and spotless body, every soul in that church, is full of spots. Yea, Christ himself hath spots, not by nature, but by imputation; not his own, but ours; he took all our stains and deformities; he became sin for us, 2 Cor. v. 21; for us he was made full of spots, that we in him might be spotless. The grace of God may go a great way in our souls, and yet not leave us without spots. Mercies may fall in abundant showers on our hearts, and yet not mollify all our hardness. Those holy fires may consume a great deal of our dross, not all. Corrections are a bath to purge us from the foul corruptions we gather by walking in this dirty world; yet Israel confesseth, they were not cleansed from the iniquity of Peor to this day, Josh. xxii. 17. God may heal our wounds, and yet leave scars; purge our blood, and yet leave spots. But there is no spot so foul, which repentance cannot wash off: this shall make a man lift up his face without spot, Job xii. 15. And St. Paul prays for his Thessalonians, that they might be presented blameless at the coming of Christ; which he would never have begged, if he knew it never could be granted. Not to have no spot here, but to have no spot imputed hereafter, is the happiness of a Christian.

4. We have all spots, but these are spots; for the apostle speaks not of their actions here, but their persons; not the blemishes of the men, but that the men themselves are blemishes. This is a high degree of sin, to be wholly turned into sin. The leopard is full of spots, but the leopard is not a spot, nor is the spot a leopard. Many a body is diseased, but the body is one thing, the disease another; but when the whole body is turned into a disease, it in a manner ceaseth to be a body. When the clouds let fall their showers by drops, we call it a rain; but when all those drops are met in one channel, it is no more a rain now, but a flood. They have committed so many sins, that for the number and continuity of them, they cease to be sinners, and are very sins: as the prophet Micah calls it not the idolatry of Jerusalem, but the Jerusalem of idolatry, Micah i. 5. The case seemed desperate, when there was no soundness, nothing but corruption; and David says, There is no whole part in my flesh; and Job is said to be so full of ulcers, that a pin's point could not be thrust between them. If this were other than an emphatical expression of their malady, it was strange that the whole flesh should be one coagulated ulcer. Yet was this bile but upon the flesh, and there was life within; but here the whole soul and body becomes one botch: as Lucan spake of a wounded body, Totum est pro vulnere corpus; i. e. No more a body, but a wound; no more sinful creatures, but creatures that be sins. If there were not several degrees of sin on earth, there should not be several measures of torment in hell. When travellers ride together in a dirty way, all are dashed, but some more or less than others, according to their more or less circumspection or advantage. Vice is said (in the fable) to have in her garden a subterraneous vault; out of which she could convey foul water, to soil the curious spectators; which was of different operations in the staining. They that were defiled with the aspersions of wantonness, were sooner dried; they that with pride, covetousness, ambition, quite spoiled their garments; they that with envy, treachery, homicide, sacrilege, could never get out the spots, but were fain to cast their clothes into the fire. Spots may be sized in so deep, as not to be purged but with the fire of hell.

5. To whom do these appear spots and blemishes? (1.) To God, who hath pure eyes, and can abide no unclean thing. He hates filthiness in his own, though he does not hate his own for filthiness, because he respects them in Christ; but in the reprobate he so abhors the sin, that he hates even the sinner for it. It was for the sin of man, that God repented he made man: thus it offends the First Person. These spots drew from Christ a sweat of blood in the garden, and the blood of his life on the cross; so they offend the Second Person. They also grieve the Holy Ghost; who looking for the fruit of joy and peace, and such sweet perfumes, finds the stench of sordid corruptions.

(2.) To the angels: they despise not a diseased body, nor an infected house, if a holy soul dwell there. "No plague shall come nigh thy dwelling, for he shall give his angels charge over thee," Psal. xci. 10, 11. They are set not only to keep us and the plague asunder, but still to keep us though we light in a house together. They do not scorn to take Lazarus's soul out of an ulcerous body. It is not sickness, but sin, from which they turn their faces. But now, should angels stand by sinners in their acts of uncleanness? Must an angel wait upon a proud fop, while he is dressing himself by the glass? While men ply their drunken carouses in taverns, do they look that their angels should fly up and down the room? Iniquities be sport for devils, but an eyesore to the angels; they that rejoice at a sinner's conversion, do rather grieve at his aberration.

(3.) To good men, whom nothing pleaseth that displeaseth their Maker. While the world is laughing, David is mourning for them: Mine eyes gush out rivers of waters, because they keep not thy law, Psal. cxix. 136. Men turn from lazars and lepers, and refuse to visit visited houses; yet Tutius morbi, quam vitii consortium: it is better dwelling with good men in an unwholesome climate, than in the purest air with unclean persons; as Lot, in a good land with a bad set.

(4.) To bad men; for howsoever sinners love to be evil themselves, yet they would have others good to them. Nero, that took such pleasure in shedding blood, when his own turn came, complained. He that delights in polluting the marriage-bed of others, would not have his own abused. The thief would not have his own goods stolen; the proud man is said to carry a dagger, to stab him that is prouder. No wicked man doth wish to suffer what he takes pleasure to do. We read of four lepers that kept company together, 2 Kings vii. 3, but it was upon a desperate adventure; neither could endure the other's leprosy. He that hath the most corrupt lungs, complains of another's offensive breath. "Naaman, the captain of the host of the Syrian king, was a great man with his master, and honourable, and a mighty man in valour, but he was a leper." 2 Kings v. 1. A great warrior, an honourable courtier, yet a leper! The leprosy was a nasty and loathsome disease, yet this odious and wearisome condition lights upon a great person. Now, what was all his glory with his leprosy? They that honoured him, avoided him; and he was abhorred of those that flattered him. The basest slave of Syria would not change skins with him, though he might have his honour to boot. So men given to villanies are shunned of those that are little other than villanous. These spots are infectious, more than the plague-tokens; and though they please other dissolute souls here, yet they shall curse them in hell, because their example is the cause of their greater torment.

(5.) To the creatures; for God made them to serve man, and to wait upon him in the service of God: now when man turns himself out of God's service, all the creatures in serving him are (as it were) turned out of God's service too, and grieve that they are compelled to wait upon a wrong master.

(6.) They are offensive to the very damned in hell; which seemeth strange, but it is true. That rich man, Luke xvi., not out of charity to his brethren, but favour to himself, requested that warning might be given to his brethren; lest as his example increased their sins, their sins should advance his torments.

(7.) But now, lastly, do they not offend themselves? No, the sick man may feel, the dead does not. Who knows the spots on his own face, but either by the reflection of a glass, or by the relation of others? The leper cannot choose but abhor himself: how little pleasure did that Syrian peer take to be stooped unto by others, while he hated to see himself; while his hand could not move to his mouth without his own detestation! But this is a spiritual disease, festering inwards: when the conscience is unclasp'd, and these spots break forth; as when the bottomless pit was opened the locusts flew out; and sin shall write her inscription on the doors, not as in visited houses, Lord, have mercy on us, but in the chambers of despair, All mercy is fled from us; it will be fearful.

6. Sin is of a defiling quality; like a bemired dog, when it fawns upon us it fouls us. It may in this one thing be compared to fire, it converts matter into itself. Stain a cloth, or dye it into another colour, yet still it remains a cloth: the body turns meat into itself, is not turned into the meat: only as fire can convert a burning material into fire, so sin turns a man into sin, that he is no more a man, but a very spot. Corporal leprosy has been healed by natural means; and blemishes that art cannot cure, yet it hath devices to hide. But for these blemishes, there is nothing in nature to cure them, nothing in art to cover them. If honour could do it, Naaman had been no leper. A noble sinner is but a noble spot. If riches, Nabal had not been branded for a churl: but heaps of wealth laid upon heaps of wickedness, make but a great dunghill. Can perfumes? Civet indeed will make a dog smell as sweet as his master; but a vicious life doth more stink through a garnished body, than a rotten body doth through perfumed garments. Can beauty? No, even when there appears no blemish in the outward skin, yet, through a lascivious demeanour, the beauty itself becomes a blemish. Nay, can profession itself hide or heal the spiritual leprosy? Rome dresseth herself in the robes and titles of the chaste spouse of Christ, yet is she not still that scarlet whore? The Jesuits have been saucy with the name of Jesus, are they not still that mystery of iniquity? Saul did prophesy in the college, was he not still a blot in the world? Many are beautiful as the sons of the morning in their profession, that are still black birds, children of the night, in their conversation. As Sigismund the emperor said of Julian the cardinal, legate at the council of Basil, when he was highly commended to him, Tamen Romanus est, i. e. Yet he is a Roman; so we may say of a hypocrite, when he is praised for his zealous devotion, Tamen macula est, i. e. Yet he is a blemish. Men of foul and corrupt manners shall find nothing in nature or art, that shall keep them from being, and being called, spots.

7. Open and notorious offenders ought to be denied these holy feasts, to be put from the sacrament; and instead of communicating with us, to pass under the censure of excommunication from us; till in penitent tears they have cleansed their pollutions. Spots in the life are worse than spots in the face: if such sluttish aspersions appear on the skin, will any man come to the church before he hath washed his face? These are not members, but spots of the body; we pare off such excrescent blemishes that the body may be perfect. They may be in the decree of God members of Christ, they are not so yet in the judgment of man: we call not a wart on the flesh, a part of the body. Indeed it is true, as Augustine says, It belongs to the servant to invite, but to God to separate; yet the minister calls in some, whom the Master casts out, Matt. xxii. 13. We may not put the sign of Christ's body into a drunken hand; nor offer the symbol of his blood to a bloody and malicious heart; nor the sacrament of peace and love to them that hate both love and peace. We do not only say, Come not hither if ye be such; but we must not suffer you to come hither if we know you to be such. We wash our hands before we take our temporal food, and shall we not cleanse our hearts before we receive our spiritual? The dead body of Christ was wrapped in clean linen, and is not his living body worthy of a clean conscience? The body and blood of the Lord doth make us holy, and is it not our default if the same should make us guilty? Read and compare John vi. 54, with I Cor. xi. 29. How contrary are these effects of the same thing in divers men! even as life and death, heaven and hell, salvation and perdition, eternal joy and eternal fire. Oh that man for a little filthy lust, the pleasure of his sense, or indulgence to his affections, should convert heavenly food to his own bane! He that comes a penitent, departs an innocent: they that come with all their unwashed blemishes, with a thousand woes return; the supper of life is to them a bloody banquet.

Observe what preparation was required for receiving of the law, Exod. xix. 10. For time, three days: if so much time must be spent in preparing to take it, our whole life is short enough to prepare a reckoning for it. That was the word of a command, Paul calls it the ministration of death; this is the word of promise, the promise of Christ and salvation with him. If that required three days, which was all terror, what time of preparation is due to this that is all comfort! When our souls are at the best, yet our approach to God requires particular addresses and new preparations; it is well if the whole Lent can prepare our hearts for Easter; and they that do not fit themselves before they come, had better have kept away. For matter, all Israel must be sanctified: what was the cause? Seven weeks they had been out of Egypt, yet all this while Egypt was not gone out of them; the Egyptian vices, together with their flesh-pots, stuck still in their memories, in their appetites. They had passed by many waters, of the Red Sea, of Marah, of that which gushed out of the rock; yet the infection of Egypt was not washed off; therefore they must be sanctified. Doth not this charge lie as close upon us? Now is the time (Easter) we draw near unto God in a special manner: he often preacheth to us, and we hear him; we often call upon him, and he hears us; but now we come one step nearer, as it were to take him by the hand, and convey him in these holy symbols to our heart. Sin is never safe, but then most dangerous when we bring it into the presence of God. If it comes along with us to the communion table, it shall not only frustrate what we do, but endanger us to a worse estate than we brought thither. At all times we must be holy, but then especially when we present ourselves to the holy eyes of our Maker. Who dares kiss the king's hand with a foul mouth? We wash before our private meals at home daily; but when we are to eat with some great person, we scour our hands with balls. We cannot be too holy when we come to feed with our Saviour, Rev. iii. 20, yea, to feed upon him. When he is a Guest, we are but the host; but when we are his guests, he is both the Host and the feast, even the cheer itself. Now if they must be so sanctified to receive the law, how holy should we be to receive the grace of the gospel! Yea, not only their persons, but their very clothes, must be cleansed; as they that come out of infected houses air their garments: their clothes smelt of Egypt, and must be washed. But why their clothes? and why washed? Garments are not capable of sin; if they were, water would not cleanse them. The danger was neither in their skins, nor in their coats, yet they must be washed, that they might learn by the cleanness of their clothes, with what souls to appear before God. Because they were more in danger of being foul than of being bare, they are washed to begin their age in purity.

At this solemn time men use to put on their best garments; a custom which we approve, rather than reprove: it is fit our reverence to the presence of God should be seen in our very vestures. Devotion takes no pleasure to dwell slovenly; like Galba's wit, under a deformed roof. Christ doth not condemn external cleanness, when he prefers inward holiness, Luke xi. 39. It is not the beauty of the skin, but the uncleanness of the heart, that comes under censure. A crystal glass doth well, but we do not use to put mud into it. But what is a neat suit with foul and ragged linings, a white skin with a filthy soul? Rather than not to have the face fair, too many use lotions and colours to blanch it; as one says, God made the face, and the devil paints it. Yet, both within and without, we should be cleanly. But especially God looks to the pureness of that part which resembles himself. He made every creature after his kind, Gen. i. 24; man in the image of himself. A whited or adorned clay is not his image; the God of spirits looks to the spirit, that that be holy and humble, both. For some will be holy, and not humble; but all the pureness of their minds will not bear out the stiffness of their knees. If they want reverence, pretend what they will, I shall hardly credit their holiness. Others seem humble, but they forget to be holy; so some guests sit down with the rest, but they have no appetite.

In a word, receive him with cleansed hands and joyful hearts. Let not Christ be forced upon you, but stretch out a thankful hand to receive him. If thou art not a receiver, thou art a deceiver, thou cozenest thine own soul. And let Christ be present mentally, when he cannot be had sacramentally. But when the feast is prepared, and we invited, let us come. Let us avoid spots, that we be not defiled; bewail our spots, that they may be pardoned; and resolve against all spots hereafter, that we may be comforted.

8. We may not abstain from the sacrament, because there be spots and blemishes in the society. It is true, these spots should be removed; say they are not, shall we therefore remove ourselves? To them the holy bread is bane, to thee it is salvation. The unworthy receiver "eateth and drinketh damnation to himself," 1 Cor. xi. 29; to himself, not to thee. If we communicate with evil men, and not in evil things, we have no harm. Woe were us, if we should live in the danger of all men's sins! we have enough of our own, we need not borrow of others. Every man shall bear his own burden; ours is not so light, that we should call for more weight, and undertake what God never imposed. It was enough for him that was God and man, to bear the iniquity of us all; it is no task for us: alas, we faint under the least of our own. Nor can others' sins become ours by toleration or connivance, but by imitation and indulgence. If each man's known blemish be every man's, then is every son of Adam as public a person as his father was. We were all in Adam, stood or fell in him; there must be some difference between the root and the branches. My father's sin is not mine, much less my neighbour's: "The son shall not bear the iniquity of the father," Ezek. xviii. 20. Unless a spotted soul could blemish the sacrament, it is to my believing heart the bread of life. The church of Thyatira had many blots, yet the Holy Ghost lays on them none other burden but this, "That which ye have already hold fast till I come," Rev. ii. 24, 25. He bids them not leave the church, but hold fast their own.

But "a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump," 1 Cor. v. 6. It is true, by the infection of it; but it only sorreth them that partake it, not those that dislike it. Am I become an adulterer, because an adulterer communicates with me? Am I guilty of excess, because he that was yesterday drunk, to-day eats with me soberly? Charity would think that no man brings his sin along with him to the sacrament; but rather, hath formerly exonerated his soul by repentance. While we dislike, resist, reprove, and mourn for it, it cannot be ours. The Corinthians had these love-feasts, and in them gross and sinful disorders; yet Paul doth not say, Abstain from the sacrament till they be reformed. No, he corrects the abuse, but he commands the act: That you come together for the worse, I praise you not; but that you come together, I praise you. God hath commanded us to hear and receive; where did he ever say, Except you must come among sinners? Their uncleanness can no more defile us, than our holiness can excuse them. We are invited to a feast; if but a napkin or a trencher be misplaced, or a dish ill carved, we fly off from the table in a fume, and never stay to thank our host. Oh that men would be but sober, and either less curious or more charitable!

9. As all sins are spots, so some have a more special resemblance, as carrying in them a natural poison and filthiness. Such particular instances we find in the Scriptures, wherein God discovered the spots in their consciences, by sticking spots on their bodies. The Egyptians and magicians contest with Moses, and are struck with a scab on their faces, Exod. ix. 11. It is against men's lusts that we fight, and for their lusts they contend against us; spots they would defend, and therefore God lays on them such spots from which they shall not defend themselves. I never knew men oppose God's messengers, but once before their death they complained of their gettings. Miriam's foul tongue is punished with a foul face, Numb. xii. 10. She would have been as glorious as her brother Moses; now every Israelite sees his face glorious, hers leprous. The venom of her tongue would have eaten into the reputation of her prince, therefore the venom of leprosy eats into her flesh. Both Moses and Miriam had need of veils, the one to shadow his glory, the other to hide her deformity. And indeed, deformity is the fit cure of pride: she scorned Zipporah the Midianite for not being so fair as herself, now the Midianite will not change complexions with her. Pride and envy are two fatal spots, they seldom escape infamy; the Divine justice will cast filth in their faces. Let them that be proud because they are well-favoured, think on Miriam: the beauty that is held with affectation, shall perish with contempt: God hath spots for the proudest face.

Of this cup drank Gehazi; seeing he would needs take part of Naaman's money, he shall take part with him in his leprosy, 2 Kings v. 27. These were heavy talents for Gehazi; he had far better have kept a light purse and a homely coat, with a sound body and a clean soul. The talents were never heavy till now; two of Naaman's servants bore them for him before, now Gehazi must bear them himself alone. He desired a load of treasure, and he hath loaded himself with a curse: he would have two suits, and he hath got a third to boot; one more than he looked for, an unchangeable suit; that shall last as long as his skin, that shall clothe him with shame, and be ever loathsomely white, noisomely unclean. The sins of Gehazi were covetousness, fraud, sacrilege; and all passengers shall read these in leprous characters. What be more truly the sins of this city, than these three of Gehazi? Sacrilege, in which it hath justified all the world: covetousness in our hearts, fraud in our hands, who complains not of? These be the spots of our souls; and hath not God answered them all, over and over again, with spots on our bodies? Have we not been plagued for these injuries, with stinging leprosy? Have our own persons only bore the punishment? No, but as Gehazi's sin was not only read in his flesh, but in his posterity's; so even the children have drunk of the fathers' cup.

Lastly, for application: our land is too full of these spots; it is more populous of blemishes than of inhabitants. There is a tale of St. Bridget, that she heard the blessed Virgin saying to her Son, Rome is a fruitful land: to whom he answered, It is so indeed, only fruitful of tares. (Catal. Test. Verit. tom. ii. pag. 800.) If a man were in Tartary, he might see abundance of men, but all black-a-moors: we have store of Christians, but a greater number of them be spotted Christians; yea, not a few be rather spots than Christians. Our sins multiply faster than our people. Oh that there were any comparison between their numbers! for one man hath a great number of sins. We had but some families of papists; now they talk of whole colonies, streets, and lanes, and parishes of the brood of that spotted harlot. Drunkards were as rare as wolves, now they are as common as hogs. Harlots were like owls, only night-birds; now they keep open house, pay scot and lot with their honest neighbours. With spotted lives we profess that unspotted Lamb.

We know there is a spotted fever that rageth and rageth among us, (Ann. 1624.) in which we may read our spotted courses. How justly doth God retaliate to us our sins; spot for spot, blemish for blemish; for the hidden spots of our souls, these visible spots on our bodies! I do not censure the persons sick of that disease; God forbid: there be greater sinners that escape than some that suffer. A good man may die of that plague which was bred by others' sins. Of a poisoned fountain in the way, the innocent passenger may miscarry as well as the guilty, the true man as the thief. Yet from a general visitation we may gather a general instruction. By a fever that discovers itself in spots, God punisheth our undiscovered sins; thus he cries quittance with us. The spots declare the sickness to be a malignant and pestilential disease; and by these tokens the physicians see more clearly what to do. You will say, There is comfort in that: but most commonly all they can do comes to nothing; there is no comfort in that. It is some benefit for a man to know his enemy; but withal to know him too hard for him, is small benefit. It is a poor step toward recovery, when our spots do only tell us that we are worse than we thought ourselves. Indeed it is well, if God's marks upon us can be our marks to God, and like symptoms of death direct us to the Fountain of life; if this judgment can make way for mercy, as a strong wind clears the air for the sunshine. To say, the house is visited, God's tokens and marks be there, the spots are upon them, keeps off friends; for few men dare visit where God hath visited. But though they dare not come, under pretence of being pestilential to others, yet the Lord fails not to visit his with compassion, as with affliction. Many a man hath been saved that had God's marks upon him; but he is a wanderer, in a woeful state, upon whom God hath not set his marks. Paul professeth that he bore about in his body the marks of the Lord Jesus, Gal. vi. 17, and this was his joy. David hath it, Show some good token on me for good, Psal. lxxxvi. 17. There is then a token for good, a token of goodness; and the heat of a fever working on the body may be but the chafing of the wax, that God may set the seal of salvation upon it. Howsoever, let us pray for them that have these spots on their bodies, God comfort them; and no less heartily for ourselves that have these spots on our souls, God amend us.

Uses. 1. Learn to see thy spots. Many have unknown sins, as a man may have a mole on his back, and himself never know it. Lord, cleanse me from my secret faults, Psal. xix. 12. But have we not spots whereof we are not ignorant? In diseases, sometimes nature is strong enough to put forth spots, and there she cries to us by these outward declarations, that we are sick; sometimes she cannot do it but by the force of cordials. Sometimes conscience of herself shows us our sins; sometimes she cannot but by medicines, arguments that convince us out of the holy word. Some can see, and will not, as Balaam; some would see, and cannot, as the eunuch: some neither will nor can, as Pharaoh; some both can and will, as David. We may know the malice of a man by his confession, yet we do not know whether there be not as much malice remaining in him after his confession; we are sure of his hatred, not of his repentance. Many a one knows his fault, yet loves it. It is poor comfort to know much danger, and not to know that that is the worst. A woman is eased by being delivered, and she forgets her pains at the birth of a son; but could she read his future story, how ill a man, perhaps how ill a son, he would prove, I doubt whether the case of her body would recompense the grief of her mind. What am I the better to know my calamity, if I know not the way to comfort? Such a knowledge would but increase sorrow, and be a purchase clogged with more encumbrances.

Yet is it the first degree toward recovery, to see our spots, though upon the sight we have a touch of despair. There be some virtues that cannot be exercised but in trouble. We must be poor and want, before we can exercise the virtue of thankfulness; we must be miserable and in anguish, before we can exercise the virtue of patience; so we must be sinners and have spots, yea, we must see those spots, and feel those sins, before we can exercise the grace of repentance. If we did not cry, we should die, and by our crying we come to live: though we dig deep, yet the gold is worth our labour. What must we do next?

2. Confess these spots. Our corporal blemishes we hide from men's sight, and that with modesty: none but beggars expose their sores, to move compassion. And we do not amiss to hide our infirmities also from public view; seeing every sin doubles its own malignity by being offensive. But if we hide our spots from God, we and our spots shall perish together. The spots that God hateth, are the spots that man hideth. He that carveth a piece of wood, covers the spots, Wisd. xiii. 14; as the painter hid the scar in Agamemnon's face: and many living pieces are painted for the same purpose. Yea, there be some that study to be spotted; as if they thought themselves then fairest when they are foulest. Jacob practised an invention to procure spots on his sheep; and these invent, meditate, project how to procure spots in their souls. And yet when they have them, they are as careful to hide them; if God can find them, so it is; he shall not know it from their mouth. These are idolaters of their own stains, in love with their own foulnesses, and conceal them as Rachel did her father's gods. But "he that covereth his sins shall not prosper," Prov. xxviii. 13. There is a voluntary confession, the language of a tender conscience; and there is a confession upon the rack, when the smart of our sides opens our lips. Jacob sought to bring spots on his lambs, and God did prosper his rods: when affliction can bring us to confess our spots, then God doth prosper his own rods. Until we tell the heavenly Physician our spots, he applies no medicine; unless we call that a medicine, which drives us to tell them. But without discovery of our disease, how should there be a recovery of our health? In the courts of human justice the safest plea is, Not guilty; but in the court of conscience, Guilty: Lord, have mercy on me a sinner.

3. It is madness to confess ourselves foul, and not to wash; therefore let us endeavour our own cleansing: that as our apostacy hath blurred our pureness, so our renovation may put out our apostacy; and as sin defiled nature, so grace may destroy sin. In our making there was work for God only; in our marring there was work for ourselves only; in our restoring there is work for God and ourselves together. To do this, sprinkling will not serve: so Agrippa stood within the shower of Christianity, and had some aspersions of it; he was almost persuaded to be a Christian: as the dew stands in drops on the blasted grass. If sprinkling could make a cloth clean, we should never stand to wash it. Nor is dipping sufficient: so Nicodemus had an immersion in the river of grace; but Christ tells him, Except he "be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God," John iii. 5: he must have a better scouring ere he get in. Some look into the church, but have not the power to tarry; here is a dip and away. Nor will half-washing do it, or washing by halves; like Ephraim's cake, half-turned, dough-baked, Hos. vii. 8. Men may be washed, and not clean. Hypocrites deceive many, but none so much as themselves. Indeed dipping or sprinkling shall be effectual, when the Spirit of God applies it. Once dipping in the pool of Bethesda cured, John v. 4; and the blood of the new covenant is called "the blood of sprinkling," Heb. xii. 24. "I will sprinkle clean water upon you, and ye shall be clean," Ezek. xxxvi. 25. It is no more with God, but as the prophet said to Naaman, "Wash, and be clean," 2 Kings v. 13. But for us, when we put our souls to washing, let us be sure there is water enough; as John baptized in Enon, "because there was much water," John iii. 23. Our fonts are made large enough to dip the infant, but charity dispenseth with ceremony. Let thine eyes gush out a stream of penitent tears, to bathe and purge thy conscience from these spots. I wash my bed, and water my couch with my tears, saith David, Psal. vi. 6; tears enough to run down from his bed to his couch. Many guests were invited to that great supper, Luke xiv. 22, yet there was room: he sends for more, takes them up from the hedges and highways, and rests not bidding till the rooms were full. So invite graces to thy soul; bid repentance, a heart-easing guest; bid faith, a cheerful guest; humility, charity, patience, zeal, till thy house be filled. Be not washed without and foul within: hypocrites are but painted tombs; look on them, they please your eyes; look into them, they offend your nostrils. Some have washed their faces, not their hands; so Judas's face kisseth Christ, but his foul hand betrays him. Some have washed their hands, not their faces; so Pilate washed his hands, yet with his mouth condemned the innocent. Some have washed their eyes, not their ears; they presume to understand so much of their own judgments, that they scorn to hear any preacher. Some have washed their ears, not their eyes; they come to hear, but their eyes are full of uncleanness. Some have washed only one side; like plaices, you see a white side, turn them over, and they show you the black. Others have washed all but their feet; and those, for place and motion, are foul still. But let us leave no part unwashed on earth, as we desire that no part should be excluded from heaven.

4. To conclude, there is only one fountain to purge all these spots, the blood of the Lamb. For this purpose was Christ baptized, even to wash us. There was in him neither foreskin of corruption, to need the knife, nor filthiness, to need the water: he came not to be his own Saviour, but ours. We were all uncleanness; he would therefore have that done to his most pure body, which might be of force to cleanse our most impure souls. His baptism gives virtue to ours; yea, it doth not only wash the souls of men, but it washeth that very water whereby we are washed. By that act the water became clean and holy, and can both cleanse and hallow us. If the handkerchiefs that touched the apostle had power of cure, how much more that water which the sacred body of Christ touched! His first baptizing was with water, his last with blood; both of them wash the world from their sins. If we manifest them to him by a humble confession, he will take them from us to himself by a merciful translation. The spots of every believer belong to the body of his Saviour; for this purpose he came to the earth, even to assume them. So that when we deplore our spots, we do but present him with his own; and till we do so, we withhold his right. He doth challenge the sins of all humble penitents to be his by imputation, and by imputation we challenge in faith his righteousness to be ours. O Christ, take from us that foulness of our own, which would condemn us; and give us that holiness of thine, which is only able to save us. Amen.

"Sporting themselves with their deceivings." These words asunder describe to us a varlet and a fool, and both together make up a devil. To sin in deceiving is the part of a lewd wit; to make sport with sinning, is the part of a foolish heart. It is easy to deceive, to deceive a friend, to deceive under the impression of friendship; to make this a sport, is most wicked. We have an Ahithophel in the one, a Hanun in the other, a Belial in both. First, consider them asunder.

"Their deceivings." He that is resolved to make no matter of his conscience, may easily find matter enough for his deceiving. But is there no deceit justifiable? Be there not pious frauds, compensative sins; as when a virgin is saved from ravishment, a man from murder, by a lie? There is no intentional good can bear out a formal evil. I know it is good to prevent sin, but not to prevent it with sin. The Egyptian midwives were taught by the fear of God to disobey that bloody command: to say, they had warrant for so foul a deed, they knew would be no excuse. God had said to their hearts, "Thou shalt not kill;" this voice was louder than Pharaoh's. Thus far I commend their obedience in disobeying; but to help themselves with a lie, I dare not commend their excuse. In not killing, they feared God; in dissembling, they feared Pharaoh. There was weakness in their pretence, goodness in their practice. Yet God blessed them, and rewards with good their very not doing of evil. But here, let not men lay the thanks upon the sin which is due to the virtue. Let us ascribe things to their right causes; their mercy was recompensed, their lie or deceiving was but pardoned. Michal delivered David through a window; thus far she did like David's wife. Then answered her father, that he threatened to kill her, if she freed him not, 1 Sam. xix. 17; here she began to be Saul's daughter. In keeping him from the guilt of innocent blood, she did well; but not in closing it up with a lie. But as she loved her husband better than her father, so she loved herself better than her husband. She saved her husband by a wife, and now she saves herself by a lie. Thus she loseth half the thanks of her good service, by devising a slander of her husband, to quit herself, and delude her father.

Thus David himself deceived Ahimelech, 1 Sam. xxi. 2: he that overcame the bear, lion, giant, is overcome with fear. Long had he gone upright, yet now begins to halt with the priest of God, and draws from him by a falsehood that favour that shall cost him his life. Oh what would he have given afterwards to redeem this oversight! Thus to Achish he feigned himself mad, and thought it the best use of his reason to dissemble the loss of the use of his reason. I find such acts of deception in the saints, I find infirmity in those acts, but malice, and avarice, and dishonest fraud, I find not.

Wicked deceit is another thing; that beguiles men of what they have, with a vain hope of that they never shall have. When the simple go to the market, the subtle then get money. Deceit is ever bad enough, but then worse when it is disguised with an oath. They that cannot tell how to begin praying, know not when to make an end of swearing. The Jews durst scarce mention the name of God in a truth, our deceivers stick not to call it into a falsehood. Some think that ἀληθεια (truth) comes of λανθάνω, (to lie hid,) for truth lies hidden; and deceivers endeavour all possible means to keep it hidden still. Like Potiphar's wife, they have only the garment of an honest man, to prove their dishonest cause. Whosoever devised the sentence, Rome takes up the practice. They have pictures and pageants to deceive some, formal gravity to deceive others, false oaths to deceive all. There is a generation of deceivers, flatterers; whose profession is to catch dotterels: these by maintaining men's works, work out their own maintenance: the devil's special agents, that deform men by commending their deformities. Ravens feed but upon dead carcasses, these upon living souls. Of all wild beasts, the tyrant is the worst; of all tame beasts, the flatterer. The tradesman deceives me of my money, but the flatterer cheats me of my virtue, yea, of my salvation. They are summer birds, they never sing in winter: take off the idol, gold, they kick the ass with their heels, instead of bending their knees. Vermin run not away faster from a house on fire, than they from poverty. Alexander Severus being certified how one Turinus, under colour and pretence of his interest with the emperor, had abused the people, promising things he never performed; fastened him to a stake in the market-place, and smothered him to death with smoke; the crier proclaiming, Fumo pereat, qui fumum vendidit; i. e. Let him die by smoke, who sold smoke. They that deceive men of their estates by adulterate wares or false promises, are the brokers of falsehood; but they that obtrude popish trash instead of God's truth, and deceive men's consciences, are the special agents of antichrist. The former have lost all worth of trust; but from the other, the wisdom of heaven deliver us.

"Sporting themselves." It is hard when the fool can find no bauble to play withal, but sin; casting firebrands, and arrows, and death, and then jeers it, "Am not I in sport?" Prov. xxvi. 19. If Samson fire the shocks of the Philistines, Judg. xv. 5, and Absalom Joab's barley-fields, 2 Sam. xiv. 30, is this in sport? We read, 2 Sam. ii. 14, both the commanders were cruel, both so inured to blood, that they make but a sport of killing. Custom brings sin to be so familiar, that the horror of it is turned into pleasure, and homicide is held but a sport. Cocks indeed, and dogs, often fight and tear one another, to make men sport; but that men should bruise one another to make sport for their own kind, is no Christian, if it could be a rational course. Ham derides his father's nakedness: it should have been his sorrow, he makes it his sport. It is ill for a man to make himself merry with that which angers God. While the Philistines will find nothing to play upon but Samson, Samson finds nothing to revenge himself upon but the Philistines. When the wicked laugh at sins with delight, God laughs at them, but with scorn. Yea, such sport on earth, is the only sport for the fiends in hell. While men be hammering sin, the tempter stands at their elbow; while they are acting sin, he sits in their bosom; all this while he is a working; but when they have done it, and make a sport of it, the devil himself makes holiday. The common pretence for the foulest abuses, is but sport. The sacred word of God is profaned: tax the violaters of that majesty; alas, it was but in jest. Business of state may not be made the business of the stage; and shall that which God prizeth like himself, be sacrilegiously turned to a jest? More safely may the satyr play with the fire, or the fly with the candle. O charm your mouths from jesting with that which is given to save your souls. No fugitive abroad does so much harm, as a detractor or jeerer at home. They that write of creatures naturally disposed to the ruin of man, do as well mention the flea as the viper; because though the flea cannot kill, yet it doth what harm it can: so these licentious jesters utter all the venom they have.

If sin were rightly considered, it were more worthy our tears than our sport; the fool laughs at it, but the saint weeps for it. David wept buckets of tears for his own sins, but whole rivers for others. The world is like Jonah; for him was the storm raised, yet he only was asleep: godly mourners are like the mariners, crying to God for mercy. Jerusalem made a sport of Christ, Christ wept over Jerusalem. If we weep not for the sins of the land, nobody else will: sinners themselves will not weep; they spend the evening in jollity, go to bed in security, and rise again without any further repentance, than that they call a cup of repentance, small drink to cool their intemperate heat. For their sakes judgments are upon us, and yet they of all men are least sensible of them. The fire of wrath is kindled, and they do but warm themselves at the flame. Who must come with pails of water in this combustion, but they that mourn in Zion, and for Zion? Turn to me, saith the Lord, with weeping, Joel ii. 12; where did he ever allow us to come laughing? A horrible incest was committed among the Corinthians, "And ye," saith Paul, "are puffed up, and have not rather mourned," 1 Cor. v. 2. Alas, that men should look merrily on that sin, which heaven beholds with sore eyes! Though Christ forbade the daughters of Jerusalem to weep for him, who was holy; yet he commanded them to weep for themselves, who were sinners, Luke xxiii. 28. He that knew what sin was, and felt it so sharply, is not reported ever to have laughed; often you have him weeping, the chief mourner. When he came to Jerusalem in triumph, yet he "wept over it," Luke xix. 41. Neither the solemnity of time, nor joy of the people, nor those loud acclamations, could either drown his voice, but still he lifted it up; nor dry his eyes, but still he wept. If we truly knew our sins, our sport would be turned into tears; yea, and the more we weep, the better we know our sins. As Solomon said, "He that increaseth knowledge increaseth sorrow," Eccl. i. 18; so he that increaseth sorrow increaseth his knowledge. A silver penny in the bottom of a bason of water seems as big as a shilling; it seemeth so, it is not so. But our sins steeped in tears seem as indeed they are; yea, indeed they are greater than they can seem. As wine drowns cares, so doth sport sins; they are little, easy, light, and slight to those that are merry with them; but when, instead of sport in our deceivings, we begin to bleed for that sport, then the remembrance of them is grievous unto us, the burden of them is intolerable. Now we that have turned our grace into sin, and our sin into sport, let us turn our sport into sorrow, that God may turn our sorrow into joy.

Thus we have considered them asunder, now both together; where we have two principal observations: 1. All deceit is sinful. 2. Religious deceit is intolerable.

1. Fraud is no laughing matter, and he that deceives another doth much more deceive himself; nor could he think it a sport, did he foresee who should have the worst in the end. Show me that false-hearted politician, that hath not consulted shame to his own house. Look upon Ahithophel, whose counsel was as the oracle of God; see him advising Absalom to abuse his father's concubines, 2 Sam. xvi. 21. What a hellish depth was in the advice of that Israelitish Machiavel! If Absalom be a traitor, yet he is a son; nature may return to itself; Absalom may relent, David may remit, what then shall become of us? Therefore he finds him out an act incapable of forgiveness, to secure the conspiracy.

Who would think that so lewd a man had ever sat at King David's council-table? Yet was he wise enough to advise others, not to be good to himself. Policy and grace have one Author, but they do not always go upon one errand, nor to one person. David falls to his prayers, Lord, turn the wisdom of Ahithophel into foolishness; and lo, one short ejaculation of innocency shall overturn this deep foundation of policy. God hath furnished his creatures with power to war, even against himself; but he is wise enough to confound their devices; and while they reap shame by the abuse, he will have honour by the gift. Vainly doth Ahithophel hope to strengthen evil with worse, to make treason fortunate by incest. He was one of David's deepest counsellors, yet one of David's shallowest fools, that said in his heart, "There is no God." Now what was the success? he meant to deceive David, he shall deceive himself. He strove for the highest renown of wisdom, and runs into the grossest extremity of madness. Hushai's counsel is allowed for better; and now Ahithophel is beaten at his own weapon, he can live no longer. He goes home a worse ass than that which carried him, and puts the halter about his own neck. In this glass let politic sinners read their own destiny; they are to themselves the most desperate fools. If the Supreme Judge could be deceived, fraud had some hope; but seeing he is just, it makes its own mittimus to hell.

Had Judas any better success in his deceiving, that betrayed Christ with a kiss? Luke xxii. 48. As Augustine saith, The war begins with a kiss, and by a token of peace the sacrament of peace is broken. From the fairest flower of courtesy, this spider sucks the deadliest poison of treachery. Joab's kiss was a preface to a stab, 2 Sam. xx. 9; and Nero kissed his mother even when he meant to bathe his hands in her blood; and Judas hath the same key to his horrid treason. It is bad to deceive the deceiver, howsoever some blanch it: for another's sin may hurt us, it is our own sin that condemns us; and because another man would do me a mischief, must I therefore do myself one? burn myself to keep him from the heat of the fire? But Judas thought to deceive him, who cannot either be deceived or deceive, that was both God and man: a man most innocent, and therefore would not deceive; a God omniscient, and therefore would not be deceived. To beguile a harmless man, was doli improbitas, i. e. dishonesty of deceit; but to offer this to the all-seeing God, was doli impietas, i. e. impiety of deceit. But what was the end of this deceit? he redelivers the hire of his treachery, and saves the hangman a labour, by making away himself. Christ was well acquainted with such deceivers: "Master," saith a Pharisee, "we know thou art true," Matt. xxii. 16; when he could have silenced him, Hypocrite, I know thou art false. Satan is that old deceiver; and was so successful with the first Adam, that he durst set upon the Second. He saw him depend upon his Father's providence in the matter of nourishment, therefore tries him in a matter of miraculous preservation: Throw thyself down, &c. Matt. iv. 6. He that can sustain thee without bread, can preserve thee in this precipice. The roof of the temple was a hundred and thirty cubits high; this was a pinnacle above the roof. From this pyramid the cunning sophister persuades him to make proof of his Godhead, by the break-neck of his manhood. The gloss of the deceit was to show a miracle, that he might believe him; the meaning was to break his neck, that he might laugh at him. This is the way to proclaim thy Deity, to get credit in the world; men's eyes shall teach their faith, that there is more in thee than a man: and for danger, there is none; what can hurt the Son of God? Wherefore serves the guard of angels, charged with thy safety? Thus in one act thou mayst be both safe and famous: trusting thy Father's providence, and those serviceable spirits, cast thyself down. How strong was this deceit, if it had lighted upon a son of Adam, that was not the Son of God!

2. But deceits are then most abominable, when they shroud themselves under the wing of religion; for such we shall prove these. There is no such devil, as he that looks like an angel. Copper would never deceive us, if it had not the tincture of gold. Thus the sons of Jacob dealt with Hamor, Gen. xxxiv. 13. Revenge is their meaning, that is bad enough; to hide their cruelty with craft, worse; but to hide their craft with religion, worst of all. The smiling malice is most deadly; and hatred glossed with dissimulation discovers itself in the most prodigious mischief. We will agree with you, if you will be circumcised. Here was God in the mouth, in the heart a devil. Never was any project so bloody, as that which is coloured with religion. The better vice shows, the worse it is; and the worse it is, the better it desires to show. A sacrament is intended, not to the good of the soul, but to the murder of the body. O religious deceit! Did the sons of Jacob deceive alone? no, they dissemble with Shechem, and Shechem with his people; Shall not their wealth be ours? ver. 23. The one pretended religion, and meant murder; the other pretended profit, and meant pleasure. They prevail with Shechem, and Shechem with the city. The conceit of commodity is a powerful oratory: not any love to the sacrament, no, not to Shechem, but the hope of gain, makes them prodigal of their blood in so painful a condition: they are content to smart, so they may gain. What was the end of this deceit? They receive a sacrament, and their bane withal; and their first drops of blood are a preparative to the whole stream. Thus they are paid for a purpose of deceiving. Do the other escape? no, their sin lived after the city was spoiled. It was a horrible impiety, instead of honouring a holy sign, to take advantage by it. How did those deceived Hivites die cursing that sacrament which had betrayed them! even their curses were the others' sins. I would the children of Rome were like the children of Jacob in any thing else but this; but in this only they are like them, and in nothing else. Did they not eat their sacrament upon a bargain of blood? Do not their bloody practices make all reasonable souls abhor their religion? Is not religion their pretence, and murder their end? Why then is all this killing of kings, ruining of countries, massacring of cities, blowing up of states? For the catholic cause, they confess; and by the catholic authority, they cannot deny. O who can more than pity them, that forsake Christ the Prince of peace, and either choose no God, or a bloody one?

Take another example. Abner revolts from Ishbosheth in a discontent, and persuades Israel to the change; and fetcheth his motive from the oracle of God, 2 Sam. iii. 18. He knew this well enough before, and smothered it for his own turn; now for his own turn he publisheth it. He knew this decree for David while he opposed him; now he wins the heart of Israel by showing God's charter for him. If Ishbosheth's title to the crown were bad, why did Abner maintain it? if good, why did he forsake it? Was his conscience better informed? No, but his mind was changed. Saul's son had disgraced him, therefore now he is for David: he is become loyal for David's sake, and become David's for God's sake. No man ever heard Abner godly till then; and he had not been so then for any conscience of goodness, but for opportunity of revenge. Pride hath made many English malcontents the almsmen of Rome : here their ambitious desires are crossed, therefore they fly hence in a snuff: treachery is their aim, and hither they bring it in the shape of religion. Oh that they could see how odious it is, to make devotion a stalking-horse for policy ! What was Abner's end ? Whom David dismisseth in peace, Job repays with death. Of all men, the religious dissembler shall be sure of plagues.

Thus Absalom first deceives the people, and therein his father, 2 Sam. xv. 6. The people by insinuations ; that considering his godly person and magnificent state, how affable he was to suitors, how humble in his greatness, how diligent in searching their causes, how full of pity to their complaints, how great his love of justice, and care of the commonwealth was ; they conclude, the world hath not so complete a prince as Absalom. Thus like a close traitor, he stole not his father's goods, but his father's people's hearts. He deceived his father by a vow, made forty years before, to be paid in Hebron, ver. 7. He carried peace in his name, war in his heart ; and to perfect his treachery, nothing will serve but a cloak of religion. The devout man hath made a vow a great while ago, and now the toy takes him, he must perform it. The good old king blesseth God for blessing him with so godly a son ; who indeed had never more deeply renounced all goodness, than now he talks of religion. This guilt of piety set on the rough metal of his conspiracy, takes with his father against his father, with the people against their king ; so his father sends him away with one blessing, and they entertain him with another. What is the end of this deceit ? The just meed of all traitors : his mule and his treason leave him hanging between heaven and earth. " Bring me word, that I may come and worship him," saith Herod to the sages, Matt. ii. 8 : another devout Machiavel, like the devil confessing Christ. How horrible was this villainy, to mask itself under a show of piety ! Herod will worship him, that is the pretence : Herod will worry him, that is the meaning. The cunning hypocrite never intends so ill, as when he speaks fairest. What was the event of this politic deceiving ? First, God mocks him, then the sages mock him. God besots him, that he could not find the way to so horrible a mischief. Why else did he not send some of his bloody assassins to Bethlehem ? Why did he not employ his courtiers, rather than trust strangers ? Why, seeing the matter so nearly concerned him in his opinion, and the journey was so small from Jerusalem, did he not go himself in person ? why did he not rather prevent their journey, than hazard their disappointment ? All the courtesy he meant that new-born King, was but to cut his throat ; and will he trust foreigners with this inquiry ? Such a fool is the craftiest politician, when God will blind him. These messengers come no more back to Herod with their news. He had mocked the wise men, and now God makes the wise men to mock him, ver. 16. He sends to inquire of them, whom he sent to inquire of Christ, and they are gone. How doth he rage, and fret, and curse himself, for trusting strangers in so important a business ! How would he revenge their false play, how would he torment them, if he could catch them ! Thus he palpably finds himself gulled by those whom he meant to deceive.

Thus doth God's justice often punish illusion with illusion ; they that nourish a purpose to deceive, shall be deceived indeed. Think of these examples, ye that make religion your messenger, and mischief your errand. It is a disease whereof this generation is sick at the very heart. Hypocrites make use of God for their own purposes : they frequent the church with the devoutest saints, but it is that the saints may take them for devout ; they pray with the godly, but to prey upon the godly. You shall not miss him at the lecture in the forenoon, but it is in hope to find some of you at his shop in the afternoon ; and then, he that received in so much truth at his ears, hath not one word of truth in his mouth. Alas, too many make that divine business but a colour for their own designs. Over-fair shows are a just argument of unsoundness ; no natural face hath so fair a white and clear a red, as that which is painted. While we see men notoriously zealous, we may be charitably suspicious. For wicked hypocrites care not to play with God, that they may mock men. The more foul a project is, the fairer visor it seeks : those monopolies that undo the commonwealth, have the most colourable pretences to benefit it. But as Christ said, " He that receiveth you receiveth me," Matt. x. 40 ; so in effect, he that deceiveth you deceiveth me : and he must rise betimes that overreaches his Maker. Let me shut up all with discovering to you three sorts of deceivers.

1. The deceivers of souls. Such are the Romish seminaries. They tell you of a Saviour called Christ, but they mean the pope ; for his word must stand, when Christ's word is thrust behind the door. They say, his judgment is infallible : yet Pope John the Twelfth made deacons in a stable, a boy of ten years old a bishop, the Lateran a stew, degraded his predecessor's shavelings, made each of them confess, My bishop had nothing for himself, and gave nothing to me, prayed to Jupiter and Venus, and drank a health to the devil. (Luitprand.) Not a few of that race were as bad, yet papists will believe they cannot err ; are they not worthy to be deceived ? They say, that the church cannot subsist without the pope her head ; yet was that chair ten years empty. (Bodin.) We use to say, Great head, little wit ; but certainly, no head, no wit. Whence should their church have her wit, when she was bereaved of her head ? The Irish men are not troubled with venomous beasts, for this they must be beholden to St. Patrick ; yea, he is said to have obtained of God, that no Irishman should abide the coming of antichrist : (Legend.) yet their great masters are ashamed of it, and never allege it to clear the pope from being antichrist. They will show pilgrims that go to Jerusalem a three-cornered stone, and make them believe it is that very stone spoken of in the Psalm, " The stone which the builders refused," &c. Psal. cxviii. 22. (Bibloni.) A monk, among other relics, boasted that he could show some of the hairs that fell from the seraphical angel, when he imprinted the five wounds of Christ on the body of St. Francis ; yea, gave out, that he had brought from the East some of the sound of the bells that hung in Solomon's temple. (Vergier.) Be not these pretty deceivings ? But too gross to deceive us, too bungling for these times : therefore (as old tricks of cheating can do no good) they find out new ; which is a short cut, an absolute denial of all truth that is not for them. They do not dethrone kings, nor suborn parricides, nor pardon incests and murders, nor worship images, nor disgrace the Scriptures, nor forswear by equivocations, nor prefer the mother to the Son, nor set states in combustion, nor make the eating of flesh on forbidden days damnable, and uncleanness every day venial ; not they : though we know they do all this, yet when they deny it, they look we should believe them. A reverend bishop of this land dies an orthodox catholic, a professed protestant, as he lived ; yet they disperse books, and tell the world, he died in the Romish faith. A common liar should not be believed; men know them so, yet trust them. O ye besotted English, why will you be thus deceived? The devil's hand is in it, their hand is in it, your own hand is in it; but above all, God hath a hand in it; who justly gives them up to believe a lie, that would not receive the truth, 2 Thess. ii. 11.

2. The deceivers of the church, that make it nothing to defraud their Maker. Joseph was twice stripped of his garments; first by the violence of envy, then of lust; the first time of necessity, the next of choice in convenience. His brethren took away his coat, to deceive his father; his mistress kept his coat, to deceive his master. First, the policy of Rome took one garment from us, which the policy of state took again from them. We had still a poor coat left, the remainder that escaped appropriating: now sacrilege keeps away that too. The first we could not save by law, this last we cannot redeem without law: and that is a remedy worse than the disease. That first rent had the colour of pleasing God; this other, of punishing us. The world doth charge us with pride and covetousness, and therefore surchargeth us with beggary and emptiness. Joseph may plead, but is not heard: and our case is as bad; we may deny the justice of the fact, but we scarce dare accuse the offenders. Hanun misused David's ambassadors, and shaved off one half of their beards, and cut off their garments to the middle, exposing them to the derision of all beholders, 2 Sam. x. 4. The Israelites were forbidden a shaven beard, or a short garment; to despite their law, they are sent away with both. Man hath a double ornament to his body, one of nature, the other of art; the natural ornament is the hair, the artificial is apparel: in both these are David's servants abused. But is not David sensible of it? Doth he not feel himself dishonoured in their persons? Will he only hide it, and not revenge it? We are God's messengers to the world, and the world returns us so to God. Surely, as David could not but feel his own cheeks shaven, his own coat cut, in his ambassadors; so the Lord cannot but appropriate that injury to himself, which is offered to his ministers. By the universal law of nations, ambassadors are free; that office hath in the name sufficient protection, nor was it ever wronged without a revenge. Do not the notorious contempts cast upon us below, concern our great Master above? Is it possible he should not feel them, not revenge them? Yes, David revengeth it on Ammon to the full; for cutting his messengers' coats, Joab and his army cut their throats: and certainly, God will not let such indignity pass unpunished.

3. The deceivers of men, in regard of their estates; contrary to God's flat prohibition, Defraud no man, 1 Thess. iv. 6. Wherein and how far any man hath thus deceived, his conscience will tell him; unless by the long habit of deceit, he hath also learned to deceive his conscience. Fraud is theft, and a thief (we say) no man can endure to be any long time, for his conscience; out how if his conscience itself be turned thief? Howsoever deceivers think to get a patrimony of riches by fraud, as they pretend Jacob got the birthright; yet it will not be so lucky to them as Rebekah's pasty, they shall not (with Jacob) get the blessing by it. The crafty fox hugged himself to think how he had cheated the crow of her breakfast; but when he had eaten it, and found himself poisoned with it, he wished the crow her own again. Wealth got by deceit is like a piece of buttered sponge, (an Italian trick,) it goes down glib, but in the stomach swells, and will never be gotten out again. It is not stable; it will either be lost by the gainers, or be squandered by their heirs. Terminus had been spared, but for his belt: when that was found about him, it cost him his life. So when other sins might find mercy, Christ seeing the cognizance of fraud, begins to strike; as Æneas said to Turnus, Pallas, te hoc vulnere Pallas immolat, Pallas with this stroke kills thee, Pallas immolates thee; one tortures more for that. It is an observation set upon the house of Desmond in Ireland, that Maurice Thomas the first earl raised it by injustice, and by injustice Gerald the last earl of that race ruined it. The gains a man gets by deceiving, at last he may put in his eye, and yet see himself miserable. Sin is the greatest cheater in the world, for it deceives the deceiver; yea, as Haman built his own gallows, it makes a snare to entrap others, but is sure to confound the sinner. The seed of this sin, as of all other, is in every man by nature; the heart of man is deceitful: and while he thinks there is no deceit in it, even in that he is most of all deceived.

Find out this thief, apprehend him, convict him, condemn him, yea, execute him; yea, bury him, lest his very death deceive thee. It is one brand of the wicked, "When thou sawest a thief, thou consentedst with him," Psal. l. 18. Many see a thief abroad, and consent not; but the most dangerous thief is at home, within us, there we consent. Elisha had a thief to his servant, but he followed him at an inch, and found out his brocade. Thus pursue thy fraud, meet it at every turning, cross it with resolution, plague it with restitution; wish, thy heart, as that Roman built his house, not close to do things unseen, but open to the view of passengers, to show that honest dealing dwells there. Fraud is both a robber, and robbery itself, a theft to others, a thief to a man's self: as falsus in Latin signifies both the deceived and the deceiver. It steals away his grace, his peace, his conscience, his blessing in this life, and his hope of glory in the life to come. The day of the Lord shall come as a thief too; and if it take a man with his thefts about him, no heart can think how terribly it will handle him. "We have wronged no man, we have corrupted no man, we have defrauded no man," 2 Cor. vii. 2. Thrice happy conscience that can speak this in sincerity! That steward hath not deceived God in his trust, and God will not deceive him of his reward, eternal blessedness in Jesus Christ.

"While they feast with you." A certain kind of feasts is much spoken of by the apostles Paul, Peter, Jude; love-feasts. This is a festival time, yea, the greatest of all Christian feasts (Easter): every sabbath is a feast; this, as it is a sabbath of sabbaths, so a feast of feasts. The day of the sabbath was changed for the honour of Christ's resurrection; and this is the day for whose honour the sabbath was changed. Something therefore I take liberty to speak of this occasion. Feasts may be distinguished into three kinds, holy, civil, and profane. The former must be, the next may be, the last should not be. The first are commanded, the second allowed, the third prohibited. The first is a feast to God, the next for man, the third to Satan.

I begin with holy feasts. Religion is not tied to time, yet cannot religion be publicly exercised without a due time allotted for it. It is necessary to consider every great blessing of God, and it is kindly and convenient to consider it in the day it was wrought: then to repeat it with thankfulness, is to do opus diei in die suo. Otherwise the revolution of time would eat out the memory of these precious benefits. The Jews, among many, had three solemn festivals every year, by God's institution; the passover, pentecost, and feast of tabernacles, Deut. xvi. 1. Of tabernacles, n remembering that Israel dwelt in tents forty years. Even that walk of theirs must not be forgotten in their rest. So much memory of our weary pilgrimage here, as may stand with the perfection of our joy in heaven, shall be reserved. 2. The passover, to remember them of their deliverance from the Egyptian bondage: freedom from such a servitude deserves a solemn and set time of gratitude. 3. Pentecost, in remembrance of the law given on Mount Sinai. God wrote it, that it might be legible; wrote it in stone, that it might be durable; honoured he day with an annual feast, that it might be memorable. Thus the Christian church, among the rest, celebrates three principal feasts. Christmas, in honour of Christ's nativity, then was he born to the earth. Easter, in honour of his resurrection, then was he borne from the earth. Whitsuntide, in honour of the mission of the Holy Ghost, by whom we are new-born to the kingdom of heaven. And we still retain two names of the three, passover and pentecost. Such is the accordance of the two Testaments, that those two Jewish feasts and our two Christian agree, both in signification and in time.

1. For signification; their passover and pentecost are types of our Easter and Whitsuntide. For the former, God did pass over the doors where the blood of the paschal lamb was sprinkled. What signifies it? That God will pass over our sins in the day of wrath, if he find our souls sprinkled with the blood of Christ, that "Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world," John i. 29. That night Moses led Israel out of Egypt, this day Christ brings us out of the house of bondage. When he rose from the grave, this was the full conquest of all our enemies, for the last enemy is death. For their pentecost, it was a memorial of the law, which is a hidden gospel. And our Whitsuntide is a memorial of the gospel, which is a revealed law. The law was given on Mount Sinai, the gospel on Mount Zion: the law written in tables of stone, the gospel in tables of flesh: I will write my law in their hearts, Heb. viii. 10; so run the terms of the new covenant. On their pentecost, the law was given in fire and smoke, obscurity was mingled with terror. On our pentecost, the gospel was given in fire without smoke, befitting the light and clearness of the truth. Fire, not in flashes, but in tongues; not to terrify, but to teach. Thus the promulgation of the law makes way for the gospel: first we must feel the terrors of Sinai, before we have the comforts of Zion, the gracious consolations of the Holy Ghost. If therefore they had a festival for the law, the ministry of death; good reason we should have one for the gospel, which is the power of God to salvation. Christmas is a merry time, then we sing and feast. Easter is a solemn time, then we communicate and feast spiritually. Whitsuntide is a triumphant and flourishing time, not only for height of the season, but for the church's confirmation by the descension of the Holy Ghost: Because, says Augustine, we have not lost a departing Christ, and we possess a coming Spirit.

2. As they agree for substance, so for the very time of delivery: the ancient Jews kept our feasts, and we still keep theirs. First, their passover and our Easter is kept at the same time: so fitly to their coming from the bondage of Egypt, doth answer Christ's coming from under the bondage of death. "Even Christ our Passover is sacrificed for us," 1 Cor. v. 7; that spotless Lamb, whereof one bone might not be broken. Next, their pentecost and our Whitsuntide, on the very same day. Their pentecost was fifty days after their passover, and our Whitsuntide is fifty days after our Easter; from which number of days it hath the name, pentecost. The very day that God came down in fire and thunder to deliver the law, the Holy Ghost came down upon the apostles in fiery tongues, for the propagation of the gospel. Now as our feasts be the same, so be our sacraments. We do all eat of the same spiritual meat, and drink of the same spiritual drink, 1 Cor. x. 3, 4. The same, 1. In object; the same Christ in both: not one God in the law, another in the gospel; not a bloody one there, a merciful one here, as Marcion blasphemed. But "Jesus Christ the same yesterday, and to-day, and for ever," Heb. xiii. 8. Only a darker Christ there, a clearer Christ here, but still the same. 2. The same not in the signs, but in the things signified. (August.) In the passover the Lamb of God was prefigured, in the Lord's supper he is exhibited: they saw him, we have him. 3. In identity of name. So circumcision is called baptism, and baptism circumcision, and the Lord's supper the passover. 4. The same in efficacy. Their effect is all one; their faith received Christ before he came, in as full virtue as we do now he is come. But if the body of Christ be really in the supper, why was not the lamb so transubstantiated in the passover? for Paul says, it was the same. They never say, in baptism, the water is turned into blood; why then say they so of the wine in the eucharist? "This is my body, which is broken for you," 1 Cor. xi. 24. There is the logical subject, this, this bread; the predicate, my body; the copula, is; and the exposition, which is broken for you. There is bread, and there is the body: the bread is not the body, therefore a holy sign of it. We receive a mystical, yet the true, body of Christ; not in the truth or substance of the thing, but in the mystery significant of it. Thus be our sacraments the same. Indeed they had also manna, and water from the rock; both which signified Christ: they were fed with sacraments. Their bread was sacramental, whereof they communicated every day: who complains of receiving often, when the Israelites received daily? Their drink was sacramental: surely from them the church of Rome never learned a dry communion. Twice hath the rock yielded them water of refreshing: the true Rock is Christ, and he yields it always. Out of his side issued that bloody stream, whereby the thirst of all believers is comfortably quenched. They thirsted with repining, let us thirst with faith: our spiritual Rock shall abundantly satisfy our souls; yea, even sustain us, till this water be changed into that new wine which we shall drink with him in his Father's kingdom.

We have seen the harmony and accordance between both the Testaments, now let us return to the feast of the day. Some difference may seem to be in the evangelists, about the time when Christ did eat the passover. Three of them say, on the first day of the passover; but we read in St. John's Gospel, "before the feast of the passover," John xiii. 1. To reconcile these, first, some say, that Christ did not eat the passover that year; and their reason is glorious, because himself was the paschal Lamb then to be offered. But this is frivolous, for it is manifest he did eat it. Secondly, some say, the passover is taken for the whole time of seven days, and that he did eat it one of the seven. But this is apparently false; for after the Jews had apprehended him, they would not enter into the judgment hall, for fear of being defiled, "but that they might eat the passover," John xviii. 28. Christ had that day (before) eaten it, therefore before the seven. Thirdly, others say, he did eat it one night before the Jews; and that he did so, to thrust a sword into Judas's hand, to accuse him for an innovator and law-breaker. But they that were fain to take up a false accusation against him, rather than none, would have triumphed in this. Besides, the disciples would have questioned the reason of such an alteration, and the master of the house would have found some fault. And, which is above all, the Fulfiller of the law, and that so punctually, would not have failed in a chief point, so main a circumstance, and that so immediately before his death: and this supposition still is objected to by the Jews.

Briefly then we conclude thus: He did eat it on the due and true day, the fourteenth of the month. But then how failed the Jews? for both cannot stand, seeing Christ and they did eat it on several days. It is answered thus: Since the captivity, when the pass-over fell on the sabbath eve, they put it off to the sabbath day; so it was called a high day, because that feast fell upon it. For this reason they took down the dead bodies from the crosses; for if these two feasts had fallen immediately together on several days, they had had no opportunity to bury their dead. But why did not Judas accuse him of this? God so disposed it, that his heart being fraught with malice did not observe it. Some think it was left arbitrary, that whoso would, might eat it on the even, or put it off to the sabbath. Thus are the evangelists reconciled. "Before the passover," saith John; that is, before the people did eat it by their tradition. "At the passover," say the rest, that is, on the day of institution, when Moses commanded it. So Christ died in the feast of passover, that the type and the truth might agree together. They took him at night; arraigned, condemned, afflicted, and crucified him before the end of the next day: this was strange haste; but what bounds are there to desperate madness? They meant nothing but death to him, but God hath this day turned it into life to us.

Surely, even the angels in heaven keep these paschal solemnities with joy: the glory of that victorious Lion, who hath triumphed over death and hell, is even to them matter of rejoicing. It is the sabbath of the new world, our passover from everlasting death to life; our true jubilee, the first day of our week, and the chief in our calendar. Herein our Phenix rose from his ashes, our Eagle renewed his feathers, the First-begotten of the dead was born from the womb of the earth. Christ, like the sun eclipsed by the moon, got himself out by his resurrection; and, as the sun by the moon, he was darkened by them to whom he gave light. His death did justify us, his resurrection did justify his death. He buried the law with himself, and both with honour; he raised up the gospel with himself, and both with glory. His resurrection was the first stone of the foundation, "In Christ shall all be made alive," 1 Cor. xv. 22; and the last stone of the roof, for God assures us he shall come to judgment, by this token, that he raised him up from the dead, Acts xvii. 31. Satan danced on his grave for joy; when he had him there once, he thought him sure enough: but he rose again, and trampled on the devil's throne with triumph. This is the faith peculiar to Christians: the Jews believe him dead, not living; we believe that he is risen, and sits at the right hand of God. As Moses led the people to Canaan through the wilderness, so Christ led us to heaven through the grave. His resurrection is not only the object of our faith, but the example of our hope. We all carry mortality about us, and the strongest man is but like Nebuchadnezzar's image; though his head be of gold, and his ribs of brass, yet his feet are of clay: a stone thrown at the feet overturns this great image, and down falls man. But, "O death, I will be thy death." Durst death kill Christ? Christ therefore shall kill death. "If in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable," 1 Cor. xv. 19. But spes vite immortalis est vita vite mortalis, as one saith, the hope of life immortal is the life of our life mortal. Death and the grave swallow all, and then burst; as crammed covetousness disgorgeth itself by a prodigal heir.

The Jews craved a sign, and had it, Matt. xii. 38, 39; yet then spake against it, or wondered at it. To us it shall be more than a sign, it shall have wonder, and wonder enough; but we will not lose our fruit or part therein for a world. Him, that this day rose from the clods, we expect from the clouds, to raise our bodies, to perform his promises, to finish our faith, to perfect our glory, and to draw us unto himself. I do not say, Come, see the place where they laid him, that is empty; but, Come, see the place where he is; Here is the Lord. I say not with Mary, They have taken away the Lord, and I know not where they have laid him: he is personally in heaven, he is mystically, sacramentally, yea, in a spiritual sense, he is really here. Himself said, I have earnestly desired to eat this passover with you: let us earnestly desire to eat this sacrament with him. God said once, Take and eat of every tree but one; but man then mistook the fruit, he did eat and fell. He now says again, Take and eat; this is my body, which is given for you: let us not mistake, but eat and live for ever. And the body of our Lord Jesus Christ which was given for us, preserve our bodies and souls into everlasting life.

As God spake to the fish, and it cast up Jonah, commanded the earth, and it delivered up Jesus; so he will speak to all creatures, and they shall not detain one dust of our bodies. There shall be a dry ground for this valley of tears, a land of the living for this Golgotha of the dead, a settled mansion for this movable pavilion. Christ had his Easter-day by himself; there shall be one general Easter-day for us all, when the wicked shall rise to contempt, the faithful to eternity of days. Here shall be no terror to affright us, no sorrow to afflict us, no sickness to distemper us, no death to dissolve us, no sin to endanger, for evermore.

2. The next are civil feasts: when the soul hath been feasted with God, the body may be feasted with the creatures of God; when the mistress hath dined, the servant may sit down. Every sabbath is a feast, but this is an exceeding day. When we hear the word, we have a good spiritual meal: but the sacrament is an extraordinary banquet; wherein the best cheer of heaven is set on the table, and the faithful soul feeds more liberally on Jesus Christ. We do not feast every day; that was the epicure's brand, he "fared sumptuously every day," Luke xvi. 19; so nor every day communicate: there may be satiety even in sacred things, and the soul cloyed as well as the body. Those love-feasts were before the Lord's supper, where the communicants brought every man his provision to one place, and they did eat together: giving thanks to God, and bestowing the remainder on the poor. Thus were they intended for the increase of love: but what foul abuses crept in, St. Paul notes and condemns; "one is hungry, and another is drunken," 1 Cor. xi. 21. Riot and intemperance is an ill preparation for so holy a business.

First, therefore, begin with God: a full body makes an unwieldy soul, but a feasted soul will keep a temperate body. First drink at Christ's wine cellar, before thou touch thine own. Not that I obtrude the popish custom upon you, which puts a necessity of fasting before; because forsooth they would receive their God into a clear stomach, next their heart. Cannot Christ come into the heart if there be meat in the stomach? This is as if a man could not come to the steeple for the sound of the ells. Or as the merry cardinal said to his fellows in the conclave, when they could not agree about the election of the pope; Let us untile the house, because the Holy Ghost cannot get in to us through so many tiles. (Onup. in Plat.) A weak stomach helped by refection is as capable of Christ as a fastidious superstition. Indeed if men can forbear, it were best to have the first morsel sacramental: but it is the soul, not the body, that receives Christ himself. At this point I praise this city, that they begin their fasts with a sermon, as Jethro began his with a sacrifice, Exod. xviii. 12. First serve the Lord, then at the fat and drink the sweet, and give the rest to the poor. Some have been as fond on the other side; they will eat nothing that whole day after the sacrament; as if they wronged that holy food, if they thought it would not keep them a whole day. In former times, some would not wash a whole week after their baptizing; as if men should refuse to wash a day or two after their trimming by the barber. But these be fond singularities: let us keep the day holy, keep ourselves holy, in the strength of the Most Holy; that we may confess the virtue of this blessed sacrament in the sanctity of our future deportment and conversation.

Feasts have their seasonable allowance: the bounty of God reacheth not only to our life, but to our contentment; nor doth he afford us only the bread of efficiency, but of pleasure, that we may more than live, even live happy. The blessed Virgin, at the marriage in Cana, perceived a defect of wine, and he tells Christ, John ii. 3. They had wine enough for a meal, not enough for a feast: and if there was not wine enough, there was enough water: water to quench thirst, if not wine to cheer the spirits. Yet she complains the want of wine, and is troubled with the very lack of superfluity. Christ gives her rough words, but answers her faith with gracious deeds; he feast shall be supplied with wine, if six pots full of two or three firkins a-piece can do it. To turn one of these vessels of water into wine had been a sufficient proof of his power, and perhaps enough for the present necessity; yet he makes wine enough to serve above a hundred guests, had they been then but newly sat down. It was a feast; that quantity at another time had been superfluous, which is now but necessary. That hand of infinite munificence regards not only our need, but our honest affluence. We are sullen guests, if we scant ourselves where God hath been liberal, and from the table of his bounty depart hungry. We are unworthy guests, if we riot upon his abundance, and turn his plenty into wantonness. To fast when he invites us to feed, is our sin; to be fuller than he allows us, is our sin and our shame; to be pleased no ways, neither full nor fasting, is our sin, our shame, and unhappiness. The Philistines in their feast called for Samson to make them sport: take heed that Samson be not your mirth; make not religion your fiddle. God doth not therefore so liberally give us temporal things, that we being full should abuse spiritual things. David vowed that he would not forget Jerusalem in his mirth; and in their mirth there be some that remember Jerusalem, but it is with a sacrilegious frump. Yea, too often, they do not only in their mirth remember Jerusalem, but they make Jerusalem their mirth; and holiness is wounded through the name of puritan. Call godliness by what name they will, it is too good to be jested with; and when profane men are thus in jest, God will be in earnest. And here we fitly fall upon,

3. Profane feasts: I call them so, where God is not placed at the upper end of the table; where he is forgotten in the beginning, neglected in the midst, at the latter end dishonoured. We find such feasts in former times; we find them all concluding in horror. The house fell down upon Job's children, while they were feasting, Job i. 19. Their sin is not specified, yet their father feared, sanctified them, and interceded for them, after their meetings. The upshot of their last feast was destruction; I mean, on their bodies, I dare not say so of their souls. The fathers think otherwise; and allege for it this observation. At the first Job had "seven thousand sheep, three thousand camels, five hundred yoke of oxen, and five hundred she-asses," Job i. 3. After his reparation, "he had fourteen thousand sheep, six thousand camels, a thousand yoke of oxen, and a thousand she-asses," Job xlii. 12. But in his first estate, and his last too, he had but seven sons and three daughters. The number of his cattle was doubled, the number of his children remained the same. Children are dearer than riches; why then is his wealth doubled, and not his progeny? They say, his beasts, according to the condition of beasts, utterly perished; but the souls of his children were saved. So then, as he had twice as much substance, he had twice as many children also; ten whereof were with him on earth, and the other ten with God in heaven.

Nabal "held a feast in his house like the feast of a king," 1 Sam. xxv. 36. Commonly there is nothing more plentiful than a churl's feast. He was merry, and feared no mischief; as if he had never angered David. That mighty champion was at the foot of the hill, coming to avenge himself; yet Nabal was feasting without fear or wit, and drinking drunk with his sheep-shearers. Full little do sinners know, how near their jollity is to perdition. Judgment is often at the threshold, while drunkenness and surfeit are at the table. Abigail's wisdom suspended the present ruin, but this feast would not off of Nabal's stomach: the report of his wife puts him into a swoon the next morning, and within ten days after that swoon ends in death: and that heart, which wine had made as light as a feather, dies as heavy as a stone. Belshazzar made a feast for his lords, and drunk wine to it. On a sudden, his countenance was changed, and his knees smote one against another, Dan. v. 1, 6. What an alteration was here! a sumptuous and presumptuous banquet ends in trembling and astonishment. He had the most glorious cupboard of plate in the world, for which he might thank the spoils of the temple: we read of many bowls, not of much wine; but in our feasts, a great deal of wine is turned over with a few bowls. Nabal cannot abound, but he must be drunk: excess is a true argument of folly. We use to say, When drink is in wit is out: but if wit were not first out, so much drink would not be let in. But I have held you too long at a feast, unless my cheer were better. The Jews by a custom did challenge at their feast of passover the release of one malefactor, Matt. xxvii. 15; whereupon they chose Barabbas, and refused Christ. So do you at this feast, turn out Barabbas, lust, riot, malice, injustice, covetousness, uncharitableness, profaneness, and all those sins which make up a malefactor, a Barabbas; and then in another sense than Pilate meant, I shall deliver to you the Lord Jesus, not to be crucified by you, but presented in this holy sacrament as crucified before you. Thus you shall see his body broken, his blood poured out, not to his pain, but your comfort; not his death, but the remembrance of his death. He took the bitterness of that, that we might have the sweetness of this; he died for us once, that we by him might live for ever.

"Deceiving while they feast with you." Feasting hath ever been held a note of friendship; we invite none to our tables, but either such as are, or such as we would make, our friends. David speaks of a wonder, of a monster: My friend that did eat of my bread, hath lift up his heel against me, Psal. xli. 9. Elijah would not do violence to the very raven that was his purveyor. But for a man to feed upon his neighbour's meat, and to eat his host in his heart, it is such a prodigy of unthankfulness, that nature herself is sick of him. Some sly politician, as Absalom, may make a feast for him whom he means to kill; some cunning usurer may make a feast for those prodigal heirs whom he means to undo; some ambitious aspirer, for them whom he means to undermine. "A feast is made for laughter," saith Solomon, Eccl. x. 19: yet all feasts are not for laughter, yea, some are for slaughter; not for society, but for satiety; not for delight, but deceit; not for love, but for lust. So the luxurious makes a feast, that he may lay his guests on the floor. The end of a feast is not seldom the beginning of a fray: therefore some interpret our English phrase, "To pledge," To defend; the drinker supposed to be in danger, and he to whom he drinks engaging or interposing himself betwixt him and harm. Feasts are not always safe; for if a man have no other enemy, he hath himself; his own riot may do him that mischief which another forbears. These were called love-feasts; their intent was feasting for love, yet some came for love of feasting: one was hungry, and another was drunken, 1 Cor. xi. 21. In these last was not the fulness of love, but the love of fulness. Thus the first institution did languish into corruption; and they became luxurious, some were drunken: uncharitable, others were hungry; the poor got nothing: and fraudulent; they had thieves among themselves, whose plausible insinuation made way for their pestilent circumvention. The hypocrite would bring his dish; but it was either to tempt a woman to his lust, or to deceive a man of his goods, or to spoil him of his wits. Let me conclude all with three observations.

1. It is odious to feast with men on purpose to make them drunk. It is usually said that we taught the Germans to fight, and they taught us to drink: and we have both proved apt scholars, too forward proficient; if they be tall fighters, we are stout drinkers. But shall men be so desperate, as not to think themselves welcome to a feast, unless they be sent home drunk? Many have lost their lives, because they would not be drunk; noble Uriah was made drunk, yet could not save his, 2 Sam. xi. 13. King David had abused his wife, and his project was to shelter it with the name of her husband. Uriah had protested against feasting at home, against uxorious delights: he could not be won with words, therefore now the courtiers must try him with wine. A king begins to him, and he must pledge it. I do not think that he intended any excess, but to obey. But wine is a mocker, it goes plausibly in, but who can imagine how it will work? It steals in like a lamb, but then rageth like a lion: he that admits that traitor, shall complain of a surprisal too late. Well, even good Uriah is made drunk; the holiest soul may be overtaken; he is a rare Rechabite that never drank but when he was thirsty. There is hope now that these cups will send him home; so common is it for wine to prepare men to lust. Uriah was made drunk, that he might desire his own wife. What was the issue? The aim fails, grace is stronger than wine, the fury of the grape cannot carry Uriah to his own bed. The graceless tempter sometimes fails in his project. David meant by procuring the sin of another, to hide his own; he shall not. Often have we heard of those that sought to overthrow others, soonest overtaken themselves. Whose is the chief offence? Uriah's drunkenness is more David's sin than his own: sober David is worse than drunken Uriah. Woe to him that gives his neighbour drink to discover his shame! yea, he shall discover his own shame. He that gives a man wine to deceive him, is first drunk in soul, before he can procure the other bodily distemper. If we should compare them, the one is as a sinner, the other as the tempter; the one yields weakly, the other intends wilfully. Lot's daughters gave their father wine to provoke him, but themselves were first drunk with that lust of provocation. The husband is drenched, that his bed may be polluted; the adulterer is more intoxicated with sin, than the other can be with wine. Even the drunken temperance of some abhors that wickedness which the sober intemperance of others desires. So other purposes be left out, and nothing is intended but victory; is he the valiant man that can drink most? David's worthies were honoured for the deeds of arms, not for their great draughts. He that makes a man drunk to deceive him, to turn another into a beast, makes himself a devil.

2. To cheat men under the colour of amity, is the most execrable villany. Feasting implies friendship; friendship admits of no deceit. Boetius says, No more deadly pest than a household foe, or an enemy among your friends. Nothing is more easy than to deceive, nothing more unpardonable. Nothing more easy: my friend may sooner mischief me than I can mistrust my friend. Nothing more hateful, because he doth that as a friend, which he could not have done as an enemy. The manner of doing specifice and aggravates moral actions, saith the school: and doth the very instrument. If I strike a man with sword, it is presumed that I meant to kill him: not so, if I strike him with a reed; because a reed is a probable instrument of death. He that deceives me under the name of a friend, shows that he took the name only to deceive me. There is no fence for the pistol that is charged with the bullet of friendship. Hilary compares it to a razor in the hand of a counterfeit barber; Prepared for ornament, says he, it is turned to murder. Uriah must be set in the forefront of the battle, 2 Sam. xi. 15: honour is pretended to him, murder is meant. He was a valiant soldier, and before he had the title of David's worthy he dearly earned it. It was not a great lady's letter nor that which got the captain his burgesship, Act xxii. 28, that gave him that reputation; but a noble courage in difficult exploits. David sent for him, made him royally welcome, and he was worthy of it; worthy indeed to have leaned his head near the golden sceptre and to have died in his prince's bosom, not by his prince's prodiction. But now that all this seeming favour and honour should tend to his ruin, oh how foul a deed was it even of that holy saint! His renown was as great as had been his dangers, and his valour beyond them both; and even in this last attempt that cost him his life, if his followers had not been more treacherous than his enemies were numerous, he had come off with victory. Now poor Uriah is not so much conquered, as betrayed; nor fell he by his enemies but by his friends. Yet is he neither the first, nor the last, that hath thus perished.

David himself had such a plot put upon him by Saul: Be thou valiant, and fight the Lord's battles, and I will give thee my elder daughter Merab to wife; for he said, My hand shall not be upon him &c. 1 Sam. xviii. 17. David was grown so gracious with the people, that the king durst not offer him personal violence; therefore he hires him into the jaws of death, by no less a price than his eldest daughter. What could be spoken more honourably more graciously? A king could not offer a more noble gift than his own daughter, nor desire a more acious recompence, than to fight the Lord's battles. What a saint, what a friend was Saul! yet he did ever mean so much mischief to David, so much unfaithfulness to God, as in this offer. A good man never safe from the false-hearted; for when they take the fairest weather, then is the greatest danger. Whatsoever the colour was, Saul meant nothing to David but death. Yet doth this falsehood discover itself, for Merab was not given to David, but Adriel. Seeing all these dangers could not effect what Saul desired, himself will not effect what he promised. Yet still he will be a friend, and he hath now another daughter for David; though the younger, yet the more affectionate; she was as sick of love, as her father was of hate, toward him. Saul is glad of this, his daughter could never live to do him better service: if she can betray David, David shall have his good will to marry her, ver. 20, 21. Thus doth this false-hearted king sacrifice his own child to his envy; and hopes that her honest and sincere love shall betray her worthy and innocent husband. It is so storied of a late emperor of Turkey, that he married his own daughter to a bashaw on the one day, and then, after a night's pleasure, sent for his head the next morning. Are there none that care not to cast away a daughter on their friend, for their own ends? Such is the rage of desperate malice, that rather than not ruin those they hate, they will do it through the sides of their own children. Faithful are the wounds of a friend; but the kisses of an enemy are deceitful," Prov. xxvii. 6. No man so much hates his professed foe, as he does his dissembling friend, when that shadowed villany declares itself. We pray, from the hands of all our enemies, and (of all our enemies) from the hands of our deceitful friends, good Lord, deliver us.

3. To boast of all this mischief, when it is done, doubles the wickedness; to glory in their shame, Phil. iii. 19. Wicked men glory in that which shall everlastingly cast them from glory; and make that their sport on earth, which in hell shall be their torment. One glories in his strange attire, as if that were matter of pride, which makes him ridiculous. What glory takes the owl, that she is not fashioned like other birds? Another glories in his perfumed garments, and thinks every one that sees him or smells him, must needs be in love with him. Another, to hear himself talk, or to read his own lines; though he bungle up such stuff as tires the most patient ear. Yet the ass takes no pleasure in his own braying. Another, to bring out an oath with a grace, as if to offend God, and to poison his own mouth, were an honour to him. Another, to tell of his cheats, and how many he hath gulled; and yet the gull knows not that he hath most of all cheated himself. Another, to tell of his adulteries; and every time he boasts, he again commits the sin; yea, this report shall have a worse vengeance than the act. Herodstratus burnt the temple of Diana in a bravery, and for a bravery he relates it. You shall hear the gallant swear that such a one is a brave, valiant gentleman: why? he killed such a man. So Cain was a brave, valiant gentleman, because he slew his brother Abel. Another, in giving weak brains a drench, to see them wallow in their filthiness: this is to boast how far they are become Satan's children.

Alas, that a man should make sport at sin! Doth the peacock glory in his foul feet? Do not his proud feathers come down when they are in his eyes? Every vice, for this very reason, its being a vice, is against nature: so Augustine. And are we enamoured of that which the very beasts hate? Takes the devil a pride or glory, that he is banished out of heaven? Doth he make a sport of his torment, or play with his chain? No, but he rather curseth God, angels, and men, who live in the kingdom of light, while he is confined to the dungeon of darkness. What coward is there, that will brag or glory that he was beaten? If we could see the baseness of sin, we would have little desire to make sport with it. Now the Lord open our eyes to see, and sanctify our hearts to detest it. Amen.

Having eyes full of adultery, and that cannot cease from sin; beguiling unstable souls: a heart they have exercised with covetous practices; cursed children.

LONG and late I am got out of that troublesome labyrinth: and now, like a traveller that hath spent some time in a bad country, where the conditions of the people displease him, he embarks himself, and hoisteth sails for another coast, hoping to speed better; and yet, alas, finds his progress from bad to worse; so, where am I now landed? Is the climate more temperate, are the inhabitants more civil, am I contented in my change? No, I have left the Sybarites, and lighted upon the cannibals; I am come (with Lot) from Egypt unto Sodom; from a knot of loose companions, to a rabble of adulterers. Before I found a land of deceivers, Jer. ix. 5, now I am fallen upon a land of adulterers, Jer. xxiii. 10: thus is the matter well mended. The sixth commandment forbids to kill; the seventh, to commit adultery; the eighth, to steal: a man's life is more precious than his wife, his wife than his goods. So the apostle's argument riseth a minore ad majus; before they did but cheat men of their purses, now of their spouses.

"Having eyes full of adultery." The theme riseth in full strength to the condemnation of adultery. For the particulars, we may compare them to a hunting: these graceless deceivers being granted the huntsmen, we have three occurrences. First, the hounds be their eyes. Secondly, the beast they hunt after, is the adulteress. Thirdly, the game is pursued, the dogs are at full cry; their eyes be full of adultery. Before I uncouple the hounds, or examine the particulars, let me say something to the matter in general. And that not much, because I have formerly handled this argument. It is a conquering sin, a cheating sin, a commanding sin, and a condemning sin.

1. It is a conquering sin, for it hath overcome the strongest. Some man perhaps says presently, Why then hath it not overcome me? Nay rather, why should it therefore overcome thee? even their falls should teach thee to stand. Bathsheba was no sooner washed from her uncleanness, but she goes into a forbidden bed, 2 Sam. xi. 4: she was never so foul, as when she was newly washed: yea, if she had not been washed, she had been clean: the worst foulness of the body is cleanliness to the best of sin. We read not of any fault of Bathsheba's either before or after, but that she was a good woman: yet she was a woman; the importunity of a king, and infirmity of sex, may plead for her. But what can be said for that prophetic king, and royal prophet? God hath not left it a blank, but a blemish in King David's chronicle; that every passenger may shun that rock, and steer his course another way. Otherwise what hope hast thou but to be drowned, when God's own favourite so narrowly escaped? Did not his holy profession teach him to abhor such a sin more than death? Did not his justice punish this sin in others with no less than death? Did not his place require him to protect the chastity of his subjects? Did not the countenance of his majesty imbolden the others' dishonesty? A princely tempter is like to prevail. Great persons should make their commands conscionable, their demands reasonable; for they sin by authority that are solicited by the mighty. Thus deeply might we accuse him, but that he did more deeply accuse himself. Be there any profane eyes that look upon this woeful example with content, as their pattern, or their excuse for adultery? (As some think of Ham, that he meant to take advantage of his father's nakedness, thereby to excuse himself for his continual drunkenness.) O those be dissolute eyes, and such as shall one day see David in joy, and themselves in torment. Good eyes behold it with fears and tears, as the woeful spectacle of human frailty. God notes it, and we repeat it, for a terror. What a powerful sin is that, which could overcome a David! If any man could have beaten Samson, how terrible would he have been to the world! One Joseph shunned his tempting mistress; now he would be a rare man. If thou be that Joseph, I will apply to thee that text of Solomon, "One man among a thousand have I found; but a woman among all those have I not found," Eccl. vii. 28. But if thou hast not been an innocent Joseph, yet now at least become a penitent David.

2. It is a cheating sin; for instead of repentance, it works the adulterer to labour a concealment. His study is not how to abandon the lewdness, but how to hide it from notice. He fears shame, not sin; the commissary, not God; the churchwardens more than the angels; and the apparitor worse than Satan. He seeks a rag to cover his sin, rather than a plaster to heal it. Bathsheba conceives a child in sin, 2 Sam. xi. 5, and withal conceives a trouble how to hide the shame. He that did the fact, must cover it. Marriage is a common recompence and shelter for fornication; but adultery always breaks out like a desperate plague, that knows no cure. Therefore it makes the offenders such hypocrites, that they rather seek to conceal their wickedness from the eyes of men, than to pull the sting of sin out of their own consciences. As there be some acts wherein the hypocrite appears a saint, so there be some wherein the greatest mortal saint may be a hypocrite. Compunction and tenderness is turned into circumspection and care of secrecy. Instead of clearing their sin, they labour to cloak it; and spend those thoughts in concealing it, which they should have bestowed in preventing it before, or in repenting it afterward. As if a client should be tedious and curious in making his cause good to his neighbour, and never think of a lawyer to plead it for him. Sinners endeavour to make all fair with the world, and forget their advocate, Christ. Not unlike the soldier, that was very diligent in scouring his musket, preparing his match, practising his postures, and fitting his furniture; and when he came into the field, had forgot his powder. Their thoughts are so taken up with the sweetness of fruition, and policy of contriving, that they quite forget the main, which is repentance.

3. It is a commanding sin; no iniquity that stands in the way must be refused, if adultery be once admitted. All the witnesses must be corrupted, yea, and allowed to take their own pleasure the same or any other way; the pander must not ask a reward, and have a repulse. Other maids stand in fear of their mistresses, but here the mistress stands in fear of her conscious maid. The servant's lips must be locked up with a golden key: if those setters once quest, the game is marred. The husband must be watched, dishonoured, impoverished, yea, perhaps butchered; for if blood stands in the way of lust, it is not spared.

There are no conditions so hard, to which the adulterer must not subscribe. David hath abused Bathsheba, the Hittite (her husband) is sent for from the wars; and after some needless and far-fetched questions, receives a royal present, and so is dismissed home, to cloak another's sin, 2 Sam. xi. 6—8. That train will not take, the good soldier is so used to his field-bed, that he rather chooseth a stony pillow under the canopy of heaven, than the delicate chamber of his wife, whom he thought as honest as he knew fair. David's wanton heart does not yet melt, by comparing his servant's chaste resolution with his own light incontinence; but he tries another trick. He that cannot be stirred with words, shall be heat with wine: this fire (he presumes) will send him home to his remedy. Here is a new plot, with a new sin; but it does not take. Drunkenness hath made many adulterers, yet shall it not move Uriah to lawful pleasures. What then? there must be another project. Where, O where will this mischief end? Adultery cannot be hidden without murder, murder shall be employed to hide adultery. The fact which wine cannot conceal, the sword shall. What a brood of sins hath the devil hatched out of this one egg of adultery! Uriah shall bear his own mittimus to Joab, and be the messenger of his own death. Joab must be a traitor to his friend, the host of God must shamefully turn their backs upon their enemies, much blood of Israel must be spilt, many a good soldier cast away, that murder must be seconded with dissimulation; and all this to hide one adultery. Who knows how far he shall fall, that hath once fallen thus far? Let him not flatter himself, This sin and no mere; for when Satan hath him at that advantage, he will command him further service. Oh how happy is it for us never to begin the evil, whereof we know not when we shall make an end! Now the preventing grace of God keep us from the sin, that we be never delivered over to the shame!

4. It is a condemning sin, and carries its own sentence about it. It must needs abandon all love of God, for that and the love of a harlot cannot stand together. There be three sorts of love; the first is ever good, the second is ever bad, the last is good naturally, accidentally evil. First, the love of God is ever good, nor is it possible to sin in the excess; there be no limits or boundaries set to this love. Secondly, the love of any sin, as of adultery, is always bad. Thirdly, the love of sustenance, recreation, &c. (as they say of Mercury, that joined with a good planet it is auspicious, noxious with a bad one,) is good by nature, bad by intemperance. This love by the love of God is stinted, that it may satisfy necessity, not curiosity. A proud stomach that quickens itself by artificial receipts, it will not endure, but confines it to mediocrity. But unlawful love is allowed no mediocrity; a man must not be an adulterer by measure. "The fear of the Lord is clean," Psal. xix. 9; that and foul thoughts will no more stand together than the ark and Dagon: if the ark be there, Dagon must down: Dagon may stand when the ark is gone. No idol must be in the temple of God, but of all idols not Baal-peor. As malice is damnable, because it is so diametrically repugnant to God who is love; so God is also purity, and therefore nothing more directly contrary to him than uncleanness. There is no adulterer but will say, yea and not stick to swear, that he loves God; yet if he have but a crown in his purse, his harlot shall sooner have half of it, than he will lend God one sixpence: this the poor find too true. Perhaps after the cooling of his heat, loss of spirits, and abatement of courage, he may be a little sorry; but it is like a cold thaw at noon, that is congealed worse at night. Though it takes away present strength, yet it leaves a desire; whereas grace takes away desire, though it leaves strength. It is like fire, that purgeth out the filth of uncleanness; like the sun, that deadens these embers by his greater force; like pure water put into a vessel, that thrusts out the stinking air whereof it was full before. Love God therefore, know him that you may love him, read that you may know him, pray that you may do all. Augustine, the famous doctor, was anxious to become a Christian; only this troubled him, that he must leave his fornication. (Confes. lib. 8. cap. 8.) As he sat in a garden, he heard a voice, saying, Tolle, lege, Take the book and read; and at the first opening of it, he was presented with that text, "Let us walk honestly, as in the day," &c. Rom. xiii. 13. This was enough; it wrought his heart to piety: whose soever the voice was, the conversion was the work of God.

"Having eyes full of adultery." Their eyes be the beagles that hunt after this game; where we have five observations.

1. There is no sense which is not at the heart's command; but the principality of those servants is varied according to the disposition of their mistress. If the heart be gracious, the ear hath the superiority; if vicious, the eye. Faith comes by hearing, to make the soul good; faith is confirmed by hearing, to make the soul better. Lust comes in by seeing, to corrupt the heart, and make it evil; lust is inflamed by seeing, to make it worse. Unless God come in by the ear, you shall not find him in the heart. So the harlot takes the heart by the eye. The blind is in better case than the deaf; for the former hath but lost the sense that might undo him, the other hath lost the sense that should save him. In the market a man's eyes do him more service than his ears: in the church, no matter though his eyes be shut, so his ears be open. "Mine ears thou hast opened," saith David, Psal. xl. 6, not mine eyes; yea, he prays rather for their shutting, "Turn away mine eyes from vanity," Psal. cxix. 37. In the temple, a running or roving eye is a dangerous thief to steal away the soul. The popish service was only invented to take the eye: the deaf man may be one of their best catholics; there is nothing to do for his ears, unless he can understand Latin, or have some skill in music to distinguish tones of the organs. All is a pageant for the eye, as St. Paul hath fitted it with a word, ἄφραδος οὐλῆς, eye-service; which brings so many fools into their paradise. This makes it perilous to see their histrionical idolatries, because the soul is surprised by the eye.

If any object, that Paul was present at the pagan devotions, Acts xvii. 23: but we are not all Pauls, we have not all Paul's constancy; yea, rather, how many Peters there are! how many are guilty of Peter's flexibleness! But is truth then too cruel, to forbid our bodily presence at superstitious services, for the preservation of our lives and liberties? Nay, rather admire the bounty of this mistress: you aim at the company of men, she tells you of a society with angels; you think of your rotten tenements, she wisheth you eternal mansions; you would be content with under-offices, she offers you dominion over cities; you plead for provinces, she for kingdoms; you are indulgent to a life that leads unto death, she counsels you rather to accept of a death that leads unto life. We read not, By seeing you shall be saved, but by hearing.

2. The eye is of all senses the quickest of apprehension; a port to land the commodities of hell, before the soul have warning. It goes out for prey, and brings it home in an instant. If that of Plato had been true philosophy, that the sight is formed by darting out the visive faculties to the object, there had been hope of better safety. But seeing exerciseth itself by bringing the object within, according to Aristotle, and thus is the baneful impression made. That is a rare eye, like a pure beam of the sun, that can mingle itself with sordid corruptions, and receive no taintment. It is a most sharp-sighted faculty or sense, it can see the sky and stars so remote. Most efficacious; no sense so firmly imprinteth forms in the imagination; what it sees once intently, it sees many days after. Most sure or certain; I saw it; an evident testimony. One eyewitness is better than ten ear-witnesses. No sense is so ranging; now it is on the earth, in a moment at the moon. Therefore the suddenness of the last judgment is compared to the twinkling of an eye. None hath such variety of objects, and continual business; none is so often put in action, none is so quick of motion; indeed none so serviceable to reason: well guided, none so commodious; and none so pernicious, if corrupted.

The visible instruction is most potent: young King Philip, being but carried in his cradle to the wars, did greatly animate the soldiers. The visible temptation is most prevalent. Imagination in absence represents the pleasure afar off, and not prepared; before the eye, it enrageth the desire, and nothing wants but execution. Therefore the way to root a bad impression out of the heart, is to remove the object from the eye: out of sight out of mind. We think on absent things with colder affections. Indeed well-grounded love is more constant, and lovers have a secret cabinet in their memories, whereby they confer; yet unless the intercourse of messengers, letters, tokens, revive the affections, even their thoughts will grow remiss. How easily then may loose love, which hath no other nerves but blood and sense, be dissolved by a separation! Many a bitten lover says of his harlot, Would I had never seen her face: but he says not, I will never more see her face. He vainly wisheth what cannot be, and yet does not conscientiously resolve what may be.

3. The eye is the pander of a lustful heart; the window that lets in the infection, the first betrayer of the fort. To say nothing of the sons of God, allured to the daughters of men by their eyes; nor of Potiphar's wife, that by a cast of her eye drew Joseph into her heart; nor of David, the glance of whose wanton eye wrought so many mischiefs: Ahab's eye was sick of Naboth's vineyard, his heart was drunk with the grapes whereof he never tasted. Adultery sets her chair in the eye: they say, the master's eye feeds the beast; but here the beast's eye feeds the master. In the eye itself there is no such virtue; yet the master's eye is said to govern the family. Here the eye doth engender lust, lust adultery, and adultery (if nothing else) engenders vengeance. "Let her not take thee with her eyelids," Prov. vi. 25. Oculi sunt in amore duces, saith a poet; i. e. In love the eyes are the leaders. Upon this ground it seems Zeleucus imposed that law on the Locrenses, that the adulterer's eyes should be pulled out: sin entered at those casements, therefore he would stop up the windows; and when the steed was stolen, shut up the stable door. Pliny writes of a chalky brimstone, that draws to itself distant fire: the wanton eye attracts this adulterous fire to the heart. All shapes, all colours are alike to darkness; no sense can distinguish betwixt foul and fair, but the eye. Dinah was a maid, and went to see virgins of her own sex; her eye was chaste, though idle; but Shechem's eye was both idle and unchaste. That great soldier called the Persian maids, Dolores oculorum; i. e. The torments, or pains, of the eyes: therefore the same Alexander refused so much as to see Darius's wife, a lady of incomparable beauty; fearing lest he that had conquered the husband, should be overcome by the wife. What abundance of offices doth the eye bear in this little family of man! First, it is the body's watchman, and guides the hand to defend it. Secondly, it is the understanding's informer, whereupon she determines of substances true or false. Thirdly, the stomach's taster; for if the eye do not like the morsel, that refuseth it. Fourthly, the affections' purveyor, to bring in their desires. Fifthly, the heart's messenger, that runs on her errand almost as quick as thought. Sixthly, the fancy's intelligencer; the painter must see, before he can counterfeit. Lastly, a scout to the whole soul, and a sentinel to the whole body; and corrupted, a traitor to them both.

4. Satan's first project is to take the eye; if that be once his friend, he hopes well of all the rest. Indeed, if the door stand open to the thief, what safety can be in the house? The devil took Christ into an exceeding high mountain, and showed him all the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them, Matt. iv. 8. Why so high, but for prospect? If all this glory were only represented to his imagination, a valley would have served; if only to the sense, no hill were high enough. Circular bodies, though small, cannot be seen at once. This show was made to both; the kingdoms about Judea to his eye, the glory of them to his imagination. A cunning devil in all; he meant that this glory should tempt the eye, the eye the fancy, and the fancy should tempt the will. If that sense be viciously employed, remember the devil is there. How many thousand souls have died of the wound in the eye! If sin be not let in at that window, nor the door of the ear, it can find no way into the heart. Death comes through the windows: when a man opens his eye lustfully, he cannot think what a train of sins will crowd in upon him. Had Satan come to David in the most lovely form of Bathsheba herself, and at the first in direct terms told him, he should enjoy her if he would murder her husband; without question, he would have spit scorn on that face, on which he so much doted. Now from the glance of his eye arose all that succession of mischiefs. He sins; and no less sin would serve his turn than adultery; and that is not enough, without the addition of blood. Yea, he is not only a sinner, but a tempter; he solicits Bathsheba to offend God, to break her faith, to dishonour her husband, to dishonest her body, to wound her soul, to put an asp to the breast of her conscience: and all this begun with a look. The man that was so heart-smitten for cutting off a piece of his master's garment, is now lavish of a noble servant's blood. Yea, because that worthy commander cannot fall alone, he grudgeth not the blood of his innocent people to accompany him. Could he have expiated that sin with his own blood, it had been but well spent; but to cover it with the blood of his faithful soldiers, was a crime above astonishment. How did the Spirit of God retire at a wanton look! Oh the deep fetches of sin! Satan were not that old serpent, if he had lost his windings; his craft is of as long standing as his malice. That sin at the first presentment would affright a man, which he juggles on by degrees. When the prophet told Hazael of the horrible mischief he should do to Israel, he replied, Am I a dog, that I should do this? 2 Kings viii. 13. Not yet; but in time the devil will screw him up to it. He that willingly runs into a known wickedness, knows not where he shall stop. Set a man on the top of some high tower, and bid him leap down, he finds horror in the precipice. Yet you may persuade him to go down by the stairs to the very bottom. If we do not prevent this assault in our eyes, we shall too late complain of the horror and anguish of it in our hearts.

5. Where be the eyes that have not been faulty? If the eyes have sinned, why should not the eyes be punished? Punished they must be, with rottenness in the dust, with horrid and astonishing visions in hell, if some former penalty be not set on them here. The rich man in hell saw Lazarus in Abraham's bosom, Luke xvi. 23: that sight was his torment. How must the eyes be corrected for this wantonness? By tasking them unto tears: for ranging eyes, we must get mourning eyes; for eyes lifted up with pride, eyes dejected with shame and sorrow; for eyes full of incontinence, eyes full of repentance. How else shall we dare to lift up those eyes to heaven, which have been the brokers of hell, polluted with the aspersions of lust? O let those eyes, that have been the cisterns of corruption, become the fountains of compunction. Mary Magdalene's eyes had offended, her eyes shall pay for it, Luke vii. 38. She had been a notorious strumpet, a woman of a mercenary condition: if her eyes had not invited her to love others, yet they had bewitched others to dote on her. Lo, she would not look on that world but through a shower of tears, which she had so enamoured with her wanton looks. These organs have made our bodies stinking lepers, let them be turned into a Jordan or Siloam to cure our leprosies.

We magnify some waters distilled out of herbs and flowers, because they are good to heal sore eyes; but there is no water so virtual to cure the lust of the eyes, as the penitent water, which the limbeck of sorrow draws from those eyes. Some of the ancients have thought, that God did endue us with this dew of tears for no other end, but to wash away our sins. Because when we weep for any losses or crosses, we do not lessen our grief, but increase it; but when we weep for our sins, we do not increase them, but take them quite away. No tears can raise my friend up from the grave, they may raise my soul from the death of sin. From the bitter flowers of wormwood, the heat of fire distilleth sweet and wholesome water: the grace of God's Spirit, from the bitter remembrance of our sins, distilleth tears able to comfort our souls. When we are thirsty, we run to the well; when our houses be on fire, we run to the river: the sight of our eyes hath procured both these mischiefs to our hearts; the tears of our eyes must help them; they are able both to allay our thirst and cool our lust. This is not an eye full of adultery, but full of grief for adultery: such an eye shall look upon thy harlot with indignation and detestation; that in those tears she shall read at once thy present sorrow and her former sin. A graceless woman that had long insnared a young man who was now converted, saluted him in the old familiarity as he went by. He regarded her not. She replied, It is I. He answered, I am not as I was, I was not as I am. (Ambrose.) Blessed souls, that have got the mastery of their own eyes!

"Adultery." This is the game, the beast they hunt; where I observe three gradations.

1. The main attractive of the eye is beauty; and of this the fancy is informed by the eye: yet being so informed, then the eye is ruled by the fancy; and as that imagines her, so the eye sees her. Beauty is the glory of nature, a glimpse of the soul, a beam of the Maker's brightness; so ravishing the heart, that it is more present with the body it loveth than in the body where it liveth. Yet as the meat which pleaseth the taste, is but a mixture of well-compounded materials; the music that delights our ear, is but a harmony of proportionable voices or instruments; so the beauty which so takes the eye, is but a just correspondence of the parts and colours of visible bodies. Why should not that spiritual beauty be far dearer to us, which is the image of God, the elements or lineaments whereof be righteousness and holiness? The body's beauty is but superficial, skin-deep, hiding that within which we cannot look upon without horror. Spiritual beauty is like a diamond, fair to the centre. Time will plough furrows on the fairest face, and fill it with wrinkles; but the wrinkles of a beautiful soul are done away with time; the older, the fairer. Many a woman's beauty hath been her ruin; but blessing never forsook a beautiful soul. When thou comest near to a fair face, thou becomest never the fairer for it; nay, thou appearest the fouler by being near it. But a virtuous soul, by a kind of exemplary influence, diffuseth into thee some ornaments; and is indeed, as they talk of that imaginary stone, by the touch of that pure metal, so diffusive of goodness, that thou shalt be the better for it. No miseries can blemish this beauty: "I am black, but comely," Cant. i. 5; tanned and sun-burnt with persecutions, yet still amiable in the beauty of holiness. In this, Sarah was a figure of the church; who was as fair at a hundred years old as she was at twenty; and then, the fairest woman of the world. It is said of Christ, that he was without form or comeliness, or beauty to be desired, Isa. liii. 2; yet even then, he was "fairer than the children of men," Psal. xlv. 2. Clean through a corporal beauty, a spiritual eye can see the very image of the devil; but a gracious soul in her worst estate is but like a slubbed diamond, which after a little polishing shines with a radiant lustre. "The king's daughter is all glorious within," Psal. xlv. 13: but who can persuade carnal minds to this? It is the image of Adam they dote upon, not the image of God. A fair skin surpriseth a fleshly heart; and he thinks there is no other beauty in the world, but that which toucheth his sensual desires.

2. But if a man's eye be delighted with beauty, may he not enjoy it with chastity? Why may he not think his own wife the fairest upon earth? She is so to him, if he so imagine her: opinion cannot err in matter of opinion. He sees her daily with the same eyes he first chose her. But the ranging eye cannot be so limited. Propriety in other things is a content, here it is a burden: and were not the adulterer's fair wife his own, he would give much to enjoy her; but being his own, he cares not for her. "Stolen waters are sweet," Prov. ix. 17: but will a man leave his own delicious wine, to steal a draught of his poor neighbour's water? It is a wife that he loves, but not his own: and this aggravates his wickedness, that the adulteress is not her own woman, but another's, under covert baron; not a straggling deer of the herd, a beast of the common, but one upon whom be set the marks of propriety. God hath set his mark, and resolves not to know her, if she knows another man. The church hath set her mark of solemn marriage, refusing to be the mother of that daughter which defiles the marriage-bed. The husband hath his mark of a holy covenant made before men and angels; and is allowed a divorce upon such a fedifragous forfeiture. To pick this threefold lock with a false key, to undo a knot thus tied before heaven and earth, will call God and man, heaven and earth, not only to witness it, but to take vengeance of it.

What a laborious, what a dangerous way the lustful finds out to his pleasure! as if no water could please David, but what is brought through a host of enemies: no content was worth their desiring, but what was fetched from the gates of hell, snatched out of the devil's teeth, handed out of that burning furnace of unquenchable flames. Those delights are not esteemed, that are not troublesome: the malice of lust supposeth all ways of obtaining better than the lawful. Suppose the two sinners forgive one another on earth, will they not curse one another in hell? Suppose the church pass it over, either through ignorance or connivance, will not the Judge of all the world plague it? Say he is patient, will the wronged husband, brother, friend put it up? Doth not Absalom pay Amnon the wages of his sister's constupration? 2 Sam. xiii. 28. Two whole years that sly courtier smothered his revenge; but it was not for nothing; it was so much the more exquisite, by being longer protracted. If David will not punish it, Absalom shall; not that he cared for justice, but for revenge. Absalom did it wickedly, but God righteously; human partiality hath neglected it, inhuman malice shall punish it. God punisheth sin with sin, while Absalom punisheth sin with death. If either David had called Amnon, or Amnon called himself, to account for it, the revenge had not been so desperate. How often hath the adulterer been slain by the abused husband, when he least suspected it; righting himself unjustly, as he had been secretly injured! Abimelech was the son of a concubine, yet he murders all his father's legitimate children. If Gideon had lived to see that bloody day, how would he have cursed the knowledge of a luxurious bed! So some write, that Ulysses was slain by his own base son. The adultery of Paris was the desolation of all Troy.

I will not tire you with examples. It is an adulteress their eye is full of, they seek a like to themselves. These lusts they conceive by the mediation of the eyes, as Laban's sheep did their young, at the sight of the pilled rods, which Jacob laid in the watering troughs. Placet interdicta voluptas; i. e. forbidden pleasure is pleasant: they slight the fruit of the tree that is easily climbed. What is Ahab's kingdom to him, while Naboth hath a pretty vineyard? The cloyed husband sits carelessly looking on that wife, for which another languisheth. Herein David's plot failed him, when he had sent for Uriah; he imagined that the beauty of Bathsheba must needs attract a husband so long absent, that it was his grief to be detained from so pleasing a bed. Because that face, those eyes and breasts, had so enchanted him, and stolen his heart, that they could make him sin; he thought it could not be possible, but Uriah must be allured by them to a safe and warrantable fruition. He was deceived, though Uriah had another end: many a wanton stomach plays with that meat, which to the hungry affecter would be above all dainties. Nabal is churlish to that wife, whom holy David thinks himself happy in, and makes his queen. Oh the boundless vagrancy of irregular lust! whither will it go, where will it end? Will one harlot serve the adulterer's turn? No, could he renew his strength as fast as his desires, and multiply objects to both, a nation of women would scarce suffice one adulterer. It is a sin that sours up the conscience with the blood, dries up grace with the marrow; and when it can sin no more, yet it cannot repent. Happy soul that never knew it! and next happy that for ever after detests it!

3. Lastly, it is an adulteress they love, and that is but one bow short of Satan. Some have mistrusted, that it is not a reasonable soul, but an infernal spirit, that enliveneth such a licentious shape; to do that by a fair woman, which he could never do by his foul self. What hath not a guilty conscience cause to dread! The soul of the adulteress cost Christ his precious blood; yet half a crown, or little more, or sometimes less, is the set price of it. What need Satan tempt her, when for so small a value he may have her? We hate the Turks for selling Christians as slaves; how odious are they that sell themselves! Soon is their lively colour wasted, their blood parboiled; that were it not for superficialized cheeks, and enticing dresses, the most graceless lecher would abhor them. But it is the devil's special care to keep them gorgeous. A soldier having a sword which he hath well proved in divers combats, and knows he may surely trust it, will be careful to scour and polish it. Woman hath done Satan singular good service; by her he overthrew the first man, by her the wisest man, by her the strongest man, by her many millions of men: no marvel therefore if he be curious in dressing her with ornaments, in disheveling her hair, and fitting her with all conducements; that she may still help to people his infernal kingdom. Fowls of the air, though with never so empty craws, fly not for food into open pitfalls. Quæ nimis apparent retia, citat avis, says the poet. The bird avoids the nets which show too much. An adulteress is the devil's pitfall, a trap to catch our souls; let us not run into the gin with open eyes. Now the Spirit of grace keep us from the strange woman, that we may be no strangers to the kingdom of heaven.

"Full of adultery." This is the pursuit of the game, full cry. The eyes do not engross all their uncleanness; they are not only full, and the other parts empty. The caterer fills his basket with provision; but this serves afterward to fill the mouth, and to fill the stomach. The eyes be first full, as the cistern; but the cistern serves all other offices of the house. Nor is this a fulness of satisfaction; for as "he that loveth silver shall never be satisfied with silver," Eccl. v. 10, so he that loves women shall never be satisfied with women. Unnatural desires are infinite: hunger is soon appeased with meat, and thirst allayed with drink; but in burning fevers, the more water is drank, the more it is thirsted for. They still love with the love of concupiscence, not with the love of complacency. The hunter hath killed to-day, he is fresh again for the game to-morrow. This guiltiness first takes the eye, but stays not there; the procurer provides for another, not for himself. The lustful heart is the great commander, that assigns all members their several offices. So the ear is full of luxurious discourses, the eye full of provoking pictures: both full, at an obscene interlude, of exemplary and visible carnalities. The bones are full of idleness; they rest on that pillow of vices. The thoughts full of contemplative uncleanness; for it is not hard to be an adulterer by speculation. The mouth is full of filthy jests. They come to do evil by these accessories; yea, the evil is already in those accessories. Some flatter themselves that they are chaste of body; but their eyes, their ears, their thoughts have committed adultery. Therefore if thine eye offend thee, pluck it out. What the substance? No, but the vice of the substance. The liver is obstructed, and makes the body sick; what then, shall we pluck out the liver? No, but let the arm bleed, take some course to draw out the corruption. Lust is a fire; if it be inflamed in the heart, there is no part of the body but shall feel the heat.

"Full." There is no mediocrity in sin: in extremes can be no mean; and every sin is an extreme, either deficient or excessive. The heart of man affects fulness; and if it be not full of God, it seeks to be full of something else. The wicked are full of unrighteousness, full of envy, Rom. i. 29; their hands are full of blood, their houses full of spoil, their lips full of deceit, their mouths full of cursing and bitterness, their throats full of slander, their bellies full of new wine, their loins full of lust, their inward parts full of malice; let me add, their heads full of mischief, their hearts full of rancour, their ears full of petulancy, their eyes full of adultery. These be the fulnesses that shall bring the fulness of torments. Sin will not leave a graceless soul empty: the house is no sooner swept, but it is filled with seven worse spirits. The drunkard cannot give over till he be full of wine; the swearer delights to fill his mouth with a monstrous oath; the covetous never feels himself full though he enlarge his belly like hell; all, like Pharaoh's lean kine, though they have devoured the fat, are lean still. Ambition, like the grave, is never full. What a thing is the heart of man, that it should swell as big as the world! Alexander was but a little man, yet a hundred worlds could not have filled him. The babbling tongue is not weary, though full of prattle, and is scarce silenced with sleep. A full wardrobe cannot content pride, it is still longing for new suits. All Haman's honour could not fill him; he would swallow Mordecai's head, and that choked him. Oh the insatiate desire of sin! when will it be full? When the eyes be full of soreness, the hands full of palsies, the houses full of misery, the faces full of infamy, the bones full of aches, the mouth full of cries and roarings, the loins full of diseases, the head full of pangs, the heart full of distractions. Yea, their mouths must first be full of earth, their souls full of torments: this world could not, hell shall, render them full enough.

But for us, there is another fulness. Be ye filled with the Spirit, full of good works, full of fruits; our mouths full of blessing, our hands full of charity, our eyes full of modesty, our bowels full of pity, our looks full of humility, our hearts full of honesty, our souls full of God; that we may lie down full of peace, and rise again full of glory.

I conclude. Adultery is an epidemical disease: almost the whole world is infected with it. That if Christ should now come down, and call none to follow him but they that have not been defiled with women, Rev. xiv. 4, his court would be very thin. Rome hath been notoriously branded for this execrable vice; especially since the popes have bound them to contain, to whom God gave not the power of continency.

But enough of their filthiness, let us look to reform our own. Some (who, it may be, speak of their knowledge) tell us of whole houses of harlots in this city; by whose allurements, servants rob their masters, sons their own fathers. They are the sink of the world, the common sewer of all corruptions, not for passage, but for confluence; the standing pool, the vault that sucks in all odiousness. They have excellent gifts of wit and beauty, which they convert to pestilent uses of turpitude and brothelery. To church they never come, not in their whole life would they ever hear of God, but for their fearful swearing and blaspheming his holy name. The souls they bring forth, shall stand up at the latter day, and give evidence against them. Indeed God never said to Adam and Eve, Increase and multiply, till they were married; to show that he hath a curse, not a blessing, for that increase which is not lawful. But even to destroy that fruit which was unlawfully gotten, before the Lord Chief Justice of the world will be found murder. That God, who knows how to raise good out of evil, doth sometimes bless an adulterous intercourse with increase; and sometimes to the chaste embraces of honest wedlock he denies it. The honest wife hopes to be a joyful mother; the harlot fears that title, and therefore hides adultery with murder.

Whom God hath joined, let no man separate; yet the adulterer does what he can to separate them. For virgins; when virginity is gone, the virgin is gone too: When God can do all things else, saith one, he cannot restore a defouled virgin. Our flesh will corrupt fast enough, though we never admit these corruptive forwardings. We have sins enough of our own, though we bring not upon us the sin of another. By other sins a man goes to hell alone, but in this he rides double. Our Saviour speaks of bundles that shall be cast into the fire, Matt. xiii. 30. The proud man burns single, the homicide burns single; but the adulterer and his harlot shall make one bundle, and burn together. Like Zimri and Cozbi, as they were conjoined in the sin, they shall not be parted in the torment. When two be bound together, and thrown into the sea, they have less power to help themselves. Marriage hath made one of two, that they might fructify together, like Aaron's rod. Palms are the emblem of marriage, that do not bear fruit divided. Cursed is that heat which shall make two of one, and dissolve so sacred a union.

"That cannot cease from sin." All sin is a labyrinth, wherinto the entrance is easy, but it is hard to get out. Possession is eleven points of the law, we say; and that which begun by an unjust title, fortifies itself by custom. Stamp garlick in a new earthen pot, it will never out. I do not wonder at the continuance of sin; to break it off by repentance is the matter admirable. The descent is easy, but to retrace the steps—that is it. Down-stream the boat goes fast enough; to stop it is the cunning, before it strike on a shelf. I do not say that the greatest sinner is evermore in the act of wickedness; yet so long as the habit is unmortified in him, he does not cease from sin: the slave asleep discontinues the acting of his master's business, yet he is still in service.

Sin, like the sun, runs his continual course, Psal. xix. 5; though sometimes clouds by day, and always the interposition of earth by night, hide him from our eyes. Yea, and sin hath his circle and line, as the sun his orb and ecliptic; if we may compare the real passages below, with those imaginary signs above: and let us compare them.

1. Wantonness. Conceive sin to begin with Aries, the Ram; in petulancy and youthful wantonness, ready to butt at every passenger. "Remember not the sins of my youth," Psal. xxv. 7.

2. Obstinacy. Thence it proceeds to Taurus, the Bull; to strength and tyranny in evil; a stiff-necked disobedience. The prophet calls them the bulls of Bashan, Psal. xxii. 12, goring with the horns of oppression.

3. Confederacy. It comes to Gemini, the Twins: it can no longer continue single, but must have a partner in transgression. The adulterer must have his harlot, the drunkard his boon companion: Babel cannot be built alone. Society makes good men cheerful in good things; and assistance makes evil men confident in their evil attempts. It is rare to see single sins, or single sinners.

4. Hypocrisy. Then to Cancer, the Crab; a crooked, irregular course, anfractuous, full of subtle windings; circumventing his neighbours, as the crab doth the unmistrusting oyster. Here sinners get themselves hardened ribs, a shell not to be pierced by any reproofs.

5. Tyranny. Next to Leo, the Lion; a raging and roaring kind of life. Thus they grow on from petulancy to obstinacy, then to conspiracy. from that to hypocrisy, now to cruelty. The lion fills his den with prey, his hole with rapine, Nah. ii. 12. He contemns all admonition, and without respect of justice, will be his own carver. This is the height of ungodliness.

6. Uncleaness. He comes to Virgo, the Virgin; a sign which astronomers ascribe to the belly. Now he gives himself to rapes and adulteries, and looseth the reins to his brutish and boundless appetite; that were his power equal to his desire, he would not leave a virgin in the world.

7. Justice. Then to Libra, the Balance; and there is a demur in his proceedings. Human justice begins to examine him, to curb his impetuous violence: and in this house sometimes he stays longer than the sun does in that sign. For if lewd men should not fear the magistrate, more than they do God or the devil, there were no living among them. Now Libra delivers him over to

8. Conscience. Scorpio, the Serpent. When he hath been corrected by moral justice, he is then taken in hand by conscience; a tormenter that hath a worse sting than scorpions. This haunts him like a curst wife at home, like a querulous scold abroad; no where can he be quiet. No entreaties can persuade her, no bribes can corrupt her, no music can charm her, no noise can drown her thunder. He talked his pleasure while she said nothing; now she roars as fast, and he knows not what to say. This the prophet calls the Lord's rod of scorpions, wherewith he scourgeth wild offenders. This happily sends him to

9. Prayer. Sagittarius, the Archer: he takes the bow of devotion in his hand, and shoots up his prayers to the throne of grace. The fathers have called our prayers, the church's artillery, arrows of zeal; which if we draw up to the head, and send up from the heart, they shall pierce the very heavens, and wound the Lord of hosts with pity; and he will have compassion on us. The bow is repentance, the string is faith, the arrow is prayer, the hand that draws and looseth it is zeal, the mark is God, and the errand it goes for is mercy. At this sign he would dwell longer, but because he must go on, he lights upon

10. Infirmity. Capricornus, the Goat. Even after his humble devotion, and pious resolution, he falls into sin. The Ram, and Bull, and Lion may be mortified in him; pride, obstinacy, cruelty: yea, the Twins and the Crab, double-dealing and hypocrisy, may be abhorred of him: to Virgo he will offer no more violence; he loathes all constuprations and turpitudes: yet still he smells of the Goat; some tang of the old corruption remains, the beast is not quite worn out of him. But it is fallen down as low as the knees, to which place they assign Capricornus: it is far from the heart, out of the reach of any vital part. But in this house he is but a passenger; the sun does not make more haste than he from it: and now having sinned, he posts to

11. Repentance. Aquarius, the Water-bearer: he knows no sin, which he endeavours not to wash off with his penitent tears. This fountain he hath always about him; and if the air of bad company hath made him sin with Peter, yet he can go forth and weep with Peter. Mary's tears did not more wash the dust from our Saviour's feet, than the sin from her own soul. If Capricornus have made thee offend, let Aquarius be ready with this repentant water; that Christ may answer thee as he did Mary, "Thy sins are forgiven," Luke vii. 48. So well the devout soul loves to dwell in this watery sign, that he concludes his journey in the very element of water, with the Fishes.

12. Perseverance. Pisces, the Fishes: this is the foot of the song, as they appropriate Pisces to the feet in their anatomy. They be clear and cleanly creatures, delighting to swim in the crystal streams: if they strike into the mud, it is but to avoid the net; and when the danger is past, they soon cleanse themselves. True converts, if they cannot be always pure, yet are quickly purified. First, as fishes are beaten by the waves, but do not yield; so the billows of temptation beat upon the godly, yet they fail not. Secondly, as fishes swim thrice, in water, in vinegar, and in wine; so doth the Christian, in the water of baptism, the vinegar of affliction, and the wine of consolation, the sacrament, which cheers the heart. Thirdly, fishes, being wounded, have recourse to the tench, the physician of fishes, whom if they but touch, they are healed. Souls wounded with sin repair to Christ, the Physician of kings, the King of physicians; and touching him by faith, they are cured: as the woman with the bloody issue did but touch the hem of his garment, and was presently as whole as a fish, Luke viii. 44. Thus swimming in the pure streams of grace, removed from the sordid and dreggish corruption of earth, we shall at last be translated higher than that sidereal sign in the zodiac, even to the heaven of heavens, the kingdom of Christ.

But now, alas, how have I lost my theme! The argument of my discourse is sinners' obstinacy, and I have concluded with their salvation. Pardon me, it was a merciful mistake: I wish it should be so, though I find it otherwise of these in my text; for they are wretched adulterers, "that cannot cease from sin." Well, then, it is but bringing you some way back again: if you remember where I turned the sinner out of his road of condemnation, you find it in Scorpio. Libra, that is, public authority, had him under the scourge; but suppose that favour dismiseth him, and so gets out of the hands of justice, yet Scorpio will have a bout with him, conscience will trounce him. This, like some ghastly apparition to a soul forlorn, upon the threshold of desperation, with a show of fresh bleeding wounds, and an astonishing countenance, presents itself in unexpressible terror: how will he pass this sign? Yes, he will stupify his conscience with a deluge of wine, never allow himself to be sober; and with a vicissitude of sensual delights, lust and drink, as with two hot irons, quite sear up his conscience; and is then confident that the dead dog will never bark.

Thus he passeth from that dismal house of correction, a very bedlam to his soul: but now Sagittarius comes; Justice shoots at him from heaven, that unerring archer who never missed his mark: the arrow of sickness sticks in his ribs. Now his down-bed is troublesome, and after many changed sides he complains of uneased pangs. What now? this will be a tedious sign to him, perhaps the end of his voyage. Physicians are sent for, who receive gold, and give drugs; keeping him sick the longer, that themselves may fare the better. But at last he recovers; after many promises to God, and vows which he never means to keep, he is enlarged from his bed; up he gets.

And now he posts to the next sign, to try what better cheer Capricornus will make him. He finds him like some goatish host, close at his cups and ribaldry; and here he falls in, relapsing to his former sensuality: riot and intemperance renew their old acquaintance with him; whoredom and new wine take away his heart; and thus being intoxicated with sin, he lays himself down to sleep. Thus many passages of execrable wickedness he hath got through; pride, injustice, hypocrisy, oppression, uncleanness, and voluptuousness, without any interruption, saving those short disturbances of sickness and conscience; and now he slumbers in security. But yet his race is not done, he hath two more signs to pass.

From this sleep, Aquarius, or the world, calls him up; and whispers in his ear a golden word, Be rich. Now age and covetousness seize on him at once, and he projects to fill his barns with corn, with money his coffers, and thereby his heart with joy. To do this, he refuseth no course, be it never so unjust; neither friend nor father must stand in his way, now he is set upon it to be rich. He will starve his family, perhaps his own body, to be rich. He will be an Aquarius indeed; the devil's water-bearer, a water-drinker, so he may be rich. The law reproves him, his neighbours hate him, the poor curse him, God threatens to condemn him; he cares for none of all these, so he may be rich. Well now, rich he is, a rich beggar, or a beggar in the midst of his riches; for upon all his estate there is set a spell, "Touch not, taste not, handle not," Col. ii. 21. Touch me not, says his wealth to him: Leave me not, says he to his wealth. It is good to be here; in this house he would dwell for ever. But he must not; there is a bell that tolls him into another sign, the last of his eclipsitic, that shall eclipse his glory for ever; the grave and hell; the one to devour his body, the other to swallow his soul.

Pisces looks for him, and thither he must come. Thou fool, this night shall they fetch thy soul from thee, Luke xii. 20. Pisces are placed at the feet of man; this is the last foot of his journey, the standing house at the end of his progress, the period or full point of his travels. Swimming in the Dead Sea of this world, he hath swallowed the bait of riches, and now is caught with the hook of death; and he that never ceased from sinning, shall never rest from suffering. Though we sin often, and much; too often, too much; yet let us break off our sins by repentance, and cease from sin that we may be saved.

"Beguiling unstable souls." The wicked cannot be quiet, till their vicious desires be accomplished; they have eyes that are uneasy and restless for sin, as Calvin renders it. Their meat and drink is to do their father's will, that is, Satan's: restrain them from wickedness, and they complain of famishment: either they call for poison, or no food. Ahab is sick, because he is denied Naboth's vineyard. Whether more in anger or in grief, it is hard to say, but he keeps his bed, and refuseth his meat, as if he should die no other death, 1 Kings xxi. 4. Because he cannot have his will on Naboth, he will take it on himself; as the madman tears his own hair, because he cannot come at his enemy's. The wicked cannot sleep till they have done mischief. Saul will not give over the chase of David, but hunts him dry-foot through every wilderness. The very desert is held too good a refuge for innocence; the hills and rocks are searched in an angry jealousy: the very wild goats of the mountains were not allowed to be companions for him, that had no other fault but his virtue. Still David's success is Saul's vexation. Where shall that man rest, who seeks rest in sin? In this life he cannot, for he walks all round, and grinds in Satan's mill. Shall he rest hereafter? No, then he shall eat of his own grist, and labour in torment. Only there is some difference in the manner of their working, and of the time; here with pleasure, there with horror; for a while here, there for ever. Still these obstinate seducers go on, from strength in sin to strength of sinning, till every one appear before their master in Tophet.

"Beguiling unstable souls." This verse yields us a fourfold description: First, of their filthiness, Eyes full of adultery. Secondly, of their craftiness, Beguiling unstable souls. Thirdly, of their worldliness, Exercised with covetous practices. Fourthly, of their wretchedness, They are cursed children. In this branch we have two particulars: the fish, souls: the net, fraud; beguiling unstable souls.

1. The fishes they take are souls: the prince of darkness says, as did the king of Sodom, Give me the souls, take thou the rest, Gen. xiv. 21. There is no taking the body, without a former winning of the soul; nor can they make those bodies tractable to their lust, whose souls be not first prostituted. And if the flesh could be abused without the consent of the mind, they might make themselves merry with the case without the instrument. In vain does the thief look in at the window, when he sees the master standing on his guard in the house. Joseph's garment may be rent, his body escapes, because his mind was whole.

The soul is their fish, and so they are compared by Him, who gave his apostles that office, Matt. iv. 19, to draw men out of the sea of this world by the ears, that they may be served in to his own table. The poets tell us that Bacchus began his empire with the transmutation of mariners into fishes; the moral whereof may be, that when mariners come to shore, they drink like fishes. Christ, God of his Father's substance, begotten before the world; and man of his mother's substance, born in the world; began his spiritual kingdom by converting souls: that as fishes are caught lineis textis, with a net of twisted lines; so men are taken lineis ex Scriptura contextis, by nets made out of Scripture, by the holy word, Rom. x. 17; not sea-fish, but land-fish.

But these be none of Christ's fishermen; they do not fish for him, they rather fish from him. The element that preserves fishes, is the pure stream of the water of life: out of this they labour to fetch them that they may perish. No fish with them so sweet as the soul. Yet as they do not catch the body but for their lust's sake, so nor the soul but for the body's sake, and neither but for gain's sake. Indeed there is difference between God's spiritual fishing, and the taking of material fishes; for when fishes be taken it is death to them, but when men are taken it is life to them. Fishes are taken to be devoured by the jaws of men; men are taken to be delivered from the jaws of hell. But these deceivers catch souls for their own ends, that they may pickle them up in vices, and make them the food of their insatiate lusts.

2. The souls which they beguile, be unstable, unconstant, tottering. If they were firm, they could not; if apostatizing, they need not; but in this wavering plight they are fit subjects to work upon: the weathercock will be ruled by the wind. To-day the unstable soul is for a mass, next Sunday for a communion, the next week for neither. Rome thinks him theirs, we think him ours, his own conscience finds him neither's: this make him waxy to persuasion, servile in imitation. His heart is in such an equilibrium that the next scruple turns the scale. Now comes the tempter with a bait, and this foolish fish is caught. This Laodicean temper is far worse than the extremes, Rev. iii. 16: heat and cold have their uses, lukewarmness is good for nothing but to trouble the stomach. Spiritual heat hath God's promise of acceptance; stone-cold hath an easier reckoning; that which is betwixt both procures sickness: the nearer it comes to heat, and is not hot, the more odious the Lord holds it. Why do ye halt betwixt two opinions? 1 Kings xviii. 21. The prophet doth not so much rate them for their superstition, as for their irresolution; not so much for being unsanctified, as for being unsettled. One Israelite serves God, another Baal; yea, perhaps the same Israelite serves both God and Baal. How long will you halt in this indifferency? God is less offended with going upright in a wrong way, than with halting betwixt the wrong and the right way. I yield that in ceremonial or circumstantial differences, indifferency is the safest, both for opinion and practice; but in the oppositions between God and Baal, woe be to him that is a neuter!

Curse ye Meroz, because they took not the Lord's part in the day of battle, Judg. v. 23. Here, even to stand and but look on, is treason; to take part with neither, is to be an enemy to both. God doth not hold them so capital foes that serve him not at all, as those that serve him with a rival. There are points which the passions of men have set further asunder than needs, wherein the persons indeed fight more than the things: it is charity to reconcile these; or at least, better to state the questions. But when the quarrel is betwixt Jerusalem and Babylon, truth and falsehood, woe to the unstable soul! We may sit at home and weep, bless God that we are in the right, pray for them that are in the wrong; but to labour a peace between them, is to bring a curse upon ourselves; to work, not a satisfaction, but a stupefaction, upon our conscience. Some things may admit reconciliation, as differences between men and men; some are in their nature irreconcilable, as the differences wherein men differ from God. Every man is a little world, yea, every man is a little church; wherein there be two factions, two armies that fight continually: nothing but a lethargy of conscience can cease this war. It is a civil war, yea, rather a rebellion than a war; yet cannot it be absolutely quenched. To make these two friends, were a labour not less vain than impossible. Every militant soul is a soldier in that general war between Christ and Belial: now as what God hath joined, let no man put asunder, so what God hath put asunder, let no man join. To set up the ark and Dagon under one roof, is an impiety that ends in scorn. "I will put enmity," saith the Lord: we and Satan should never have fallen out, we agree but too well, but that God hath put an enmity between us. This quarrel presently showed itself, and begun between Cain and Abel, and it is not yet taken up. The truth of the gospel, and the errant wickedness of idolatry, are so diametrically contrary; that whilst we would reconcile them, or by any colourable modifications bring them together, we fight against our Maker. For he hath infused such an incompatibility, and imprinted such an implacability, between truth and falsehood, that they can never flow into one another.

In quarrels betwixt brethren, in quarrels betwixt Christian princes, blessed are the peace-makers: but in the wars betwixt Christ and Belial, cursed are they that go about to make peace. "Ye cannot serve God and mammon," Matt. vi. 24. The wit of the world, and the pestilent wit of hell to boot, hath long laboured to bring these two lords together, to dwell in one house, and to feed at one table; that they might do them service both at once. But how vainly! Ye cannot: we will try: you may, but ye cannot do it. Day and night may join and meet; yea, they do so twice every four and twenty hours, in the dawn and in the twilight; the dawning of the day in the morning, and the shutting in of the day in the evening, make day and night so much one that we cannot tell which to call them. But light and darkness, midnight and noon, never met, were never joined together. "What communion hath light with darkness?" 2 Cor. vi. 14. What do you call that between grace and sin? hath it a name? Almost a Christian, saith Agrippa, Acts xxvi. 28. What is that? One neither with Christ nor without Christ, neither holy nor unsanctified: sure there is no such creature. But it is plain, "He that is not with me is against me," Matt. xii. 30. If a man be almost a Christian, God will almost pardon his sins, but he will not pardon them; he will almost save him, but he will condemn him. For him that is neither man nor woman, we have a name, hermaphrodite; but we have no name for him that is neither a believer nor an unbeliever, neither true nor false, neither for God nor for Belial. There is a Christian, and there is an infidel; there is a heaven and a hell: he that finds a third kind of creature, may fool himself with the belief of a third place, purgatory.

"Unstable souls." Here first let me give you a character, then an application.

1. The unstable man is in an evil case; for while he professeth neither side, he is hated on both sides. He is still asking for news, and scarce thinks it news as soon as he knows it. Quid rari, chari, miri? i. e. What are rare men, dear men, and wondrous men? To whom it was well answered, Vir sapiens rarus, vir bonus charus, vir pius mirus, The wise man is a rare man, the good is a dear man, the pious is a wondrous man. He may well be compared to the wave, for he is ever wavering. He now says it, in an anger swears it, and within half an hour renounceth it; as if his understanding did write upon his will, as a man writes upon water; it tarries not long enough for an impression. All his resolutions be but flashes, fiery, and momentary. When he begins a business, he goes about it hotly; ere you can say a Pater-noster, he is weary. Yet (by way of paradox) we may commend him for a good commonwealth's man, for he sets many on work; Diruit, adificat, mutat quadrata rotundis, as Horace says, i. e. He pulls down, he builds up, he exchanges square things for round, or round for square: you shall never have him but either building, or pulling down, or altering; as if he meant to make more business than time itself. Commend him also for this, he is a professed enemy to idleness; for he is never out of action, though what he doth is to no purpose. His heels carry his wit, neither his wit nor his heels know whither. His feet, like the harlot's, cannot keep within doors; he loves to be a guest in his own house. Propriety is a disease to him; he likes every thing better than his own. He longs for every rare thing he sees; and his purse gives it him, like a rattle to still him; and before night the child is weary of it. He is a piece of clay tempered with running water, which keeps his wit in a perpetual motion. He is any thing, or every thing, in possibility; but for the present he is nothing.

He is no dangerous enemy, for his hate cannot be more constant than himself; but the worst friend that can be chosen, for he is never the same. He were good to inhabit the fleeting islands, for he treads upon moving earth; and like some ill-broken horse, he hath no pace. In what a wretched case is the unstable man, whose religion is yet to choose! He knows he shall die, yet he will not know what faith he should die in. If he should die in that doubt, there were great doubt of his eternal state. His religion (it may be) lies in wait for the inclination of his prince; as a spaniel hunts according to the face of his master. Of all creatures, he is like the bat, which hath both wings and teeth; if he could cast off one of them, he might show himself either a bird or a beast. The unstable man shall receive nothing of the Lord, Jam. i. 7. Hear this, ye neutrals, that hold Christ with one hand, with the other antichrist, and know not whether you should choose or let go; that would fain mingle the colours of St. George and St. James in one scutcheon; while you are not settled in religion, in irreligion you are settled. Christ will not save you, because you were not wholly his: Rome cannot save you, though you had been wholly hers. If you must settle, when begin you? if you must begin, why not now? Choose, therefore, and choose right, and cleave to it. It is not enough to resolve, but we must rather lose ourselves, than the truth of Jesus Christ.

2. We have chosen, and blessed may we be in our choice. It is happy for us, that God hath put the meat into our mouths; that we are baptized, catechised, and confirmed in the truth. Many thousands would have been more thankful to him, who exceed us in devotion, more than we do them in illumination. Are there no unstable souls among us? They write of a place in the isle of Paphos, where never fell rain; the island wants not showers, but none falls there. There is a place within us, our heart, so roofed with hardened lusts, that no dew of grace can have access. With what fear and unwillingness do I think of the state of a great multitude; so unstable in their devotions, that it is a high extent of charity to believe them Christians. The lawyer professeth Christ, yet a round fee can tempt him to plead against Christ: he doth sell his speech, and he will not give his silence: as he said, Non omnibus dormio, I do not sleep for all; so this, Non omnibus taceo, I do not keep silence for all: you must hire him to hold his peace, if you do not to speak. So indifferent and irresolute are such advocates in their religion, as they are in expectation of judgments; they hear both sides, yet know not on which side the cause will go. Indeed too many deal with Christianity, as they do with a suit at law; the matter is plain enough, but they cloud and puzzle it with their wranglings. So papists dispute, not from a wish to learn, but from a desire to contradict. As Cyprian speaks of one in his days, that challenged him to dispute, and used to amaze the people by holding the conclusion. The preacher would boldly reprove some vices, but then his parish withdraw their benevolence; are not these unstable souls? The magistrate would do justice, but then a great man's letter conjures his forbearance; is he not unstable? Some go to mass, yet flatter themselves that their hearts are right to God: a man does not walk in the sun with a purpose to be tanned, yet he cannot but know that he shall be tanned with walking in the sun. Et agere et pati, Romanum est, said Scævola, Both to do and to suffer is Roman: we are taught at agere, at doing; but when it comes to pati, suffering, we are gone. We are glad that Christ suffered all for us; but we will suffer nothing for him. It is the happiness of these cold times, that we are not put to the hot fire, for trial of our faith and love. If the wheel were turned, which the mercy of God forbid, how many would turn from Christ, rather than burn for Christ! But if there be a recompence for a cup of cold water in Christ's name, Matt. x. 42, how shall a cup of warm blood yielded for that name be rewarded! yet such is the niggardly devotion of men's unstable hearts, that they will scarce afford the poor even a cup of water from their cisterns. The distressed have God's mandatory and commendatory letters for them, yet toward the advancing of a collection, some great man's letter doth them more good. We all love to be of the taking hand, but will part with nothing: we would receive Christ's bounty, yet grudge our duty; we would be like him in glory, not in grace. If man's law should not prevail more than conscience, what order would be observed? Too many fear an obligation more than religion, and are more careful of a recognisance than of their conscience.

It were easy to find among us the faults and fates of the twelve tribes, praised be God that we have also their blessings. The very first puts me in mind of all the rest. Reuben unstable as water, thou shalt not excel, Gen. xlix. 4. Such a bar in the arms of great houses is inconstancy. Reuben was the first-born, yet he lost the principality: and you can say, This hath been the fortune of many an elder brother. Simeon and Levi, brethren in evil, ver. 5: the papist and seminary, in mischief against the gospel, sworn brothers. He that calls to mind the fifth of November, shall find instruments of cruelty in their habitations, and see them digging down a wall. "I will divide them in Jacob, and scatter them in Israel," ver. 7: yea, O Lord, divide them from Israel. Judah hath the crown and the blessing, and the crown of blessing be upon Judah, our gracious sovereign: let him and his hold the sceptre, till Shiloh come again, ver. 10. "Zebulun shall dwell at the haven of the sea," ver. 13. Merchants are for the sea; but let them remember, it is a wavering element, governed by the inconstant moon; and that all their voyages are but adventures, their ships but reeling vessels; all unstable. If their conscience should be infected with this staggering disease, that were the worst shipwreck.

"Issachar is a strong ass couching down between two burdens," ver. 14. Issachar, the usurer; an ass that feeds upon thistles, while he stoops his back to the burden of riches. Let them be made servants to tribute: they are the fittest subjects for subsidies. Poor men labour for a little; they grow rich with ease: it is but walking out six months; then sit down and tell their monies.

Dan's place is to "judge his people," ver. 16; and far be untableness from the place of judgment. Yet, alas, there is nothing more unstable: the cause that goes on this side to-day, is to-morrow judged on the contrary. But we dare not say, the fault is in the judge, but in the law: just as the peremptory sexton said, Howsoever the day goes, I am sure the clock goes true: the law is difficult, but there is no fault in the judge. Aye, but Dan hath officers under him; bad lawyers, crafty serpents, adders that bite the horse's heels in the path of his journey, ver. 17; and that so sore, that no leech can cure it. The client comes riding up in haste to his lawyer; but by that time the suit is ended, he may walk a-foot home at leisure.

"Gad, a troop shall overcome him: but he shall overcome at last," ver. 19. He had his name of a troop, Gen. xxx. 11, he is overcome by a troop, and at last shall overcome a troop. We have many troops of them, abundance of the tribe of Gad; some gad to Rome, others to Amsterdam: it is still (according to my argument) an unstable soul that sets them a gadding.

I find no fault in Asher, unless plenty be one. He yields bread, and fat bread; dainties, and for kings; royal dainties, ver. 20: his emblem is a cup or bowl of delicacies. But as Noah was drunk with his own wine, so the cup of prosperity hath intoxicated many a soul. And God hath no worse servants in our land, than they that can live on their lands, and care for nothing else.

Naphtali "giveth goodly words," ver. 21: we have too many of this tribe, hypocrites, that can give nothing but goodly words. They will speak so fair, and deal so foully, that you would not believe they are made all of a piece. But when the wind sings, and whistles in the leaves, look for a storm.

"Joseph is a fruitful bough," ver. 22: and blessed be God, we have also a tribe of Joseph, fruitful of good works. Though he be the butt of contradiction, and "the archers have shot at him, and hated him;"

yet he is "made strong by the hands of the mighty God:" and a universality of blessings from heaven, earth, the womb and breasts, and the everlasting hills, shall be on the crown of his head that was separated from his brethren.

"Benjamin shall ravin as a wolf," ver. 27. The last is a wolf, the merciless oppressor, that from morning to evening doth prey upon the poor, and divide the spoil: but at last they shall be divided; their names to infamy, their wealth to the world, their bodies to the dust, and their cruel souls a prey for those more cruel spirits of darkness. Reuben had his divisions, Judg. v. 15, and the rest their waverings and infirmities; only we have Judah and Joseph among us, that faithfully adhere to the truth of Jesus Christ.

They beguile. The net wherewith they catch these trouts is fraud. If we continue the sense from the foregoing words, they charm them with the witchcraft of the eye. That is a silent oratory, and discourseth the meaning of the heart in a dumb motion. The tongue is a speaking eye, and the eye is a silent tongue: and by this dumb language, lovers understand one another's mind, though their lips open not. But I rather take this net to be the tongue, a subtle persuasion to lewdness. A deadly net, like that in Suidas, which in single combats one did cast over another, and being so insnared slew him. "They hunt every man his brother with a net," Micah vii. 2; a bloody net. Not a fantastical, imaginary net, such as purgatory; which Szegegin calls, Amplissimum rete ad capiendas animas, A large net to catch souls: he should have said, A large net to catch fools; a net wherewith the pope catcheth fish enough to serve his kitchen.

Fraud hath a thousand tricks of cheating; but of all instruments, the chief is the tongue. A handsome tale drunk in at a thirsty ear, is a philter to the soul. The tongue is either a man's glory, or his shame. When it is the servant of an honest heart, it is an especial organ to glorify the Maker. If otherwise, Satan is more beholden to it, than to all the body besides. It hath a thousand ways to do good, and as many to do hurt. When Satan had stripped Job of his riches, children, health; and laid him so full of sores, that no part of his body was free; yet all this while he spared his tongue. The reason might be, because the devil looked that that should do him some service; even such as his wife prompted him to, blaspheme God and die. Still he expected when all his vexation should break out at his lips. He that offends not in word, he is a perfect man, Jam. iii. 2. But where is that man? The Lord sanctify our ears, that they be not seduced by others' tongues; and sanctify our tongues, that they offend not the ears of others.

"An heart they have exercised with covetous practices." There is not a more dangerous vice in all the storehouse of hell, than covetousness. To other sins Satan tempts a man often; but covetousness is a fine and recovery upon the purchase; then he is sure of him: as when the jailer hath locked up his prisoner safe in a dungeon, he may go play. It is an imperious sin; and sits like a justice in his chair, while religion must stand cap in hand to it. Heaven is the highest place, earth the lowest; yet covetousness sets the lowest in the highest esteem, and the highest it undervalues to the lowest. He respects heaven but on the by, for recreation; his main game is the world. While Christ was preaching, a covetous younger brother interrupts him with the division of an inheritance, Luke xii. 13. Make an end of your sermon, and come and end a difference betwixt me and my brother; you shall do a deed of charity, a neighbourly office, and save a great deal that would be idly spent in law. We have many of his religion, that think we do God better service in composing their quarrels, than in preaching heavenly doctrines. This is to call Christ from dividing the word, to divide the inheritance. I know there is no Christian but condemns this vice, and yet this vice shall condemn many Christians. The difficulty here, is not so much to win consent of judgment to the point, as conformity of practice to the judgment. There may be a conviction of conscience without any preparation of obedience; and truth will be sooner confessed than practised. If every man were his own judge, there is not a covetous man among us; but the Judge of all the world will find many, that flatter themselves with Not guilty. The world hath very ill luck; for many affect it, admire it, adore it, yet will not be known of it. But God hath more injury; for they profess to love, serve, trust in him, yet indeed care not for him. The world hath many servants, but they wear not his livery: God hath many that wear his livery, but they are none of his servants.

"An heart they have exercised with covetous practices." Methinks here be four words not unlike the four elements. First, the heart, like the earth; it being the centre of man, as the other is of the world. Secondly, covetousness, like water, soaks into it, and makes it hydropical, yea, turns it into dirt. Thirdly, exercise, like the air; which is an element movable and circumambient, full of exercise. Fourthly, practice, like fire, active and devouring. Or covetousness is the child born; the house it is bred and brought up in is the heart; her education is the exercise of cruelty; and her whole course is the practice of iniquity.

But covetousness must formally be defined, that we may not lose ourselves at the first setting forth. Some say, it is a desire of having more; but we must have more in the definition of it than so: he that hath not enough, may desire more, and yet be free from covetousness. Others say, it is a desire of having more by unjust means: but covetousness is beholden to them for so favourable an expression: this were rather to confine it than define it. Avaritia est plus velle quam sat est, says Austin. Covetousness is a desire of more than enough. But now what is that enough? There is no such word in the worldling's dictionary. "It is enough;" Israel said so, Gen. xlv. 28: it is a word only known in Israel. Enough is both necessary for being, and competent for well-being. "Having food and raiment let us be therewith content," 1 Tim. vi. 8. In those boundaries doth God hedge up our desires, like wild bucks in a park. If we have money enough to bear our charges to our journey's end, to desire more is covetousness.

But who then is not covetous? It is a disease of nature; but here is the difference; some give it physic, and no sustenance; others give it sustenance, and no physic. Some would destroy it, and those it molests, but kills not; the other maintain it, and those it kills, but molests not. These latter are the covetous. The good man feels it as his enemy, the bad loves it as his friend. If you see a man that hath sufficient for his family, yet scraping for more, know him for covetous.

Covetousness is, like the father of it, of many names, but never a good one. As the same soul, in the several faculties, hath several titles; or as the same river, passing through divers regions, hath divers appellations; so hath avarice. In the church, it is sacrilege; in a churchman, simony; in the place of government, it is oppression and tyranny; in the place of judgment, it is corruption and bribery; and when this river swells up to the bank, it is usury. First, it is called idolatry, Col. iii. 5. All idolatry is not covetousness, but all covetousness is idolatry. Secondly, adultery; as a man forsakes a wife peerless for beauty and virtue, to embrace a harlot, so doth the covetous man relinquish piety for gain, God for the world. Thirdly, homicide, Zeph. iii. 3: for betwixt life and living there is no such wide difference. Cut the poor man's purse, he thinks you cut his throat, and the throats of all his children: such a merciless cut-throat is oppression. The prophet speaks of princes that were such butchers, Micah iii. 2, 3. The thief steals to satisfy his hungry soul, Prov. vi. 30: but they can plead in themselves no necessity, for they are princes; in the other no superfluity, for they rob the poor. This is a sin which the poor man cannot commit though he would; the rich man doth, because he can. The high rate and port that divers live at, can be maintained by no driblets: but in the country, by racking tenants, enclosing commons; in the city, by diminishing quantities, corrupting qualities, taking advantages, falsifying balances or measures, by mixtures, blendings, and such sharking sophistications: a small booty will not serve their turns. Mice may be nibblers, and live; but the cat that keeps them in awe, is of the eating kind: she devours more at one bit, than the poor mouse would have done at twenty. This sin is the rich man's peculiar. Lastly, it is theft. There is a flying roll that "shall enter into the house of the thief," Zech. v. 4. Are none thieves but they that scour the plains? Yes, there is a thief that dwells in a house, a house of his own; and that commonly one of the fairest and stateliest, for it is built with blood. Thieves? rich men scorn the name: a thief is the only man they are afraid of. Yet they that lie in itinerant ambushments, shall in comparison of oppressors be justified as no thieves. Alas, they be poor shallow fools, soon taken and clapped up in chains of iron; whereas the other walk like senators in chains of gold: the great thieves are a terror to the little ones. Without partiality, to take men as we find them, the universal practices of covetousness occasion me to make a humble suit to free men, and rich men, and gentlemen, to lawyers, and judges, and magistrates, that they would think it no scorn to be no thieves. Let not the motion seem harsh, that you would not disdain the commendation of being no thieves. As portly and stately as they bear their heads, were they but stripped of that pomp wherewith injustice hath clothed them, and to begin the world anew, those poor people whom they now despise, would scarce be bound for their truth and honesty. Thus the covetous man may be called an idolater, an adulterer, a murderer, a robber.

But some will not believe the plague, till they see the tokens. Take therefore some concomitant signs. First, solicitous care for the future; as if God that was here yesterday, and is to-day, would be gone to-morrow. What shall I do when I am old? So he breaks his sleep while he lives, to think what shall happen to him hereafter, perhaps when he is dead. This is an extreme folly of avarice, when a man makes himself miserable for the present, for fear of being miserable afterwards; not suffering himself to be free from a burden while he may, because he doubts he shall not be free when he would. Thus the fool leaps into the water, for fear of being drowned in the boat. Secondly, engrossing of too much business: they censure churchmen for pluralities; but there be temporal pluralists; and many have made themselves so much to do in the world, as if they had nothing to do with the world to come. They only say that they love eternal life; but if you mark their employment, you will confess they prefer the temporal. Thirdly, no business at all: when they give over their profession, to live with less faith, and more security; and make themselves of that desperate number, whereof ten in the hundred go not to heaven. Fourthly, religion must not stand in their way to riches, without contempt, without violence. Moses broke the tables of the law in pieces for anger at the golden calf: these men would have broken them in fitters for the gold that made the calf. In their conscience there is kept a court of faculties; whereby they can give themselves a dispensation for any sin at pleasure. Fifthly, their discourse is of nothing but riches. He that is earthly talks of the earth, John iii. 31: his breath, like a dying man, is of an earthly savour. "The mouth of the righteous speaketh wisdom:" why? because "the law of God is in his heart," Psal. xxxvii. 30. So the covetous hath earth in his heart, and his very breath smells of it. Take off his tongue from the market, it walks to the exchange, then to the key or wharf, and from the custom-house to the warehouse; it never comes near the church. These be the signs.

The heart; that is the throne of covetousness. It is bad enough in the eyes; so Achan took the infection that cost him his life. Worse in the tongue; Let not covetousness be once named among saints, Eph. v. 3. As if that world, which many prefer before heaven, were not worth talking of. I will not take their name into my lips, saith David, Psal. xvi. 4. The worldlings worship those idols which the saints will not so much as honour with a mention. But the covetous man's mouth is full of earth while he lives, and shall be fuller when he is dead. Yet worse in life; "Let your conversation be without covetousness," Heb. xiii. 5. But worst of all in the heart: alas, that any disease should come near the heart! and yet any disease less dangerously than avarice. Lord, "incline my heart unto thy testimonies, and not to covetousness," Psal. cxix. 36. Our contemplation, our conversation, our communication, yea, our very cogitations, should be clear from covetousness.

Exercised with covetousness. The worldling will acknowledge covetousness to be a sin, but he will not acknowledge himself to be covetous. Adultery and blasphemy are notoriously convicted; they wear their Master's known livery. But avarice, like hypocrisy, will needs be a virtuous vice, a gracious sin. It wears the cognisance of frugality, the complexion of good husbandry, and would be called by the honestest names that are. There is no text against intemperance, but they think it makes for them. Because the drunkard spills the wine in wantonness, doth this excuse the miser that grudgeth himself a draught in necessity? A man may sin damnably, though he never come at the tavern; as at the tavern a good man may be merry and guiltless. The covetous wretch, that locks up his cupboard, and rageth at his servant for eating a poor crust more than allowance, cries out against riot; the times are prodigal; and rails at him for lavishness, whose snuffs he is glad to drink of in private. He tells his children how thirsty our predecessors were; how long one gown served his grandfather: and himself is still known by his forefather's coat, which with his blessing he bequeaths to his posterity, that they may be known by it too, for many generations. Thus he praiseth plainness, not for less sin, but for less cost; because it is cheaper, not because it is better. He persuades his family into meanness, as the tyrant served the idols; he took away their golden robes, which were too cold for winter, and too heavy for summer, and made them linsey-woolsey coats, that might serve them better for both seasons. He condemns others for wasting time, and never blames himself for selling time; which he doth so punctually, that he will neither prevent his day nor defer it. Bring him principal and interest before his day, he fears you have law against him; after his day, he hath law against you. Some gratuities in the mean time are morsels to stay his stomach. He grudgeth a coal of his fire, a bucket of his water; and of all things next stealing, he hates borrowing.

Divers sins have the saints of God been taxed with, never with covetousness. Once Noah was drunk with wine, never drunk with the world. Lot was twice incestuous, never covetous. Peter denied his Master thrice; it was not the love of the world, but rather the fear of the world, that brought him to it; for he had denied the world before he denied his Master. Once David was overcome with the flesh, never with the world. Grace may stand with some transient acts of naughtiness, but never with covetousness; those were acts, avarice is a habit: grace is not overthrown by every act, but by the habit of sin. Therefore of all sins, the children of God have cleared themselves from covetousness, when they would approve their integrity before God and men. So Samuel; "Whose ox or ass have I taken?" 1 Sam. xii. 3. He that was the judge of Israel, would not now judge himself, but be judged by Israel: they shall acquit him, and of all sins, from covetousness. So Jeremiah; I have neither lent on usury, nor on usury borrowed; yet they curse me, Jer. xv. 10: as if that practice had deserved a curse. So Paul; "I have coveted no man's silver or gold," Acts xx. 33. He was covetous of nothing, but of their souls for Christ. Why did they not purge themselves from adultery, anger, contention, and the like? Because into these sins the infirmity of a saint may fall; but if once into covetousness, there is nothing of a saint left, not the very name. A guest may lodge in my house all night, yet leave me master of it still in the morning; but avarice, when it gets admission, turns grace quite out of doors. Exercise facilitates things in their own nature troublesome: the old cart goes quietly under a heavy load, when the new cannot away without creaking. This makes them call their wealth, their substance; while themselves wait on it like base circumstances and servile accessaries. Their heart is obdurate, like rammed earth, to be the foundation of mischiefs, and bear the weight of all villanies.

"With covetous practices." He that prescribes medicines, and undertakes cures, professeth himself at least a practitioner in physic. The covetous are not without their practices, yet they deny the name. When Christ preached against covetousness, Luke xii. 15, one man gave the hint or occasion of the text, the whole multitude heard the sermon. Good reason, for from the least to the greatest, they were all given to covetousness, Jer. vi. 13. Some sins are peculiar to some places and conditions; but covetousness is an epidemical disease, infecting all persons. Let me discover to you some of these practices.

1. According to the rule of charity, I begin at home, with the church. If we should love the world, that teach others to condemn it, this were like the fox, to dispraise the grapes we keep for our own tooth. There is much art to elude the law: as a wager to be lost, that the living may be gotten: a poor jade bought at a hundred pieces, and a benefice at the tail of him; as one wittily said, The case is clear; the benefice is cheap, the horse was dear. Such a simonist applauds his own wit, that he is no bungler in carrying on a business. What follows? He that bought dear, cannot sell cheap; unless he means to live by the loss; and he that so buys, hath no such meaning. I do not deny, but the patron hath as condemnable a share in this bargain; for he sells what he should give, and the other is fain to buy his own. Again, to take God's wages, and not to do his work, is a legal sacrilege. We find "men of the world" mentioned in holy writ, Psal. xvii. 14, and their worldly practices, Luke xii. 30. "But thou, O man of God, flee these things," 1 Tim. vi. 11: man of God, stands in opposition to those. Let fishes love salt-waters, birds of the air fly up towards heaven: God and mammon are two contrary cures; and they be so infinitely distant, that no court of faculties can give a dispensation to serve both. Bernard observes of St. Paul; All that the world love, was as a cross to him. But indeed, all the charity of the world is put upon us, other men rid their hands of it; as if we only were bound to do all things for God-have-mercy. If the least recompence be afforded to our pains, they think it is their courtesy, not our merit. God is much beholden to such men, and without question at the last day he will thank them to their faces; but they had better be without it. In this city, for the tenth, they have scarce left us the fortieth part; yet if we demand but that, we are censured covetous. But let not sheep judge the shepherd. God made thee, thy parents begot thee, thy preacher saves thee; where is the fourth equivalent to these? Yet as if God and the preacher had nothing to do with us, and nothing had done for us, there is none whom we so boldly defraud. There was an order and custom in St. Augustine's time, that the poor should beg of none but the priest; and if he had not wherewithal to relieve them, they might exclaim against him, for not more effectually moving the people. Then the poor came to us for succour, now all the succour we have comes from the poor. The rich rob us, only the poor are more willing than able to bestead us. We dare not plead for our own, then sacrilege would not hear us; the law must not help us, their evil conscience will not help us, the poor cannot help us; now the Lord help us.

There be some that have brought down the price of our function; and for the bettering of their own severals, have inveighed against the church's commons, in the language of Judas, To what purpose is this waste? John xii. 5. Crafty cub, he would have had it himself. Oh how these preachers tickle the people's ears, that can fit them with a cheap religion! If I should prophesy of wine and strong drink, I were a prophet fit for this people, saith Micah, chap. ii. 11. Now it is but turning wine into water, and strong drink into small charges, and then he is an excellent prophet. Faith, and all faith, and no good works, but to the household of faith, by which they mean themselves. I could also mention non-residents and self-silencers; but they are my brethren, and I will not accuse my brethren; my fathers, and I will not lay open the nakedness of my fathers: only pray for them, as Noah did for Japheth, Gen. ix. 27: God persuade them to dwell in their own tents; and purge all avarice from the house of Levi. You see I have not spared ourselves, shall I flatter the rest? God forbid.

2. Church patrons; who instead of Levites to divide the word, put in Gibeonites not worthy to divide wood. Their question to him that moves them for a living, is Judas's, What wilt thou give? Let their end be Judas's, despair and a halter. God gave him a halter. They that ask the same question, why should they not receive the same answer? Sacrilege is the highest theft; and by their own confession, the thief is worthy of a halter. They are in some kind worse than Judas; he sold the body, they sell souls: his barter bought but a pot-ter's field for burial; theirs doth make the church Aceldama, a field of blood, for slaughter. Besides all their other condemnable traffic, they shall answer for soul-blood at the day of judgment, Rev. xviii. 13.

3. For magistrates and judges, they have their practices too. Isaiah calls the unjust ones, the "companions of thieves," Isa. i. 23. Why? for taking purses of travellers? No, but for taking bribes in their chambers. The thief hath as much right to the one, as the judge to the other. They plead gift; and what is freer? So the true man gives his purse to the thief, to save his life; and the client gives his money to the judge, to save his living. This sin is able to turn Guild Hall into Shooters Hill, and make Westminster Hall more dangerous than Salisbury Plain. They cry, Give, Hos. iv. 18; and the thief says but, Deliver; and what is the difference betwixt Give and Deliver? Yet Give sits on the bench, while poor Deliver stands at the bar. If places of judicature were to be bought for money, (and I would to God they never had been so,) we have them among us, that would buy them up by the wholesale, and make them away again by retail.

4. Covetous lawyers have their practices too. See, thy matters are good: so Absalom stole the people's hearts, so these steal their purses. Shall I say with the apostle, "Such were some of you?" 1 Cor. vi. 11. No, such are some of you.

He is a dissembling chapman, that says of a good commodity, It is naught; and he is a dissembling lawyer that says of a naughty cause, It is good. Tertullists will plead against Paul, and Abiezrites for Baal; such lawyers are advocates against Christ, and Christ will be no Advocate for them. It is a proverb not more old than true: Logic, the law, and the Switzers may be hired to fight for any body.

I must omit many practices of covetousness. As that of the covetous gamester; who when he wins, plays the thief with another, and losing is a thief to himself. Or the oppressing landlord, who while he makes his tenants beggars, makes himself a fool: Thou fool, when thy soul is snatched away, whose shall these things be? Luke xii. 20. Yea, worse; for if he be a fool that lays up but his own goods, find out a name for him that takes away other men's. Or the severe creditor, that useth his debtors as Darius did Daniel; first cast him into the lions' den, and then solicit God for his deliverance; Thy God deliver thee, Dan. vi. 16: so he casts them into prison, and prays God to help them out. I have heard of prisoners, that on their death-bed, when they had scarce one hour to pray for themselves, have spent half of it in cursing their creditors; and instead of their own pardon, have desired their vengeance. It was a fearful condition, yet remarkable; the parties thus cursed falling into such insufferable diseases, that they have been desperately ready to blaspheme God and die.

Or the sacrilegious purloiners of tithes; who fed the rich gluttons of Rome with the fat of bread, and will not allow poor Lazarus of the gospel the very crumbs. Nor is it the fault only of improprators, some of which number are cured for reaping where they never sowed; and do not value a minister so much as they do their horse; with whom, as with men given over to a reprobate sense, there is nothing more to do: for no voice of God can awake them out of their dream, nothing but the archangel's trumpet; at which day they will be found to have impropriated their own souls from Christ. Thieves are broke in upon the remainder. The world is busy about the disquisition of the tenure of tithes; and many are cunninger in this, than in the articles of their reli-

on. But why does custom overbear God's law, un's law, and all? Let this point be argued in the urn of conscience; and if God determine on their les, we have done, much good do it them. I pay hes of all that I have, saith the Pharisee, Luke iii. 12. I should have feared he had lied, but that r Saviour justifies him, even to mint and cummin. Pharisee of Jerusalem was in this an honest man many a citizen of London; yet the Pharisee went hell. The least sheaf the covetous man culls out r God, and what he steals from him he thinks the earest gain.

1. If the usurer were not desperate, I would say mething of his practices too; but the very name is ough to condemn him. He breeds of money to e third generation; and a shilling is not sooner is, than he sets it to beget another. The bear can- ot drink, but he must bite the water; the usurer ever cools his thirst, but his draught is a poor man's state. St. Augustine felt a heavy burden on his onscience, for robbing of a pear-tree in his younger ays; he calls it his perishing, his falling from the ne firmament. (Confess. lib. 2. c. 4.) Usurers rob en of whole orchards, and never grudge at it. A entleman in the country takes in the commons, hich in the city he takes out in commodities; and or his racked rents, he is furnished with rattles. he devil had a serpent to tempt Eve, and the usurer hath a parasite to tempt the young heir: bring im but once to riot, and then he will want powder; nd who should supply him but the usurer? Thus is mind is quite transposed from his original: the usurer furnishes him for the tavern, the tavern for he harlot, the harlot for Satan. If one entice an up apprentice to rob his master, the law makes it felony; f he maintain him being run away, there is a penal- y; and is there no law for him that enticeth a son to rob his father, yea, that shall rob a father of his son, rob God of a soul? Methinks, such injured fathers should put up a bill in parliament against such caterpillars. "This is the heir; come, let us kill him, and the inheritance shall be ours," Mark xii. 7. They are like foxes, that use their wits and their teeth together; they never talk, but they take hold. Bees, of all creatures, cannot abide sheep; because being once got into their wool, they are so entangled that they cannot get out again. Usurers have the countenance of sheep, they look simple, and go plain; you would take them for sheep, but they are sheep-biters. They make no other use of their wool, that is, their wealth, but to snarl and inwrap men; and once in their books, it is hard getting out.

2. For practices of avarice in trade; preventions, interventions, circumventions, adulterate wares, blended mixtures, a weight for the hall and a weight for the stall, a measure to buy with and a measure to sell with; they transcend all numeration. There be certain mystical principles in every science, which cannot be declared; wherein caveat emptor, i. e. let the purchaser be on his guard. Call them what they will, they may all be reduced to fraud, that is the formal, yea, and practical part of them. Gehazi runs after Naaman for a talent of silver and two changes of raiment, with a lie, 2 Kings v. 22. The good Syrian greets the servant in that language wherewith he was dismissed of his master; "Is all well?" So sudden a messenger might seem to argue some strange news; but the breathless Gehazi soon satisfies him, if he will as soon satisfy Gehazi. Had he come for this reward in his own name, as a fee for the prophet's servant, as his gain, so his sin had been less; but he must have a greater sum. Light profit will not content a covetous tradesman; therefore he stretcheth his conscience; as Gehazi belied his master, robbed Naaman, burdened his own soul. Avarice is ever cunning, as having the mother-wit, and the father's wit to help. "Two young men of the sons of the prophets be come from Mount Ephraim." What a sound and formal tale hath he devised, of the number, the place, the quality, the age of his master's guests! The value of his demand was so proportioned, that it might not be unlikely of his master, and yet well enrich himself. I ask you but reason, saith the shopkeeper. But the love of money can never keep good quarter with honesty; there is a mint of fraud in the worldly breast, and it can coin lies as fast as utterance. Covetousness never lodged in the heart alone; if it do not find, it will breed, base companions. We are not to do evil, that good may come of it, Rom. iii. 8; but there is no evil which they will not do, that goods may come of it.

But now what is the end or project of all these practices? To be rich; an impatient desire to be rich. "They that will be rich fall into temptation," &c. 1 Tim. vi. 9. One says, He who wishes to become rich, wishes also to become rich soon. "He that maketh haste to be rich shall not be innocent," Prov. xxviii. 20; yea, sometimes, he shall not be rich; the more haste, the worst speed. Cush runs apace, but through chubby and rough grounds, uneven disadvantages: Ahimaaz outruns him, because he takes the way of the plain. Plain-dealing doth not seldom get more riches, it ever gets more happiness. The spurred horse soonest tires: many a one is so hasty, that he loseth the game. When the wind is strong, and the sails full, then let the mariner beware the rocks. How many had been rich, if they had tarried God's leisure! If Saul will not stay for Samuel, his sacrifice shall do him no good. But now when they will be rich, and God shall not know of it; rich, and never trouble him about it; when fraud is employed as a co-agent of trade, to ripen and forward it, as art helps to improve nature; when the spring of conscience is screwed up to the highest pin, that it is ready to crack; when religion is locked up in an out-room, and forbidden on pain of death to look into the shop or warehouse: then is covetousness in the full practice. The poets feigned Pluto to be the god of riches and of hell, (as if hell and riches had both one master,) and to be lame; yet withal, swift and nimble as fire. When Jupiter sent him to a soldier or scholar, he went limping; but when to one of his mistresses, he flew like lightning. The moral was, The riches that come in God's name, and are sent to honest men, come slowly; but they that come by unjust dealing, flow in apace. He that resolves to be evil, may soon be rich. All the wealth which the worst man hath, is for the matter the gift of heaven; yet for the manner of getting it, millions go to hell. Health cannot come but from God; yet how many have sought and obtained health of the devil! But more safe and welcome is the gain that comes in the slow wain of honesty, than that which comes hurrying in the swift chariot of iniquity.

Thus I have discovered some practices of avarice; but who can declare them all? Not he that hath done them, the covetous; not he that is undone by them, the guiltless; not he that teaches them, Satan himself; but only he that shall judge them, the omniscient God. But to what purpose is all this, if the covetous man will not be found? While the preacher walks in generals, declares the nature of avarice, every man can be the master of his own patience. But descending to particular application, Thou art the man; then he is held to leave his text, and to mistake his auditory. For my own part I profess, that I should be far from Jonah's passion, to vex or fret at it, should God's mercy and your innocence make me this day a liar, and prove all my speeches impertinent; yea, I will pray that it may be so. But when the Pharisees came to Christ with an errand of accusation, John viii. 3, there were at first many sinners; when they had charged the woman with adultery, there appeared but one, ver. 4; but when they all went away convicted by their own consciences, there appeared never a one, ver. 9: but this did plainly show that they were all sinners. Oh that men would ransack their own consciences, and make a stricter inquisition into all the suspected passages and practices of their lives! You shall find this sin full of fetches, pretences, excuses: believe it not, spare it not; shrive it to the proof, arraign it, condemn it, punish it. Punish it in the body by fasting and mortification, punish it in the soul by repentance and contrition, punish it in the purse by works of charity and restitution. Break open your consciences, more rusty than your coffers. The law will not allow of the defendant's bare negation, without witnesses. Thy own word will not be taken before God; let the poor witness for thee that thou art not covetous. Their prayers shall unlock the gates of heaven for thy soul, and their testimony avail thee, when no riches shall, in the day of Christ.

"An heart exercised with covetous practices." This is the disease; now let me ask thy soul two questions. First, wouldst thou perceive the danger of it? Secondly, and then, wouldst thou be cured of it? If so, first consider the effects, then the remedies. The effects are many, and mortal.

1. It ineffectuates the instruments of salvation: covetous thorns choke the seed, it is but cast away. It may breed a swimming, but not a saving knowledge; furnish the head, but not better the heart. Nabal is his name, and fool is his surname; the wisdom of God is shut out of doors, while this folly keeps the house. We wonder that our sermons take no better effect; that among so many arrows, none should hit the mark. But God tells us the reason; "They sit before thee, and hear thy words, but their heart goeth after their covetousness," Ezek. xxxiii. 31. The damps of the earth do not more quench fire, than the love of the earth stifles grace. Neither trees nor grass grow above, where the golden mines are below. If money be centred in the heart, no fruits of goodness can appear in the life. What, look for grace in the covetous? We may as well look for a harvest in a hedge. They do but serve us as they did Christ; when we preach against covetousness, they laugh at us, Luke xvi. 14.

2. It impossibilitates the entrance into heaven. Where the treasure is, there is the heart: no man hath two hearts, or two treasures; the one is but counterfeit, if any at all. The world indeed sometimes falls into men's mouths, but God doth not spill his heavenly riches; he parts not with them without suit, without thanks. He must strive to enter into heaven that misseeth not, and he shall miss of entrance that striveth not. The covetous is like a camel, with a great bunch on his back; heaven-gate must be made higher and broader, or he will hardly get in.

3. It disposeth a man to all sins, be they never so horrid: he is a fit piece of timber for any place in the building of hell: this mercenary soldier will refuse no office in Satan's camp, for booty. Any sin doth prepare and habitually dispose the mind to every sin; but this doth actually transgress the whole decalogue.

1st Commandment, "Thou shalt have no other gods but me." If the covetous have not another god, why does Paul call him an idolater? Either he doth offer sacrifice to his gold, Job xxvi. 24; Hab. i. 16; or if he does not, yet he refuseth no desperate adventure it puts him upon; and obedience is better than sacrifice. One of Jupiter's many names was Money: (August. Civit. Dei, lib. 7. cap. 12.) pagans gave unto their god the name of Money; and the covetous give unto money the worship of God. The Romans had a god which they called Terminus: I fear we have made it a London god and a Westminster god too. The Israelites made a calf, and then danced about it, one calf about another: with no less joy do the covetous adore gold.

2nd, "Thou shalt not worship an image." But mark how the prophet joins them; "Their land is full of silver and gold;" and presently, "their land is full of idols," Isa. ii. 7, 8. It was gain that made Diana so great, and Demetrius to roar and make so great a noise for her. They be the coffer-doctrines that Rome is most violent to justify: masses, which bring in masses of wealth; praying for the dead, which is a trick to prey upon the living; they are somewhat colder for those tenants that do not warm their kitchen: yea, I would that covetousness had not robbed God of his worship among us. How many churches of this land have no better than a ten pound stipendiary, that hath less learning than living, whilst one of another coat goes away with the church's salary!

3rd, "Thou shalt not take the name of God in vain." This the covetous thinks a very vain commandment. What equivocation, oath, lie, blasphemy, perjury, will not he swallow in the sweet broth of commodity? It is a principle in his catechism, Gain is godliness; and he never likes godliness, but when it brings in gain. Sometimes covetousness strips of all religion, at other times religion must be the cloak of covetousness, 1 Thess. ii. 5. "Shall not their substance be ours?" saith Shechem, Gen. xxxiv. 23. So, shall not their custom be ours? Are we brothers at the church, and shall we not be cousins at the shop.

4th, "Remember to keep holy my sabbath." But the covetous thinks, religion makes men idle; the sabbath is one day lost in a week; above seven weeks lost in a year. The people are idle, saith Pharaoh, therefore they cry, Let us go sacrifice, Exod. v. 8; as if men would never think of sacrifice, unless they were idle. Sacrilege hath impropriated God's tenths already; and now covetousness would impropriate his sevenths too. Christ should have neither time nor time, if avarice might have her will. Not to speak of some lawyers' chambers, which on a sabbath afternoon are fuller of clients than some country churches are of suppliants. We read that on the sabbath day Jerusalem was troubled with fish-merchants, Neh. xiii. 16; and does not London abound with drink-merchants? Suppose that these temples of Bacchus are better visited among us, yet what are the suburbs and adjacent villages? When will the sabbath be gone, that we may sell corn? Amos viii. 5. There was some honesty yet in that covetousness; they had the patience to tarry so long. But our borderers cry, When will the sabbath come, that we may have our houses full of citizens, and vent our tipling commodities? So they turn God's sabbath into the sabbath of Bacchus; and make it both a selling day and a swilling day.

5th, "Honour thy parents." The father says of his child, as Abraham did, Oh that Ishmael might live! the covetous son, like Esau, Oh that the days of mourning for my father were come! Hæredis lachrymæ, The heir's tears, are grown into a proverb. This is one practice among the Romish orders, like that of the Pharisees, Mark vii. 11; they must give all their goods to the college, and go as naked into the cloister as they came into the world. Thus their poor parents, that depend on their maintenance, must be empty, that the others' corban may be full; is if the very smell or steam of the sacrifice were enough to give them their dinners. Did we never hear of such unnatural prodigies, that have denied relief to their own parents?

6th, "Thou shalt not kill." Yet this is a common effect of covetousness. He that is greedy of gain, takes away the life of the owners, Prov. i. 19. The lamp is not only put out by pouring on of water, but by not pouring in of oil. Was not the rich man guilty of Lazarus's blood, while he relieved him not? It will grieve those churls, that have either made beggars or not comforted them, to be found at the last day murderers. Dishonest gain is accompanied with blood, saith the prophet, Ezek. xxii. 13. Judas did not so much hate his Master as love the money; yet the love of the money moved him to betray his Master. Naboth will not part with his vineyard, he shall therefore part with his life. He is accused, condemned, stoned, 1 Kings xxi. 13; here is a ready payment for a rich vineyard: Ahab will drink his blood, that he may come to taste his wine. What makes Rome give toleration of murder, by ordaining refuges for wilful blood, but avarice? Murder is condemned by the light of nature, as the barbarians concluded upon Paul, Acts xviii. 4; yet to the golden shore how many fear not to swim through a stream of blood!

7th, "Thou shalt not commit adultery." The curse hath often prevailed more than the person. Do not too many gallants plot how to get into the merchant's bed, rather than how to get out of the merchant's book? Some force themselves to a single life, merely to avoid the charges of the married condition. They that had rather burn in their own sensuality, than quench that fire with an allowed remedy, do (as it were) offer up themselves to Moloch in the burning flames of lust. Thus a covetous father in the marriage of his child, inquires not after virtues, but riches. Abigail signifies, her father's joy, yet she was matched with Nabal and sorrow together. If her father had meant her joy, either in herself or in her life, so unworthy a churl had wooed in vain. But he married her nummo, non viro; i. e. to money, not to a husband. Oh how many a child is thus cast away upon riches!

8th, "Thou shalt not steal." All cozenage is theft; and as one says, Show me a covetous man, and I will in return show you back a thief. Extortions, depopulations, impropriations, enclosures, engrossings, monopolies, with that whole litter of vipers, are bred in the dunghill of covetousness. Now the covetous man may be counselled by his lawyer, that he hath an action against me, for calling him thief. But if we should come to trial, there is a witness within him that would cry, A thief, a thief; his conscience would attach a thief in his own bosom. I could tell you of a eulogy made by an orator of a magistrate, wherein he commended him for being no thief. This, replied another, were a good commendation for a servant; if, besides, he be no runaway. But at the great assizes, he is no lover of riches that shall clear himself from being a thief.

9th, "Thou shalt not bear false witness." But he that scruples not at false dealing, will never stick at false accusing. The tongue is an ill apprentice to the covetous heart, if it cannot lend the false hand a lie or an oath. I know there be hackney consciences, knights of the post, and flatterers that admire persons for advantage, Jude 16, as dogs fawn for a crust. But does not the tradesman, that tells me a tale in my ear, while he cuts a hole in my purse, deceive me with a false testimony? "Lest I be poor, and steal, and take the name of my God in vain," Prov. xxx.

9. Poor and steal: poverty brings in robbery. Steal, and take the name of God in vain: robbery brings on perjury. The lawyer that pleads his client's cause against his own conscience, is hired by covetousness to bear a false witness.

10th, "Thou shalt not covet that which is thy neighbour's." But if the covetous man's hands were as able as his wishes be nimble, like another Adam, he would have the whole world to himself. They talk of the philosopher's stone, but there is no such thing in the nature of things, unless it be a covetous man's heart. That is of a chymical virtue, and would turn all into gold, a perpetual limbeck that labours of projection; till on the sudden the glass breaks and all flies out in smoke. He doth wish the whole earth were mines and Indies; the ocean a sea of gold, as St. John calls it a sea of glass. If every fish had as much money in it as St. Peter's, he would quickly turn fisherman. Heaven itself cannot tempt him, unless it were all gold, and every star a diamond. Pope Benedict XII. refused to make another cardinal, unless he could make another world; for as that was not sufficient for his cardinal, so one is too little for the covetous. If the whole world were thrown as a sop into their mouths, it would not content avarice.

Thus is he a transgressor of every law. Go now, ye fools, and flatter yourselves that you are no atheists, no idolaters, no blasphemers, no sabbath profaners, no parent contemnors, no murderers, adulterers, thieves, nor liars; you have been all these, are all these, or may be all these, or whatsoever else Satan will, if you continue covetous. The opinion of honesty is put on this sin through the world, An honest man, but something hard; but yet in the Judge's sentence, the adulterer and thief are as honest men. Read 1 Cor. vi. 10, and Eph. v. 5. There you may learn what to think of his honesty. He is got into the midst of that desperate throng, that shall never see the face of God. We rank him with aldermen and gentlemen, give him the best offices, the highest room at the table and pew in the church: God reckons him amongst harlots, and blasphemers, and thieves, and dogs, which be indeed his companions. Certainly, if such a man be honest, there are abundance of honest men in hell. We are loth to keep company with swearers, and harlots, and drunkards; but we have as great a charge of separation from the covetous. Eat not with him, 1 Cor. v. 11: and Solomon gives the reason; because he hath an evil eye, Prov. xxiii. 7, that wisheth a man choked when he bids much good do it him: when his guests are gone, he talks how much this man did eat, and how fast the other called for drink; and feeds his family with the mouldy remnants a month after. If such muck-worms were as odious to the rest as they are to me, they should appear in the street like owls, with whom no honest man will converse. Why should I prefer him before a piece of copper, that prefers a piece of gold before my Maker.

It is time to come to the remedies of this desperate disease; and to stop that violence and precipitation, wherewith we are transported to these rotten inconsistencies.

1. Faith overcomes the world, 1 John v. 4. What, doth it bring the riches of it into our coffers? No, but it casts the love of it out of our hearts. The world is not overcome by gaining, but by despising it. As covetousness is an alchymist, that turns gold into God, so faith makes Christ unto our souls All in all. The more hold a man takes of the world, the more he loseth hold of the Lord. Covetous men cleave to the world as long as they can; but when that staff breaks, then to the Lord. Extremity of distress will send the profanest to God; as the drowning man stretcheth out his hand to that bough, which he contemned while he stood safe on shore. So Saul retired himself to inquire of the Lord, but he answered him not, 1 Sam. xxviii. 6. It is an unreasonable inequality, to hope to find God at our command when we would not be at his; to look that he should regard our voice in trouble, that would not regard his voice in peace. "Let your conversation be without covetousness." Why? Because "he hath said, I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee," Heb. xiii. 5. We credit the promise of a wealthy and trusty friend; yet man may lie, man may die, man may be unable to help himself. God is too constant to be changed, too potent to be crossed, too wise to be deceived. I will never leave thee; not in a dear year, not in age, not in sickness, not in death: they that believe this cannot be covetous. The wealth thou keepest, is not thine own, but God's: he must give it thee out of thine own chest; and if thou hast little, cannot he give it thee out of another's chest as well?

2. Content with our own condition: he that hath wrought his heart to this happy resolution, hath furnished Satan of a deadly weapon. The king is forbidden to multiply to himself silver and gold, Deut. xvii. 17; yet who hath greater uses, or fairer pretences, for this multiplying, than a king? Solomon says there be four things that cry Never enough, Prov. xxx. 15; and we may add a fifth, the covetous heart, that shall eat with them all four, and yet rise up with a Never enough. Esau was an honest man to thousands of these; for Esau had enough, Gen. xxxiii. 9. Naboth's vineyard lay too near Jezebel's court, 1 Kings xxi. 2, it had been better for him in the wilderness. The vicinity did not make it more commodious to the owner than envious to the beholder. It was now the perpetual object of an evil eye; his vines grew too near the smoke of that tyrant's chimneys, too much within the prospect of Ahab's window. The sight of it breeds those desires, that can neither safely be denied nor honestly satisfied. Eminence is still joined with peril, obscurity with peace. An inheritance needs no worse inconvenience, than the covetous eye of a great neighbour. There is no such annoyance belongs to a house, as an Ahab's avarice. He had vineyards enough of his own, but all their grapes were sour to Naboth's. His heart covets it, his tongue demands it, the possessor denies it, he grows sick upon it, Naboth must bleed for it, and then he will have it. Ahab was sick of a pleurisy, and Naboth must be let blood to cure him. Oh the impotent and insatiate desire of avarice! what is there that can make a man rich, but content! Ahab was lord and king of all the territories of Israel; Naboth is the owner of one poor vineyard; yet Ahab can have no joy of all Israel, if Naboth enjoy his vineyard. Besides Samaria, Ahab was lord paramount of Damascus, and all Syria; conqueror of him that was attended with two and thirty kings. Naboth was a plain townsman of Jezreel; the good husband of a little vineyard. Whether is the richer? Naboth wisheth for nothing of Ahab's; Ahab longeth for something of Naboth's, and cannot brook a repulse. Riches and poverty is more in the heart than in the hand: he is wealthy that is contented, he is poor that wants it. O poor Ahab, that carest not for thine own large possessions, because thou mayst not have another's. O rich Naboth, that carest not for all the dominions of Ahab, so thou mayst enjoy thine own.

3. Look up to the promised land; if but one glimpe of those heavenly treasures were presented to our eyes, how scornfully would we behold the world, and call it, as Hiram did the cities given him by Solomon, in indignation, Cabul, 1 Kings ix. 13, a miry or dirty land! Thou lovest gold; there is a city whose streets be gold, Rev. xxi. 21. Who would be raking in the kennels of the earth, that might gather pearls out of those crystalline streams of joy? Our Head is in heaven; what makes our hearts upon earth? It is fit the head and the heart should go together. As her Head went before the church, so his heart should go before the Christian. (August.) We cannot yet get up our bodies, let us send up our hearts. The whole of us will follow, whither some part of us has gone before. The way to mortify covetousness, is to "lay hold on eternal life," 1 Tim. vi. 19. The looser hold we have of the world, the less hold the world shall have of us; and the more we fasten above, we loosen below. "Men of the world have their portion in this life," Psal. xvii. 14; but my teeth shall not water at their dainties.

4. Let us free ourselves from a false opinion of riches: we think they will satisfy us, and they cannot. The heart shall be satisfied with gold, when the body is contented with wind; yea, does not aurum, gold, rather make avarum, a covetous man? St. Augustine (Confess. l. 6. c. 6.) tells of an oration which he made to the emperor; wherein he exceedingly pleased him, because he exceedingly praised him; and was so eloquent in his commendation, that all the hearers fell into commendation of that eloquence. But for his reward, it was like ours; for our good words, the people return us only good words again: as when a poet presented Augustus with Greek verses, he for his reward gave him Greek verses again. Home he came, and by the way in a green meadow he spied a poor beggar, well lined with strong drink, frisking, and singing, and dancing, and taking care for nothing. Whereupon he thus sighed; What is riches, that it should not give so much content as beggary! Miserable is that life, wherein none are happy but the miserable. All our labour for wealth, is but care and travail, for travail and care. He that hunts this game in the world's forest puts up more beasts than he well knows how to be shut of. This beggar hath not burnt candles all night a month together, he made no oration to the emperor to-day, yet he is merry. His purse hath no crowns, his flesh wears rags, yet he is jocund: sure there is no art leading to felicity, but the art of beggary. The meditation of this beggarly content wrought that learned man to provide for the posterity of his soul unperishing riches. Thus though the beggar had more joy than Augustine, yet St. Augustine had more joy than the beggar. With how different aspects and affects do diverse men look upon the world! The prophet and his man did not look upon the Syrian treasure with the same eyes, 2 Kings v. The one with the eye of contempt, the other of admiration: the one refuseth it offered, the other runs after it forbidden. I will destroy the whole land, and seekest thou great things for thyself? Jer. xlv. 5. Alas, they are, as one calls them, but splendid punishments, the vomitings of fortune. If they, like true servants, could continue, yet we, like frail masters, must vanish.

5. Lastly, charity. The sheep is overladen with wool if it be never shorn; and no coat is made for the child while it grows there. The worldling's wealth is too heavy a burden for him; let him be clipped, and his wool then may do much good. Do good, and distribute, 1 Tim. vi. 18. Call your riches what you will, you shall never find them to be goods till you do good with them. Men are mistaken in riches: God is called rich, not for his money, but for his mercy; not for having good, but for doing good. "The same Lord over all is rich unto all that call upon him," Rom. x. 12. Wherein rich? not in being Lord of all, so much as in doing good to all. Thus covet to be rich; rich in faith, rich in God, rich in good works. It was the worldling's folly, to think that wealth consisted in having goods, not in doing good. "So is he that layeth up treasure for himself, and is not rich toward God," Luke xii. 21: so, that is, as very a fool as he was. Covetousness is that iniquity, which hath cast upon riches that reproachful title, to be called, The riches of iniquity. This inconvenience can only be helped by charity; make you friends of that mammon. Otherwise, a treasure of riches gathered and hoarded this day, is but a treasure of vengeance gathered and hoarded against the last day, Jam. v. 3. Whereas he that gets to give, doth give to keep. Thou fearest to lose thy money by giving it, and yet fearest not to lose thyself by keeping it. Every man shall leave his riches behind him, and every man shall find them again. They that have done good with them, shall find them safe in heaven, with the advantage of glory; they that hoarded them here, shall find them again too, and with usury; but the superaddition is the plague of conscience, and eternity of torments.

God hath appointed himself the rewarder of alms, even to a cup of water, Matt. x. 42; and a punisher of covetousness, even to the want of a drop of water, Luke xvi. 24. Dives would not give Lazarus a crumb of bread, though it might save his life; and Lazarus must not bring Dives a drop of water, though it might save his soul. Disused riches do not more rust in the coffer, than in the conscience, they be not only corrupted, but corrupting. Moisture was not given to the springs, that they should remain in the places where they were bred; but to run along in their watery channels, and to spend themselves upon the dry and barren grounds. Plato had a conceit, that nature at first was delivered of two daughters, Plenty and Poverty: that Need might be beholden to Plenty, for supply to her indigence; and Fulness to Poverty, for ease of her abundance. The rich man was made for the poor, and the poor for the rich. It belongs to the poor to ask, the rich to bestow. (August.) Rich niggards are like blessed thistles; when death hath cropped them, some water may be distilled out of them, medicinal to the disease of poverty.

Rich men should imitate Job, as he did the eagle, who is so honourable, that he will not eat his prey alone. The conceit that keeps rich men from giving, is a faithless fear that they shall want before they die. Therefore God often takes them away in the midst of their mammon; and so rids them of what they were afraid, and provides for others whereof they have need. It is easy for avarice to find an excuse to save the purse: the widow of Sarepta could have answered the prophet, with her own want; as the Macedonians could the apostle, that they had poor enough of their own, to take up their relief; yet they did not. "God loveth a cheerful giver," 2 Cor. ix. 7. An alms given with a grudging hand, doth not only lose all reward, but deserveth no pardon. By laying out your money, you shall increase your righteousness: thy righteousness shall shine forth as the sun, when the Sun of righteousness shines forth in his glory. Otherwise, Audiant irrogare supplicia, qui nolunt erogare subsidia, as one saith, Let them look for the infliction of punishments, that will not apply themselves to the bestowal of relief. Men receive but ten for the surplussage of a hundred below: there shall be a hundred for ten repaid hereafter. What do we give, but that which was first given us, and we cannot keep? "He hath dispersed, he hath given to the poor; his righteousness endureth for ever," Psal. cxii. 9. The good man hath both riches and righteousness; he gives his riches, his righteousness he shall keep for ever. Good deeds derived from faith, are fortifications against Satan: what shall become of those cities, that have no such walls? They are a tribute we owe unto God, for defending us from our enemies, and planting peace in our consciences: he requires now no burnt-offerings nor sacrifices, but the fruits of mercy. Thus our religion affords us more, and costs us less; yet when the Lord gives us the whole harvest, we scarce allow him the very gleanings. The idolatrous Gentiles shall condemn us; for they bestowed their wealth in fanes, and shrines, and images; whereas we to the living images of the true God will not give our superfluities. Our devotion can away with any thing, rather than this same pharisaical almsgiving. Yet the cart that is overladen and crammed too full of sheaves, hath a tail that will scatter: let those full-gorged worldlings take heed, lest hogs come to glean after their cart's tail, and their heirs be made wards to usurers. "Let the extortioner catch all that he hath," Psal. cix. 11. It may be for his soul, he gives it gone; but his goods, he hopes, shall last: the extortioner says nay to that; and his children shall not have enough left to keep them in prison. The miser is the thieves' mark; if he would prevent robbing, let him be bountiful. The carle comes to distress, and no man pities him. Be charitable, that you may save your heirs from undoing. If there be in your bags but one shilling that should have been the poor's, that shilling shall be the consumption of all its fellows.

But after all this, he will build an hospital. Will he? Now blessing on him: when he hath taken away a man's land and inheritance, he will give him a staff to walk withal. By oppression he hath hedged in to himself great pastures, and now he will allow the owner the running of a nag. When I pass by an hospital built by a moneymonger, methinks I see the goodly monument of a cruel devotion. He sets a dozen beggars to pray for him, that God would forgive him the making of a thousand. And not seldom lewd persons are chosen into those places; whose prayers in the chapel cannot so much avail him, as their curses out of it make against him. In the law, God abhorred that offering, which was the price of a dog, or the hire of a harlot. He that thinks to be excused by giving part of his robberies, goes about to corrupt God with presents, and calls him in to take part of the spoil. But why doth Christ then say, Make you friends of your unrighteous mammon? Luke xvi. 9. I answer; He calls them not evil, because they were so much gotten by evil means, as were the baits of evil motions; otherwise, first wrongs should be satisfied, before friends be purchased. The apostle's rule is, first to labour honestly for wealth, and then to give to him that needeth, Eph. iv. 28. Quamvis de parvo, tamen de justo, de proprio, says one; i. e. Although out of a little, yet out of what is honestly got, and is your own. It is true, that a pound does the poor more good than a penny; yet a well-earned penny shall do the giver more good than ill-gotten thousands.

But there be some that hold it idle to do but so well, with what they got so ill. He that hath nothing to do with his money but build churches, they count him a fool. Or if the bench of penny-fathers do not censure his wisdom, yet they will term him a vain-glorious fellow. Tut, almshouses will make good stables; and being let out in tenements, yield a round sum by the year. A strong closet, and a good iron hutch, is worth twenty of your hospitals. These chuffs will contribute something toward the building of a jail, to deter thieves; or of a gallows, to execute them; but for a church or an almshouse, they see no need of those. Thus do they teach God to deny themselves mercy; for he that demands mercy, and shows none, ruins the bridge over which himself is to pass. We read of a lad that had five barley loaves in a basket, which Jesus took and distributed to the people, John vi. 9. Much goods are too heavy for the covetous, as the loaves were for the boy. Being shut up they will burden, being opened they will relieve: let them open the basket, and divide them among the poor. This is a special medicine, to breathe out the corrupt blood of covetousness.

"Cursed children." Children of cursing, a Hebraism, which may be taken either actively or passively; for they carry a curse about them, whosoever they go; and they bring a curse along with them, whithersoever they come. Covetousness is the root of all evils, not only criminal, but penal. There be innumerable woes against it, and sooner or later they shall overtake it. "I have smitten mine hand at thy dishonest gain," Ezek. xxii. 13; there the covetous man is but threatened. "For the iniquity of his covetousness was I wroth, and smote him," Isa. lvii. 17; there he is plagued. God doth not only smite his hands at him, but he smites at him with his hands. He is in Laodicea's case, Rev. iii. 17; wretched in getting, poor in not using, blind in keeping, naked in leaving, miserable in accounting.

1. Cursed not seldom in his body, Job xx. 20; which restless calamity is but a whip of his own making. I might instance Achan's heap of stones, Balaam's sword in his bowels, Judas's halter about his neck, one piece more to his thirty; but look upon Gehazi for all, 2 Kings v. 20. The prophet and the Syrian are parted; only Gehazi could not so take his leave; his heart was mailed up in one of Naaman's portmanteaus, and he must after to fetch it. He thinks his master too kind, or too simple, in refusing so just a present; himself will be wiser, thrifter. Desire hastens his pace; he does not go, but run after his booty. He hath it with advantage, two for one; and now pleaseth himself with the waking dreams of what land he might purchase, how well he was provided for, to live at ease. What says his master to it? "The leprosy of Naaman cleave unto thee, and to thy seed for ever;" the act overtakes the word; "he went out from his presence a leper as white as snow," ver. 27. A woeful change hath Gehazi made with Naaman. Naaman came a leper, returned a disciple; Gehazi came a disciple, returned a leper. Naaman left behind him his disease and his money; Gehazi takes up both his money and his disease. The rest of his days he shall wear out in pain, and shame, and sorrow. He hath two changes of raiment for his body; but is not the body better than raiment? He wears Naaman's double livery, both of apparel and leprosy. He shall never look upon himself, but think on Naaman; and, O ye covetous, when you see yourselves, think upon Gehazi.

2. Cursed in his goods, which are his gods. First, he shall never have comfort in them: the curse of that unbelieving prince shall fall upon him, 2 Kings vii. 19; he shall see his own abundance, never taste it. Like the Indians that are slaves to the Spanish mines, he is a man condemned to the mines. "In the fulness of his sufficiency he shall be in straits," Job xx. 22. Dives in miseriis, miser in divitiis; i. e. Rich in miseries, miserable in riches. Other sinners that have forfeited heaven, yet receive some pleasure on earth; but the covetous deprives himself of this world, and God will deprive him of the world to come; so he enjoys neither: is not this a curse? But suppose the fool thinks it none; therefore, secondly, he shall not long keep his wealth. "He shall leave it in the midst of his days, and at his end shall be a fool," Jer. xvii. 11. It is a hell to him to leave his riches at the end of his days; what is it then to lose them in the midst! The Sapiens of Africa are buried with all their gold about them; and worldlings would either not die at all, or else be buried so. If he must be a beggar in the midst, what shall he be at the end of his days? A fool; he shall lose both his goods and his wits. Thus saith Augustine, Prædo minoris erit præda majoris; i. e. The prey on the lesser will be the prey of the greater. "There shall none of his meat be left, therefore shall no man look for his goods," Job xx. 21.

3. Cursed in his posterity. All his project and drift is to leave his children an inheritance on earth, though he forfeit his own in heaven: lo, even this also God disappoints. As the father was a rich beggar, the children shall be poor gentlemen. What got Gehazi's posterity by their father's covetousness, but an hereditary leprosy. He "covets an evil covetousness to his house," Hab. ii. 9. Indeed his desire is of good, but the event of that desire turns to evil; and he consults shame to his house, ver. 10, not, as he supposed, honour. "His children shall seek to please the poor," Job xx. 10; flatter the needy, and beg even of beggars: see now what his gentlemen come to. "God hath given him riches," saith Solomon, but not "power to eat thereof," Eccl. vi. 2. It may be so, but the more he spares, the more he leaves for his children: no, but a stranger shall eat it. Parents, be good to your children; let not my breath seem strange to you, (to speak in Job's phrase,) that entreat for the children of your own loins, Job xix. 17. Do not covet to leave them so much, that you disinherit them of all. There is no surer way to undo them, than by undoing others for them.

4. Cursed in his soul: he is in little better case on earth, than that rich miser was in hell, burning in desire of that drop of water, which never shall be granted him, content. The covetous hath no inheritance in the kingdom of God, Eph. v. 5. No inheritance there? and none here neither? In what country then lies this man's purchase? In a place which is called, "without," Rev. xxii. 15, the territory of hell. After all his comings-in, he shall be sure of that to come into the bargain: this is that which makes up his revenges.

Now he that is so well practised in casting up parcels, so much in his counting-house, let him look over these particulars, and sum up his gains. A curse upon his body, upon his goods, a curse upon his children, upon his own soul; here is his profit: would not this gain make a man covetous? A man's soul in exchange for the whole world, were but a hard bargain, Matt. xvi. 26. Thou fool, they shall fetch away thy soul from thee; and then whose shall these be? Luke xii. 20; yea, whose shalt thou be? Lord, give us nothing in this world that may prevent our happiness in the world to come; let us rather be beggars than not saints.

To take yet a fuller view of this curse, let me give you a short character of the covetous man. He is cursed to be a servant of servants; the saints' drudge is his saint. He shrines his god in his coffer, and there locks up his heart for a perpetual sacrifice to it. Whereas the true God keepeth his, he will keep his god; and gives to a piece of earth that veneration which he denies to his Maker. Yet he dares not trust either any other god, or his own; but fears lest thieves should put him to Micah's complaint, "Ye have taken away my gods, and what have I more?" Judg. xviii. 24. O poor god, that cannot keep itself from stealing! He fears a thief worse than Satan; yea, he will be beholden to Satan for a spell to save him from the thief. In his unquiet sleep he dreams of burglary; and is not sure that even now he barred the door. If his conscience ever go about to prejudice his profit, he condemns it for a common barrator. He laughs at poor men's curses; and before he dies, curseth himself to boot.

The ancients have compared covetous men to swine; of all beasts, the ejected demons chose to enter into them; and still they affect those swinish churls, that insatiately swill up the draff of the world. One wittily observes, that if the Jews had not been forbidden by the law, yet nature itself would have dissuaded them from eating swine's flesh; lest one hog should eat another. Worldlings are swine, carrying their faces downward, not looking up to the tree whence comes their mast; wallowing in muck, digging up the earth, if they be not ringed by the law for rooting; insatiable in devouring, hoinish and grunting, and grudging any neighbourhood. The unthrif with his riotous courses, doth but still feed swine. It is not meet to give the children's bread to dogs, Matt. xv. 26; much less to hogs. By their unnatural dealing in the world, you would not think they came naturally into the world. Their sin is so impatient of the delay of vengeance, as if they would pluck the stern of the world out of God's hand, till he had confounded them. Oppression is the price of blood: the Jews would not put it into their treasury; these dare put it into their patrimony. There is no religion in them, but the love of money: by fraud and perjury they had confiscated their souls long ago. Any doctrine is welcome to them, but that which beats upon good works. They stick not, with the sages, to fall down and worship Christ, but they cannot abide to present him with their gold. Not to meddle or make with a man, is a high favour, for which (they look) God and the world should be beholden to them. They think all charity to their neighbour consists in bidding him Good morrow. How grossly do they cheat themselves! The prince requires not only that his laws be not contradicted, but not violated. Go, ye cursed, because ye did not give, Matt. xxv. 41, 42: you do not hear them taxed for condemning charity in others, but for not performing it themselves.

All their devotion consists in a few abrupt graces; God be praised, Much good do it you. And if any man speak against unjust dealing, they stand not to maintain their copyhold; but, We are all naught, God amend us: and stop the preacher's mouth with, Sir, I drink to you: but God's mouth will not be stopped so. Being asked at the day of judgment, From whence come you? they must answer in Satan's language, From compassing the earth; for heaven they have not compassed. All their good deeds be only good words, but God's words are deeds: Go, ye cursed. He that spake the word, and made heaven and earth, shall but speak the word, and send them to hell. Nec volunt esse pauperes, nec haberi divites; i. e. They would neither be poor, nor yet be accounted rich. To avoid a subsidy, they complain of poverty; and when they complain of want, they most fear that which they complain to have. Thus do they live in anguish, to die upon the rack, and to finish their course in everlasting unhappiness. Now as you like this cursedness, you may go on in covetousness. It is pity but the world should love him, that will love the world upon these conditions. But for ourselves, let us impartially scourge this mammon out of our temples: Christ did not die to purchase this world for us; let us not lose that which he purchased, to purchase that which he contemned. No, Lord, thou hast prepared mansions for us, prepare us for those mansions; that by being rich in grace, we may come to be rich in glory. Amen.

Which have forsaken the right way, and are gone astray, following the way of Balaam the son of Bosor, who loved the wages of unrighteousness.

As a man hath but two hands, and but two feet; so he hath but two kinds of ways for those feet, but two sorts of works for those hands. His deeds be either good or bad, his way is either right or wrong, and his end will be either heaven or hell. The right way is hard to pass, and not easy to find; therefore God gives us his word for a guide, and his grace for an assistant. But the wrong way is so familiar, that we know it from our childhood; and so easy, that we run it by nature. We need not be taught it, for if we be not taught the other, we will never forsake it. Besides the easiness, that it is without difficulty; the smoothness, without rubs; the advantage, down a hill, without pains; it is numerous, and multiplies itself into great variety. The evil of sin: sin is the head or beginning of it; and this divides itself into three, "the lust of the flesh, lust of the eyes, and pride of life," 1 John ii. 16; and those three into three thousand. Now the concluding term where they all meet, is the evil of punishment: So that if a sinner doth not like one way, he may take another; if he cares not for excess, he may admit oppression; there is choice enough: any of all those millions of obliquities is able to bring him to hell; that rendezvous and common term where all transgressions have appointed to meet. Satan is called the god of this world, as it were, lord of the soil, having a commission to take up those wefts and strays, that wilfully straggle from the way of truth, and keep not the precincts wherein God hath bounded them.

First, these sorcerers, like vagabonds, abjure all honest callings, and turn their backs upon the place where they are set to work; refusing the path of God's commandments, they forsake the right way. Secondly, next, being set a wandering, all the world is their scope: which way soever they travel, they cannot be out of their way; be it treachery, blasphemy, uncleanness, what it will, all is their own. They balk no wrong way, all their care is to miss the right; they are gone astray. Thirdly, then they have their captain, whose exemplary steps they must follow; Balaam the grand rogue, the master rebel, the king of outlaws; this is their leader; following Balaam. Fourthly, and lastly, though the great commander of all be not expressed, yet he is insinuated, Satan; under whose colours they all march, move, and remove as he appoints: and the reward, which this black guard, this tattered regiment, serve him for, is wages; and that not bare pay, so much wages for so much work, but above just allowance, it must be the wages of unrighteousness. Thus now they have taken press-money, and put themselves into the army; let us see how they follow their captain, and he his commander; they Balaam, and Balaam Satan.

They "have forsaken the right way." This is their

apostacy. The right way is the signified will of God; and whatsoever repugneth that, is the wrong. The will of God is either consilium cordis, or verbum oris; i. e. the counsel of his heart, or the word of his mouth: the former, quod vult fieri de nobis; the other, quod vult fieri a nobis; i. e. what he wills to be done with us, and what he wills to be done by us. The first we cannot break, the latter we now cannot keep. This manifest will of God was first dictated to man by nature, when God engraved his image in the table of his heart. Adam obscured this image, but (through God's mercy) saved the tablet. But now because the letters which he had written in our tables of flesh, were almost grown out, like some ancient characters in the barks of trees, he saw it time to write them in tables of stone, whose hardness should not be capable of alteration. It was plain, that the squared stone would be more faithful and retentive, than our unsquared heart. There never was so precious a monument, as the law written with God's own hand. They that so dote on the beggarly relics of their imaginary saints, how would they have adored this! If we did see but the stone that was Jacob's pillow, or one of those upon which Jesus sat, a piece of Jacob's well, we would look upon it with more than ordinary respect. With what admiration then should we have beheld that stone, which was hewn and written with the very finger of God! If we have but a manuscript written by the hand of some famous man, we lay it up among our choicest jewels; what reverence then should we have given to the hand-writing of the Almighty! The stone is lost, the hand-writing remains; yea, even the hand-writing is nailed to the cross, so that it hath lost the condemning power, though not the commanding power. The book is miscarried, the contents are left as a royal law; whereby the whole world should be governed, whereby the whole world shall be judged.

This is the right way; from which they that perversely wander, destroy their own souls. We read of the wicked, that they cast the law of God behind them, Psal. l. 17; and we read of Moses, that he did cast the law of God from him, and broke the tables. Yet God forgave the latter, and condemns the former. Moses in a holy zeal broke but the material books, they in a rebellious malice break the spiritual contents. The law then is the right way; Thy commandments are right, Psal. xix. 8; therefore given us as infallible rules to guide all our actions by. Inquire for the old way, which is the good way, and walk in it, Jer. vi. 16. The will of God is the rule of rectitude; whatsoever swerves from that is erratic, whether in opinion or practice. "Wherewithal shall a young man cleanse his way?" or an old man his; prince or subject, theirs; noble or vulgar, rich or poor, theirs? Even by ruling themselves after thy word, Psal. cxix. 9. But, alas, who is able to keep this way without some deviations? It is for these sacred cherubims, to have "straight feet," Ezek. i. 7. We have a right way, but not straight feet; in many things we sin all. "Thou hast commanded us to keep thy precepts diligently," Psal. cxix. 4: this is God's imperative. "O that my ways were directed to keep thy statutes!" ver. 5: this should be our optative. But how if we endeavour to go right, and cannot, is there no help? Yes, there is a way within the way, (like the ecliptic line within the zodiac,) an evangelical way of mercy to correct the rigour of the legal. "I am the way," saith Christ, John xiv. 6: this is the right way indeed. We cannot walk in the law, unless the gospel help us; and the gospel will do us no good, unless we strive to walk in the law, Gal. iii. 21, 22. Christ is both our Saviour and our King: first, we must believe in that promise which he hath given to save us; and next, give obedience to that law whereby he will govern us. This is that entire rule; "and as many as walk according to this rule, peace be on them, and mercy," Gal. vi. 16. "Lord, to whom shall we go? thou hast the word of eternal life," John vi. 68: not only the word of authority to command, nor the word of wisdom to direct, nor the word of power to convert, nor the word of grace to comfort, but also the word of eternal life to make us perfectly blessed.

They "have forsaken the right way." Therefore they once had it; no man can be said to leave that thing which he never knew. To refuse a thing, implies a present offer; but to forsake it, argues a former acceptance. So the prodigal forsook his father's house for a strange country, his father's household for strange company, his father's favour for a bag of money, his father's bread for the husks of beans: these if he had not enjoyed, he could not have forsaken. Here is an image of apostacy, whether of faith or of manners; which after a knowledge and approbation of the right way, is a deliberate election of the wrong. To begin is the lot of many, to finish, the lot of few, says Chrysostom. There be some that go forward in the ways of obedience; that in spite of all crosses and bruises, like good ships, maintain their course; that are not disheartened through the ill success of one adventure: but redit ad tumidas naufraga puppis aquas; i. e. the shipwrecked vessel returns to the swelling waves. In Gideon's army, all the faint-hearted were commanded to stay at home, Judg. vii. 3: no cowards get into the kingdom of heaven. Some are in many minds and moods, now forward, then backward; full of motions and commotions, ebbing and flowing, like Euripus, seven times a day. Some make neither forward nor backward; neither ebb nor flow, like the Dead Sea; but are betwixt the religious and the irreligious, just standing water. But these go altogether backward, and forsake the right way, as their most offensive eyesore: so, like a man out of the way, the faster they run, the further off.

They "have forsaken the right way." Perseverance is the crown of all graces. Aaron's garment had pomegranates in the skirt; the pomegranate hath the form of a crown, above all fruits; and this hung at the end of his vesture, to show that the end crowns all. The righteous man's "leaf shall not wither," Psal. i. 3; it is the note of the gloss, Lapsus foliorum, mortificatio arborum. The fall of the leaves is the killing of the trees. Happy repentance is sorry for ill beginnings; but to dislike good beginnings is an unhappy repentance. To divert ourselves from virtue, as the Jew put away his wife, without cause, is base ingratitude. Virtue seems to give a man this charge, when she first offers herself, Either never choose me, or never lose me. Not to know the right way, is an unblest ignorance; but it is a cursed disobedience, after knowledge to forsake it. To begin in the Spirit, and end in the flesh, was, in Paul's sense, folly, Gal. iii. 3; but to begin with grace, and end with wickedness, is malicious impiety. Yet how many have begun and proceeded well, that have shamed the stage with their last act! Solomon's younger years were studious and full of wisdom; his age was licentious and full of misgovernment, 1 Kings xi. 4. The philosopher could say, If every man must have a fit of madness, it is less unhappy to fall in youth; but certainly it is best not to be mad at all. Youth is petulant, wherein as to fall is easy, so these falls are relieved with pity. But inordinate errors are both most unseasonable and most intolerable in old age. The childhood of old men is the sport of the young, one says. Solomon was the beloved of God, the oracle, the miracle of wisdom, in youth: who would not have expected, that the blossoms of so hopeful a spring should have yielded goodly and pleasant fruit in the autumn? Yet see, in his old age he forsook the right way. There is no time that can have security from sin, while it carries the sin of security about it. If any age were safe from this danger, it is the last. If any man's last days were safe, old David had not fallen. Youth is impetuous, middle age stubborn, old age covetous, all dangerous. It is no presuming upon time, or means, or strength: if God uphold us not, we cannot stand; if he do uphold us, we cannot fall. When we are at our full strength, it is good to be weak in ourselves; when at our weakest, to be strong in Him, in whom we can do all things. O blessed conscience in which is found this testimony, we have not forsaken the way of the Lord! All virtues run in the race, one only receiveth the garland, the image of most happy eternity, happy continuance. He that continues unto the end shall be saved, Matt. x. 22.

They "have forsaken." This is more than a mere aberration, of weakness; even a resolute, dissolute, absolute renouncing of the right way; without so much as a farewell to it, or a vouchsafing so much as once to look back upon it: not an aberration from, but rather an abjuration of, piety. When the wicked fall out with God, they betake themselves to new saints, or rather new devils; hardness of heart, contempt of God, neglect of salvation. "Behold, this evil is of the Lord; what should I wait for the Lord any longer?" 2 Kings vi. 33. Oh the desperate resolution of impatient minds! They will stint God, both for his time and measure; if he fail their desires in either, they turn their backs upon him, or fly in his face. It is one thing to forsake, another to propose and prepose a forsaking: nor is their fault a simple transgression of the law, but a proud and wilful contempt of it.

In how full strength doth this example arise to the conviction of the Romists, who have indeed forsaken the right way, not only in regard of manners, but of doctrines! they have practically rejected it, and dogmatically taught against it.

For the law, they have made it of none effect through their traditions. First, for the first commandment, they make an unjust God, which is worse than none at all; while they teach that he quits the debt, but not the payment of the debt. As if the creditor should tell his debtor, I do forgive thee, but withal I will arrest thee. To pardon the fault, and not the punishment, is but a mockery. Secondly, the second they have rased quite out: because that commandment stands plainly forbidding images, therefore, that images may stand, they forbid the commandment. Thirdly, by declaring that men are not bound to keep oath with heretics, they take the name of God in vain, and teach flat perjury. Fourthly, the Lord's sabbath hath not so much respect among them, as a saint's holiday. Fifthly, they dispense with allegiance to princes; yea, give remission of sins upon condition to become traitors; and so make the grace of God the reward of disloyalty. They absolve children from all obedience to their own parents, by admitting them into their monasteries. What hast thou to do with a father? the pope is thy father, the church thy mother, friars thy brethren, and nuns thy sisters. Sixthly, they make him no murderer, that kills a person whom they have excommunicated; and tolerate murder by ordaining refuges for wilful blood. Seventhly, they have established and permitted fornication. So they may have silver, they care not to rake it out of the devil's sink. Hence it comes to pass as the prophet said; It came by the hire of a harlot, and to the hire of a harlot it shall return, Micah i. 7. Eighthly, sacrilege is the greatest theft, and of this they make the least conscience. They make sale of all things; heaven, hell, earth, pardons, purgatory; which is flat robbery, and the greatest deceit. Ninthly, their spurious and juggling equivocations have made the whole world hiss at them for false witnesses. If the priest be examined by the magistrate in any dangerous article, he answers, I know it not; that is, with this reservation, to tell it thee: grounding it upon a senseless exposition of Christ's words, The Son of man knoweth not the day or hour of the last judgment, Mark xiii. 32; that is, say they, to reveal it to others. Tenthly, the tenth they have restrained to the consent of will, and make lust or the first motion no sin. One commandment they have taken out; and to make up the number, cut the last into twain: as he that out of ten bags of money stealeth one, divides one of the nine left into two, that his theft may not be perceived. And yet this last they disannul again by their wrong interpretation. So that one while they make two of one, another while of those two they make none. Considering all this, it was no wonder in the first session of the last council of Lateran, to see the pope lay the Scriptures at his feet. We find the true church with a crown of twelve stars on her head, Rev. xii. 1; while that counterfeit head of the church throws the crown and twelve stars, the doctrine of the twelve apostles, at his profane feet.

To the gospel they have been no less injurious; laying another foundation than Christ, and ascribing his prerogative to a man of sin. To him they give power to create new articles of faith; albeit these overthrow the old. Whereas God hath subjected all men to the Scripture, they subject the Scripture to themselves, and bind it to an uncertain dependence upon their church. For the fathers and most illuminate writers, if there be any thing makes against the policy of Rome, away with it; their expurgations shall cast it out at the window.

Who can then blame us for forsaking them, that have forsaken the right way? O but they are still the church, and we leave the church in leaving them. This they utter loudly, and think to carry it away with a noise. Take a reverend divine's comparison: Suppose a man hath a fair pool of water in his grounds, which in time becomes corrupted; weeds grow, mud increaseth, and frogs creep into it. To help this, the owner cuts a new channel; and so drains out the water to this other place, that he leaves the filth and corruption behind. Shall the remaining frogs complain that the water is theirs, because the pit wherein it formerly stood is theirs? Shall they croak and foam as if they had wrong done them? or condemn all those fishes for heretics, that refuse their sink for the other pure streams? We have forsaken Rome: what, have we left the crystal waters, the pure doctrine that was first in that pool? no, we have only left the weeds, the mud, and the frogs. God hath given us the water clear, which was theirs till they polluted it by their errors. And therefore have we forsaken them, because they succeed in the church, as the frogs did in the pool. If they forsake the right way, we must forsake them, or Christ will forsake us; which his mercy and our holy faith forbid.

"And are gone astray." Truth is one, errors are infinite. God chargeth us to refuse all ways but one; Satan bids us refuse that one, and take which way we please. All the paths of the wicked be crooked and irregular ways: they walk not forward to the prize that is set before them, and therefore lose both pains and reward. Herein they truly follow their father, who testifies of himself, that he had compassed the earth. So confused and anfractuous are their goings, as if they cared not which way they went, so they went not with God. The ways of the wicked are crooked; they go wheeling to hell. We are all apt enough to stray, if preventing grace did not rectify us. Philosophers hold, if the inferior spheres were not ruled, and in a manner corrected by the highest, the swiftness of their motion would quickly fire the world. Certainly, if the affections of men were not moderated by the all-guiding Spirit, this little world would soon destroy itself. He that once forsakes the right way, and does not walk uprightly, Gal. ii. 14, quickly goes astray, and the first step he takes is toward hell. And he that hath begun that dangerous race, knows not where to stop: like an unbridled horse upon his speed; or a ship with a full wind, even when you strike sails, yet it will go some deal further by the force it had formerly won. He that lays the reins on the neck of his carnal appetite, cannot promise where he will rest. To say, This sin and no more, is as if a man should throw a stone into a pond, with a purpose to make one circle and no more; but that one will beget two, and those two multiply to a hundred.

When a man hath erred from the right way of charity, into what a number of mischievous courses doth he run! Here he takes up with injury, there he lays out with usury; this man he scandalizeth with malice, with fraud he robs another, a third he kills with oppression: every unrighteous action that Satan puts in his way, he is ready to embrace, be it as foul as deformity itself. Like that free citizen, that so doted on a female slave, that he would needs marry her, though by that match he were sure (by the law) to become a slave with her. God's charge was ever against bigamy: Solomon first takes two wives, then three, then hundreds; and having once gone beyond the stakes of the law, he is ready to lose himself amongst a thousand bed-fellows. "King Solomon loved many strange women," 1 Kings xi. Here was enough to overthrow the wisest king of the earth: women, many women, strange women, idolatrous women. First, women. He that made one woman for one man, saw that one woman was enough for that one man. "Let every man have his own wife," 2 Cor. vii. 2: a wife, not a concubine; his own, not another man's; his wife, not wives. One; for the charge of our wife is like the charge of our words: whatsoever is more than yea and nay in the one, or more than husband and wife in the other, comes of evil, and evil will come of it. Secondly, many women. Two is more than God allows; bigamy is unlawful: but polygamy, many women, is the practice of a Mahometan. No marvel if many women did ruin Solomon: Adam had but one, and that a good one; and yet she lost the game. If one woman was enough to undo all men, there is no wonder that many women should undo one man. Thirdly, strange women. Strange, because not sealed with the holy signet of matrimony; for otherwise they are too familiar. Fourthly, idolatrous women. Others only tempt to lust, these to misdevotion; if they can join our heart to theirs, they will disjoin it from God.

Hell is down-stairs; and if a man have descended a step or two, it is a miracle if he stop before he comes to the bottom. He that hath strayed into these thickets, will be so mazed with intricate circumsolutions, that he shall hardly unwind himself. This bad desire must be gratified with a lewd act, that act seconded with a lie, that lie credited with an oath. To do evil is a sin; to hide it with a lie, doubles the sin; to bind that lie with an oath, trebles it. So error begets error;

as a man of sunk estate, borrows of one to pay another, till finding his credit past soldering up, he runs in every where as far as he can, and then breaks. So the sinner, whose conscience lies perdu, refuseth no action that may at once satisfy his desire and conserve his reputation. At last he hath gone so far wrong, that he thinks himself in the right, and vice is counted virtue. In bodily diseases, where the beginnings are doubtful, and cannot denominated the sickness, yet the proceedings are evident, and the more keenly the disease is felt, the more certainly is it discovered. In spiritual diseases it is otherwise; for the first entrances are manifest; they trouble the conscience, and the sinner condemns himself: but the more he multiplies transgression, the less is he sensible of any compunction. No man is so mad as to call a fever health, or the gout swift footmanship, or the green-sickness beauty, or the consumption a good state of body. Yet these far-strayed sinners miscall the right way; while they call lust love, rage fortitude, envy emulation, pride magnanimity, sloth wariness, covetousness frugality, and rank dishonesty but mere policy. Who shall rectify that luxate member, which denies itself to be out of joint? Come, cast in thy lot among us, we shall find precious substance, saith the ungodly, Prov. i. 13, 14. If he might appoint the way, this should be the right; if he might determine the end, all should be peace; but he is mistaken in both. "Woe unto them that call evil good, and good evil!" &c. Isa. v. 20. Woe indeed; woe for refusing the right, woe for approving the wrong, woe for that they have erred, and woe because they will not be converted.

I conclude. It is said of Israel, that they journeyed and pitched at the commandment of the Lord, Numb. ix. 18. O blessed obedience, that in all business follows this direction! But, alas, "all we like sheep have gone astray," Isa. liii. 6. Like sheep? yea, like goats and dromedaries. The breasts of Eve gave no other milk to her children, Adam left no other inheritance to his posterity, than disobedience. Even in the garden of Eden, this bitter root grew too near the goodliest trees of life and knowledge; whereof our parents tasting, not only infected their own blood, but diffused their corruption into their whole succeeding lineage. God forbade but one tree, granting all the rest: Satan slighting all the rest, persuaded to this one. Yet how did Eve believe a murderer before her Maker, the father of lies above the God of truth! Aaron's rod was laid up in the ark, as a token of Israel's rebellion, Numb. xvii. 10. The whole world is an ark or court of rolls, to record the monuments of our disobedience. Moses sets down a catalogue of their rebellions, Deut. ix.; but, alas, ours be beyond all numeration. If the Lord forsook them for forsaking his truth, can we look to escape?

Christ sent two disciples to bring him the ass and her colt, Matt. xxi. 2. Some by the ass understand the Jews, by the colt the Gentiles. First, he chose the ass, he offered himself to the Jews; but they proving resty, he takes up the colt, the Gentiles. And now having been almost 1600 years a breaking and backing us, and managing us to his hand, even when he thought to have found us fit for the saddle, we are grown wilder and more untamed than we were before. We kick, and wince, and fling, and will by no means endure the reins of his blessed government. Thus now God is wearied with us both: his old obstinate ass, the Jews, tired him with continual beating; his unbridled colt, the Gentiles, vex him with their rambling. The former was a slow beast, and could not be gotten forward; this other runs fast enough, but will not keep the way.

but if the colt will not be ruled, the Lord will take it ass again, as the fitter of the two to do him service. O let us confess our errors, and return to the right way. Return, for you have erred; with weeping, for you have sinned, Joel ii. 12. Lord, thou tellest my wanderings," Psal. lvi. 8: he tells them one by one, knows their just weight and number; for God is so wise that he can cast a man up to his hair. Your hairs are numbered, do not think that our sins shall pass unnumbered. O let the Lord also number our penitent sorrows; for as he doth look our sins, so he doth bottle up our tears. Our iniquities are not written in so deep characters, but our repentant tears shall be able to blot them out.

Let us therefore come home with sorrow, that have wandered with shame; seeking our Father's house, by doing our Father's will. Why should we run on this senseless and endless race of iniquity, till the days of our gracious visitation be out of date, when it will be hard to determine what the end will be? Let us follow the counsel of St. Chrysostom, alluding to the policy of the sages, who returned into their own country another way, Matt. ii. 12. Have we erred by the way of adultery? Let us go back by the way of chastity. Have we erred by the way of covetousness? Let us go back by the way of mercy. If we return the same way we went, we are still under the kingdom of Herod. No less in the sickness of the soul than of the body, there be critical days; whereby God observes in what likelihood we are to recover health. Smite thy breast and say, Where am I? Whither go I? We are all stray-sheep; now the great Shepherd of our souls bring us home to himself, and the fold of eternal peace. Amen.

"Following the way of Balaam." Custom is the principal magistrate of man's life, the guide of his actions; and as we have inured ourselves at the first setting out in this world, so commonly we go on, unless we be turned by miracle, and changed by that which is only able to do it, the grace of God. Our thoughts are according to our inclinations, our discourse according to our acquired and infused opinions, our deeds be according to our customs, and our customs generally follow after our precedents. So they that propound a Balaam for their master, are sure of vice for their mistress, and destruction for their wages. The apostle here speaks of sorcerers; and whom should sorcerers imitate but that grand magician, Balaam, the prince of false prophets, the eldest son of Satan? The general points are two; what, and wherein. First, what they do, They follow Balaam. Secondly, wherein they follow him, In his way, with all the passages; and in his end, which is the wages of unrighteousness. In the former I have three circumstances; a description, an observation, and a caution.

1. A description of Balaam, who had taught evil, and done evil; and in doing evil, he taught it. He was two ways a master of wickedness; preceptory, and exemplary: Quæ docuit lingua, facilitavit vita, says one; i. e. What he taught with his tongue, he illustrated by his life. He had his damnable doctrine, whereof we read, Rev. ii. 14; a doctrine which will never die so long as there is a pope living. Let us observe the parallel; the fitness invites me to the comparison. First, Balaam was great with kings; the pope will be great over kings. Secondly, Balaam would do any thing for money; and what practice doth the pope refuse to fill his exchequer? Incest shall be dispensed, murder refuted, uncleanness tolerated; all for gain. You may buy heaven, buy out hell, for money. For this, indulgences be his wares, and purgatory his market town. He will,

with Balaam, curse the very Israel of God for money. Thirdly, Balaam was a hidden hypocrite, a close villain, with a corrupt heart under a clear skin. The pope is such a glorious saint in show; no matter what stuff his conscience be made of, all his doings must be justified: his murders are excused like Samson's, his thefts like the Hebrews', his adulteries like Jacob's. Nothing doth he amiss, though the devil himself would scarce wish him to do worse. Fourthly, Balaam had some true oracles, and by the colour of them, he vented his own sorceries. If the pope should not confess some truths, the world would never admit his many falsehoods. He must have two or three pieces of right gold that would get off his bag of counterfeits. Lastly, Balaam persuades the Moabites to tempt Israel; first, to fornication, and by that to misdevotion. It is the papal indulgence to a fleshly life, that wins so many to his superstition. They will worship the pope's God, upon condition he will let them also worship their own. What is a harlot, but a pleasing idol? What is an idol, but a spiritual harlot? If the pope will allow them the one, they will not stick with him for the other. Idolatry was Balaam's sport; and who can but think that antichrist laughs in his sleeve, to see superstitious fools down on their knees to beautified puppets? Cornelius Agrippa, a great learned papist, hath left it written, that certain of the schoolmen, meaning Aquinas and Aureolus, defended, that the very stars in the firmament might be worshipped, but only for doubt of giving occasion to idolatry. Not that it were idolatry, but that it might give occasion of idolatry. Just as when a thief cuts a passenger's throat, he gives occasion of murder. But as Balaam was crafty to do mischief underhand; so the pope doth but plot, and contrive, and command in his consistory, what must be performed by his officious emissaries. Treasons and conspiracies against anointed sovereigns, blowing up of parliaments, ruin of countries by war and invasions, all fetch their original from his sacred and unerring breast; yet the Romish Balaam is innocent, he hath no hand in it. Let the actors on the stage answer it, the poet is close behind the curtain.

But now shall not this Balaam answer for all those conspirators whom he hath suborned? Suppose he did not give every one of them his particular errand, doth not his general warrant bid them go? While they teach men to earn the kingdom of heaven by shedding the blood of an heretical prince, and promise the forgiveness of many sins for the committing of one, what is this but to hire instruments to their damnable designs? Machiavel's doctrine is quite fooled and shamed by the Jesuits: he taught that no man was fit for a desperate conspiracy, but one whose hands had been formerly dipped in blood. Alas, he knew not of a Friar Clement, or a Ravillac; he knew not, that superstition hath so well advanced mischief, that the first blood which a murderer sheds shall be no worse than a king's; and that by votive resolution, he shall be as merciless as butchers by occupation.

The Moabites were persuaded that Balaam could not err; and do the Romists think any less of their papal god? "He whom thou cursest is cursed, and he whom thou bledest is blessed," Numb. xxii. 6. They think if the pope put a traitor into the rubric, he is presently a saint in heaven; if he curse or excommunicate a Christian, he must needs be enrolled in hell. This being sized into their souls, no wonder if they become as dead engines, moved only by the Spirit he puts into them. Thus the way of the Lord is no more stood upon; but the way of Thomas, as the Dominicans speak; and the way of Scotus, as the Franciscans; and the way of Loyola, as the Jesuits; and indeed the way of the devil, for he comes in for his share: while treasons, perjuries, uncleannesses be the doctrines, what man of sense will look for any other but Satan in the pulpit? At the best, we find not an apostle to be the master of their sentences, but Peter Lombard grows to be the text, and the hierarchy of Rome the expositors; and what will become of the poor lambs when such wolves be the pastors?

For observation, They follow Balaam. There was never any man so desperately wicked but he had some fellows and followers. Beelzebub fell not alone from heaven; thousands of angels fell with him in that confederacy. We read of three conspirators, Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, that prevailed with two hundred and fifty rulers, men of renown, and famous in the congregation, Numb. xvi. Those seditious leaders could not err without followers. Shall an Absalom rebel without seconds? No, two hundred men went out with him in their simplicity and knew nothing, 2 Sam. xv. 11: even the innocent are won to wait upon a conspirator. It is no hard matter to beguile harmless intentions: yea, the true-hearted lie most open to credulity; and while they mean nothing but faithfulness, are brought into rebellion. The name of David's son carries them against Absalom's father: and while they purpose only attendance to the prince, they become loyal rebels to their king. But were there none that embraced this innovation for their own turns? Yes, it grew a strong rebellion. Can Jeroboam be an idolater alone? No, he no sooner sets up his calves, but Israel is down on their knees. If he cause such an impious erection, they presently follow him with their superstitious devotion. One man may kindle such a fire, as thousands are not able to quench. One plague-sore may infect a whole nation, and all the venom of sin is not spent in the act. The deed may be past and gone, but the pernicious example remains, and spreads to a woeful contagion. Like Goodwin sands, which not only swallowed up his patrimony, but still continues a dangerous place, where too many have miscarried. He is a very mean person, that draws not some clients after him: even Theudas and Judas had their four hundreds to accompany them.

It hath ever been the dangerous policy of Satan to assault the best; he knows the multitude, as we say of bees, will follow their master. The unstable vulgar are soon carried with the religion of authority. What Hushai said in policy, they speak in simplicity; Whom Israel choose for their king, his will I be, 2 Sam. xvi. 18. Hypocrites will be of the king's faith, as papists are bound to be of the pope's. Let Korah kindle the fire, two hundred and fifty captains will bring sticks to it, and all Israel are ready to warm themselves at it. The weathercock will look which way soever the wind blows. Jeroboam shall be sure of brutish subjects, while he sets up calvish deities. Simon had so bewitched the people, that they all took him for the great power of God, Acts viii. 10. A sorcerer shall not be without clients.

It is an unhappy degree of wickedness, to be the ringleader of sin: every accessory is faulty enough, but the first author is abominable. Therefore is Jeroboam so often branded in those sacred leaves; therefore do all ages ring of his fact, with the accent of dishonour and indignation, "Jeroboam the son of Nebat, that made Israel to sin." It was a shame for Israel, that they could be made to sin by a Jeroboam; but O cursed name of Jeroboam, that drew Israel to sin! Jeroboam was a wicked king, and miserably accursed; they of his house that die in the city the dogs shall eat; they that die in the field the fowls of the air shall eat, 1 Kings xiv. 11. Yet Nadab his son, and Baasha his successor, Zimri, and Omri, and Ahab, and Ahaziah, and Jehoram, they all walked in the way of Jeroboam, which made Israel to sin. So easy is it for a man's sin to live when himself is dead; and to lead that exemplary way to hell, which by the number of his followers shall continually aggravate his torments. The imitators of evil deserve punishment, the abettors more; but there is no hell deep enough for the leaders of public wickedness. He that invents a new way of serving Satan, hath purchased for himself a large patrimony of unquenchable fire. Shall not the pontificians answer for all that blood, which miscarried by their superstition? Suppose they think best to die with Christ, and nothing but Christ, in their mouths; shall they not answer for teaching others to live and die otherwise? How fearfully do the seducer and seduced greet one another in hell; where the one saith, Thou hast been the occasion of my sin; and the other, Thou art the occasion of my more grievous torment! What infinite tortures doth Mahomet endure; when every Turk that perisheth by his juggling, doth daily add to his unspeakable horrors! The devil himself by tempting and deceiving souls, doth advance his own damnation. Nor was it any charity, but mere fear of greater burden, that made the rich man in hell so respective of his brethren, Luke xvi. 28. Many a man sins only for himself, he shall be plagued for the sins of others.

3. The caution. Let eminent persons take heed of eminent sins: they do, with Samson, pull down those pillars of goodness, that shall not only quash themselves, but be the ruin of thousands. Their facts become examples, those examples laws; and it is natural to men to follow the law of fact, before the law of faith; a visible pattern, rather than a mere audible doctrine. We were wont to say, Evil manners occasion good laws; but here it is true, corruption of manners is become the birth of laws; the leader's example is a law to the followers. Divers customs are no less than ridiculous and pestilent, that have had their birth from a great man's precedent. From this root hath grown all our strange disguises, transformations of apparel, painted faces, apish, brutish gestures. Usury had still lain like neglected ware in the devil's shop, if some great rabbin had not brought it forth. The excuse of such pernicious customers to the followers of them, is as Pilate said to Christ, Thine own nation hath delivered thee unto me; and sin will conclude against those authors, Therefore he that delivered me unto thee hath the greater sin.

Let this first warn us of the ministry, that we teach you that way, whereof you shall never repent the travel; which is only Christ, "the way, the truth, and the life," John xiv. 6. "Let him that heareth say, Come," Rev. xxii. 17. He that inwardly heareth the voice of sanctification, let him outwardly call men by the voice of exhortation. It was a law among the Jews, "If a man die, having no children, his brother shall marry his wife, and raise up seed unto his brother, Matt. xxii. 24. Christ being dead, risen, and gone up into heaven, we are bound to raise up seed to our elder Brother; begetting children to Jesus, Gal. iv. 19. No other way dare we teach, lest we perish. For quid proderit, non puniri suo peccato, qui puniendus est alieno? saith Prosper; i. e. What comfort is it to escape with our own sins, if we must be punished for the sins of others?

For you; go not into the ways of sin, though you follow a Balaam. If we see a great offender led to execution, we are not so forward as to say, Let us die with him: yet while he goes on in pride, we follow him in a hurry, Let us sin with him. If he travels with vanity, we are for him; if he sails to Rome, we venture ourselves in the same bottom with him; only when he comes to hell, we would then leave him. But if men will be followers in sin, they must not look to be separated in punishment. They that pursue the way which Balaam went, shall arrive at the place where Balaam is. The Lord turn our steps from such a following, that we may have a more comfortable ending.

“Following the way of Balaam.” They that proound examples, whether for imitation or detestation, have respect both to the way and the end. Let me present you with both these out of the sacred history. Here suppose, the scene lies in Moab, time is the stage, all that read or hear the story be (as it were) the spectators. Balak plays the king, Balaam the conjurer, princes the ambassadors, gold and honour are the properties; yea, you have an ass playing her part too; these be the actors: the Israelites are the mutes: let me stand for the chorus. The conclusion will be the ruin of the ungodly, the reward of the righteous. Let no man think me profane, in borrowing such a comparison; the fathers have called the whole world but a theatre. Our Saviour borrowed a comparison from pipers and dancers, as I from players: players shall get no more by my comparison, than pipers and dancers did by his. Christ chargeth the slothful servant for not putting his talent to usury; yet he that puts his money to usury by the warrant of that text, is like to be ruined at the day of reckoning, and shall wish that he had better understood his Master’s meaning. The passages are divers, and useful to our observation.

1. The occasion. Moab and Midian saw their neighbours fall under the victorious sword of Israel, and expected with fear when their own turns should come to bleed. Could they have secured themselves, those bordering calamities had not moved them. Natural men are not sensible of others’ woes, while safety fenceth in their own estates. They that drink wine in bowls, mind not the affliction of Joseph, Amos vi. 6. The burning of a neighbour’s house would not startle them, but for the danger of their own. But peril is come to the doors of Moab, and they begin to be frighted: to overcome or repel this, Moab is not able alone, therefore requires the confederacy of Midian. Yea, both Moab and Midian find themselves too weak, without the assistance of Balaam. They put more confidence in his tongue than their own swords, and will not fight, but conjure. What needs the levying of forces, mustering of soldiers, emptying their treasures, endangering their persons, when all this trouble may be saved with one curse? They had only wit enough to fear, but knew not how to take the right course for safety. Otherwise they that saw the irresistible power of Israel, why did they not treat, and entreat, yea, buy the conditions of peace? They might easily think, Either the God of Israel is stronger than we, or he is weaker. If weaker, why are we afraid of him? If stronger, why do we not serve him? If he be greater, then down with Baal-peor; if not, then Baal-peor is sufficient without Balaam. But he that can make Israel victorious over others, is able to keep us safe from Israel: let us make him our friend, whom we cannot escape as an enemy. But wicked men are not more jocund in prosperity, than in disasters they are amazed. As the voluptuous man, that hath taken such pleasure in his own house, when suddenly he finds it a-fire, knows not which way to turn him, but runs forth at the wrong door.

2. The invitation; “Come, curse me this people,”

Numb. xxii. 6. A devilish errand for the elders of Midian to carry. Sihon with his Amorites, Og the giant with his Bashanites, were destroyed; there is no hope of resistance left in man; therefore they will try what the magician can do. How desperate is that wickedness, when Satan must be implored to undertake what God refuseth! They are likely to have good counsel that fee the devil. What can Balaam do without him? What can he do for Balaam? Curse: alas, as if all the world were under the power of an enchanter’s tongue; as if that little engine, fired at the furnace of hell, had a kind of omnipotency in it. But, doubtless, Satan doth more through our credulity than by his own efficacy; that beggarly spirit is more beholden to our imagination than to his own riches. “He whom thou cursest, is cursed.” If Balaam were a famous prophet, yet Balak was a very credulous king; he believes that the sorcerer could do any thing beneath the moon. Commodities far-fetched and dear-bought are diet for ladies; and so this design proved, for the ladies of Midian must manage the plot of Balaam.

Superstitious dotards think nature itself under the spell of their charms; but they are deceived. For if either the curses of men, or the malice of devils, could take effect, how soon would all be hell! Could either power or policy prevail, the church of Christ should not stand. But there is a strength so far above Balaam, that neither the prophet nor the potentate shall avoid that curse on themselves which they wished to others. From their evil let us learn this good, to bear as fair a respect to the true prophets of God, as they had confidence in the false. Why should they expect more comfort from God’s enemies, than we from his deputed servants? Why do we not more seek their blessings, and stand in fear of their curses; seeing they have the ratification of God in heaven to their sentences upon earth? John xx. 23. If Moab have so bold assurance of a Balaam, how choice should we be of a Moses! Balaam’s tongue cannot hurt us, Moses’ lips can bless us. It was not the hand of Israel, but the hand of Moses, that got the day: as one expresses it, It was not the hand which fought, but the hand which did not fight, that prevailed. Shall we give less credit to God’s instruments, than they do to Satan’s? How miserable is the darkness of some souls in this glorious day-light! To the chamber of a fortune-teller, a juggling mountebank, or some suspected conjurer, flock many clients; not only of the vulgar, but even of those that come in coaches, and the gayest comparisons. The door of the devoutest preacher is empty enough; few visitants trouble him, either for direction of their lives, or comfort of their consciences. Alas, for such children of perdition; that they should take the forbidden way of hell, and neglect the gracious invitations of God!

“Curse me this people.” Why did they not rather desire Balaam to bless themselves than to curse Israel? that had been the easier task of the two, and more likely to prevail. Defensive war is surer than invasive; we may better fortify ourselves at home, than offend our enemies abroad. Israel did not trouble them, why would they trouble Israel? who would wake a sleeping lion, that had not first fettered his claws? Moab might have rested in peace, and Israel in peace: why then should Moab curse Israel? It is a most malicious pride, that cares not to fare well itself, unless it go ill with others; as Moab did not care for safety, unless they might have victory. Yet it is worth a good man’s thanks, to have his own blood spared, though the same favour be allowed to others. Is my own prosperity nothing, because my neighbours also prosper about me? Let such a conceit be harboured in the breasts of pagans, or those antichristian Christians, that content not themselves to extend their bloody dominion to the Indies, unless they may also ruin their adjacent countries; whose envy is not satisfied with escaping us, if we escape them. They eat their own hearts in anger, that they cannot eat ours in revenge. We pray for the opening of their eyes, and they pray for the pulling out of ours. We desire the turning of their hearts, and they wish the cutting of our throats. There is a great dearth of reason and charity in that man, who would be happy alone. Society is no small part of the very joys of heaven. They desire the blessedness of others, that are of the communion of saints.

3. The prohibition. Balaam had a mind to go, God hath no mind to suffer him. The elders of Moab have not sooner delivered their message, than the fingers of that leaden prophet tingle for the golden wages; yet he appears not rash and peremptory, but pretends serious advice and deliberation. That night he will give them hospitable entertainment, the next morning shall give them their answer. Lodging and good cheer they shall have, but their host means to make them pay for it in the reckoning. Yea, they deserved to be welcome, for they brought the reward of divination. An answer he promiseth them, but such a one as God shall give him. Now the Lord prevents his inquiry, by inquiring first of Balaam, "What men are these with thee?" Numb. xxii. 9. Did not God know them? Yes, they that could not move but in him, could be no strangers to him. He knew them well enough, but he would have Balaam know them better. Before his question was, "Where art thou?" God had found Adam, but he would have Adam find himself. When we lay open our wants, and confess our sins, we tell him no news; alas, he knows all better than our own hearts. Yet he chooseth to deal with us from our own mouths. When we harbour foul lusts, he seems to ask us, What thoughts are these? Is it fit for you to give lodging or house-room to such messengers as Moab, of hell? Are these guests fit for the men of God to entertain?

Balaam hath admitted them, and now waits what God will do for him, what he will suffer him to do for them. He receives a plain oracle of inhibition; "Thou shalt not curse the people, for they are blessed," ver. 12. Balak had a confident opinion of Balaam's power. Either he thought him a notable conjurer, that could do much with the devil; or a true prophet, that had interest in God. Balaam shall not be suffered to gratify him either ways. Let him be a sorcerer, he shall not give Moab the least encouragement in the conceit of this help. Let him be a prophet, God will not have his name scandalized, no not in the opinion of those pagans. Why should his name be usurped to curse, where his will hath intended to bless? "Thou shalt not go."

Yet what if Balaam had been granted the liberty of his feet and tongue? say, he had gone, and cursed; how forceless had all his maledictions been! Could not the breath of God have dispersed them all into air, or beat them back on the curser's own head? "The curse causeless shall not come," Prov. xxvi. 2; or, at least, it shall not come where the curser meant it. He gives just cause to make himself accursed, that without just cause curseth another. How often hath the Balaam of Rome cursed the church of England! How often hath he roared out the direst execrations against us! How often have those Sauls, with letters of commission from the high priest of that synagogue, like pirates with letters of mart from the Great Turk, breathed out threatenings and slaughter; using the ordinances of their church like the ordnance of a man of war, spitting fire and thunder against the bark of Christ! What have they done, but sunk themselves in the skirmish? Let them look back upon their invincible navy, their inevitable powder-plot; and confess with blushing cheeks, to the glory of God, that they would have more than cursed Israel, but they could not. How many bulls of theirs have bellowed out execrations against us, endeavouring to gore us, and let out our very bowels! yet God hath sent those curst beasts short horns; blessed be his name, they did us no harm. How many blustering tempests have those enraged sorcerers raised against our prince and country! yet all this wind hath shaken no corn. Were we the worse? Nay, I rather think we had not sped so well, had not these Balaamitish curses been spent upon us. For them; I read of certain Africans, who being troubled with the north wind, driving heaps of sand upon their fields, mustered an army of soldiers to fight against it; but with so ill success, that themselves were buried under those sandy monuments. They that arm themselves against the church, shall fall by their own weapons. Malice shall do the nature of malice; drink up the marrow and moisture of them that foster it, and bring their curses upon their own souls; as Nadab and Abihu were consumed by as strange a fire as they had in their censers. As we may say of that blind man whom Christ cured, and the Jews excommunicated, that he was never fully in till he was cast out, John ix. 34; so if antichrist had not cursed us, we had not been so thoroughly blessed. Though they curse, O Lord, yet bless thou; and so thou hast done with a merciful advantage.

The Israelites sat still in their tents; they little knew what mischief was brewing against them. The goodly plains of Moab gave such refreshing to their minds and bodies, that they securely embraced this dear-purchased rest. They neither felt nor saw any opposition; yet even then the most dangerous plot was hammering against them. Our adversaries never mean us more hurt, than when they cry Truce. Villanous policy then multiplies her pledges, when she purposeth to destroy us. What trust should be given to them, even when they swear, whose religion allows them to break all oaths for advantage? Only that God, who (without making Israel of his counsel) crossed the design of the Moabites, still sees, and (we hope) will prevent all the stratagems of our enemies; or else, like another Parisian Vigils, we should feel their swords before we heard their alarms. But the providence of our Maker restrains many evils, which we never dreamed to be near us. He that keeps Israel, slumbers not; he is both a sure and secret Friend. Why are not our sanctuaries turned into shambles, and our beds made to swim with our bloods, long before this, but that the God of Israel had crossed the conspiracy of Balaam? It is no thanks to wicked men, that their wickedness doth not prosper. The world would soon be overrun with evils, if men might be so ill as they would.

4. We have their answer and dismissal. The reward was so sweet a taste of a rich banquet, that the teeth of Balaam began to water. Yet he pretends that God must inform him, before he can tell what to say. He waits on the Lord, they wait on him. Yet he falters in the repetition of God's answer, He refuseth to let me go, Numb. xxii. 13. Had he spoke the downright truth, it may be they had solicited him no further. But he higgles, and dodges, and conceals half of it, which was little less faulty than the denying of all. From this niggardly relation of God's message St. Paul most accurately clears himself, Acts xx. 20, 27; to the condemnation of those lisping and curtailed doctrines of Rome, that show no more truth than that which concerns their own profit: like a subtle artist, that teacheth his scholars only the rind, concealing the sap; that so it once he may keep them the longer and himself the better.

Here was Balaam's hypocrisy; to hold in with God, he refuseth to go with Moab; to hold in with Moab, he lays the blame upon God. So did he deny, is one that wished to be sent for again. How often do we look on the temptation with one eye, with the other on the penalty! fain we would, but we dare not. So the unhappy child would be fingering the knife, but looks on his father, and fears the lash. And instead of being angry with ourselves and our loose desires, we grumble at the good law of our Maker; as if he had done us an unkindness, in that we will not suffer us to perish. Yea, rather than bridge our own pleasures, we will hazard the displeasure of God; we will do what he forbids, and yet hope to escape what he threatens. But let us know that while we bluster against his precepts, we do but raise a tempest against our own souls. It will never be right, till we can heartily say, Lord, thy will be done, though ours be crossed.

5. The elders of Moab are returned with Balaam's refusal; and now the impotent king frets and rageth with a furious passion, that so potent a monarch, the lord of so fair territories, of such viceroys and under-lying princes, should be denied. Graceless sovereignty scorns a repulse, in the most unreasonable demand. Chafe he may, and vex himself; but still the sorcerer is tied at home, Israel lies safe in the plain, no revenge is found out for Moab and Midian. Oh what a scene was here! a malicious king rejected, a covetous prophet hampered, an innocent people secured, and in all a blessed God honoured! Still there is no hope but in the conjurer; again he sends to Balaam. It may be the former were not worthy to wait on so famous a sorcerer, therefore he sends more noble ambassadors, Numb. xxii. 15. No messenger is honourable enough to wait at the door of a mountebank; every lackey is good enough to fetch the preacher. Like the first Indians, that hung bugles at their ears, while they left their gold on the dunghills.

Balak is not discouraged with one denial: oh that we could be so importunate for our good, and double our knocks at the gate of heaven, as he did at the gates of hell! Denials do but whet the desires of vehement suitors. The repercussive blast brings out the fire with more violence. Much time and wit is spent in compassing that, which after a short fruition varies the obtainer. So do worldly objects enchant us, that the more they fly us, the more impatiently we pursue them. But when it comes to spiritual things, which we cannot want and be blessed, we beg them as gluttons do their daily bread, whereof they are full even to surfeit. Balak was denied, and became more eager: God doth not deny us, but delay us; and we give over at the first repulse, yea, even before we have an answer; spare to speak, and despair to speed. It is true that God gives us more than we desire, but without our desiring he makes no promise to give. If many had all they desired, it would be very little; if some good ones had no more than they desired, it would not be very much; but if the best had no more than they deserved, it would be nothing at all. There is an impost set upon the favours of men: Balaam will not gratify the king of Moab without a reward. God gives liberally, and forbids not, Jam. i. 5. The trees bow down their heads, as if they would ask moisture of the rivers; the thankful flowers open their dumb mouths to the sun; the eagles and young lions seek their prey at God; and he feeds not the young ravens, till, in their language, they call upon him. And shall man be silent at the bountiful gate of his Maker, when it is no more but ask and have? If we have not all that we ask, yet we must ask all that we would have. Why do we hold our peace, that have such a command to pray, and such a promise to speed in Jesus Christ?

6. Next cometh to our observation, the sorcerer's lure, the prostration of wealth and honour at his feet. I will promote thee; let nothing hinder thee, Numb. xxii. 16, 17. O fools, is there nothing to hinder a man in his way to promotion? Doth not the swiftest eagle stoop a hundred times to her prey, and rise without it? "The race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong," Eccl. ix. 11. He that sits in heaven, and disposeth all things in the world, can disappoint the huge host of Midian by a dream, Judg. vii. 13, of the Syrians by a noise, 2 Kings vii. 6. What needs he employ angels or thunders, or awake the winds and tempests, when he can make a man hinder himself? Or suppose they spake like a king's orators, not so much questioning the possibility of impediments, as persuading an inclination to consent; they show their tempting bait, presuming that if they could once fasten this hook in his nostrils, then nothing should hinder them from drawing him all the world over. Once mentioning promotion, they hoped to have struck it dead. This vanity had transported themselves; and they knew no man living that could hold out against those assaults, wherewith their own hearts had been so easily conquered. Who would be poor, that might be rich on such terms? who would toil in common drudgeries, that might for one curse be set among princes? what is a poor word to their pains, that have broke many sleeps, flattered many fools, swallowed many sins, spent their time and means to get one favour, honour, or grace from him that sits on the throne? and yet, after all this, might say of their courtship, as that captain did of his burghesship, With a great sum we have obtained it, Acts xxii. 28. Balaam's honour comes at an easier rate; Do but curse Israel, and be a statesman of Moab.

Thus was their persuasion, that all the world would be glad to run a madding after their bait, or adoring their idol. They that are all flesh and blood, think it impossible to despise wealth and dignity; and because innumerable souls are thus inveigled, they cannot believe that any would escape. The swine thinks no garden so pleasant as the dunghill wherein he wallows. But they are deceived; that which seems a heaven to one mind, to another is little better than a hell. Two men see a mass together; one is transported with admiration and delight, the other looks on it with indignation and scorn; one thinks it heavenly, the other knows it blasphemy. Let covetous hearts confess, there be those that can despise the world and say, Thy gold and silver perish with thee; that had rather be masters of themselves, than of the Indies; that tread under feet with disdain the best proffers of this world, in comparison of a good conscience. Fetch them from beneath the burden of their sins, and let them feel the ease of an assured forgiveness; and then tempt them to their former condition with the gain of the whole world, and they will scorn it. What are riches in themselves, but the mere baggage to goodness? The baggage of an army cannot well be spared, yet doth it hinder the march, yea, and not seldom the care of that loseth the victory. So poor is the value of riches, when they come upon the best terms; but if they be gotten like Balaam's, with a curse, a curse shall light on them. That God who allows men to be rich, doth not allow them all means to be so. They that are gotten up to the top, let them look down again to the stairs by which they ascended: if those were crooked and rotten, their wealth at the height shall be but a burden to break their own necks. There is a golden prize set up for all runners; but they must keep the right road, of honesty, charity, equity, truth: if, with Balaam, they leave this regular path, and will be crossing over through by-ways, with a shorter cut of their own, they may be rich with a vengeance.

7. The sorcerer returns his answers to this golden and honourable invitation. "If Balak would give me his house full of silver and gold, I cannot go beyond the word of the Lord," Numb. xxii. 18. What saint could speak better? who would not think this man mortified to the world? He talks of a round quantity; no bags, nor chests, but a whole house full, and that house no less than a king's: now the more he mentioned, the less corrupt he appeared. He was not yet of the mind of our ignorant votaries, that place holiness in want, and think to merit by having nothing. They would make good the old rule in a wrong sense, It is better to give than to receive; they give away to some convent all they have at once, for but a licence to beg for ever. Crosses they call holy, yet abandon money; as if the very crosses could not sanctify the coin, and keep it from sin. But for all their ridiculous paradox of money-hating, a wise man would be loth to trust them with a house full of gold and silver. But did Balaam in very deed mean as he said? Dissimulation is able to deceive thousands. Good words, conjurer, no such matter in earnest. Such godliness might come no further than his lips, and there the covetousness of his heart stopped it out. Balak by this refusal may think the worse of his gold, Balaam doth not. A house full may not buy his tongue, a far less sum hath won his heart. A house full, sorcerer! alas, a closet full, a coffer full, yea, rather than fail, a purse full shall do it. Avarice will play at small game, ere it quite sit out. If Balaam were not covetous, why did he say nay with a desire to take it? why did he solicit God for that which was so peremptorily denied him? why did he hope that his Maker's mind would change, but that he longed for the reward? why did he delay the messengers, and feed them with hope of success, that had fed him with hope of recompence, but that his heart was formerly bribed?

Once forbidding is enough for an obedient child. When we petition God for some useful things, all the while he holds us in suspense, and says nothing to us, we may redouble our prayers. But when he resolutely denies us, and signifies plainly that we ask not according to his liking, therefore he will not give us according to our asking, it is time to hold our peace. Thrice did Paul repeat his suit, 2 Cor. xii. 8; all this while God gave him no direct answer; but when he heard, "My grace is sufficient for thee," he gave over in that particular. We grow saucy with God when we solicit him for that which he hath said he will not grant us. Let our requests be lawful, and then the more earnest the better welcome; such holy violence shall make the kingdom of heaven yield to our conquest. But when we beg prohibited favours we are troublesome. Should the malicious pray for a place of authority, to carve his own revenge? or shall another beg riches to accommodate his pride, that he may overtop his neighbours? It is wretched presumption to ask that allowance, which God's word hath expressly forbidden. Shall Balaam beg leave to curse? shall he repeat that postulation? was not one answer sufficient?

No honest heart will endure to be forbidden twice. But oh the powerful enchantment of money! this can charm the very charmer, and command him that thinks he can command hell. When we are resolved to sin for profit, we do even then turn our backs upon heaven. Nor is it now enough, in cold blood, while we are reading this, to disclaim this unrighteous mammon: (and yet there be some stony hearts, that let God preach till doomsday, life and the world shall part from them both together; that think all this as needless as a shower of rain in harvest:) but when the temptation comes, and the king of Moab or hell offers the golden bait, then to resist, then to condemn his offers, this is the noble trial of Christians.

8. Balaam longs, prays, and obtains, Numb. xxii. 20; permitted he is to go, but this permission was worse than a denial. This is not the first thing that God hath granted in anger. He gave murmuring Israel dainty meat, quails; but they had little joy of it, when that they put in at their mouths came loathsomely out at their nostrils. They had better have had no meat, than such sauce. I gave them a king in my wrath, Hos. xiii. 11; they had better have been without him. It is one thing to like, another to permit: God suffers a thousand evils in the world, he never took pleasure in any. Moses tolerated those legal divorces, he never approved them. God liked not Balaam's journey, yet in his judgment he gives way to it; as if he had said, Well, since thou art so hot upon gold, set on thy journey, be gone. So he bids him go, as Solomon bids the young man rejoice, Eccl. xi. 9; whereupon would follow a sorry reckoning. This Balaam could not deny; for when God crossed him in his journey, he did not say, Thou commandedst me; which (had not his conscience known the contrary) had been a ready answer. The Lord rather deny us our requests in love, than grant them in anger.

Be we content with what God sends us; and let neither purses full nor houses full of gold hire us to transgress his laws. If we keep the bounds of obedience, he will both give us the bread of sufficiency on earth, and a whole city of gold in the kingdom of heaven.

We are got through the better half of Balaam's way; there is but one mile further, of eight short furlongs, and we have overcome it.

1. Such was his forwardness, that no sooner did God answer him importunity with a Go, but he takes the first hint, and longs to be gone. He was busy with God before; but now he hath his Vade, (Go,) not a word more, there is no need to bid him hasten. He gets up betimes in the morning, Numb. xxii. 21: the night seemed tedious to him, and he taxeth it of lazy minutes; but the morning is welcome. Covetousness needs neither clock nor bell to waken it; its own desires will not allow it to take rest. Want does not break so many sleeps for provision the next day, as abundance doth for increase. Where shall we find men thus eager after spiritual wealth, which alone can make them happy? We seek for that, as the Israelites did for Canaan, when they made forty years' travel of a forty days' journey: so softly do we pursue the blessings of our eternal peace, that if we can reach home by that time we come to threescore, we think it time enough. But in the pursuit of profit and pleasure, we drive Jehu's pace, as if we were mad. Under religion men travel a pack-horse motion, as if they were weary of their burden; but run after vanity, like horses with an empty coach. We would be strong at twenty, rich at thirty, we would be wise at forty, but to be holy we can tarry till fifty. When our own business wakens us, what common day in the week finds us tardy? But on the sabbath, when God's special service calls us up, we take our ease, and make bold to lie in bed. Nature and our vain misconception of God hath taught us, that if any work be left undone, it shall be his.

2. Balaam is up and onwards his way, and now flatters himself with assured success. His corrupt heart prompts him; Why should God let me go, but that he means to let me do the thing I go about? God had first charged him neither to curse nor to go; now he hopes, he that had given him licence to go, would also give him leave to curse. He that relented in the one, why may he not as well relent in the other? He saw how this curse might bless himself; and therefore chooseth rather to undo so many millions of souls, than to prejudice his own fortune in so gallant a promotion. How Satanic is that mind, which would make way to his own particular benefit, with the ruin of so many thousands! that would set a whole city on fire, and it were but for light to tell his money! How should they escape the plague of Balaam, that have more than cursed, even depopulated, whole towns, to build up their own smokeless chimneys? Would God such men had only cursed the people, and not given the people so just cause to curse them. They cannot escape woes, while there is an orphan left to cry, or a widow to weep.

But now, confident sorcerer, is there no stop to be feared in the way? Yes, "God's anger was kindled because he went," Numb. xxii. 22. First God said, Neither go, nor curse; next he says, Go, but curse not; and now he is angry that he did go at all. Why did God suffer him to do what he prohibited, if he be angry with him for doing that which he suffered? The Lord saw his covetous desires grow hotter, his wicked hopes stronger, and his heart worse with this last allowance; therefore it was high time to cross his wicked intendments. Men know us only by our external motions, God judgeth us according to our inward dispositions. The life of all our works lies in our heart: if the fountain stink, no matter how clear the channel looks. The difference of all actions in God's sight, is fetched from the will. He bade Moses smite the rock; he smote it twice, and is blamed for doing it so often. Elisha bids the king of Israel smite the earth; he doth it thrice, and is blamed for not doing it oftener: all the difference of the fault was in the different heart. Moses numbers the people, and is praised; David numbers them, and is punished. Not that one man may better play the thief than another look on; as if God were indulgent to any sin; but he finds in some men's inwards that malice, whereof another is less guilty. Corn that grows on a house-side, often shoots up higher, and looks fairer, than that of the tilled field; yet this we gather, that we neglect, because we know the root is naught. Though our persons shall be judged according to our works, yet our works shall be judged according to our hearts.

3. An angel is despatched to resist Balaam: this is one of the noble employments of those glorious spirits, to give a strong and invisible opposition to wicked enterprises. Many a treacherous act have they hindered, without the knowledge of the traitor. Among the divers conspiracies against Queen Elizabeth, some, by the adversaries' own confession, were prevented by miracle; they knew not how. It pleased their malice to give out that they were crossed by the devil; but we acknowledge with thanksgiving, it was the hand of God; and say, with Daniel, Our God hath sent his angel, and delivered us from those merciless lions, Dan. vi. 22. How often hath the murderer prepared his weapon, the thief plotted his robbery, the enemy set his ambush, and been disappointed above their imagination! Sure there was a secret resistance, God sent his angel to cross the designs of Baalam. It is our honour, that God hath set us on work for this purpose; therefore also are preachers called angels. As God hath made his angels ministers, so he hath made his ministers angels: the whole scope of our labour is to stop sinners in their way of disobedience. To stay the course of evil, whether ministers do it by the word, or magistrates by the sword, is in both their hands angelical service. Yea, and to prosper this work, both the tribunals of the one, and pulpits of the other, are protected by angels, or they could not stand.

But now in what case are the wicked, that have God's angels for their opposites! How deplorable and desperate is their estate! God they have made their enemy, angels they cannot call their friends, devils labour to destroy them, the world cannot save them; whither, oh whither should they run for refuge? Balaam goes away from God, (for he leaves him that does not ask leave of him,) Satan provokes him, a good angel resists him, what shall become of him? How should those heavenly spirits bear that man in their arms, like nurses, upon earth living; or bear up his soul to heaven, like winged porters, when he dies; that refuseth the right way? They shall keep us in our ways, Psal. xci. 11. Out of the way it is their charge to oppose us, as to preserve us in the way. Nor is this more a terror to the ungodly, than to the righteous a comfort. For if an angel would keep even a Balaam from sinning, how much more careful are all those glorious powers to prevent the miscarriages of God's children! From how many falls and bruises have they saved us! In how many inclinations to evil have they turned us, either by removing occasions, or by casting in secretly good motions! We sin too often, and should catch many more falls, if those holy guardians did not uphold us. Satan is ready to divert us, when we endeavour to do well; when to do ill, angels are as ready to prevent us. We are in Joshua the high priest's case; with Satan on the one hand, on the other an angel, Zech. iii. 1: without this, our danger were greater than our defence, and we could neither stand nor rise.

4. The angel stops Balaam, not strikes him. Why doth not God confound him, as well as withstand him? Why did he withstand him, yet so as to let him pass? God is pleased to warn the very wicked, before he destroy them; they shall see his dislike, ere they feel his wrath; that so at once he may be glorified, and the mouth of all wickedness stopped. If all God's warnings were laid to heart, how few should perish! So he spares Balaam, because he had more to do with him: that tongue shall get him honour in Moab, which meant there to dishonour him. God sees it more for his glory to fetch good out of evil, than to suffer no evil at all. Pharaoh shall be soundly knocked, before he be slain. Why? "I will get me honour upon Pharaoh," saith the Lord, Exod. xiv. 17. He could soon rid the world of bad members, but then he should lose the praise of working good by evil instruments. The bad man's sin is the good man's sorrow: he must grieve for it, he may not repine at it. The wicked do not sin behind God's back, he sees it, and suffers it; and though for a time he hold his peace, he will call them to a strict account for it, Psal. i. 21. It is no good sign for a man to prosper in his ungracious courses: God owes him a payment; and it shall be the greater, when he comes to reckon with him for all his faults together. Do you mark none worldly and wealthy, that are rich in goods, and penurious in good deeds? That man doth not more treasure up gold than wrath; and while he grudgeth his superfluity to the poor, he grudgeth mercy to his own soul.

5. After all oppositions, the conjurer is arrived in Moab. He had seen an angel against him, heard a beast speak under him; and if the former were familiar, yet this last was strange and uncouth; yet he is not afraid to ride on that ass, whose voice was still in his ears. News goes post to the court; the long-expected guest is come. Now as if he had been some great monarch, the king sets out to meet him: he that to fetch him sent princes, goes himself in person to welcome him. They both look for promotion, either from the other; and he that said, "Am I not able to promote thee?" insinuates a confession withal, Thou art able to promote me. Two would be raised, and both with the downfall of a third. Now the bargain is sure on both sides; the very sight of the physician hath half cured the disease.

But who can wonder enough at this, that a king thus graceth a prophet? Such respect have even pagans borne to those that were but reputed prophets; their purses, their palaces, were not held too dear for them. How should this cast a blush upon the cheeks of Christians! Those showed false gods, we teach the true; they brought poison, we bring the food of life; they flattered men to destruction, ours is the tidings of salvation: yet they were honoured, we are despised; we are defrauded, they are rewarded. So that if Barbary wring her hands for mistaking, Christendom shall rend her heart for abusing, the messengers of God. Our names come into few mouths, out of which they return but with reproaches. Among the rest of our sins, O God, be merciful to the contempt of thy servants.

6. The superstitious king hugs Balaam, and his hopes in Balaam; and confident of the success, he feasts his gods, his princes, his prophet, and spares for no cost. Next morning they all visit the high places of Baal, altars are erected, sacrifices prepared, the number designed; seven altars, seven oxen, seven rams. What a glorious business was here! Why seven? Would not one have served the turn? The true God is but one, and he required but one altar at once: did he now stand upon numbers? There is nothing more magnificent than false devotion. Idolaters in all ages have made more pompous shows than the true worshippers. Religion seldom hath so fair a flourish as superstition. The harlot affects gaudy dressings, the sober matron does not. Truth had rather go naked, than wear the caparisons of hypocrisy. We paint old rotten houses; sound and substantial buildings honour themselves with their own bare worth. What a world of plausible devices hath the church of Rome invented to hold up her credit in the world! To say nothing of their proud vaunts of antiquity, universality, succession, name of forefathers, which amaze and besot an ignorant heart; the glorious shows of their processions, the gaudy ornaments of their altars, the rich robes of their images, the pomp and magnificence of their places, the triumphs of their great festivals; these transport simple and shallow spectators. Nature is led by sense: children and fools cannot well be of any other religion. Alas, they see not the inside; the doctrine that maintains idolatry, justifies treason, commends lying, refuseth murder, disgraceth the word of God, dishonours the Mediatorship of Christ. It is but the face they behold, not the heart; yea, it is the paint, not the face. I have heard of a traveller, that could get no lodging in his inn, unless he were bed-fellow to a stranger, that seemed a goodly person. They slept together all night. This passenger waking first in the morning, draws the curtain, and seeing a deformed, stigmatical, and misshapen creature in the bed, cries out that he had lodged with the devil. Yet when this ugly heteroclit had put on an artificial nose, a glass eye, covered his bald head with borrowed hairs, and clapped a rich suit on his back to hide his other deformities, he appeared a brave, proper man again. If you should see the church of Rome naked, without her disguise, you would loathe her; but stay till she put on her dressing, her artificial head the pope, her artificial hands the Jesuits, her garish apparel of pomp and ceremonies, she will tempt you to love her. If a pagan should ask a papist, What god do you worship? and he should truly answer, A god that delights in blood, that rewards treason, that commands dissembling, how horrible would his religion appear! But clothe all these with arguments, and neat distinctions, and pompous ostentation; and then how many unblest understandings are bewitched with it! Error had need be gorgeously set out, or else truth would soon mar her market.

7. Balaam's altars are smoking, the king expecting, the prophet desiring; but all will not do; God will not give him leave to curse Israel. Again they renew the sacrifice, and change the station; like an unlucky gamester, that looks for better success in another place. Yet if Balaam be constant in soliciting, God will be more constant in denying. How shameless was that forehead, which durst importune God after so many denials! Yet still the love of earth over-masters the fear of heaven; and as if the infinite Deity were not every where, he chooseth a new place for sacrifice, and dares rather hope a change than change his hope. In the midst of all this distraction, his tongue bleisseth against his heart, and his heart curseth against his tongue.

Balaam hearing this unlooked-for news, first expostulates, "I took thee to curse mine enemies, and behold, thou hast blessed them altogether," Numb. xxiii. 11. Next he entreats, "Neither curse them at all, nor bless them at all," ver. 25. Lastly, he chides, "I thought to promote thee, but the Lord hath kept thee back from honour," Numb. xxiv. 11: as if he would make him curse God, for not suffering him to curse Israel. Doth God hinder Balaam's promotion? No, he hinders Balaam's destruction; in that he will not let him be so bad as he would. Many a man goes to hell for getting what he should not; Balaam must thither for desiring to get what he could not. Unjust gains may be honey in the mouth, but they are gravel in the throat, poison in the soul. It is to be feared, that many tradesmen have not a little to answer for about this reckoning. Let them search their chests, search their hearts; and if they find any of this adulterate gold among their heaps, away with it; as they love their souls, away with it. For else they have locked a thief in their coffers, which will carry away all, and at the last themselves with it, Prov. xxi. 7.

8. The king may fret, but the prophet goes on; and instead of cursing Israel, he curseth Moab, "A sceptre shall rise out of Israel, and shall smite the corners of Moab, and destroy all the children of Sheth," Numb. xxiv. 17. As if he did protest, I may curse, but I dare not; I would curse, but I cannot. The king is angry with his sorcerer, the sorcerer is angry with God: Balaam hath his dismissal, yea, command to be gone. Yet rather than lose all his hopes, he will now speak worse than curses. He falls in with the council of Moab, and adviseth them a way how to make God curse them himself. It is not for lack of desire that I do not curse Israel; thou dost not more wish their ruin, than I wish thy recompence. Now so long as they leep in with God, "there is no enchantment against Jacob, nor divination against Israel," Numb. xxiii. 3. Get them but once into rebellion, and they shall curse themselves. There is no withdrawing God from them, but by withdrawing them from God: procure them to sin, they shall fall alone. They will admit no sin sooner than wantonness; this will be wrought upon them by fair faces: adultery will draw on idolatry, and both fetch down God's anger upon them. Beauty shall tempt them to gaze, their sight shall draw them to lust, their lust to folly, folly to superstition, and so God shall curse them for thee masked. Here was policy derived from the conclave of hell. As it has been said, Ubi bene, nemo melius; ubi male, nemo pejus; i. e. Where Balaam spake well, never any prophet spake more divinely; where ill, never any devil spake more desperately. This project took too well: ill counsel prospers faster than good. Kindly seed falls often out of the way, and roots not; but the tares never light amiss. They look, and lust, and sin, and perish. The Balaam of Rome, the Balak of hell, sit in council against us; but if we do not yield to sin, they shall never hurt us.

"Who loved the wages of unrighteousness." Where we have three things propounded to our instruction. First, what this wages is, riches. Secondly, how they become the wages of unrighteousness. Thirdly, the baseness of the covetous heart, that sets his affection on this wages, that loves such riches.

1. There have been some busy humours and stirring wits in the world, that with bitter declamations have inveighed against riches: like foxes, dispraising the grapes which they could not reach; and because they might not be rich themselves, would needs persuade the rest to be poor with them for company. Eustathius, Pelagius, the illuminate elders of Munster, some ignorant votaries of Rome, have taught and practised these absurdities; fit for none but rebels and bankrupts, or (if you will) idle and unuseful beggars. But the crown of the wise is their wealth, and the blessing of God maketh rich. "The rich and the poor meet together; the Lord is the maker of them all," Prov. xxii. 2. I should not fear, if the best of those mendicants should preach you a sermon against riches, that you would presently be out of love with them: I rather fear, you would be greedy of this unrighteous mammon, whosoever condemns it. Therefore for your satisfaction, you may be rich and happy, if you will be rich and godly. It is the bad affection, not the lawful possession, of riches, that we blame. The substance is good, if there be not sin in the conscience, Ecclus. xiii. 24. God doth not charge us to renounce riches, but to avoid the dangers incident to them. When they come in God's name, in God's name let them be accepted; otherwise the saints would none of them. Abram refused the king of Sodom's liberal offer, lest he should say, "I have made Abram rich," Gen. xiv. 23. God had promised to be his great reward: the King of heaven shall make him rich, the king of Sodom shall not. "Moses refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter," Heb. xi. 24: not that he thought it unlawful; for when God called him to honour, he behaved himself as a worthy prince. Daniel refusing the king's portion for pulse, yet thought it no sin to fare well; therefore being advanced to honour, he kept a table befitting his estate.

But those that are God's sworn pensioners, will not live at men's findings. What he gives bountifully, they take thankfully. As Achsah, when her father had given her a portion desired also a blessing; so where God gives a portion, there is always a blessing with it. Otherwise, as at a funeral dinner there are many guests, and great cheer, but no mirth, because he is dead that should make it; so in a full estate there is variety and abundance, but no joy of conscience, because that is wanting which should give it, the love of God in Christ.

All things are not to be blended in a community. The Christian hath a double right to the things of this life. First, a spiritual right. Man came naked out of the earth, yet was he then so rich as to be lord of all. Heaven was his roof, earth his floor, the sea his pond, the sun and moon his torches, all creatures his vassals. This though God's earthly son lost to his posterity, yet his heavenly Son recovered for his chosen; in whom all things are ours, and we are his, and he is God's, 1 Cor. iii. 22, 23. Secondly, a civil or human right: for it is false to say, there is no tenure but grace, no title but charity. By the rule of grace, the civil owner may be a spiritual usurper, and the spiritual owner may be a civil beggar. But there is another law, jus gentium, or the law of nations, whereby God divides to every man his own propriety; otherwise that were a superfluous commandment, "Thou shalt not steal;" for no man can steal his own. In a word, Paul chargeth Timothy to charge the rich in this world, that they be not high-minded, &c. 1 Tim. vi. 17. He says not, Charge men that they be not rich, but charge the rich that they be not proud. Your riches shall do you good, when you do good with your riches. But many a man may say of his wealth, as it was epitaphed on that pope, He got it like a fox, held it like a lion, and left it like a dog: as the boat drowns the passenger, yet afterward comes itself safe to the shore. Riches too often do worldlings the kindness to help them unto hell, and that when they are,

2. The wages of unrighteousness. The gain that comes in by unwarrantable means, defineth this wages. God hath set certain bounds and limits, beyond which if men step to get wealth, they may get it with a vengeance. Every man hath his orb or compass, justice, integrity, innocence: if he can be rich within that allowed sphere, much good do it him. Balaam would have built himself a fortune upon the ruins of Israel, and got wealth by a curse: the curse indeed he got, but the wealth he missed. So it becomes the wages of unrighteousness. Not to mention those two trusty servants of mammon, use and brokerage, which have been so anciently, so universally condemned; there be some trades that live altogether by this wages, and so reconcile at once lucrum in arca and damnum in conscientia; i. e. gain in the chest and loss in the conscience. They have two evasions: First, every thing is worth what it may be sold for. But as a rigorous price is the breach of charity, so an excessive price is the violation of justice. It is no matter how they honest it with fair profit, when God shall judge it foul theft; or how they esteem that lawful gains, which they shall find unrighteous wages. Secondly, let it be at the buyer's peril: though the measure be defective, the matter vicious, all insufficient; yet still let the buyer look to it. No man can wrong himself, none are bound to buy. But do they not both conceal the faults in their knowledge, and protest the goodness against their knowledge. Is not deficiency of worth their chief apprentice, and excess of price their best factor? Whatsoever comes by force or by fraud, falls under this term, the wages of unrighteousness, and will fall heavy upon the gainers. It is an unhappy profit that ariseth from another's loss: he that cares not who doth lose so he may gain, shall be sure that whosoever gains heaven he shall lose it. The oppressor will hedge in his poor neighbour's estate, though it be to his utter undoing; as the thief cuts off the traveller's finger, and it be but to have his ring. Let me have thy vineyard, saith Ahab, and I will give thee a better for it, or the price of it in money, 1 Kings xxi. 2. One would think here was square dealing; no extorting it by force, but requiring it by a fair composition, either the value in money or in exchange. Yet was there iniquity under this pretence: for God had forbidden the Israelites to alienate their inheritances; this Ahab knew; and therefore what Naboth might not lawfully do, he might not lawfully require. It was well that he did not wrest it, it was not well that he did desire it; yet now, against all justice, he will have it. Being denied, he falls sick of the sullen, and is ready to break his heart, because God's law might not be broken. In this fit Satan sends him a physician; Jezebel casts cold water on his face, and puts spirits into him of her own extraction: "Let thy heart be merry, I will give thee the vineyard of Naboth," ver. 7. Satan knew of old, when mischief was to be done, where to find a helper. A fast is warned, the city assembled, Naboth convented, confronted, accused, sentenced, stoned; and now his vineyard is escheated to the crown. The false witnesses have their wages out of Jezebel's purse, the judges have their wages out of Ahab's favour, Ahab and Jezebel have their wages out of Naboth's vineyard; but Naboth speeds the best, for he changeth a vineyard on earth for a glorious inheritance in heaven. Here was the difference; Ahab shall lose a kingdom for a vineyard, Naboth shall lose a vineyard for a kingdom. Thus Gehazi runs after Naaman for this unrighteous wages: his master was careful to win honour to God, and credit to his profession, by denying those Syrian presents; the man will mar all in requiring, in receiving them. He will enrich himself by belying his master, and disparage that holy function in the eyes of a new convert; and all for a little of this cursed trash. Yea, Judas will betray his Master, his Saviour, himself, for this unrighteous wages. Oh how execrable is that gain which doth lose the soul! how desperate is that soul which will be lost for gain! Did not Satan first make sots of worldlings, he could never persuade them to venture their eternal blessedness for these transitory vanities: yet still they love this wages; which is the next point.

3. The baseness of the covetous heart, to love the wages of unrighteousness. There is no man that loves evil for itself, but for some imaginary good he expects from it. Something is proposed, either profit, or pleasure, or some kind of wages, that tempt men to love sin, else they never would embrace it. Achan would not have sacrileged, nor Gehazi have disgraced the prophet, but for the wages of gain. The most wicked do not love evil simply for itself, but for some other respects, which is their propounded wages. To discover this folly, let me describe riches to you by their three properties.

(1.) By their foundation, or the garden where they grow; this world. All is but earth; they consist in acres of earth, bowels of earth, beasts of the earth; and all are valued by pieces of earth. They all come from the earth, tend to the earth, and one mouthful of earth makes an end of them all. The earth is the basest part of the world; yet earth is the end of all this wages, except (which is worse) some of it be taken out in hell. They are like Nebuchadnezzar's image, a composition of metals; but the foot is clay. God hath laid heaven open to our eyes, and placed our heads next heaven; but gold and silver he hath hid from our eyes, and placed them under our feet. Yet worldlings invert all; and, like tumblers, stand upon their heads, and kick at heaven with their heels. They subject their hearts to that, which God hath subjected to their feet. Covetousness is idolatry; St. Paul puts them both in a bag: now how sordid is that idolatry which shall worship deum lutulentum, i. e. a dirty god!

As riches grow in the world, so they go not out of the world. It is but a pagan folly, to put money in the dead man's hand at his burial, to defray his charges in another world. Of all our hoards and heaps we shall not carry one single penny with us. Among the Indians, belts, bracelets, and rattles were of high esteem; yet we despise them. Their gold and silver is precious in Europe, which was there contemptible. Things are as they are used or valued: the monies that pass in divers countries are not current here, nor much of ours there. All our pieces of gold are but current to the grave; none of them will pass in the future world. Therefore as merchants when they travel make over their monies here, to receive them by bills of exchange in another country: let us do good with our goods while we live, that when we die, by a blessed bill of exchange, we may receive them again in the kingdom of heaven, Luke xvi. 9. To part with that we cannot keep, that we may get that we cannot lose, is a good bargain. Wealth can do us no good, unless it help us toward heaven.

(2.) By their uncertainty. The form of money agrees well with the condition of it; it is stamped round, because it is so apt to run away. Could we be rich so long as we live, yet that were uncertain enough; for life itself is but a dream, a shadow, but a dream of a shadow. (August.) Rich men are but like hailstones; they make a noise in the world, as the other rattle on the tiles of a house; down they fall, lie still, and melt away. So that if riches could stay by a man, yet he cannot stay by them. Spite of his teeth, he shall carry away nothing when he dies. Psal. xlix. 17. Life and goods are both in a vessel, both cast away at once; yea, of the two, life hath the more likelihood of continuance. Let it fly never so fast away, riches have eagles' wings, and will outfly it. There be thieves in the high-ways, that will take our monies and spare our lives. In our penal laws, there be not so many ways to forfeit our lives as our goods. Rich Job lived to see himself poor to a proverb. How many in this city reputed rich, yet have broken for thousands! There are innumerable ways to be poor; a fire, a thief, a false servant, suretiship, trusting of bad customers, an unfaithful factor, a pirate, an unskilful pilot, hath brought rich men to poverty. One gale of wind is able to make merchants rich or beggars. Man's life is like the banks of a river, his temporal estate is the stream: time will moulder away the banks, but the stream stays not for that, it glides away continually. Life is the tree, riches are the fruit, or rather the leaves; the leaves will fall, the fruit is plucked, and yet the tree stands. Some write of the pine-tree; that if the bark be pulled off, it lasts long; being on, it rots. If the worldling's bark were stripped off, he might perhaps live the longer, there is great hope he would live the better.

Why should we dote upon this world, which hath so many doors to let out wealth? Why love wealth, that when the doors are shut, and all the windows, can yet creep out at a quarry, at a cranny? Who would stake or wager his mansion-house against a booth? Curious glasses are pleasing vessels; yet because they are brittle, we do not think them precious. Solomon's royalty was not comparable to a lily, nor the crown on his head to the coronation-flower in the garden: yet because they are flowers, whose time is but for a month, necessitated to fading, we respect them thereafter; to-day they are for the oom, to-morrow for the besom. There is nothing durable that is not durable; nor doth it afford us much joy in the welcome, as sorrow in the farewell. It is with the rich man at his death, as with sleeping man when he wakes out of his dream. In life the worldling hath much; all this while he reams; when he dies and wakes, he is not worth one roat. Alas, that we should set our hearts and hazard our souls on that, which is so certain to vanish and so uncertain to stay! It was the speech of a worthy father, This is all I have got by my riches and honour; I had something to which I could prefer my Saviour. Happy are we, when we care not to all any thing our own but Jesus Christ.

(3.) By their mischief. Many think themselves undone by losing them, but too many are undone by keeping them. Our Saviour calls them thorns. First, for their sharpness; they prick and pierce the heart through with many sorrows, 1 Tim. vi. 10. They expose men to dangers; the fat booty invites the thief: they are but sponges, that suck up much for one squeezing. Children inquire into the age of their parents, executors long to close up their eyes; sometimes the pillow is pulled from under their heads a day before their times. Weapons of iron hunt after wedges of gold. Still gold is the most perilous metal. Secondly, thorns are the shelter for serpents, and riches the den of many sins. They are haunted with temptations and snares, with foolish and hurtful lusts, that drown men in destruction, 1 Tim. vi. 9. The foulest fact that ever was done in the world, was done for money; even the betraying of Christ. Thirdly, they hinder the growth of corn, and the path-way of passengers; but not more than riches do choke the seed of the word, and of all grace; and bar up the way to the kingdom of heaven. But the greatest mischief of all is, they steal away our hearts from God. That joy and content which we should find in our Maker, we seek in our drudge. Yea, even the faith of good men is invaded with the fear of want. Indeed the dissolute make it none of their fear; and shall we? Will God be worse to them that follow him, than he is to them that forsake him? Yet, alas, how doth wealth engross men's confidence!

What is there that the rich man hopes not to do? He can buy honours and offices, he can buy out faults and offences; yea, foolish Magus thought the Holy Ghost himself might be had for money; and Satan presumed that this bait would even catch the Son of God. Yet what can riches do? Can they put off the gout, assuage grief, thrust out cares, suspend death, prevent hell, or bribe Satan? A satin sleeve can as well heal a broken arm. Indeed this they can do; they can anger God, hurt men, bar the gates of heaven, open the gates of hell, and forward souls to confusion. They are false friends, that will be sure never to fail men but when they have need of them. Sickness will besiege thee, death will summon thee, God will pass his doom on thee: in all this, what can riches avail thee? our manifold receipts shall but greaten our accounts; and the moderate estate will have the easier reckoning. Riches are a pit, wherein to we soon slip, but can hardly scramble out. Æsop hath a fable of the two frogs, that in the time of drought, when the marshes were dry, consulted what was best to be done. One advised to go down into a deep well, because it was likely the water would not fail there. The other answered, But if it do fail, how shall we get up again? Small puddles, light gains, will not serve some; they must plunge into deep wells, excessive profits; but they do not consider how they should get out again. So it comes to pass, that either they are famished for want of grace, or drowned in a deluge of riches. If this world be a sea, over which we must swim to the land of promise, I do not see what use there is of this abundant luggage, unless it be to sink us in the waters.

To conclude. We are here like unexperienced young travellers in an inn: the host bids us cheerfully welcome; we flow and frolic, and spend with mirth while our stock lasts: that once gone, the host's changed countenance drives us out of doors with shame and nakedness. We exhaust the virtues and powers of our souls, in satisfying our covetous and carnal lusts; but then at last we must depart away sad and melancholy, bankrupt of all goodness, clothed only with scorn and sinfulness. Our joys are like fire, either durable or transient according to their subjects. Fire in straw is a blaze and away; in solid wood, lasting. Joy in heavenly things is everlasting; in the stubble of earth, but a flash. We find keys of iron and of gold; we know not to what locks they will guide us, therefore we choose the golden ones. At last we see by experience, that the richer metal brings us to the poorer purchase, it opens only a cabinet of toys and bracelets; but the iron keys of labour, repentance, and mortification, which we slighted, do open the doors of heaven, and let us into those invaluable treasures. The blood being poisoned, hath recourse to the heart, as the principal fort and refuge; but while there it seeks remedy, it thither brings instant death. Our desires infected with the world, run to the heart; and while they call it to rejoice with them, they bring it to destruction. Drowning men catch hold of any thing that comes next to hand, though it be the root of a weed; yea, they will lay hold on them that lay hold on others. They that are plunged into the gulf of avarice, for want of better stay, rest upon the rotten sticks of wealth, and so perish. Man's heart is so conscious of its own weakness, that it must have somewhat to trust upon; it cannot move without a prop: now a weak stay is held better than none at all. Politicians say, Better a tyrant than no king: but who would refuse a good king for a tyrant? Who would trust in riches, that might trust in God? 1 Tim. vi. 17. Riches are but for this world; God is Lord of this world, and of that also to come. Where the glory of this world ends, the glory of heaven begins. Riches are here to-day and gone to-morrow; but Christ is "the same yesterday, and to-day, and for ever," Heb. xiii. 8. He is the first and the last; blessing our beginning, crowning our end, and never forsaking us in the midst. Riches are but lifeless and senseless things; merely passive in gift; they cannot so much as bestow themselves, much less other things. The Lord is a living God and a giving God; unchangeable in his goodness, most bountiful in his beneficence. It is good to trust in the Lord. Some trust in their horses, and some in their swords; some trust in their lands, and some in their wits; some trust in their friends, and some in their monies; but let us trust in the Lord: the rest may have their uses, only God shall have the confidence of our hearts for ever.

Take the sum of all: the mischief of this wages of unrighteousness is not confined to this life; the full payment of it is in hell. Balaam desired one wages, but he found another: gold he coveted, as the reward of sin; this he required, and had not. Judgment he found, the reward of sin indeed; this he had, though he required it not. He went not away without wages; what the treasure of Moab denied him, the sword of Israel paid him. Unjust gains never escaped just vengeance. A man may come honestly by his wealth, and yet dishonestly use it, by making his table a snare. So God sends meat, but there is another that brings cooks; a good estate is dressed to an ill purpose. But that which is unjustly acquired will be justly required. "He that hath swallowed down riches, shall vomit them up again; God shall cast them out of his belly," Job xx. 15. God had reserved to himself the treasure of Jericho; the blood of that wicked city shall be spilt to his honour, the riches kept for his use. Who but a miscreant can grudge that God should serve himself of his own? Achan spies a booty, and filcheth it; Israel knows not of it; they go on in their wars, and are beaten by a little town. Joshua expostulates, "O Lord, what shall I say, when Israel turneth their backs before their enemies," Josh. vii. 8. God answers, "Israel hath sinned:" that people which prevailed for their faith, are beaten for their sin. A fault is committed, but by whom? The crime is spoken of, not the man. What shall discover him? A lot. Achan thought he might have lain as close in all the throng of Israel, as the wedge of gold lay in his tent. This hope of secrecy first moved him to sin, and now arms him with confidence against fear of shame. But when he saw the lot fall on his tribe, he began to startle; when upon his family, he changes countenance; when upon his household, he quakes with amazement; and is no less than confounded, when himself is designed the man. With what eyes did Achan look on that spoil, which his fellows saw and contemned? The overprizing of riches will make men transgress for a piece of bread. They that admire the glory of metals or brave clothes, shall not be innocent. But what was the reward of all this? The lot discovers him, the stones kill him, his family and substance perish with him. Lo, ye that fear not to rob God of his consecrated things, what shall be the wages of your unrighteous sacrilege: you cannot go to the grave in peace.

Gehazi derives from Naaman a rich gift, lays it up, wipes his mouth, and stands before his master, whom he had so foully abused, 2 Kings v. 25; as if he thought to blind the eyes of a seer. All his attendance on that wonder-working prophet had not wrought so much on his heart, as to know that the undeceivable eye of Divine Providence discerned his works, his words, his thoughts. He runs, fetches, disburdens, conceals; but where did he think God was all this while? To convince his hypocrisy, his master asks him, "Whence comest thou, Gehazi?" to let him know, that he knew he had been where he should not. "Thy servant went no whither." He had got the booty with a lie, and with a lie he would keep it. Whosoever loves this wages, must not stick with the devil for such a service; if a man will steal, it is necessary he should lie. In those days, to lie unto the prophets was as much as now to outface our senses; yea, our eyes seen not half so clearly as did their minds. This Gehazi might have considered afore; that prophets have spiritual eyes, not confined to bodily objects; that their hearts went abroad, when themselves sat still at home. Went not mine heart with thee? Hear then, and be convinced: Is this a time to receive money and garments, oliveyards and vineyards, sheep and oxen, men-servants and maid-servants, ver. 26; which in thy conceit thou hast already purchased? Hither thou wentest, this thou saidst, thus thou didst, and thus thou speddest. How pale now did this guilty thief stand before the tribunal of his master! With what a trembling heart did he expect some heavy judgment! Hear this, ye lovers of wealth; all your ways be overlooked by invisible witnesses; and when you have gotten riches, and forgotten the unrighteous means, the Divine justice shall call you to a reckoning, perhaps worse than Gehazi's. Yet his talents could not buy off his sores, nor his garments hide his shame: his tears might wash off the guilt of his sin; not they and another Jordan shall cleanse his leprosy. That shall remain as an hereditary monument of God's wrath upon fraud, avarice, sacrilege: and he shall more lively proclaim to the world by his face, than others by their lips, the cursed wages of unrighteousness.

Take one instance more: Ahab promiseth Naboth very reasonable composition for his vineyard, 1 Kings xxi. 2. This seemed a fair motion, yet Naboth saw violence under this plausibleness, and refuseth to bargain. He did not so much stick at the land, as at the law; one earth might be as good as another, and money as good as either. Naboth did not fear loss, but sin; he would gladly be quit of his patrimony, if God would acquit him of iniquity. Yet Ahab falls sick, and takes a strange surfeit of those grapes he never tasted. Jezebel undertakes to cure him; "I will give thee the vineyard of Naboth," ver. 7. Ahab wanted neither wit nor wickedness, yet he was a mere novice to Jezebel; there needed no other devil to plot and execute this mischief. What, shall a subject deny his king? I will soon rid the king of such a subject. She suborns false witnesses, and corrupts the senators; those accuse Naboth of blasphemy, these judge him to die, the people stone him: here was a quick despatch, an easy payment for a rich vineyard. All this while God sits still, and says nothing. Much good do it thee, O king, with thy vineyard; many fair flowers and sweet grapes may it yield thee: applaud thy Jezebel for her cunning, triumph over the blood of a harmless subject, please thyself with thy wages of unrighteousness; yet let me rather die the death of Naboth, than do the deed of Ahab. Naboth's turn was over, when Ahab's was to come. Naboth and Ahab shall both bleed; the one by the stones of the Jezreelites, the other by the shafts of the Aramites. Ahab dealt cruelly with Naboth, God shall deal severely with Ahab. The dogs shall lick his guilty blood, that to the dogs had given the blood of the innocent. Only the cause and the end makes the difference: Naboth lives holy, and dies happy; Ahab lives in wickedness, and dies in vengeance. Naboth bleeds as a martyr, Ahab as a murderer. Consider this just retaliation, ye whose covetousness hath made beggars, and then not relieved them; your children shall beg, and none give them. Read Psal. cix. 10—12. Or perhaps God will take order for your wives and children, as he did for Ahab's: whether they die in the city or in the fields, the dogs or the fowls shall eat them, 1 Kings xxi. 24. You shall not need to take thought for your posterity, or study to traduce your ill-got riches; God will ease you of that care, by depriving you of heirs. You have made your children not more heirs of your body than of your curse; the curse shall remain theirs, but God shall dispose of the riches. Ahab's cruelty to Naboth hath made both the mother and the children dogs' meat. God will recompense the slowness with the sharpness of his revenges. A Syrian draws a bow, wounds Ahab, his blood flows in the chariot, and pays Naboth his arrears. The chariot is washed in the pool of Samaria, the dogs come to claim their due. Jezebel is thrown out of a window, and brained: for their due, the dogs come again. They lick the blood of Ahab, they eat the flesh of Jezebel: the tongues of those brute creatures make good the tongue of God's prophet. I hope you will now say, that Naboth's vineyard is thoroughly paid for.

Let me conclude with Balaam. The king dismissed him, and he pretended haste homewards; but he lingered so long, that he left his bones in Midian, Jumb. xxxi. 8. His tongue had insensibly slain many thousands of them, their sword shall kill him or it. Nor is it mentioned for his honour, that he ell among the kings; but for special notice, that all his sorcery could not save his life. Moses seeing that they had slain the men, and reserved the women, grew angry. These caused Israel to sin, by the counsel of Balaam; therefore kill every woman that hath known man, ver. 16, 17. They that had tempted the lust of Israel with their faces, shall feel the revenge of Israel in their bloods. How happy was he that had not played the harlot; her maiden-head was her ransom! whereas she that had lost her virginity, must lose her life. Righteous are all thy judgments, O God.

Now as men seriously love this wages, let them accept of such a service. What shall it do you good, that you have scraped, and heaped, and hoarded, when God shall come to reckon with you for all these? I would not have one widow weep, nor one orphan cry against me, for all the wealth of the Indies. Nor is it enough to clear thee, that thou didst not injuriously get what thou hast penuriously kept. The thief is not worse than the receiver, nor the hoarder any better than a purloiner. Some get their wealth with a false key, others keep it with a rusty lock; both shall be convinced of uncharitableness. The fox and badger (in the fable) come to the lion's court, to present their new-year's gifts. The fox had nothing but from hand to mouth, yet he gave liberally; the badger had store lying by him, yet pleaded poverty, and gave sparingly. But the lion censured them both to death, because the one did steal to pay tribute, the other would not pay tribute of what he had stolen. The politic worldling deceives, gains, and gives somewhat; the hoarder scratches, multiplies, and keeps all: God shuts them both out of heaven, by the warrant of two texts. The one, "Let him that stole steal no more: but rather let him labour, working with his hands the thing which is good, that he may have to give to him that needeth," Eph. iv. 28. The Lord will take no bribes; we must honestly get what we charitably give. The other, "So is he that layeth up treasure for himself," Luke xii. 21; even like that wretched churl, who purposes to fill his barns and furnish his soul; so, that is, as very a fool as he was. They may think themselves the only wise men, fit for honours and offices; but they are fools on earth, and no fools shall enter into heaven. This is indeed the wages of unrighteousness; now grace keep us from such a service, and mercy deliver us from such wages.

But was rebuked for his iniquity: the dumb ass speaking with man's voice forbade the madness of the prophet.

God in the Old Testament, Christ in the New, angels, the prophets, the apostles, the fathers, all preachers, all Christians that have hope of heaven, yea, all reasonable men that discern the vanity of the earth, have spoken against covetousness. Now we shall come a step lower, and hear what an unreasonable beast doth say against it. So we have it condemned from the mouth of the Lord, from the mouth of Christ, from that of angels, prophets, apostles, preachers, wise men, and last and lowest from the mouth of an ass; and if all this prevail not, we shall hear it from the mouths of them that have no mouths at all: "The stone shall cry out of the wall, and the beam out of the timber," Hab. ii. 11; the silver and gold shall cry; even riches themselves shall cry out against the love of riches. Beasts have mouths, but not to speak; stones shall speak, yet they have no mouths. To prove it a worse than beastly sin, God hath enabled a beast to condemn it. We have these particulars: first, the scholar, a prophet. Secondly, the schoolmaster, or rather school-dame; for it is asina, an ass. Thirdly, the lesson, which is reprehensive; she rebuked, she forbade. Fourthly, the manner of her teaching; which is not emblematical, nor enigmatical, but plain; with man's voice. Fifthly, the fault for which she corrected him, was iniquity, and madness.

1. The scholar was a prophet, but what kind of one? First, we find him sacrificing in the mount of Baal: had he been from the true God, he would rather have said, Pull down these altars, than built up new ones: the very place and number convince him of idolatry. Seeing his seven bullocks and seven rams smoking on his seven altars, he goes up higher into the mount to receive God's answer. This haply he had learned of Moses: so nearly a false prophet can counterfeit a true one. An answer he hath, and that from God; but will God meet a sorcerer? Will he put prophecies into the lips of a magician? O man, who shall teach God the choice of his instruments? He knows how to employ not only saints and angels, but even wicked men, beasts, and devils, to his glory. Why should we wonder that Balaam receives visions, when his very ass hath her eyes and mouth opened; those to see the angel, this to reason with her master. Those words were but transient, gliding through him, and could not be defiled because they were none of his. His heart did not conceive them, though his tongue uttered them. The trunk through which a man speaks, is not the more eloquent for that speech. The looking-glass shows us our faces, yet is itself blind. The bells that ring us to church hear not their own noise. The wax that seals up the letter knows not the contents of it. A book of morality may teach us good behaviour, while itself becomes mouldy or ragged. Balaam's tongue shall convince Moab, and do good to Israel, not better himself. Many shall say, We have prophesied in thy name; and speak it for their honour; to whom Christ replies, Depart from me, ye wicked, Matt. vii. 22, 23; turning it to their shame. How divine were the parables that God uttered by Balaam! Stay but a while and you shall find Satan in the same mouth. That which came from God was sweet and heavenly; that mere villany which came from Satan: the good was God's, the evil was his own. Nor was he saved for his excellent prophecy, but lost by his hellish policy. There was no thanks to him for his good parable, but many plagues for his bad counsel. It is no wonder to hear God speak with a false prophet: Pharaoh, Abimelech, Nebuchadnezzar had visions; Caiaphas had his inspiration; none of them had his gracious benediction. Yea, God spake unto Satan, and that in a familiar question, "Whence comest thou?" Job i. 7. Men will bestow words where they will not bestow favour; the argument of God's love is not the sound of his voice, but the matter of his speech. "The Lord will speak peace unto his people," Psal. lxxxv. 8. He may speak to his enemies, he will speak peace to none but his saints. It is a poor brag of the undeserving subject, The king hath spoken to me: but what did he say? The judge speaks to the malefactor, when he gives him his sentence. Hath God spoken to thee? so he hath done to reprobates and devils: but what said he? Did he say to thy soul, I am thy salvation? Did he say, I am thy God, thou art my son? Thou canst not hear this voice and perish.

Use. Balaam was a bad man, shall we therefore reject his good prophecy? God forbid. If men be mortally sick, will they refuse to be cured by a sick physician? A lame steward may give a good alms from the purse of his rich master. Shall we think, the Spirit of God hath so tied himself to the goodness of the speaker, that he will not open the heart of the hearer, unless he hear a holy teacher? How doth this absurdity meet with popery at the back-door! Why does the novelist rail at the papist, when they both shake hands in the same opinion, That the goodness of the priest blesseth the word or sacraments? What, shall not I be saved by hearing, unless the preacher be saved whom I hear? Is the grace of God tied to the ministry of man? Shall the servant share the honour with his Master? Christ charged the people to observe their doctrines that sat in Moses' seat, Matt. xxiii. 3; yet were they such as he termed hypocrites, and on whom he heaped woes. Paul rejoiced that Christ was preached, whether in pretence or in truth, Phil. i. 18; yet they that preached him in pretence were not likely to be sanctified. What Christ commanded, and Paul commended, these men censure. The picture may be excellent and lively, representing the person whereof it is a counterfeit; and yet the painter be no handsome man. If the limner be unlike his piece, the beauty of that disgraceth him, but itself is lovely. Thou art condemned, and the prince sends thee a pardon by another that is condemned; wilt thou none of it therefore? The religious eye looks to the comfort of the message, not to the misery of the messenger. A bad man may bring good news, as God sent blessings to Israel by the mouth of accursed Balaam. Samson did not disdain the sweets because he found them uncleanly laid, in the lion's carcass. His diet was strict enough; he might not eat that which savoured of legal impurity; yet he ventures on the honeycomb in the belly of a dead beast. Good should not be refused because the means are accidentally evil; honey is honey, though in a dead lion. They are more scrupulous and less wise than Samson, that abhor the graces of God, because they find them in ill vessels. One will not take a good receipt from the hand of a physician, because he is given to unlawful studies. Another will not receive a deserved contribution from the hand of a usurer. A third will not hear the sermon, because he hath found some fault with the preacher. How sullen is this neglect, not to accept the honey because we hate the lion! as if Elijah should have scorned his breakfast because it was brought him by a raven. God's children have right to their Father's blessings where-soever they find them. Let the doctrine be good, and the heart good; this shall save the hearer, whatsoever becomes of the preacher.

2. The school-dame is asina, an ass. This is not the first time that God hath taught men by beasts, though it may be the first beast that ever he taught to speak unto man. And what if the Maker of all will teach one creature by another, the better by the inferior? there is none so contemptible which is not useful. Howsoever the ass, among all beasts, hath the most despised name; yet there be some things in him not unworthy of imitation. Some have made him an image of thriftiness, some an emblem of painfulness, some a pattern of temperance, others a miracle of patience. And be not frugality, industry, moderation, and long-sufferance, lessons worth our learning? For innocency; he is not harmful as the horse or ox. For usefulness; some few particular labours are exacted of other beasts, the ass is good for all. For moderation; he will live upon thistles. For patience; he endures hunger, thirst, and stripes without murmuring. Their milk is precious against consumptions; and famine thought their flesh sweet, when "an ass's head was sold for fourscore pieces of silver," 2 Kings vi. 25. It was with the new jaw-bone of an ass that Samson revenged God on a thousand Philistines; nor could all their forces withstand that contemptible engine, till it had left ten hundred bodies as dead as that carcass whose bone it was. With that base instrument Samson gave death to the Philistines, and from the same God gave Samson refreshing. One bone yields him both conquest and life, and was both a weapon of war and a well of water.

Thus useful hath this poor beast been; now indeed corruption hath made the name ignominious, and to all ridiculous purposes our common talk applies the ass: As ingenious as an ass, as courteous as an ass, as stupid as an ass, &c.

But now the more despicable this beast is, the more shame is it for man to be set under such a tutor. As there be some good things in the ass to be imitated; so she is an emblem of some vices to be shunned. We do not approve the folly, the stupidity, the misery, the slavery of the ass. Therefore was the teacher fitted for the scholar: a foolish beast to teach a man that was self-conceited; a stupid beast to teach him that was too precipitated; a miserable beast to teach him that placed happiness in riches; a slavish beast to teach him that was so basely subjected by his own affections.

(1.) For folly; when we speak of a defective understanding, we say, As wise as an ass. But no ass can be so foolish as the covetous. He lays up for to-morrow, and is not sure to live out this night; is not this a fool? He provides for himself, without any faith to depend upon God's finding; surely the fowls of the air and flowers of the field are not such fools. To work himself into a rich fortune, he neglects to work out his own salvation; is not this a fool? He refuseth God's service, which would save him, for mammon's service, that will confound him; is not this a fool? O wealth, how many fools dost thou make in a year! The eagles are about carcasses, bears about honey, bees about oil, wolves about sheep, and fools about riches. Many of them are worse than asses; for the ass doth not use to bite, they pinch to death. To end all controversy, God himself calls them fools, Luke xii. 20: and what is it for men to deem them wily foxes, when the Judge hath pronounced them foolish asses?

(2.) For stupidity; the ass is a dull and blockish creature, and in one sense, so are the covetous; fit for nothing but taxes and subsidies, to bear the commonwealth's burdens. The strength of the boar is in his tusk, of the elephant in his trunk, of the lion in his paws, of the ass in his back, of the covetous in his back-burden. Where the treasure is, there will the heart be also: now the heart of a usurer is to be found where his money lies; if that be in danger abroad, he is heavy and heartless at home. He so loads himself with thick clay, Hab. ii. 6, that he cannot stir a foot toward heaven. He flies with no other wings, walks with no other staff, fights with no other sword, minds no other business, but his riches. Indeed, what hath he to do? He needs not sweat for his bread, others sweat for him. He needs not go to the market, the market will come to him. To visit the poor, he hath little inclination; to spend his time in prayer, less. He is both like the mill and the mill-horse; turning and toiling within his compass; grinding the bones of the poor; still there at night where he begun in the morning. If he be a lay-man, his journey is always for a purchase; if

of the clergy, he will switch and spur for a benefice. Bees make the honey, and drones suck the hive; oxen plough the ground, and asses reap the harvest. It is said in Job, "The oxen were ploughing, and the asses feeding beside them," Job i. 14. Laborious oxen, painful preachers, spend their time in ploughing; and lazy asses eat up their labours, being always feeding. Great revenues belong to the contemplative convent, while the devout and active preacher is a mendicant. God appointed the ark to be carried only by Levites, yet was it once carried by oxen, and then it was ready to fall, 2 Sam. vi. 6; but when it is carried by ignorant asses, how should it stand?

(3.) For misery; the ass is the poorest beast: he carries his master, and meat for his master, but fasts himself. He endures sore labours and sharp blows all day; at night he is turned forth to seek his supper on the bare commons. The worldling is vexed with many cares; yet, after all, hath not the power to give himself one comfortable meal. He abates from his stomach, to add unto his coffers; and, just like the ass, having borne a burden of gold all day, all night he feeds upon thistles. He thinks himself admired for his wealth; and therein he is an ass too: for as the ass that carried the goddess, seeing the people bow in reverence as he passed by, did think that homage was done to him which was meant to his burden; so the respect that is given, is not to the man, but to his riches. "Wealth maketh many friends," Prov. xix. 4; they are friends to the wealth, not to the man. Now can there be greater misery, than to starve in the midst of abundance? Alas, he is but the jailer of his estate, to keep the keys; till at last death opens the doors, dischargeth the prisoner, and commits the keeper, and that to a strong and woeful dungeon. He is thirsty by the spring, and dares not drink for fear the fountain should fail him; yea, he cannot drink, that is God's curse upon him.

(4.) For slavery; the ass is not only a slave to man, but even to other beasts: the lion toils him, the ox gores him, the horse beats him, the fox cheats him; all are too hard for him; he dares deny none of them his service. He is animal subjugale, the word our apostle here useth, i. e. ordained for the yoke. The worldling is not only a slave to his mammon, but even to all the brokers and panders of filthy lucre. He rides his ass, and Satan rides him; he spurs his ass, and Satan spurs him; he bridles his ass, and Satan may post him to hell with a golden bit. There is no sin he will deny, no baseness he can refuse, to be rich. The ass is servile against his will; the covetous gives his full consent to this slavery. Justly therefore is one ass set to school another: and if this latter will not be schooled, they shall change names and natures; the ass shall be the man, and the man shall be the ass. If there be a fountain, the beasts of the forest will drink, and the wild asses quench their thirst; but if a man will be miserable here, to become everlastingly wretched hereafter, oh what an ass is he! Now the grace of God direct us a better course, that we may find a better recompence; and by despising this world which Balaam sought, we may have treasure in that world which Balaam lost.

3. The lesson is reprehensive; she rebuked, she forbid. A prophet, and come to be reproved? this was preposterous. A teacher taught, a rebuker rebuked, is but a harsh hearing. Yet hath it been no strange thing: the praise of the centurion was the shame of Israel; the mercy of the Samaritan the condemnation of the uncharitable Levite; the thankful returning of the strange leper an exprobration to all the nine, when God had his tithe from a person where he least expected it. "What meanest thou, O sleeper? arise, call upon thy God," saith the shipmaster to Jonah, Jonah i. 6. What an astonishment was this! An infidel leads an Israelite to his prayers: the preacher is become an auditor, the seaman a preacher; the patient heals the physician. Yet truth is truth, wheresoever we find it: "Call upon thy God," was good counsel, though it came from a Gentile. He says again, "Why hast thou done this?" ver. 10. They worshipped a false god, he the true; yet was he colder in his devotion to the true than they were to the false. How pitiful is it, when a babe must catechise a man, when a Turk shall find a Christian false, and say to him, Why hast thou done this? A child may think, speak, do as a child; but of a man there is more required. If darkness be on the hill, what light is in the valley? Errors of the eminent are eminent errors. The tattered beggar can spy a small rent in a silken coat. It is ill to deserve the censure of inferiors; fearful, of beasts: when Israel shall be taught thankfulness by the ox; when the dogs shall be mentioned to the confutation of the rich churl; when the rash prophet shall be disputed with by his ass. It was a shame for Sarah, and no great praise for Abraham, when an Abimelech shall say, Thy husband is to thee the covering of the eyes, &c. Gen. xx. 16. Let prophets take heed how they give a theme to atheists; they will quarrel at our good actions, much more at our manifest criminations. Our faults be their sport: if Samson stumble, the Philistines shout and triumph. Indeed God useth their declamations as a rod to whip his children with shame, to save their souls by the bargain. But yet still it is preposterous to come behind them in goodness, whom we go before in knowledge. Balaam's book cannot save him. They tell Christ of their prophesying, casting out devils, and doing wonderful works, in his name, Matt. vii. 22; yet are answered with an I know you not, depart from me. In vain have they prophesied to others, unless they had also prophesied to themselves, and lived like prophets. In vain have they cast devils out of others, retaining one in their own bosoms. In vain have they eaten in his presence, Luke xiii. 26, when neither the example of his life nor the doctrine of his lips hath amended them. Indeed all faults are not to be taxed, all be not faults that are taxed. God openeth that ass's mouth to reprove a manifest error; we have asses that open their mouths to censure they know not what. They will blame their pastor for no other fault, but because he is so, or because he doth not humour their fancies. It were better that such beasts would hold their peace.

She rebuked him. Among all God's preventions and stoppings of us in our ways of sin, reprehension hath a wholesome and necessary place. Our iniquities would be like rottenness in our bones, festering in our bowels to the day of judgment, but for this medicine. So Wisdom begins her lore, reproving simple ones, scorners, and fools, Prov. i. 22; giving us names according to our corrupt natures. God, like a most accurate musician, hath variety of notes and tunes: he hath spoken by a burning bush, by a cloud of water, by a pillar of fire, by visions, by dreams, by miracles, by angels; and by some nearer to us, men; and by one nearest to himself, above all, Jesus Christ, Heb. i. 1, 2. Sometimes he speaks by sensible judgments: Miriam's foul leprosy was a fair warning; Zacharias's dumbness was no dumb teacher to him; Paul's blindness took away his blindness, and made him see more into the way of life, than could all his learning at the feet of Gamaliel. Why may not Balaam be reproved by his own beast? The reprehension was not the beast's, but the Lord's.

He is a wretched man whom God never chides; the first messenger to him is the first-born of death.

This is our ministerial business; not only to teach, but to reprove. Otherwise we offer red, not scarlet; the tincture and dye of our preaching is not in grain, nor penetrating into the soul. Our fire gives light and shining, but kindles not in the conscience. It is oil without wine to the wounded; a crutch to walk withal, when the leg is out of joint, and should be set; holy-days without eves; a passover without sour herbs; continual feasting without sweeping the house. As there is a dicile of joy, "Tell the daughter of Zion, Behold, thy King cometh," Matt. xxi. 5; so there is a dicile of sorrow too, "Tell my people their transgression, and the house of Jacob their sins," Isa. lviii. 1. But most of our hearers are like wanton children, that care not to be mended, but to be commended; he that praiseth them, pleaseth them. They are all apt to conceit well of themselves; but this self-love is (in effect) self-hatred. If we reprove not our brother, God says, we hate him in our heart; and if we suffer not our brother to reprove us, do we not hate our own hearts? How often hath a horse in his full speed miscarried by a precipice, whereas one check had saved him! Yes, I would be reprehended, saith one; but I would not have an ass to do it: as the satirist said, Quis tulcrit Gracchum de seditione loquentem? Who would endure a Gracchus speaking of sedition? But as when God speaks, we regard who, without examining the what; we do it because he commands it; so when man speaks, we regard what more than who: What am I the worse, if the admonition of a fool can make me wiser? Our Maker, that sees our proneness to evil, thinks it best to hedge up our sinful ways with prohibitions. The first precept that ever was given to man, was a prohibition; Thou shalt not eat of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, Gen. ii. 17. Among those ten laws, the ground of all other, there are but two affirmative; the last of the first table, and the first of the last: the other eight are negative, leading us to good by the forbidding of evil. He that will not omit to judge us for omitting the good commanded, for the doing of forbidden evil will not fail to punish us, if he have not punished Christ for us.

4. The fault corrected is twofold; iniquity, and madness. His iniquity is discovered in three particulars.

(1.) He had a desire to curse; and the brand of the desperately wicked is to love cursing. He loved to send it abroad, he shall feel it at home; he wore it about him, he shall have it within him. "Let it come into his bowels like water, and like oil into his bones," Psal. cix. 17, 18. When David's misery deserved compassion, Shimei's foul mouth loaded him with malediction. Hereof he complained; They persecute him whom thou hast smitten, and vex him whom thou hast wounded, Psal. lxi. 26. The picking out of such an opportunity doubled his malicious rancour. Such words would have galled at another time, which now are ready to kill. Let an arrow fly against the wind, it will hardly stick upright; with the wind, it pierceth deep. While thy enemy stands, he may ward thy blows; but once fallen on his back, he is at thy mercy: and how base is that spirit which will prey on prostrate fortunes! Little children have so much valour and justice, as to call him a coward that strikes his adversary when he is down. To insult upon those whom God hath humbled, and to draw blood of that back which is yet blue from the Maker's stripes, is even the murder of a virulent tongue. Nor will it be any rare thing at the day of judgment, for cursers to be indicted of murder. They would kill, if they durst; they do kill as far as they can. I would be loth to trust his hand, that ~~bass~~ me with his lips. Balaam would soon have been the death of all Israel, if either tongue or sword could have effected his will.

Hear this, ye whose tongues run so fast on Satan's errand; you love cursing, you are not heirs of the blessing. Christians are charged to bless their enemies; what are they that curse their friends? If every curse should stick a visible blister on the tongue, as it doth an insensible one on the soul, how many men's tongues would be too big for their mouths! In the discharge of a gun, the fire is given at one end, the report is heard at the other. In the charging of the heart with malice, fire is taken at the ears or eyes, and presently the noise of cursing and railing breaks out at the mouth. Therefore have we been cursed and plagued, because our mouths were so full of cursing and bitterness. Why should we not expect that on our bodies, which proceeds so continually forth of our lips? Who can set his neighbour's house on fire, and be secure of his own? Yea, cursing mouths be like ill-made pieces; which while men discharge at others, they recoil in splinters on their own faces. Curse not the king in thy thought, nor the rich in thy bed-chamber, Eccl. x. 20; for these arrows will return on thy own soul. Some men's maledictions are shot like fools' bolts, without regarding where they light. In this throng not seldom they hurt their friends, their children: as Diogenes warned the bastard, when he saw him throwing stones at random among the people, to take heed he did not hit his own father. The wicked do not shoot directly at God; yet God shoots at them, and sendeth out his arrows as against persecutors, Psal. vii. 13. Blessing becomes Christians: Christ's heart was meek, he repined not; his tongue meek, he reviled not; his hand meek, he revenged not. The good man wronged, shoots not again; neither with the arrow of the head, nor head of the arrow; neither with the mouth of the sword, nor sword of the mouth. If this life prepares us for the next, then the mouth of bitterness shall be plagued with bitterness of mouth; but the lips accustomed to bless, shall be blessed with songs of joy for ever.

(2.) He had a mercenary tongue. He that had mortgaged his soul for gold, would not stick for his tongue into the bargain. There be not many acts of sin, wherein the tongue hath not a part to play; that little engine is seldom ever left out. For uncleanness, the tongue woos; for dissimulation, the tongue walks; for ambition, the tongue flatters; to hide faults, the tongue lies: what business hath sin wherein the tongue finds no employment? But a vendible tongue, that may be hired for a bribe to contradict the truth, is rooted in a most wicked heart. For the mouth is but the bell, and the tongue the clapper; the heart is the spring that sets all a-going. For a man to sell his speech, is bad enough, but worse to sell his silence. He that speaks, does something for his reward; the other is feed for nothing. Christ said, "He that is not with me is against me;" but many a client says of a famous advocate, If he be not against me he is with me. So the just cause may be lost both ways; by speech, or silence. But he that farms out his tongue, shall receive but a sorry rent at the last.

(3.) He did strike his beast for doing him good. She saw the angel, and would not go on; for this he bestowed his fury and stripes upon her. If she had gone on he had perished, yet he strikes her that kept him from being stricken. How often do men wish for those things, which it is mercy to go without! They find fault to be stayed in the ways of death, and fly upon those that oppose their perdition. It our office and endeavour to save you from destruction, to guide you along through this wilderness unto Canaan, to discover your dangers, to clear your eyes, and deliver your souls: do not you, like Balaam, requite us with blows, and use us worse than beasts for our service. An ape seeing himself in a looking-glass, whether through wantonness or dislike of his own visage, doth often break the glass a-pieces. Preachers are like crystal glasses, declaring to sinners their spots and deformities; and these, like apes, requite them with injuries and abuses. We would fain save you, why should you mischief us? Travelers make much of their guides; so let us have your loving company in the way of obedience, that we may all arrive at the land of promise.

(1.) He knew the danger, yet incurs it; was not this madness? Until the will of God be known, we may dissent from it without sin. St. Paul, by virtue of his apostolical commission, would have preached in Bithynia, but the Spirit hindered him; yet herein he sinned not. Samuel prayed for Saul's good, otherwise than the secret counsel of God had determined; and this without sin: but when the decree was manifested, he ceased that duty. One good thing may differ from another; and the creature may will a good, which God in his secret purpose willeth not: yet the will is good, if it leave not out Thy will be done, submitting itself to a better: as the child prays for his father's life, when God hath determined him to die of that sickness; yet without sin. But when Balaam is forbidden to go, and opposed in going, still to persist, this was madness. What prophet ever spoke better, what reprobate ever did worse, than Balaam? It is no less than madness, for prophets to give light to others, and walk themselves in darkness; to distribute portions of meat to the family, and starve their own souls; to rescue others from the enemy, and suffer themselves to be taken; to forewarn others of that pit, whereto themselves run headlong. If we hear a mountebank undertake to cure the distempered heat of the liver, while himself hath a fiery face, will we believe him? If prophets dress heavenly feasts, made up of God's gracious promises and infinite mercies, yet fast themselves, surely the very ass may convince them of madness.

Now as there be mad prophets, so there are mad people too; such as will not live as their pastor teacheth, but as their pastor liveth. St. Paul tells us that faith cometh by hearing; he does not say, it comes by seeing. We live by precepts, not by examples. But these nice patients neglect the diet which their physician prescribeth, and follow the diet which he useth. I deny not but good examples have their profit; and to see others feed heartily, better our appetite. But it is not their example, but our own meat, that doth nourish us: no man is the fatter for another's feeding. The common exprobration is, Physician, heal thyself. Yet suppose those prophets warn us of the tide, and lose it themselves; that they are careless of their own sores, so our wounds be healed; that they become infatuate salt, so we be seasoned; that they are cast into darkness, so we be enlightened; we have no cause to complain. Have they built us an ark, though themselves be drowned? have they shone to us like tapers, though themselves go out in stench? have they brought us to the land of promise, though themselves die short of it? have they served us in the temple as vessels of gold and silver, though themselves be carried into Babylon? have they sown our fields, and miss their own harvest? have they planted us vineyards, and none for themselves? Be it unto them as they have deserved: let us take our own portions, and be thankful. Indeed prophets are in your mouths, as you will be pleased to take them; and every one speaks, not as he sees, but as he suspects. What are we more than you? All are men of the like passions, Acts xiv. 15. Do you look for no passion in us, and find so much in yourselves? We bring you heavenly treasure, yet are still earthen vessels. Among the apostles, one was a devil, and another was a Satan in his kind, none were angels. We are the men of God, yet men; prophets, but yet (as Moses said) like our brethren, Acts iii. 22: not in the similitude of sinful flesh, as Christ was, Rom. viii. 3; but sinful flesh indeed. We are stars, yet, saith Job, the very stars are not pure in God's sight, Job xxv. 5. We are angels, by a more honourable style than our natures can bear; yet God hath not found steadfastness in the angels. Our profession gives us no immunity from sin. But if we know the right, and bend our whole course the wrong, we are then mad indeed; and if you neglect our doctrine, and follow altogether our example, certainly you are as mad as we. This was his foolish fit.

(2.) He hears the beast speak under him, yet slights it: this was a frantic fit. Who would not look that his hairs should stand upright, his blood forsake his cheeks, that he should alight from that strange kind of beast, and stand amazed at the miracle? But such was his madness; as the frantic hath sense to hear a voice, but no use of reason to distinguish it; that as if no new thing had happened, he talks with his ass, and gives her words again, not more full of anger than void of discretion. Who does not wonder that this magician wondered not? Two reasons may be alleged for it; though indeed there was no reason in it.

[1.] It might be, this was his trade. So custom might take away strangeness, if he had been wonted to this before. But suppose Satan and he were so well acquainted at this device; yet he knew his own ass; she had long groaned under so unworthy a burden, Numb. xxii. 30: he knew this voice came not from Satan; for then it should have been an encouragement to persist, whereas this voice sounded a retreat: yet still he puts her on, whose tongue had forbidden him to move further.

[2.] It might be, his rage and covetousness had so transported him, that he did not observe this unusual and unnatural accident. If a man had as many eyes as the poets feigned of Argus, the melody of gain would play them all asleep, or make them blind. He that looks through a green glass, sees no other colour. The worldling is like a man in a dream; you may talk what you will to him, but his dream goes on. Balaam's mind did so run on the gold of Moab, that he could hear a beast speak, and never regard it. One man passeth by that with contempt, which another receives with astonishment. In dreadful thunders, when good men be at their prayers, some still ply their sports. They are as mad as Balaam, whom extraordinary judgments cannot move. God made all his works to be observed; but they that do not wonder at his miracles, are miracles to be wondered at. The papists feign a world of miracles, and they have men mad enough to believe them. Daily we see God's judgments; if we do not lay them to heart, we are as mad as they.

(3.) After all this interruption, still he drives on, and runs upon that sword which was brandished against him: this was a desperate fit. The ass saw the angel, and gave back; common sense had taught her to avoid that danger, which reason could not work in her master. The sword was drawn against him, not her; yet she would decline it, he rusheth upon it. Evils were as good not seen, as not avoided; our happiness is in the prevention, not provision of them. "The prudent man foreseeth the evil, and hideth himself; but the simple pass on, and are punished," Prov. xxii. 3. We pity him that is hurt through want of circumspection; but he that sees the snare, and flies into it, scarce deserves compassion. The revenging angel stands before us in the ways of disobedience; and though we know we shall as surely die as sin, yet we have neither the wit nor the grace to give back; though it were with the hurt of a foot to save the body, with the pain of the body to save the soul. Sin is a labyrinth, whereinto the entrance is easy, the extrication difficult. The Turk making an expedition into Persia, found the Straits of Armenia somewhat troublesome for his passage; therefore they consulted which way to get in. But one among the rest, and he none of the wisest, said, Here is much ado how you should get in, but I hear nobody take care how you should get out. Suddenly doth a wicked Balaam set upon his mischievous design; but no persuasions can make him break off. How often doth the adulterer's conscience check him with the law, and dread of plagues; yet still he persists, and resolves desperately, as Esther did religiously, If I perish, I perish. Or as Pompey said in another sense, when he was to bring grain to Rome in a great dearth, and coming to the sea, found it tempestuous and dangerous, insomuch that he was dissuaded to embark, It is necessary that I go, not that I live. So they make a necessity of their sinning, and put it to the venture for their salvation.

Do we resolve ever to give over the course of wickedness? Yes, one day. If one day, why not this day, why not now? We are not sure to live out this day. Pyrrhus opened himself to his friend Cineas, that he first intended a war upon Italy. And what then? saith Cineas. Then we will attempt Sicily. And what then? Then we may conquer Carthage and Africa. And what then, sir? Then we may rest, and feast, and sacrifice, and make merry with our friends. Cineas replied, And may we not enjoy this sweetness now, without all this ado? Vain man fancies divers projects; as first how to be rich: and what then? next to gild his gold with honour: and what then? then to take his pleasure according to his sensual appetite: and what then? at last to repent, and prepare for heaven. O madman, and why not so now? He that calls thee now, will not call ever. He that calls thee now, will now receive thee: will he receive thee when he does not call thee? Cast away thy lusts, that they may not cast away thee. If the perverseness of our stomachs break through all oppositions, Balaam himself was not more mad than we.

(4.) His unmercifulness to the poor beast is a remonstrance of his raving fit. What did the ass deserve? All the hurt she did him, was to turn him, to serve him, to save him: this he requites with blows. This was her first fault all her time with him, if it had been one; therefore she deserved not so cruel a revenge. We little think of it, but God will call us to account for all the unkind usages of his mute creatures. Of this the angel first takes notice; of this wrong he first expostulates, "Wherefore hast thou smitten thine ass these three times?" Numb. xxii. 32. One blow had been unjust, three was madness. God hath made us lords of them, not tyrants; owners, not tormentors: he hath given us leave to kill them for our use, not to torment them for our pleasure. As they are our drudges by constitution, so they are our fellows by creation. "Unless she had turned from me," saith the angel, "surely

I had slain thee," ver. 33: that was somewhat; she was a means of saving thy life. Yea, "I had slain thee, and saved her alive;" that was more. To show that I respect an innocent beast more than a perverse man, her safety should have aggravated the woe of thy ruin. Canst thou tell, O man, whether thy very beast may not be a means of thy preservation, that thou madly spendest thy fury where thou findest matter of mercy?

Beasts have been a means of the deliverance of men; not seldom hath a dog prevented thieves, the swiftness of a horse saved the rider's purse or life; many of them have done more than ordinary service, all which pleads for them against our tyranny. Yet so bloody was this magician, that he wisheth for a sword to slay his harmless beast. A wand had been too much, yet he desires a sword. Whose beast would he have killed? was it not his own? and if he had killed his own beast, who should have been the loser by it? How impotent was this madness! The good man is merciful to his beast. They cannot declare their wants, nor tell their grievances; otherwise than by moaning in their several kinds: to an honest heart their very dumbness is a loud language. David will venture on a bear, rather than lose a lamb; Jacob will endure heat by day, and cold by night, rather than neglect his flocks; Moses will fight with odds, rather than the cattle shall perish with thirst; only a Balaam wants this mercy. It was a sign that he would fain have smitten Israel with a curse, that wished a sword in the sides of his faultless beast. It is ill falling into those hands, which the very beasts find unmerciful. While they live, it is mercy to supply them; when they must die, it is mercy to despatch them: in all things mercy becomes the servants of God.

5. "With man's voice." This was the manner of her disputing. Balaam's madness had turned him into a beast; and why might not one beast teach another? In some things the ass excelled her master. First, she saw the judgment, he was blind: common sense better instructed her, than reason and religion had enlightened him. Beasts cannot examine the occasion of their employments, their masters should. Secondly, the ass had a tongue of equity; the prophet a tongue, hand, and heart of iniquity: he would do ill, she labours to prevent him; he intends Israel's destruction, she means his preservation. Not seldom have we seen a drunken rider on the back of a sober beast; insomuch that one said wittily, the horses stand at the tavern door like men, while their masters are playing the beasts within. Thirdly, the ass was not capable of sin, and did therefore justify herself; the master was so mad upon sin, that he would needs ruin himself.

Observations. 1. The weaker vessel may hold the better liquor. The unlearned lay hold on heaven, whereas men of knowledge often wallow in the lusts of flesh and blood. (August.) We are ordained to judge the angels; but if we degenerate from our prerogative, angels, men, infidels, harlots, yea, even beasts and stones, shall be our judges. Because when we ask in our daily prayers, that the will of God may be done on earth as it is in heaven; we are so far from matching this proportion, that there is not the poorest creature in the air, earth, or deep, but in their kinds go beyond us. (Bern.) But let us know, though we have the beasts our servants in the labours of this world, they shall not be our companions in suffering the torments of hell. Howsoever the profane epicure in the pleasures of life would rather be a man than beast; yet coming to his answer, he would rather be a beast than a man. How willingly after death would Balaam have changed conditions with his beast; vainly wishing that himself had been the ass, and that ass the prophet!

2. As Balaam proceeds in frowardness, so doth the ass in reprehension. First, he went aside out of God's way, and she went aside out of his way; so her error was a reproof of his. When things go cross with us, let us consider our crossness to the will of our Maker. Secondly, as he went forward with his wicked intendments, so she dashed his foot against the wall, to put him in mind of his malicious projects, and, if it were possible, by the bruising of a limb to save the whole body and soul. Thirdly, because he was carried headlong with the hope of wages, she lay down to stay his course. Had there been the least spark of grace in him, this falling down of his beast might have taught him to fall down on his knees, and to deprecate that danger which an ordinary capacity would have suspected. In sin there may be security, there can be no safety. Wickedness makes guilty men fear where is no cause; Balaam had cause enough, but no grace to fear. Fourthly, because in his anger he smote her for stopping his haste, she opened her mouth to reprove his injustice. Thus at every turn she answered him, in every passage she was quit with him. We cannot run so fast, but God can overtake us; nor be so cunning, but he can teach even a beast to overreach us.

3. The sensual creatures are set to condemn our sins, and to reflect our evils upon us. Peter hath a cock to tell him his cowardice, and Balaam an ass to reprove his avarice. There is no creature dumb, when God bids it speak: if there were no preachers to declaim, no conscience to accuse, the very creatures themselves would cry; the beds, boards, walls, windows, markets, closets should have tongues to condemn us. We need not wish for angels from heaven, or the dead from hell, to warn us; for besides Moses and the prophets, besides Christ and the apostles, besides the gospel and a multitude of preachers, the very stones would speak against us. Whither can we turn our eyes, and not see an object rebuking our iniquities? In their rebellion against us, they are dumb interpreters of our rebellion against our Maker. In their mute inability to declare their grievances, they tax our stubbornness, that have tongues to speak, and yet will not confess our sins. When they pine for want of meat, they show us our demerits, that have brought a curse upon them and ourselves, and that we suffer in their ruin. We can take signals by ravens and screech-owls, and presently talk of graves and corpses: superstition hath taught fools to understand the language of birds; would devotion could teach us to understand the groaning of all creatures under the bondage of our corruption, Rom. viii. 22.

There is a divine voice, that cries against our sins; The Lord gave his voice from heaven, "and that a mighty voice," Psal. lxxviii. 33. There is an angelic voice; an angel cried "with a loud voice, Woe, woe, woe to the inhabitants of the earth!" Rev. viii. 13. There is a human voice, the dictation of reason; every man's conscience condemneth sin: a voice within thee, which is against thee; a loud voice to every one's self, though not heard of others. And there is a dumb voice: so Abel's blood had a tongue to cry against murder; the walls and beams have a tongue against oppression; the fields and vineyards have a tongue against drunkenness and excess. Stephen had as many mouths as he had wounds, calling for justice; and there be as many tongues as there are creatures. Yea, there is an infernal voice: the devils have thundering voices; they become (as it were) hoarse with accusing us; day and night they cease not to put up bills and declarations against us. Yet there is a penitentiary voice. How ought we to lift up our voices and weep for our sins, lift up our voices and cry for forgiveness, when so many thousand voices cry against us! All our comfort is, there is a saving voice, the voice of a Mediator that speaks for us: and it is a voice of blood too; but such a voice as "speaketh better things than the blood of Abel," Heb. xii. 24. This voice God will hear, when he stops his ears to all the rest. It is a voice that cries for mercy, and may it obtain mercy for us all.

4. There is no beast deserves so much wonder as this of Balaam; and that for three things: first, her common sense was advanced above the reason of her rider; so that for the time, the beast was the man, and the man was the beast: not by any transmigration or permutation of souls, after the fancy of the Pythagoreans; but by Satan's hand over the one, and God's power in the other, the prophet became brutish, and the beast prophetic. Secondly, her eye was enlightened to be capable of seeing an angel. Among all the properties of this beast, I do not read any commendation of his sight; but rather find it to be dull and heavy, scarce apprehending a bodily object that is not too apparent. But to see a spirit, and that spirit which his rider could not discern, was far above nature. Thirdly, her mouth was opened to speak: now to hear a word come from that tongue, which was only used to bray, was strange and uncouth. Who could but stand amazed at such a sight, at such a voice, at such a discourse, from so silly a creature! That a beast whose nature is noted for incapacity, should out-reason a man, her master, a professed prophet, was in the height of miracles.

But what can hinder the will of the Almighty, that doth all things with the same facility? Non laborat in maximis Deus, non fastidit in minimis, says Ambrose; i. e. God spends no labour in the greatest, and does not feel disdain in the least, things. There is no impossibility, where he is pleased to give a dispensation. Yea, as all extraordinary things are only done by him, so what ordinary thing can be done without him? Our eye could no more see a beast, than a beast can see an angel, had he not thus enabled it. He that made all eyes, can easily make them dim or clear at his pleasure. The Syrians had eyes good enough, yet God so held them that they could not see the man that led them, 2 Kings vi. 18. The ass had a dull eye, yet saw a spirit: he that shut the one, opened the other. If his power can make stones to speak, how much more creatures of sense! That evil spirit spake in a serpent; why is it more that a good spirit should speak in the mouth of a beast? We do teach birds to speak those sentences they understand not: if man can do this, how far can his Maker go! He can as easily create a voice without a body, as a body without a voice. We may not distrust, we may wonder; let us compare the act with the Author, and all is easy.

5. We read but of one beast in the Scripture upon which God wrought such a miracle. One, to witness his power; and but one, to show his wisdom; for wonders cease to be wonders when they are common. The antichristian church hath made them superfluously frequent; and for this one, they have many beasts that speak and do strange things, if we will believe them. As that of St. Anthony of Padua's horse, that kneeled down to worship the holy host: yet we had a man in England that taught his horse neater tricks, and we had not the faith to think it a miracle. They tell us how St. Francis commanded a wolf to hurt no more lambs; and the wolf came to him, and put his paw into St. Francis's hand, and thereby made him a promise; marry he said nothing. Not to speak of their parrot, that being pursued by the hawk, and flying over St. Thomas of Canterbury's tomb, cried to him for help; whereupon the hawk fell down dead, and the bird escaped. Nor of St. Francis's preaching to the birds, and their attentive patience, yea, thanks to him for his good sermon: or the swallows holding their peace at his rebuke. They tell us of Bishop Trian, who having killed his cow and calf to entertain St. Patrick, found them both feeding in his meadow the next morning; only we do not read of aught they said to him. And of a woman, that to make her bees fruitful, did put a consecrated host into the hive; where the bees built a chapel with an altar, doors and windows, a steeple with bells, and sung their canonical hours, and kept watch like monks in their cloisters: and was not here a goodly convent made in a bee-hive? It is no wonder that beasts speak words, when bees can say their prayers and receive the communion. Yea, they profess more, even to give language to images, blocks and stones. Beasts have tongues, though no speech; sense, though they want reason: images have neither reason, nor tongues, nor sense. So the image of the blessed Virgin is reported to bid St. Bernard good morrow; and to charge Hyacinth, when he fled from the Tartarians, to take her and her Son along with him: to bid the sexton open the church door, and let in Alexius; and thus to encourage Thomas Aquinas, Thou hast written well of me, what reward wilt thou have? Were not these very proper miracles?

They refuse Christ speaking in his word, and listen to his speaking in a rood. But, as when Agesilaus was told of one that did excellently counterfeit the nightingale, and was entreated to hear him, he replied, Why I have heard the nightingale herself; so what need we listen to these counterfeit voices of Christ, when we have heard the Word of God himself? He is too prodigal a spendthrift of the stock of his faith, that shall give credit to their forgeries. I had rather be of his mind, who when his friend told him of a strange matter, and added withal that he would not have believed it had he not seen it; answered, And no more will I. This we find, that since the brightness of the gospel, God doth rarely work miracles, but Satan is often permitted to do signs and wonders. We are not bid to expect miracles from heaven, we are to suspect the delusions of hell.

There be yet remaining certain metaphorical allusions and moral observations, wherewith I conclude.

1. This beast never spake before, never after; only this once, and that was but an expostulation and a reply. Some dissolute sinners are like this ass; their eyes are never opened, nor their tongues unloosed, but once; they see not the sword of God's vengeance, nor fall to their devout prayers, till they come to their death-beds. These fools would buy knowledge, when Wisdom hath shut up her shop. Never to spare till we come to the bottom of the purse, is a frugality next to beggary. Men sing and take their pleasure in prosperity, and open not their mouths to Heaven, unless in blasphemy: in the day of trouble they cry for help; but if they will not speak to God in their health, can they hope he should speak to them in their sickness.

But God hath said, Call upon me in the day of trouble, and I will hear thee, Psal. l. 15. True, but this must be such a voice as he is acquainted withal. Hath he heard it daily in petitions and praises? then he will know it familiarly in distress. Otherwise he will count it a strange voice, and none of his family's. Strangers hear not the voice of Christ, nor will Christ hear the voice of strangers. He that never would learn to read, and yet hopes at last push to be prompted with a psalm of mercy, shall be put away with a non legit. God is fain to deal with wicked men, as we do with skittish horses in a pasture, which we cannot take till we get them at a gate; even to bring them to the gates of death before they will be tamed. Pray continually, saith the apostle, 1 Thess. v. 17; mind that exercise that you may be perfect in it? Other duties have their several seasons: there is a time to weep, and a time to rejoice; a time to love, and a time to hate; a time to speak, and a time to hold our peace, Eccl. iii. 2, &c.: but pray continually. Let us pray while we can speak, that God, like a kind Father, may hear our groans and pity us when we cannot speak.

2. The ass spake to better her master, not herself: and so do many, that have heaven in their lips, and the image of hell in their lives; that are excellent at the muses, but have no acquaintance with the graces. We may say of their learning, as it was of Galba's wit, Male habitat, It dwells ill. They are like some unfortunate swimmers, that save their endangered fellows and drown themselves. Or oculists, that make others see clearly, while themselves have sore eyes. Or physicians, that prescribe a good diet, and keep a bad. Or the Israelites in captivity, that made bricks to build the Egyptians' houses, and had none of their own. Or the Indians, that enrich the Spaniards out of their golden mines, and yet are themselves the most beggarly people of the earth. They use their gifts, as if a man should use monies only to count them. Plutarch writes of an old man that found reverence of children in Lacedemon, and contempt in all Greece besides: All the Greeks, said he, know what is right and proper, but the Lacedemonians alone practise it. He is a monster, that hath a tongue larger than his hand; many good words, and no good deeds. Thus the salt of the earth, after it hath seasoned others, may lose its own savour. They that are the light of the world, may carry the light behind them, guiding others, not their own feet. They minister occasion of their own sentence; Out of thine own mouth, thou wicked servant. They make their learning a mercenary art, who live themselves differently to what they instruct others to live. The good commander says not to his soldiers, Go, but, Let us go; what you see me do, do likewise; as Gideon, Judg. vii. 17.

Yet might the ass's counsel have done Balaam good, though not herself. Let not the hearer become a judge, and turn his pew into a tribunal. What would such men have said, if they had heard Solomon preach after all his scandalous sins? Say thou with Samuel, "Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth," 1 Sam. iii. 9; and not, Hear, Lord, for thy servant speaketh: and what speaks he, but judgment on the preacher? It is enough for me to eat my own dinner, not to mark how much he eats that dressed it. Indeed I would have every prophet's life a martyrdom to his doctrine; for though his goodness gives not salvation, yet it may give the sweetness: this is to preach with a witness. Where the Spirit speaketh twice, by illumination and sanctification, he is more heard than where he speaketh but once: and guests mistrust that cheer, whereof the host refuseth to taste.

3. Let no man plead simplicity, when a beast sees an angel; nor inability to speak, when an ass opens her mouth. Who can complain his own rudeness and slowness of speech, when a beast is enabled to convince her master? We excuse our own coldness, when we are occasioned to reprove impiety, by the want of eloquence; yet an ass could do it. There is no mouth whereinto God cannot put words; yea, so loth he glorify the wisdom of his own election, in onfounding the prudent of this world by the foolish, Cor. i. 27. Out of the mouth of babes he will deive praise to his name. He hides those things from he wise, which he reveals to babes, Matt. xi. 25.

He that can exalt the eyes of a beast to see a spirit, an advance the dulllest apprehensions, and make hem capable of the mysteries of life. He chose his apostles among none of the great rabbins, yet who ver saw further into the secrets of heaven? The word of the Lord is able to make wise the simple, Psal. xix. 7. Some have capacity without honesty, and they have eyes without hands; some have honesty and small capacity, and they have better hands than eyes; some have both; but miserable are they that have neither. Say not, I hear and profit not, because I understand not; for thou art promised to have wisdom for the asking, Jam. i. 5. He that will not pray to be wise, may sit still and be a fool.

4. When the ass had done this miraculous service, she remained an ass still; her skin was no better after it than the rest of her kind. Many men have done God service, without any blessed recompence. Ashur was his rod to scourge Israel; that done, they fell under a sharper lash themselves. We use rubbish to scour our vessels; when those vessels are clean, we fling away the rubbish. Ahithophel could advise David well; he was the worst counsellor to himself that might be. His words were the oracles of God to the state, to his own heart mere paradoxes.
So we have heard some very judiciously discourse of good husbandry; meanwhile themselves are the worst husbands in a country. They are like bridges that help men over the stream, at last themselves rot and sink in. When this beast had done speaking with man's voice, she lived an ass, and died an ass. So many an unholy Machiavel, that hath been admired for policy, falls under Jehoiakim's curse, to be buried with the burial of an ass, Jer. xxii. 19:
he lived a fox, but dies an ass.

5. This ass spake the truth: no matter who speaks, so he speaks good matter. Sometimes a jewel is found in a dunghill; and wisdom is most applauded where it is least expected. The fathers have compared human learning to Balaam's ass: it may sometimes speak to purpose; and bring men to church, as the ass carried Christ to the temple. Not the Lord, but we have need of it, Mark xi. 3. Is there nothing but the temple of the Lord with the Jews, but the word of the Lord with us? Is there no water to be found in the jawbone of a Philistine ass? May not the crown of the king of Ammon be set on the head of the king of Jerusalem? 2 Sam.
xii. 30. St. Paul says, Be not spoiled with philosophy, Col. ii. 8: some are spoiled for want of philosophy. Nor does he condemn all eloquence, but a sophisticate and meretricious eloquence. Would not the eloquence of Tully or Seneca have done good service in the cause of Zion? Indeed, that which is against Zion, is a poisonous eloquence. Nor doth he dislike philosophers simply, but the philosophers of this world. The slavery of the Gibeonites is an ease to the free-born Israelites. Not Jews only, but Gentiles had a hand in the building of God's temple.
Even pagans have their arts from heaven, and therefore may justly be improved to the honour of the Giver. If there be a Tyrian that can work more curiously in gold, silk, or purple, than an Israelite, why should he not be employed about the sanctuary?
Their heathenism is their own, their skill is their Maker's. Many a one works for the church of God, which yet hath no part in it. Wherever truth is, she is mine, saith Austin. We may salute Athens in our way to Jerusalem, as St. Paul did. The vessel of water, that is, human knowledge, may be turned into wine, that is, divine knowledge. Indeed Sic transiendum, non hic hærendum; i. e. We pass by this knowledge, we dwell not on it. What Aristippus said of other sciences and philosophy, is more true of all other arts and divinity: they that study the other, and neglect this, are like Penelope's wooers, that made love to the waiting-women. Whatsoever we learn or know, we submit and refer all to the knowledge of Jesus Christ.

6. But one ass spake; this is no privilege for others; the rest can do no more than bray. One swallow makes no summer; nor do singular examples constitute general rules. Presumption encourageth itself by one of a thousand; and despair will not take a thousand for one. If a thousand men be assured to pass over a ford safe, and but one to miscarry, desperation says, I am that one. If a thousand vessels must needs miscarry in a gulf, and but one escape, presumption says, I shall be that one.
We read but of one sinner that was converted at his last hour of life: millions that had less iniquity, yet have found less mercy. The dissolute flatters himself, If one, why not I? Other beasts have not attempted to speak, because this one did. Yet brutish men look for heaven dying, that never looked toward it living, because one sinner sped so happily. Christ was then upon the cross fast by him; art thou sure he will be so near thy death-bed? Lazarus and some few others were raised from their graves;
the whole world else must sleep till doomsday.
Enoch and Elias were translated, and did not see death; which of all the sons of Adam had this privilege besides? Paul was rapt up to the third heaven before his dissolution; none were so before him, none so after him. It is no trusting upon precedents, where we have manifest rules. The rule is, "Remember thy Creator in the days of thy youth," Eccl.
xii. 1; lest he forget thee in thy age. "Seek the Lord while he may be found," Isa. lv. 6: this were but slender counsel, if he might be found at any time.
We use to mend our ships in the harbour, and not let their leaks alone till we come into the main.
We harness ourselves before we go to war, and not have it to provide in the battle. The walls of a city that are not repaired in peace, will hardly be mended in a siege. Let us speak when we should, or not look to be heard when we would.

One ass spake in her life, one sinner was saved in his death: there was one, why should we despair? there was but one, why should we presume? In the mean time, we can never make that too sure, whereof while we live we can never be sure enough. Grace to repent, without space, is uncomfortable to our friends. Space to repent, without grace, is unprofitable to ourselves. Grace and space, shall both comfort them and save us.

VERSE 17.

These are wells without water, clouds that are carried with a tempest; to whom the mist of darkness is reserved for ever.

FROM many things doth the word of God draw comparisons, that it might speak according to our capacities. Every creature hath this emergent use, to teach us. "The heavens declare the glory of God," Psal. xix. 1: how can we look upon them, and forget their Maker? The stars not being pure in his sight, may put us in mind of our uncleanness, which reached so far as even to blemish their glory. The sun gives us beams of obedience, while he keeps his course, knows his rising and going down. The wind breathes upon us a similitude of the Holy Ghost, John iii. 8, which comes and goes, and no man knows whence or whither. The dews drop upon us the memory of that dew of Hermon which fell upon the hill of Zion. The hen gathering her chickens doth, as it were, cluck us under the wings of Christ. The crane chatters to us how poorly we shall speak in death, Isa. xxxviii. 14. The lilies and ravens forbid our solicitousness for apparel or food. The camel at the needle's eye, is an image of the covetous man at heaven-gates. In the last verse, a beast taught a prophet to obey: a wondrous one; some have assigned her a place in the zodiac, in the sign of Cancer. Whereat other astronomers storming, they were asked, whether they would have Noah's raven, or Samson's foxes, or David's lion, or Elisha's bears, or Babel's dragon, placed there, rather than Balaam's wonderful ass? Now we are come to certain wells; out of which, if they were full of water, we might draw to quench our thirst; but they are empty, and without comfort: "wells without water," &c.

These ungodly deceivers are here described by Their unprofitableness, Wells without water.

Their unstableness, Clouds carried with a tempest.

Their unhappiness, To whom the mist of darkness, &c.

Their punishment is proportioned to their wickedness. A well, if it be empty of water, will be full of fog; a tempestuous cloud is but a blustering mist: here is all mist and darkness; therefore the penalty is the mist of darkness. They have shadowed the light in this world, therefore no light but an uncomfortable shadow belongs to them in the world to come.

"Wells without water." A fountain to a thirsty traveller is a welcome sight; but if it be without water, it is a grievous mockery. Pastors are like to wells in divers regards.

1. They are wells for constancy: they keep their residence, men know where to find them. Passengers may abuse the fountains, they cannot remove them. You fetch water at these wells every sabbath, yea, even on common days when your thirst calls for it: we teach you on the Lord's day; there is no day wherein we are not ready to comfort you. Indeed you should give us leave to fill our fountains: if we do perpetually draw, and not suffer the springs to have their time of supplying, we must be empty. You sometimes shut up your conduits on the week-days, or else they would lack water; they are so full on Sundays, that they run over. Therefore we study all the week, and fill our cisterns, that on the sabbath you may fill your pitchers. Fishers are allowed time to mend their nets; mowers to whet their scythes; bees to gather sweetness, before we eat their honey. God's temples are our hives; there you are sure of our honey; yet you must not deny us the flowers, the Holy Scriptures, fathers, and other good books, together with our own meditations, out of which we suck it: and to do all this requires time. But still we keep our orbs, and therefore are called stars; we have our stations, and therein are wells. It is true, that our waters do good as they run in the channels; but they are best drawn from the well-head. They that content themselves with reading at home, and neglect the public ministry in the church, omit the spring, to quench their thirst at the channel.

2. They are wells of piety; the water of life, the word of salvation, is in them. We must distinguish the waters that be above the heavens from the waters that are below the heavens, Gen. i. 7. The well above is the fountain of glory; a spring that multiplies itself into a river; that "pure river of the water of life, clear as crystal, proceeding out of the throne of God," Rev. xxii. 1. The well below is the fountain of grace; and this is "a well of water springing up into everlasting life," John iv. 14. Either of them is a well of life; the one inchoate, the other consummate; the one preparatory, the other satisfactory; the former a prelibation, the latter a fruition; that a well of comfort, this a river of pleasure, Psal. xxxvi. 8. Indeed Christ is the well of life, without whom our thirst can never be quenched: that "fountain opened to the house of David," Zech. xiii. 1, that well of Jacob, John iv. 6, watering the whole face of the ground, Gen. ii. 6. A well of infinite depth, without bottom; of everlasting abundance, for it hath eternal springs; of satisfying virtue, for he that drinks of it shall never thirst more. This is that fountain which supplies all the wells, which fills all our cisterns; of whose fulness we have all received, John i. 16. It never failed the thirsty passenger, never offended a humble receiver, never was shut up or denied to the faithful seeker. We are His wells; and the water he puts into us, is the word of the gospel. "With joy shall ye draw water out of the wells of salvation," Isa. xii. 3. We are earthen vessels, yet do hold a heavenly treasure; wells of clay, yet full of the water of life. He that refuseth the water for the well's sake, shall perish for that contempt's sake.

3. They are wells of sanctity, and therefore must be clean. Indeed their uncleanness cannot defile the water; it is of its own nature so pure, that it will work itself from all infection. Yet may the foulness of the glass cause men to dislike the good liquor. For the sin of Eli's sons "men abhorred the offering of the Lord," 1 Sam. ii. 17. If they had not been sons of Eli, yet being priests of God, their very calling (one would think) should have infused some holiness into them. Yet may the white ephod cover black sins; and vices, like those spies, 2 Sam. xvi. 19, may be hid in the well, while there is wheat spread over the mouth of it. Who are devils, but they that were once glorious angels? If the lantern be broken, an easy wind will blow out the light. There be commonly two buckets belonging to a well: the one bucket draws doctrine, the other example; and this latter is more employed. As it has been said, While they neglect what we say, they imitate what we do. I have heard of here and there a pastor, that hath outlived all the people of his parish; I never heard of any that hath outlived all the sins of his parish. Yet must not the infirmities of the wells bring the water into contempt: let none dislike the service of God for the sin of man. This were to make holy things guilty of our profaneness, and to offend God because he hath been offended.

4. They are wells of knowledge; and of sufficient depth; skilled in the mysteries of salvation. Shallow pits are full of mud and frogs; they may make a noise in the pulpit, but it is a harsh sound, which rather offends the ear than profits the soul; nothing but frothy stuff comes from them. Wells are deep: the priests' lips preserve knowledge; they can tell how to resolve the doubtful, to hearten the fearful, to convince the wilful, to comfort the sorrowful. They are good physicians, and have medicines for all diseases. They are able to clear difficulties, to reconcile antilogies, to answer objections, to confute errors, to apply their discourse to all occasions. So St. Augustine professeth of St. Ambrose, who went from Africa to Milan to hear him; that while he was penetrated with the eloquence of his discourse, re was penetrated also with the truth of it. He is no babbler; neither spermologus, qui mera vox est; nor matæologus, qui mera nox est; i. e. neither a talker, who is mere voice; nor a vain talker, who is mere darkness. But he hath a key to fit every lock, a gracious faculty to take every ear, to pierce every soul. Moses was a prophet learned; none like him in Israel, Deut. xxxiv. 10. Indeed I do not like the wells that are so deep, that we can draw no water out of them; men that have excellent talents, but they lie buried; that know much themselves, and impart little to others. A man of meaner gifts, by his assiduity of preaching, shall do more good, than he that breeds a sermon, like elephanti partum, a year's conception, which being born, only amazeth the hearers, and makes them at their wits' end with admiration. We put down the bucket into these wells, hoping to draw water, and bring up nothing but air. Concealed learning is but like a candle in a dark lantern, or the fowler's light, to see which way this game lies. The good pastor is light in a crystal glass, that shines every way, to the good of men and glory of God.

5. They are wells of pity, full of compassion; bowels that yearn for the danger of men's souls. Jeremiah had such a well in his head, or at least he wished such a well in his heart: "Oh that my head were waters, and mine eyes a fountain of tears!" Jer. ix. 1. The prophet before him is not in this behind him: "I will weep bitterly, labour not to comfort me," Isa. xxii. 4. David contends with them both who shall weep most; "Rivers of waters run down mine eyes, because they keep not thy law," Psal. cxix. 136. Among all, our Lord Jesus is the chief mourner; who having no sin of his own, wept and bled for the sins of others. Obstinate offenders are dry pits; nothing can pump the water of repentance out of their eyes. For their wickedness God plagues the land; that thousands cry in pain, Our bowels, our heads, our hearts: thus they give others cause to mourn, while their own mouths are filled with laughter. All that tempest was for Jonah, yet Jonah alone is fast asleep: that unspeakable agony of Christ was for the sins of his disciples and chosen, yet even then the disciples were asleep. The destroying angel's sword lays heaps upon heaps, and multiplieth his deadly wounds; and are we still dry wells, that have no tears to spend for our sins? The fire is kindled, and what shall quench it, if these fountains be without water? If there were not some Ezras and Joshuas, Isaiahs, Joels, and Jeremiahs among us, pouring out their souls before God in cries and lamentations for our iniquities, what should become of us? The Lord hath marked the houses where these mourning wells be, Ezek. ix. 4; and if we would not only escape the judgment ourselves, but even turn away wrath from others, let our heads be fountains, and our eyes conduits, sending out floods of tears, not so much for the punishments we feel, as for the cause of those punishments which too many feel not. The crown of preachers is the tears of their hearers: when we find you with moist eyes, we then hope there is good wrought on your souls.

6. They are wells of peace and amity, such as reconcile feuds and appease discords; as the water of a well serves to quench flames. In such a combustion, for want of rivers, we run to wells and conduits; yet, alas, for the quieting of jars and controversies, you seldom appeal to your pastors: a fault which St. Paul long ago condemned in his Corinthians, that they were too apt to consult lawyers, 1 Cor. vi. 7. And yet many of them, like Lachesis, wind off more in one turn than they span in five. Were your wells full to the brim, there be buckets enough belonging to the law to drench you. There is a holy water able to put out the fire of contention, the gospel of peace, or of the covenant: so was the well of Beersheba called, The well of an oath. Indeed when this water is offered to a peevish and perverse stomach, it turns into bitterness; and makes him swell yet more against his neighbour, yea, against his teacher. If the suspected wife were guilty, she would swell after a draught of those waters of trial, Numb. v. : so dissolute souls swell against their rephender. Our message is the message of peace, our doctrine is the gospel of peace, our office is to make peace; we are all for reconciliation; reconciling God to you, you to God, 2 Cor. v. 19, one with another, all with every one, every one with all. We speak peace, we speak for peace, we wish you peace; peace with your neighbours, peace in your houses, peace in your hearts, peace in your consciences, and above all, that peace which passeth all understanding.

7. They are wells of charity; that do not only give good counsel with their lips, but good relief with their hands. The loins of the poor bless them, Job xxxi. 20: they are fountains where the beasts of the forest drink, and the wild asses quench their thirst, Psal. civ. 11. Charity becomes all men, but above all, the men of God. Yet, alas, in these times, we want wherewithal. What quantity of spiritual water soever be in us, there is little enough of temporal. Our springs be cut off: sacrilege hath besieged us, as Holofernes did Bethulia, and taken away our springs. While you had wells that yielded you nothing but foul puddle-waters, superstitious ceremonies instead of pure doctrines, all your channels ran into those pools, and swelled them to the brinks. Now you confess in your consciences that you draw from us the water of life, yet you deny us the water of livelihood, whereby we may subsist. We sit like disconsolate Elijah, by the brook Cherith; and if we have sustenance it must be by miracle, and for want of your just supply the brook is dried up, 1 Kings xvii. 5-7. If we have sown unto you spiritual things, is it any great matter to reap your carnal things? 1 Cor. ix. 11. Will you not give the water of your wells for the water of life? The tenth of your increase is God's portion; do you look he should give you the cup of salvation, that deny him the cup of retribution? Do you live in him, and yet fear not to defraud him? The priest was wont to give alms, now he must be glad to receive it. If all his means can reach above necessity, to buy but one book to his study, one spring to his well, when that fails, he must sell it to buy another: his cloth is ever too short for two coats, the world will not allow him two springs. If the poor do not find our charity, it is because we are sick of their own disease, poverty. We may ask with one, How can they be beneficent, who are forced to be indigent? Yet howsoever our temporal waters fail, God grant our springs of grace to hold, that you may be saved.

"Without water." Thus pastors should be like wells, but these false teachers are wells without water. A blind guide, an ignorant physician, a candlestick without light, a penuary without provision, a well without water, is a miserable privation. When the thirsty traveller, after much labour and grief, spies a fountain, he rejoiceth; but coming to it, and finding it dry, his joy is turned into sorrow, and he is ready to curse it for such a mockery; as our Saviour did the fruitless fig-tree, when he was hungry. Suppose we are thirsty and would drink, foul and would wash, hot and would be cooled, our houses are on fire and we would have them quenched; if we come to the well with our buckets, and find it empty, we know not whether our grief or indignation be greater. When we are to build a house, we first look to the convenience of water, and refuse to dwell in a dry land. Yet whether the pastor that should moisten our souls, be a well without water, a formal fountain with never a spring to feed it, we examine not. We love a physician with abundance of medicines, a lawyer with variety of knowledge, a merchant with choice of wares, a rich man full of monies; we affect abundance in all perishable things; but for the water of life, so little serves us, that we do not mind whether the well be full or empty. But indeed, while the clouds above are restrained, the wells below will be soon dried. Unless the Spirit of grace distil down his holy dews into the hearts of his ministers, all will turn to barrenness, and the visible church appear like a wilderness.

1. Let all this teach us to thirst for the water of these wells, as the hart pants for the river when he is embost: or as David longed, "Oh that one would give me drink of the water of the well of Bethlehem!" 2 Sam. xxiii. 15: or as the woman of Samaria did, for the water, not of Jacob's well, but of Jesus' well; Lord, "give me this water, that I thirst not," John iv. 15. There is no corporal appetite so violent as thirst, when the extremity of heat hath wrought upon the radical moisture. Victorious Samson complains of it; yea, even that almighty Samson, Christ himself on the cross, cries, "I thirst." How sensible are we of this want in our bodies! yet our souls are dry, and we neither moisten them, nor pity their thirst. He is a rare man that never drinks till he be thirsty: nay, it is too common a fault, not to stay for any such occasion. Men drink before they are dry, they drink until they become dry; and thirst overtakes drunkenness; as fools run into the river to avoid a shower of rain. But for this living water, a little draught on the sabbath is enough for all the week. My soul longeth for thee, saith David, as the thirsty land; that opens itself in rifts and crannies, as if it would devour the clouds; so many chops, so many mouths, as it were crying to heaven for moisture. Blessed are they that thirst after righteousness, for they shall be satisfied.

2. Let us duly prize and esteem the water of these wells. It is an unhappy way of learning, when we will not know the worth of a benefit, but only by the want of it. Three kings were confederated to make war upon Moab; and they were not sooner come into the parching wilds of Edom, than they are ready to die for thirst, 2 Kings iii. 9. If there were channels, yet no waters; the scorching beams of the sun had dried them up, and left them rather ditches than rivers. How precious now had a cup of cold water been! There is a season, when so poor a benefit will not be poorly valued. Even with this may a soul be comforted, even for this shall a soul be rewarded, Matt. x. 42. We read of a king, that sold himself and his city for a draught of water. This caused three kings to walk down and visit one poor prophet. Religion and necessity are (either of them) able to humble the stoutest heart: either zeal or need will make a prophet honoured. Oh what are the greatest monarchs of the world, if they want but water to their mouths! What can their crowns, and plumes, and rich arms avail them, when they are abridged of that which is but the drink of beasts? Therefore with dry tongues and lips do these three princes confer of their common misery. So highly is water esteemed, that some philosophers have thought it a kind of seminal principle: aqua, as if it were a qua, i. e. from which all things spring.

Now what is elemental water to the water of life? What is a corporal thirst to the soul's necessity?

The Jews smarted for despising it, when they were driven to wander from sea to sea, and from north to east, to seek it; their young men and fairest virgins fainting for thirst, Amos viii. 12, 13. Our forefathers would have been glad of a concealed fountain, some few drops of this water; we have full wells, yea, rivers and streams, yet let it run at waste. We come to Jacob's well, but bring no pitchers with us, John iv. 11: our ears are at church, our hearts are at home. The waters of the sanctuary grow and flow, from the ankles to the knees, from the knees to the loins, from the loins up to the neck, Ezek. xlvii.; but we have not vessels to receive it. Either to this well you come not, or come and drink not, or drink and digest not; but aut bibendum, aut abeundum, i. e. you must either drink or depart. This fountain is the word of comfort; but many can find no sweetness in it, because their palates are so out of taste by the world. Christ refused the vinegar, because it was vinegar; these men taste the powers of the world to come, and will none of it, though it be the water of life. As David would not drink the water of Bethlehem, because it was the price of blood; and yet this did cost no blood, but the blood of Jesus Christ.

3. Do not abuse these wells, nor defile the waters: a troubled fountain cannot look clear. Of all men, the minister should be suffered to lead a quiet life, undisturbed, free from vexations. There is a woe due to him that polluteth the fountain, that shall cast aspersions on his pastor, to disable him in the hearts of his hearers. When Homer had spent many lines in dispraising the body of Thirsytes, he briefly describes his soul thus, that he was an enemy to Ulysses. We need say no more of a bad man; he is an enemy to his pastor; that is enough to brand him. While thy preacher is studying to apply the warm blood of Christ to thy heart, thou art studying to vex the best blood in his heart. We take care to save your souls, and many of you take care to molest our souls. While you deny us due maintenance, respect, and peace, you put us to spend that time in temporal provision for our bodies, which we should and would spend in spiritual comfort for your consciences. Supply us with springs, hearten us with encouragements, trouble not our waters, and we shall be to you the wells of salvation.

"Clouds that are carried with a tempest." In this comparison is shadowed out their variableness; where we have three considerations. First, the fitness of the metaphor. Secondly, the levity of these hypocrites, that are carried with a puff. Thirdly, the event of their dealing, which is to promise a shower, and yield nothing but a tempest.

For the metaphor, it is frequent in Holy Scripture. "Drop thy word toward the south," Ezek. xx. 46. My doctrine shall drop as the rain upon the tender herb, my speech distil as the dew and showers upon the grass, Deut. xxxii. 2. First, clouds are made to contain water, and preachers should be fitted and filled with wholesome doctrine. Secondly, clouds are drawn up by the sun, and teachers called to that holy profession by the Sun of righteousness. Thirdly, clouds are nearer to heaven than common waters, and ministers are advanced nearer to the secrets of God than other men. Fourthly, clouds hang in the air after a strange manner, and preachers live in the world in a wondrous sort; all the winds of the earth, and furies of hell, band against them, yet still they are supported by their Ordainer. Fifthly, clouds are set to distil rain upon the dry places of earth, and preachers to satisfy the thirsty soul. To give drink to the thirsty, is in other men a debt of charity, in us a debt of justice. A necessity is laid upon us, and woe unto us, if we yield not the former and the latter in, that God's ground may fructify! The rain coming down, returneth not again, "but watereth the earth, that it may give seed to the sower, and bread to the eater," Isa. lv. 10. So the word of God shall ever return void, but accomplish the thing whereto it is sent: not a drop from these clouds shall be lost; it will either work to the confusion of them that resist it, or to the conversion of them that embrace it.

The ground where these showers fall, must yield either flowers or weeds; and so be either blessed, or nigh unto cursing, Heb. vi. 7, 8. If they fall upon a proud heart, like some great mountain, off they glide, and leave it barren; if in the valley, a humble heart, they dwell there, and make it fruitful. As that royal prophet sings, Thy waters stand in the valleys, and they grow thick with corn.

But how can it be conceived, that the clouds above, being heavy with water, should not fall to the earth suddenly, seeing every heavy thing descendeth? It cannot be denied but the clouds are heavy, Job xxvi. 8; yea, the very winds, which are lighter than clouds, have their weight, Job xxviii. 25. Philosophy is here too defective; all the human learning in the world cannot give a sufficient reason for this. Only the word of God decides it: "Let there be a firmament in the midst of the waters, and let it divide the waters from the waters," Gen. i. 6. This was God's ordinance in the creation; and such is his providence in the disposition of the clouds. "He bindeth up the waters in his thick clouds, and the cloud is not rent under them." There he bade them hang, till he that called them up, sent them down. There are those bottles of rain, as it were in orbe non suo, i. e. in a sphere not their own, thin as the liquor they contain: there they move up and down; and when his finger crusheth them, they drop again to their own place. By virtue of this command, the waters hang in the clouds, and the clouds in the air, and need no supporters. He can as easily hang water in the air, as he can hang the earth upon nothing. Some by that firmamentary division of the waters, have dreamt of a watery heaven above the stars, for the better mitigation of their heat. But the celestial bodies are of no fiery or elemental nature; nor have they such heat in them, as needs to be refrigerated. By the firmament is meant the air; the waters below it are seas and floods, the waters above it are the clouds. Which helps us to understand that of the Psalm, "Praise the Lord, ye waters that be above the heavens," Psal. cxlviii. 4; that is, above the lower region of the air. So, "The Lord thundered in the heavens, with hailstones and coals of fire," Psal. xviii. 13. Now thunder, lightning, and hail, come not properly from heaven, but from the air.

In sum, priests are clouds; this is no ignoble title. How often did the Lord appear to Moses in a cloud! How long did he walk with Israel in the pillar of a cloud! "I will appear in the cloud upon the mercy-seat," Lev. xvi. 2. The cloud was a figure of Christ; without whom we should never have seen God appear in the mercy-seat. When the glory of the Lord filled the tabernacle, the tent was covered with a cloud, Exod. xl. 34. Our glorious Saviour sits upon a white cloud, Rev. xiv. 14. St. Paul speaks of a "cloud of witnesses," Heb. xii. 1. It is a happy church that is encompassed with a cloud of preachers. Man's heart is a plot of ground; which, before it be fruitful, must suffer a spiritual husbandry. First, it must be ploughed and broken up; it is so cold and stiff a clay, that it needs undergo the coulter. God was fain to shake the earth before he could move the jailer's heart. When the terror of sin and judgment works upon the natural conscience, then the ploughshare reacheth the quick. Secondly, once ploughing is not sufficient, for it will quickly harden again of itself; there must be a second stirring. In prosperity it will never tell truth, but rather flatter that it may be flattered. But when the ground is softened, then put in the plough; the heart broken by affliction is fit to be tilled with the word. Thirdly, cast in the seed with joy and hope of a blessed harvest; sow it with the precious promises of Jesus Christ. Fourthly, then come the clouds, and they do their seasonable office, in pouring down kindly showers, both to raise and ripen the fruits of grace. Fifthly, after all this, weeds will grow; therefore we must fall to weeding, and hook out our lusts with the sickle of repentance. Thus the valleys shall stand thick with corn, till we rejoice and sing, Psal. lxxv. 13.

The next point is their levity, Carried with a wind. Some are not stable in the truth, but it is not possible for any man to be constant in errors, for the next fancy will take him off from the former. As wanton children are won to be quiet with change of toys, so the devil is fain to please such men with variety of crotchets. He forgets what he hath been, understands not what he is, and knows not what he will be. But like a banished man, when his back is upon his own country, all the world is his way. He is fled, with Jonah, from the word of God, and now it matters not whither he makes his voyage. From a Brownist to Anabaptism, from an Anabaptist to Arianism, from an Arian to the Family of love: still he is "carried with a tempest;" and does not more eagerly embrace the air where he is first a cloud gendered, than he rails on it when he is removed. He is water, and water hath ever been an emblem of inconstancy. So Jacob called his son Reuben, "unstable as water," Gen. xlix. 4. Whether it be a cloud above or a billow below, it is carried with the wind. There is a rack-wind, and that drives the clouds: there is a ground-wind, and that tosseth the waves. So St. James compares the inconstant to a wave driven and tossed with the wind, Jam. i. 6.

To exemplify this unstableness. First, water is continually running from coast to coast, and as it changeth currents, it changeth names and colours. Names, according to the countries it salutes. Colours; for in puddles it is black, against rocks foamy, in the sea green, in sweet rivers clear. Such a cloud as here is meant, is at Rome a papist, at Munster an Anabaptist, in England a protestant. Indeed he tarries no where; for his heart is but an inn, and all his thoughts travellers; if they lodge for a night, they are gone in the morning, and leave him without taking leave of him. Secondly, water runs to the lowest parts, seeking out holes and receptacles where to hide itself. So these wavering clouds love corners and private conventicles, and leave the beaten way, though it lead directly to heaven. They scorn with every common understanding to go through the gate, and therefore will climb over the wall. Thirdly, water poured out leaves nothing behind in the vessel: oil and wine will leave their savour, and milk its colour; but there is no remaining sign of water that it was there. So their steps be fluid, and no more stable is their memory; either buried in oblivion, or famous for infamy. A cloud both alters the shape with the wind, now appearing like a house, then like a camel; and the seat with the wind, now hovering over this climate, then over that. They are wax ready tempered, that soon taketh a new impression. Or chaff, which when the good grain sinks down and is saved, becomes the sport of the wind, Psal. i. 4. Their plague is answerable; they "shall be chased as the chaff of the mountains before the wind, or like a rolling thing before the whirlwind," Isa. xvii. 13. The tempest hath driven them to and fro upon earth, at last it shall blow them to hell. They are like loose teeth in the mandible, of more trouble than use. They set themselves for so many things, that they are good for nothing. A pluralist in religion is indeed a neutralist, and seeks the truth by all ways but that where he is sure to find it. The Moon spake to her mother to get her a coat made; but no tailor could fit her: for if he made it fit for her in the change, it would be too little in the full; if it were fit for the full, it would be too large for the wane: so we must have for every day a new coat, or none. The inconstant soul is as hard to suit; only, after the change of many places, there is one that will hold, the place of darkness; after the change of many fashions, there is one that will last, a coat of torment. But for us, let us stand fast in the faith, and hold that we have, that we may never lose our crown, Rev. iii. 11.

"Carried with a tempest." They promise a shower, and bring a storm. This is their mockery: they have four inconveniences of the clouds.

1. They hinder the sun from so clearly extending his beams to comfort the earth. An antichristian priest is a cloud gotten before the sun, whose very doctrine tends to darken the light. That "ignorance makes saints," how much is hell beholden to them for such an opinion! They call that the mother of devotion, which was indeed the daughter of transgression. We use to say for the body; If nature lose some vigour or virtue in one sense, she recompenseth and mends it in another; they that see ill, hear the better; and he that wants his smelling, hath the better taste. But if the soul lose her eyes, she will hardly find the way to heaven; nor can we say, any faculty is improved, any grace advanced in her, for being blind. There is a woe to them that withhold the truth in unrighteousness, Rom. i. 18. Not sanctity, but iniquity, is the child of darkness. Sin was begot in secret, betwixt Satan and Eve; and Vice is the brood of Nox and Acheron, say the poets.

2. Clouds are unthankful: for they are drawn up by the sun, and set in the lower region of the air; there being placed, they not seldom dishonour that sun which exhaled them, by darkening his refulgent beams. I do not say that false teachers are called by Christ; they rather prefer themselves without invitation, making the church a market, and buying their places, and those, too often, of eminency; which they fill, like clouds, with a blustering and stormy presence. But in the mean time they obscure that light, which the Sun of righteousness would give to his church by better instruments. Thus they have the places of Christ, and the arms of antichrist; and most ungratefully dishonour that name by which they would be called.

3. Clouds do harm when they vent themselves in a tempest; their moisture is not so profitable, as their violence is hurtful. They that never preach but in thunder, whose words be flashes of lightning, hell and damnation being almost the period of every sentence, are black, pitchy, and pernicious clouds; presenting the face of God tempestuous, and the brow of heaven cloudy: for so we call the frowning, a cloudy forehead. These are engendered of clouds, as poets write of the centaurs. They that hang their faith on such men's lips, do but, like Ixion, embrace a cloud instead of Juno. Fabius Maximus resolving to prolong the war, waited on Hannibal's progress, and encamped himself on the high grounds. Terentius gave Hannibal battle, and was put to the worst; but then Fabius came down the high grounds, and got the day. Whereupon Hannibal said, he ever thought that same cloud which hanged on the hills would at one time or other give a tempest. So these clouds never spend themselves, but with a storm to the church of God.

4. They are unprofitable clouds; "clouds without water," as Jude calls them, ver. 12; empty bottles, which promise the thirsty earth relief, and have never a drop in them. Or if they have any water, they let it fall where it can do no good. As sometimes we have seen dry pastures and chopped grounds, as it were with open mouths calling upon the clouds for rain: anon a cloud gathers, and comes down; but where? It misseeth the needy fields, and falls in a dirty lane; balking the place where it is expected, and fouling the way where it might be spared. This the natural clouds do by God's disposing; but I speak of rational, wilful, spiteful clouds. Many rich men are such conditioned clouds: they have store of wealth, and some they will part with; but it shall be to such as have no need of it; and that either for fear, or favour, or in hope of honour; which is in the proverb, pouring water into the sea. But to the poor, distressed, and thirsty souls, they will not afford a drop. While they live, they will empty a bag to the lawyer; which is to fall in a dirty lane. When they die, they make rich men their heirs and executors; not in imitation of God, To him that hath shall be given: but to witness their dear regard of money, which when they can keep no longer, they bequeath to them that will keep it: as if they durst trust any thing sooner than their Maker. So do they love the world, that they love all them that love it: and when the hand of death crusheth these clouds, they fall into a quagmire.

You see by this time what clouds they are, against which our apostle inveighs. Tempestuous clouds, that raise storms and factions, and trouble the peace of the air. Black clouds, that turn day into night by their errors. Wandering clouds, that never keep any station. Dissembling clouds, that promise moisture and have none. Malicious clouds, that intend nothing but mischief. Foolish clouds, that make mire rather than cause fertility.

But withal, there be commendable clouds. There is difference between a shadowing cloud and a showering cloud. There is a bright, azure, sky-coloured cloud; like that heaven to which it is near; whose life is in heaven, Phil. iii. 20: a fruitful cloud, that causeth the earth to fructify, Hos. ii. 21, 22. The Lord fills these clouds with his holy dews, which they let fall in due time and place. They water the earth, and come down like showers upon the mowgrass. In their days shall the righteous flourish, and abundance of peace so long as the moon endureth, Psal. lxxii. 6, 7.

Besides the former resemblances, preachers are clouds in spending themselves upon the dry earth. When a cloud hath emptied itself of water, it ceaseth to be: so we consume ourselves to do you good. Love turns us into lamps, that we waste ourselves to give light unto others; into silkworms, that we spin out our own bowels, to make you garments. The olive would not leave her fatness, nor the fig-tree her sweetness, nor the vine her cheerful liquor, Judg. ix. 8—13: we refuse not to part with our fatness and sweetness, our blood and marrow, our rest and quiet for your sakes. Yea, like clouds, we willingly consume ourselves in showers, that you may bring forth fruit unto Jesus Christ. This riseth to the commendation of them that will not be bettered by the good clouds.

1. Some refuse to come under the clouds, and of all places love not the orb of the church. The fruitful grounds are covered with clouds; they that stand his rain for fear of being wet, shall have barren souls. There is a double heaven, one of glory, the other of the church. The church is a heaven upon earth; her priests be the clouds of heaven: she desires not her showers to them that seek it; the rest must remain a wilderness. The Jews, while the church of God was national, were commanded in their devotions to look toward the temple, when they could not come to it. We have those that may come to it, but will not look toward it. "In this place will I give peace, saith the Lord," Hag. ii. 9. Not anywhere, not every where, but in his own house: as if their blessing were confined to his holy walls, "In this place will I give peace." I know not whether the blessing doth more honour the place, or the place the blessing; both grace each other, and make God's people happy: "In this place I will give peace." This lower grows not in every garden, but only in that which these clouds have watered. If ever we would have peace, outward, inward, private, public, secular, spiritual; peace in our land, peace in our church, peace in our state, peace in our own souls; we must pray for it: and if ever we will pray for it, we must pray here; for "In this place will I give peace, saith the Lord." It is true indeed, that we are bidden every where to lift up pure hands unto God: but those hands cannot be pure that are profane; and they cannot be other than profane, that condemn the church, the clouds, and showers, and ordinances of God. If ever men would have their prayers heard at home, let them pray at church; else their devotion is but the sacrifice of fools. For he hath said it, who hath good reason to appoint the circumstances of his own beneficence, "In this place," where those holy clouds are, "I will give peace."

2. Some bring forth no fruit at all, though they dwell under the clouds. They are barren and beaten grounds, like the streets or high-ways, over which such a throng of lusts fetch their continual walk, that nothing can rise or prosper. The more rain falls, the more dirt. Or if they produce any fruit, it is weeds instead of herbs; stinking weeds; yea, even briars and thorns, to scratch and wound the husbandman that tills them. If a displeasing drop falls from the clouds, they rage and swell; as Pharaoh did when he received a command of Israel's dismissal. The showers and monitions of God make ill men worse. Corruption, when it is checked, grows frantic; as the waves do not beat or roar any where so much as at the bank that restrains them; or as the vapour in a cloud would not make that fearful report if it met not with opposition. A good heart yields at the stillest voice of God; but his most gracious motions harden the wicked. Some would not have been so desperately settled in their sins, if the word had not controlled them. But that ground is reserved for the fire, which would not be bettered with the water. What the element of mercy could not mollify, the element of wrath shall cruciate. For the earth's sake which we bear, the earth that bears us is often cursed: therefore our works are weeds, because we concoct the moisture of the clouds into venom. So, We bear thorns and briars as fuel for the fire, says one: they are fit fuel for the fire: and another, According to those things which the wicked bring forth, will they themselves be hereafter moulded. If the lustful limbs burn in flames, it was lust that made them fit matter for those flames.

3. Others look after the infirmities of the clouds, and never mind their virtue or benefits. They will follow their teacher's own way, not that which God teacheth by him. Israel indeed did follow the cloud in the wilderness; when it stood still two years together, they moved not; only then they went on, when that went before them. And we do well to follow the pattern of those holy clouds, that direct us the way to Canaan. Yet this, not absolutely, but with limitation. The cloud that guided them had two parts, a light part and a dark one. The Egyptians, who were God's enemies, had only the dark part; which following, they rushed into the Red Sea, and were drowned. The Israelites had the light part, the direction whereof safely delivered them. Wicked eyes see only the dark part, the infirmities of these clouds; that example they follow, and perish. Faithful souls look upon the light part, the graces of God in them; this doctrine they follow, and are saved.

To conclude. Be thankful to these clouds, in returning answerable fruits. If showers fall on a dunghill, they make but dirt; if in a kennel, they make but stink; if in desolate places, they spring up weeds: but in the garden, they raise up herbs and flowers; in the tilled field, corn; in the meadows, grass; in the groves and orchards, plants and fruits. If the ground of your hearts be foul with uncleanness, rank with covetousness, or sown with lusts, our rain will cause the appearance of weeds. But the mind that comes hither like a well-tilled field, receives these showers with comfort, and recompenseth them with increase. "Then shall the earth yield her increase; and God, even our own God, shall bless us," Psal. lxxvii. 6.

This heart of ours is the best or the worst ground that lies between heaven and earth. The worst, if it be thorny, weedy, miry; but if fair, pleasant, fruitful, it is the best. There be two that lay claim to it; and howsoever the propriety be God's, for he made it, yet Satan will try his title, and sues to have it. First, let us weed this ground, and that betimes, for old weeds will hardly be destroyed. Sins are weeds, the weeding-hook is repentance: let not a weed appear, but presently by contrition cut it down. God indeed said of another field, and in another sense, "Let both grow together until the harvest," Matt. xiii. 30; but it must not be so here, for then the weeds will eat out the corn. Secondly, keep it in heart; for if the soul have not her cheerings, she will grow faint and barren. The way to keep thy heart in heart, is by devout prayers, meditation, hearing the word, and receiving that which is the food of the soul, the blessed sacrament. Thirdly, look to the expiration of thy farm, and be sure to leave it in good case; that when the great Landlord shall call the tenant out of the tenement, the soul from the body, it may be entertained into his own house, the glorious court of heaven. Fourthly and lastly, be sure to pay thy rent always, and that is thankfulness. For temporal farms we pay our rents by quarters and half-years; but this rent is due every month, week, day, hour. Seven times a day, yea, seven times an hour, will I praise thee, Psal. cxix. 164. We forfeit many of God's favours, for not paying the rent of thankfulness. It is an easy rent, it costs us no labour. It is a cheap rent, we are not out of purse for it. It is a ready rent, never to seek. If it be easy, ready, cheap, why do we grudge it? We can do little, if we cannot thank God for his goodness. Yet for the ground itself, for the seeds that sow the ground, for the clouds that water the seeds, for the sun that draws up the clouds, for the influences of heavenly grace that bless all, God requires no rent but our thanks. Nothing is more easy to be spoken, or more comfortable to be heard, or more acceptable to be understood, or more fruitful to be done, than thankfulness: so Augustine. If we cannot requite gifts, yet let us return thanks. And even Seneca writes thus: I can never give unto God sufficient thanks; yet I will ever acknowledge that I cannot give him thanks sufficient. He that returns this to man, makes half the amends; to God, it is all the amends we can make.

But the least gratitude lies in the tongue; when the heart, when the life is thankful, this is better than the sacrifice that hath horns and hoofs. Then is the earth thankful to the clouds, when it returns answerable fruits, when it does confess and recompense the good it hath received; when the valleys stand thick with corn, the meadows yield fat pasture, the trees flourish with fruits, that the birds sit and sing in the branches. We call a barren earth, an unthankful earth. What is the worst fruit that the earth bears? I find a great complaint of tares, Matt. xiii. 27, of thorns, Heb. vi. 8, of thistles, Gen. iii. 18, of venomous creatures, noxious and baneful plants; yet all these are good in their kinds, and useful to the wise. But the worst thing that the groaning earth bears, be ourselves, our sinful and unprofitable selves; telluris inutile pondus, i. e. a useless burden to the earth. Therefore God more than threatened to destroy both man and beast from the face of the earth, Gen. vi. 7. The earth, as a good mother, rejoiceth in good children; but she mourneth for them that dishonour their Father, and are a shame to their mother. She does not take pleasure in wild animals, and beasts of prey, but in men, tame and gentle creatures. So long as there is pride in us, contention among us; while covetousness and cruelty in our hands, unmercifulness in our hearts, and lust in our loins, remain unweeded out; we are those wild beasts. Is this our thankfulness to the clouds? Is this our requital for all their showers? Do we rain down holy dews, and find you springing up profane weeds? Alas, for the sins of the land! for this cause the clouds melt themselves into tears. As all our sermons be public showers, to refresh your thirsty souls; so we have also our private showers, dissolving ourselves into tears for the obstinacy of your hearts. We weep in secret for your pride, Jer. xiii. 17, and are still dropping this rain from our eyes, together with the exhortation of our lips, Acts xx. 31. Remember that God who gives you the former and the latter rain; showers to soften the earth before the seed be cast in; showers when it is cast in, to bring it forth; showers to ear it, and showers to ripen it. If all this will not make you fructify, the clouds weep again, because they have laboured in vain, and spent their strength for nought, Isa. xlix. 4.

Cælum pro nobis solvitur in lachrymas.*

When men for their own crimes no tears will shed,
The heavens above melt into tears instead.

Oh that it would fall out by you, as the bishop comforted Monica concerning her son Augustine: The children of so many showers and tears shall never perish.

Open therefore your breasts to receive these holy dews; lest with that rich churl, you cry hereafter for some of this water, when you cannot have it. How many showers and buckets of grace had he despised in his jollity! now he calls out pitifully, for one drop to cool his tongue, Luke xvi. 24. Do not neglect the least drop of grace when it falls, lest you be driven to beg one drop of mercy when it must not fall for ever. Now God draws near unto you, draw you near unto God, and be enlightened: so shall you no more be a dry land, but a fruitful land, bearing fruit for the Lord's harvest. Thus you shall restore the golden age, and make the place you live in, were it worse than it is, a very earthly paradise. Earth shall return to earth; but such fruitful earth shall possess the earth, and be possessed of heaven. Now the grace of God make us the one, and the glory of God crown us with the other.

"To whom the mist of darkness is reserved for ever." Private offenders are not so much plagued as public. He doubly sins, who sins by example; for he teacheth evil by doing it, and so again does evil by teaching it. The exemplary sin is a mischievous sin: he that gives bad example, shall be made an example himself. A sinner, by his true contrition and hearty repentance, may get pardon for his own sin; but how shall he procure it for them whom he hath taught to sin? Nothing more troubles the mind of a good man, than his tempting of others to offend God. Thou hast been a blasphemer, and art converted; but how shall this medicine cure the infection which thy foul breath hath conveyed to others? Thy excesses may be forgiven thee, but how art thou sure of those Uriahs whom thou hast inebriated? The adulterer, after the fact, may repent of his own wickedness, yet it cannot but trouble him to think what may become of his harlot. So grievous and dangerous is it to be guilty of others' sins. An eminent offender draws many with him into evil. When David fell in with Bathsheba, many of her servants and his courtiers must needs be conscious of that adultery. When Uriah must die, Joab must be fetched in as accessory to the murder: how did that example harden his heart against the conscience of Abner's blood! He might well think, how can my master revenge that on me, which he acts himself? Great men's sins are seldom secret, and no less secret shall be their shame. These heretical teachers have brought on men's souls a mist of darkness, and done what in them lies to send them blindfold to hell; now therefore such a lot abides them, even a mist of darkness for ever. In which punishment observe three things.

1. The quality of it, The mist of darkness.

2. The congruity of it, It is prepared or reserved for them; and they were such as loved darkness more than light.

3. The eternity or duration of it, For ever.

First, the nature or quality of it, A mist of darkness. If hell had no other anguish in it but the very darkness, it were a formidable place. How uncomfortable would that night be, which had no hope or possibility of day! But as it is said of heaven, the gates of it are not shut by day, and there shall be no night there, Rev. xxi. 25; so it is contrary of hell, the gates of it are not open by night, and there shall be no day there. Night is feigned to be the daughter of the Earth; and that is dark enough: so Job calls the grave, "a land of a darkness, and of the shadow of death," Job x. 22. If our bodies had any sense when they lie in that dark bed, how tedious, how odious would it be unto them! But there is that which Christ calls "outer darkness," Matt. viii. 12; uncomfortable, unlightable. The Hebrews, by light, understand joy and felicity; by darkness, sorrow and confusion. "To give light to them that sit in darkness," Luke i. 79. Such a mist shall be on their souls, as comes upon a swooning man; who cannot see though his eyes be open, the organs being (for the time) incapable of illumination. So lie the damned, as dying men in the very pangs of death, with a mist of darkness over their understandings, yet cannot die.

But there is fire in hell; shall not this give light? No, it differs from elemental fire. First, for violence, it is more subtle and searching. Secondly, for duration, it is a wildfire that cannot be quenched. Thirdly, for operation, it consumes not what it burns.

Fourthly, for obscurity, though it flame terribly to the vexation of the wicked, yet it shines not to their comfort. It has burning, but no light, says Gregory. John "was a burning and a shining light," John v. 35. There is a fire that shines without burning, and a fire that burns without shining. It is as easy for God to make fire without light, as light without fire. All the prisons and dungeons devised by man are palaces in respect of hell; as all pains mortal are a mere shadow to these torments. (Chrysost. ad Pop. Antioch. Hom. 49.) The darkness of Egypt was wonderful and fearful: wonderful, in that it was so thick that it might be felt; fearful, therefore reserved for the ninth of the ten plagues. But this far exceeds; "the blackness of darkness," Jude 13: so doth the Hebrew idiom express it in the uttermost extract of darkness. If thou couldst see in a dark prison some looking pale and ghastly, others bound in chains and fetters, others tormented with famine, all shut up in a loathsome dungeon, howling with lamentation; how would it fright thee from such a course as might endanger thee to such a place! Thus let us meditate of this darkness here, that we may never feel it hereafter. The body that is surfeited with repletion of pleasant meats, must be purged with bitter pills. Let the due consideration of those insufferable horrors cleanse our hearts from all filthy lusts; and let us follow the way which the light of grace leads us, that the light of glory may crown us.

Reserved for them: this is the proportionableness of it. The punishments which God's justice inflicts upon sinners, have always a respect of condignity, not seldom of congruity; so that we may read the matter of the offence in the characters of the penalty. These black clouds did wholly endeavour to superinduce darkness on the church, therefore the mist of darkness is reserved for them for ever. Some read, is prepared; and this refers us to God's decree, who had preordained the darkness of hell for such cloudy souls: not in preparing, but prepared; as a king prepares a prison for such of his subjects as shall prove rebellious. But God made not darkness; and whereas in the beginning of the creation it is said, "darkness was upon the face of the deep," Gen. i. 2; this was not a thing created, but a mere privation, or absence, or not being, of that light which was made afterward. Nor do we think this mist of darkness a positive thing; but as when the sun is hidden, darkness necessarily follows. Not a beam of God's countenance, not a spark of his light, comes into hell, and thereupon follows this intolerable darkness.

"Tophet is ordained of old," Isa. xxx. 33; not by chance, not on a sudden, but with deliberate judgment. For the antiquity of hell, I refer you to the fourth verse of this chapter, where the lost angels are said to be cast down into hell: now they could not be cast into that which was not. God hath ordained but two places to receive all, whether angels or men. For those fustian-weavers of Rome with their intermediate places, they make but chimeras, and imagine places without a foundation. As the limbo of the fathers, where (they tell us) there is punishment of loss, not of sense; and the limbo of infants, for children dying without baptism, where they likewise say is punishment, not of sense, but of loss. The former whereof they would have dissolved by Christ's descent into hell, the other to last for ever. And their purgatory, where is the punishment both of loss and sense; which shall cease at Christ's coming to judgment; unless some better informed and more merciful pope unlock the doors, and let them out for money beforehand. These be pretty tales for a winter's night, and not unlike their legends. The Holy Scripture hath this plain truth: There is but election and reprobation, grace and sin, the narrow gate and the broad way; but two places, light and darkness, joy and pain; but two ends, heaven and hell, to one of these must all flesh come. They that tell you otherwise, flatter you with error: we tell you the truth, though it be with terror; and testify to you our brethren, (albeit with another mind,) that you come not into that place of torment, Luke xvi. 28. And howsoever you may storm against us, for disquieting your security with such menaces; yet we had rather you should be offended with us for preaching hell to you here, than that for not preaching it you should curse us in hell hereafter.

But I rather read it, is reserved; and then it denotes the fitness of the plague to their sin: darkness to darkness, inward to outward, temporal to eternal darkness. The Egyptians drowned the males of Israel, themselves were drowned for it. They had bloodied the waters from those innocent veins, their waters are turned into blood. That law of retaliation which God will not allow us, because we are fellow creatures, he justly practiseth on us. He would have us read our sins in our judgments, that we might both repent of our sins and give glory to his justice. Ham sinned against his father, and therefore is punished in his children; whereas Japheth was dutiful to his father, and finds it in his posterity. Because Ham was an ill son to his father, therefore his children shall be servants to his brethren. But because Japheth joined himself with Shem in bearing the cloak of shame, therefore he shall dwell in the tents of Shem, and partake of the blessing. Samson abuseth his strength among women, therefore he lost his strength by a woman. Saul divides himself from God, God divides the kingdom from Saul. David committed three sins in the business of Uriah, adultery, murder, and dissimulation; for all these he receives just payment: for adultery, in the deflowering of his daughter Tamar; for murder, in the stabbing of his son Amnon; for dissimulation, in the contriving of both. "Did not ye hate me, and expel me out of my father's house? and why are ye come to me now when ye are in distress?" saith Jephthah to the elders of Gilead, Judg. xi. 7. The suits of necessity are justly upbraided with the errors of prosperity. The same expostulation that Jephthah makes with Gilead, God at the same time makes with Israel; "You have forsaken me, and served other gods, wherefore should I deliver you? Go and cry unto the gods ye have chosen," Judg. x. 13, 14. God tells his children of their faults while he is whipping them. It is a wise and safe course, to make much of those in our peace whom we must make use of in our extremity; otherwise it is but just that we should be rejected of those whom we have rejected. We call upon God in our trouble, and are not heard. Why? Because he was not heard when he called to us in our prosperity. He will say, Did you not drive me out of your houses, out of your hearts, in time of health? did ye not plead the strictness of my charge, the weight of my yoke? did not your wilful sins expel me from your souls? what do you now crouching and creeping to me in the evil day? It is but justice, if God be not found of those that were content to lose him.

Thus he once plagued the inundation of sins with an inundation of waters; Sodom's unnatural lust with unnatural fire. He proceeds still in the same course: the dearth of charity he punisheth with the dearth of plenty; the surfeits of peace, with the sharp physic of war; malice and wrath, those burning sins, with burning fevers; the languishing of piety, with consumptions of body; whoredom and uncleanness, with loathsome diseases; riot and profuseness, with fluxes; drunkenness and excess, with dropsies; pride and swelling, with tumours; curses and blasphemies, with the plague and pestilence. That which men have so many years tossed in their mouths, is now fallen upon their loins; the plague hath been their imprecation, the plague is become their common destruction. What is it that infects the air, but the contagious breath of oaths and curses, vented every moment from the lips of men and children? Every sinner teacheth God how to punish him, out of his own mouth. And there is no particular wickedness, but God hath a particular rod to scourge it on earth, and a particular torment to vex it in hell. Only they escape, that have answered all the variety of their sins in the variety of the sufferings of Jesus Christ.

"For ever." Such is the perpetuity of this darkness. And this is also a just recompence, that they which might have found life, and would not seek it, should at last seek for death, and not find it. There is a shame never covered, a worm never dying, a cry never ceasing, a fire never wasting, an intolerable pain, an interminable time. They "shall desire to die, and death shall flee from them," Rev. ix. 6. A good day makes amends for a bad night; but to this night belongs no day; it is everlasting darkness. The roughest tempest, the weariest journey, is not without comfort, because there is hope of an end; but these pains be as endless in quantity as they are easeless in quality. Joshua had a long day when the sun stood still, Josh. x. 13; yet that day had an end; the sun did go on his course again, and set: but here the sun and moon shall utterly cease to measure time by their motion. That is a long sentence that hath no period, a doleful night which shall have no morning; a woeful darkness, where no star shall give a glimpse, no taper burn for the damps and foggy mists. Thus they lie like a malefactor pressing to death, calling for more weight to despatch them, even rocks and mountains, Rev. vi. 16, and cannot get it. They are those serpents that will not be charmed, Jer. viii. 17, those tormentors that will never be entreated. It is to no end to compare them with piles of grass, sands, or stars: if a million of years should stand for every dust of the earth, there might be an end; but this is, as Gregory expresses it, Death without death, and without end: time shall be no more; and after time, it is as possible for that damnation to be temporal, as it is for God not to be eternal.

Sinners greedily hear that the mercy of God endures for ever; but they shall as sensibly feel that the wrath of God also endures for ever. It was a pitiful complaint, "Will the Lord cast off for ever? is his mercy clean gone for evermore?" Psal. lxxvii. 7, 8. God did not deal so with David, he will deal so with the damned. Let this meditation touch thee now, that the matter itself may never hurt thee hereafter. That heart is hard frozen, which nothing can thaw but hell-fire. If a rebellious city were threatened by the king to be tithed for their conspiracy; that one of ten should die in justice, though nine were spared in mercy; would not every one tremble, lest the lot should fall upon himself? If among ten passing over a bridge, one were assured to fall in, would not every one look to his feet? The Supreme Judge in his last great assizes, will execute his wrath upon many; not one of ten, but rather nine of ten, are in danger; "for all have sinned, and come short of the glory of God," Rom. iii. 23, deserving ever-burning fire in everlasting darkness; shall we not make sure our Advocate to plead for us; even Him alone, whose plea is unanswerable, because he died for us? He that is for ever, suffered that we might not suffer for ever. But will he plead for those above, that care not to be his below? Shall they challenge his covenant then, and trample on it now? Do they not abuse that covenant, while they break the conditions, faith and obedience? Let not men flatter themselves, that they may sin in their own eternity, so long as they can; and yet that God will not punish them with his own eternity, so long as he can. Hell was not made for nothing; there be two fatal engines, the devil and sin, that will supply and furnish it, and keep it from being empty.

Thou art sick, think how uncomfortable it would be, to be confined to that bed and that pain, if no worse, for a thousand years; where thy friends are fiends, and thy physicians tormentors. Consider them that are shut up for the plague; how irksome it is to want help and society, to lie fearfully expecting death every hour; and the prayers of thousands sent up to heaven for their comfort. Who would for the pleasure of an hour, be racked a whole year? or for a mass of gold, lie burning in the fire one day? Yet how many for the satisfaction of a lust, hazard themselves, souls and bodies, to more exquisite tortures and endless flames! Let us not pass over this meditation superficially, but in time make an end of sinning; otherwise beyond all time there will be no end of our suffering. For our Creator's sake that made us, for our Redeemer's sake that with his own blood bought us, for that Comforter's sake who would heal us, for the angels' sake that guard us, for the church's sake, our mother that mourns for us, for our own soul's sake, that should be dear unto us: let us break off our sins by repentance, and live the life of grace and obedience, that we perish not in this mist of darkness for ever.

VERSE 18.

For when they speak great swelling words of vanity, they allure through the lusts of the flesh, through much wantonness, those that were clean escaped from them who live in error.

FLESH and blood is pleased either with no religion, or with a carnal one; yea, with a carnal religion rather than none at all. For without some boundaries to the unlimited rage of sensuality, they could neither enjoy their goods nor their sins in peace. Therefore among the heathen politics, that state where nothing was lawful, was preferred to the state where all things were lawful. He would be loth to have his own goods stolen, that makes no conscience of robbing others. The wicked are neither sensible of doing injury, nor patient of suffering it. Unjust tradesmen will have the law open to fetch in their debts, and that with rigour; but for payment of their creditors, they would have the law shut, and oppose them under a protection. Thus if they can shuffle out for this world, they never dream of any reckoning in the world to come. That religion, therefore, which can humour flesh and blood, and give corrupt nature leave to be herself, proud or wanton, is the only plausible doctrine, and sure of entertainment. Every bad man would have all others bound, and himself free; and he easily connives at that in himself, which he severely censures under another skin. Silly understandings adhere to that rule, which is indulgent to their carnal affections; as fishes are taken with the bait that is agreeable to their natures. Wanton souls are caught with wanton allurements. "When they speak," &c.

This verse is spent upon two sorts of men; the seducers, and the seduced: the subtle, and the simple; the thieves, and their booty. In the deceivers we have,

Their imposture, They allure or beguile souls.

For the deceived, we have three circumstances;

1. What they were for their former condition, Escaped, &c.

2. What they are for their present estate, Wrapped in error.

3. How they become so; which is their own weakness, or proneness to sin, whereby the temptation works upon them, here called wantonness.

The posture of the seducers appears in three passages:

In many words.

In vain words.

In great swelling words.

For the first, they think to carry it away with words. That is a very ill cause, which wants colourable reason for it; that is a very ill reason, which wants a Tertullus to plead it; and he is an ill Tertullus, that wants words to defend it. Yea, error hath always most words; like a rotten house, that needs most props and crutches to uphold it. Simple truth evermore requires least cost; like a beautiful face, that needs no painting; or a comely body, which any decent apparel becomes. We plaster over rotten posts and ragged walls; substantial buildings are able to grace themselves. We cannot but suspect that cause, whereon the lawyer wastes so much of his time and tongue. Multitude of words is not unlike the thick painting in some popish church windows, a mere device to keep out the light. Why doth the hare use so many doublings, but to frustrate the scent of the hounds? Falsehood is a gaudy harlot; strip her of her borrowed garments, she will appear, we know not whether more hateful or ridiculous. Loquacity hath ever been a note of folly; In multiloquio stultiloquium; i. e. In much speaking is foolish speaking: it is very difficult to speak much and well. The ship that hath more rigging and sail than ballast, will never make a good voyage. The tree that wanted fruit, might have abundance of leaves; and commonly they have the worst course of life, that have the most voluble tongue. "They think to be heard for their much speaking," Matt. vi. 7: as if God could not hear them at first; as if he could not understand them at once; as if the blessing of Heaven depended on the labour of the tongue: whereas indeed, it is not many words, but hearty desires, that can fetch down heavenly blessings. No prince will grant a suit ever the sooner for a long petition. Certainly, if twenty Ave-Marias and five Pater-nosters were all that God required, many a papist hath done his duty. But, alas, how can they hope to merit by that, for which God hath said, they shall not be heard, much babbling? The publican used not so many words as the Pharisee, the Pharisee had not such commendation as the publican, Luke xviii. 14. It is vain to do by many words, what can be done by fewer. There is little of a long-winded exercise, except to bring men asleep. Many words must not carry it; for then the brawling woman would have the better, who will not give over without the last word. But not to catch the disease which I declaim against, prolixity of speech, I pass to the next, which is,

Their full-mouthed speeches, "great swelling words." Nothing is more loud than error; the more false the matter, the greater noise to uphold it. Paul can have no audience, the truth must not be heard;

but they all cry out for Diana, Acts xix. 34. In that bloodiest and most unnatural custom of idolatry that ever the sun beheld, the sacrificing of their children in burning fire to Moloch, it was the noise of the instruments that drowned all sense of the madness. Thus Ahab shall be deluded with great words and numbers, 1 Kings xxii.; the clergy of four hundred prophets conspire to his destruction: one single Micaiah can do no good, they bear him down with multitudes. Four hundred to one is odds; every one will have as much talk as he. Yet indeed, one prophet speaking from the oracle of God, is more worth than four hundred Baalites. Truth is not ever to be measured by the poll; it is not number, but weight, that should carry it. Solid verity in one mouth is worthy to preponderate light falsehood in a thousand. But falsehood hath the more swelling words, the louder noise: as Cyprian mentions one that challenged him to dispute; who though he wanted learning to urge any argument, yet he amazed the people by engrossing all the talk, and holding the conclusion.

False Zedekiah not only speaks, but acts his prediction, with swelling words, yea, presumptuous signs; horns of iron, and Thus shalt thou push the Syrians, 1 Kings xxii. 11. The horn is forcible, the iron irresistible; by an irresistible force shall Ahab do this: as if the certainty of his tongue were not enough without his hands. He had a forehead of brass, a heart of lead; the one for impudence, the other for flexibleness to humours and times; therefore he devised horns to gore his king unto death. One silly prophet affronts the four hundred; whereupon Zedekiah, having sworn first into words, now swells into blows, and smites God's prophet on the face, ver. 24. Micaiah gave him the lie, and he gives Micaiah the fist; and with the blow expostulates. Before two kings, the guardians of peace and justice, swaggering Zedekiah falls to blows. For a prophet to strike a prophet, in the face of two princes, was intolerably insolent; the act was much unbecoming the person, more the presence. Prophets may reprove, they may not strike. It was enough for Ahab to punish with the hand; no weapon was for Zedekiah but his tongue. And if Ahab had not been well content to see that hated mouth beaten by any hand, if malice had not made authority insensible of such a usurpation, this rude presumption had not passed unrevenged. Falsehood doth not more bewray itself in any thing, than in swelling words, in unjust blows. Nor is it any new condition of God's servants to smart for speaking true. Truth suffers, while error persecutes. None are more ready to boast of God's Spirit than they that have it not. The full vessels are evermore silent. Brass makes a great sound when it is beaten: the gold is more malleable with less noise. A fool's voice is heard in the streets, but wisdom speaks low. Therefore hath luxurious behaviour been called roaring, for the dissolute cannot rule their tongues. As Bias was sailing, there fell out a great tempest, and the mariners (who were lewd persons) cried to their gods: but Bias said, Peace, make not such a noise; for if the gods know ye are here, we are all like to perish. Peacocks have a louder voice than nightingales; no man thinks a sweeter. Empty casks in the cellar return the greater sound; the good liquor lies in them that are dull. The light housewife is the scold, and can put down the grave matron in words, no less than the other excels her in honesty. The frogs of Egypt were no small plague; who besides the annoyance to their nostrils, and trouble to their bosoms, with a dismal din filled their ears. Swelling words are like the reports of ordnance; they blaze, and crack, and smoke, and stink, and vanish. They proceed from divers causes; there be in the soul six swelling diseases.

1. Pride, which is an unnatural tumour, puffs a man up. And indeed, pride is a poison, and the nature of poison is to cause a swelling. He swells for place, not only above his fellows, The man with the gold ring looks to sit uppermost, Jam. ii. 2; but even above the angels; and, "I will be like the Most High," Isa. xiv. 14. He that rides on his foot-cloth, or in his caroché, how big does he look on the inferior passengers! We wonder; it was not so with him the other day. Alas, since that time, he hath swallowed the venom of pride in a pill of wealth, and now you may see it by his swelling. He fears an affront more than he fears hell; if by his equal, he puffs like one out of breath; if by his inferior, he swells like the sea in a storm. The proud man is a kind of madman; he thinks himself brave in another's clothes, and glories in that which is none of his. He is sick of a swelling in the brain.

2. Malice, which is a higher degree of poison, swelling inwardly; and when it cannot vent itself in revenge, bursts the entrails. How did Joab swell against Amasa! Jezebel against Elijah! Nothing but a poultice of their warm innocent blood can abate the tumour. After the defeat of that great armada, the Duke of Ossuna presented himself to the king of Spain, with a distaff at his side, and a spindle at his back instead of sword and dagger: the king hereby understanding that a woman had foiled them, hastily stepped to the altar, and taking a silver candlestick in his hand, swore a monstrous oath, that he would waste all Spain, yea, his whole Indies, to that candlestick, but he would be revenged on England. But God be praised, those swelling words were but the effect of his own malice, without our ruin. Rumpantur et ilia Codri, as the poet saith; i. e. Let the bowels of Codrus (an envious person) burst. The malicious is troubled with a swelling of the spleen.

3. Vain-glory, which is a kind of venomous froth, that swells men with a rank opinion of their own worths. So the fly that sat on the axletree of the chariot wheel, gave out that she made that glorious dust. Things that move upon greater means, they ascribe to themselves; and strut like Colossus, that the world may not escape their notice. Mighty are their words, as if they would shake mountains, and speak thunder-claps. "Come," saith the Philistine to David, "and I will give thy flesh unto the fowls of the air, and to the beasts of the field," 1 Sam. xvii. 44. What big words were here! But how seldom ever was there a good end of ostentation! Presumption at once is the presage and the cause of ruin. He is a weak adversary that will be killed with words. Swell on, proud giant; a small pebble from the brook shall confute thee. "Hath any of the gods of the nations delivered his land from the king of Assyria?" Isa. xxxvi. 18. Swell on, Sennacherib: an angel shall confute a hundred and eighty-five thousand of thy soldiers with the argument of death in one night. Many a foe hath spoke bravely, who in the push hath made more use of his heels than of his hands. When one vaunted of hurts received on his face, Julius Cæsar knowing him to be a coward, bade him take heed the next time he ran away, how he did look back. This is a swelling in the throat.

4. Hypocrisy, which is a malignant humour, swelling the parts affected or corrupted with it, as some kind of grass doth the kine, or sweet wort swine. Methinks the hypocrite should smile at himself, being so conscious how he rails at the world which he worships; how he condemns the belly which he serves; how he persuades men to condemn the gold, which is dear to him as his life; how he commends the cross to others, which himself abhors. How, like the kite, he flies aloft, but is ever looking down to the earth for his prey. "God, I thank thee, that I am not as other men," Luke xviii. 11. Hypocrite, so thou sayest, so thou swellest; but what a famine of goodness there is within, thou dost not, thou darest not ask thy conscience. Like a decayed merchant, that studies tricks to uphold the credit of his wealth; and still the nearer he comes to poverty, the more show he makes of sufficiency; till at last the bladder is pricked, and the wind flies out, and there is rather a merchant's case than a merchant. Still the more a man swells in pretence, the less he is to be trusted in deed. This swelling is a tympany.

5. Blasphemy, which is the highest excess of words, when they swell against God himself. "Am I a dog, that thou comest to me with staves?" 1 Sam. xvii. 43. The last words that ever the Philistine shall speak, are boasts and curses. How truly he spoke himself! Had he been any other than a dog, he would not have opened his foul mouth against the host of God, and the God of hosts. And as he calls himself a dog, so it seems David thought him, else he had never come to him only with a staff and a stone. Jezebel hath lost her prophets; and she swears and stamps at that, whereat she should have trembled. She swears by those gods of hers, which were not able to save their prophets, that she would kill that prophet of God which had slain her prophets, and scorned her gods, 1 Kings xix. 2. O foolish dust, wilt thou swell against thy Maker?

6. Success in wickedness, which is like hemlock taken for diet-drink. To prosper in ill designs, is the greatest unhappiness, the heaviest curse; for he that useth to do evil, and speeds well, never rests till he come to that evil from which there is no redemption. Joab kills Abner, and escapes; again he embraces his hands in the blood of Amasa, and is not indicted for it: now David is old, and Adonijah towardly, he furthers him in the usurpation; and big with assurance of his own command, he thinks to carry it; but this carried him to his grave. Fair Absalom was proud and ambitious, yet he flourisheth; he kills his own brother, yet escapes; he insinuates himself into the affections of the people, and bold of their fidelity to him, he swells even against his own royal father, and becomes a disloyal traitor. God owes that man a grievous payment, whom he suffers to run on so long unquestioned. Prosperous wickedness is one of the devil's strongest chains. A man feels a little sweetness of wealth, this makes him swell for more; when his stalk is so stiff that it bears up above the rest of his ridge, presently he swells for honour; the first draught doth not quench his thirst, he swells for a higher degree; thus honoured, he swells into some place of authority, and still his insatiate drowsy calls for larger draughts, till at last he is inebriated: like the toad in Æsop, that would needs swell in ambition to be as big as the ox; and then he bursts. Such tongues shall be swoln with the infernal fire, till they be not able to call for a drop of water to cool them.

The last attribute of their speech is vain, "words of vanity." If the matter were good, yet many words were vain, great words were vain; but here both the matter and words and all are not only vain, but vanity itself. "The kingdom of God is not in word, but in power," 1 Cor. iv. 20. How justly doth the Lord infatuate these magnificent talkers, in frustrating their boasts! They have a show of wisdom, but that show ends in folly. What hath been said of two nations, is true between two sorts of men: The French are wiser than they seem, the Spaniards seem wiser than they are. He that says little, is thought by some to understand less; and those great scholars, that are confident talkers. But to make superficialities seem body, with depth and bulk, the plentifullest speaker will scarce devise sufficient shifts. It is according to the French proverb, Much bruit, little fruit; or, as we say in English, A great deal of cry, but no wool. Demades the orator in his age was talkative, and would feed much; therefore Antipater would say of him, that he was like a sacrifice, whereof nothing was left but the tongue and the paunch. Alexander in his Persian expedition, caused his soldiers to leave scatteringly behind them, as forgotten, larger and heavier pieces of armour than they were used to wear; the Macedonians being not such portly men: it was his policy to scare and fright the Persian. So mighty words terrify weak hearts; but wise judgments make small account of their vain words, whereof one day they must make a strict account themselves. Jezebel swears by her gods to be revenged on Elijah, 1 Kings xix. 2: it was well that tyranness could not keep her own counsel. She meant to kill him, and the disclosing of that purpose was a means to preserve him. The wisdom and power of God could have found evasions enough for his prophet in her greatest secrecy; but now he needs no other than the warning-piece from her own lips. Here were swelling words, but the words of vanity; she is no less vain than the gods she swears by. In spite of her fury, and her oath, and her gods, Elijah shall live; at once she shall find herself frustrate and forsworn. And now she is ready to bite her tongue, and to eat her heart for anger at the disappointment of her cruel vow. It were no living for godly men, if the hands of tyrants were allowed to be as bloody as their hearts. Men and devils are under the restraint of the Almighty; neither are their words more swelling, or their designs more lavish, than their achievements are vain and their executions short. Benhadad sends great words to the king of Israel, as if it were nothing to conquer him, 1 Kings xx. 10: stay the proof; Benhadad flees, and Israel pursues. The heathen rage, the kings combine, and the people imagine a vain thing, Psal. ii. 1, 2. Though for power they be kings; though for policy, counsellors; though for fury they be Gentiles; though for number, all the people, multitudes; yet they study but vanity: they imagine a thing vain impossible, vain unprofitably.

No wrestling of man can evacuate the purpose of God. While he struggles, he is caught; and by resisting the will of God, he doth fulfil it. The divine purpose, while man attempts to avoid it, is fulfilled; human wisdom, while it resists, is caught and led captive: so Gregory. Second causes are susceptible of impediments; as the burning of fire, by the action of water; but there is no evasion to shun the decree of Heaven. These swelling intendments are like Caligula's enterprises, who never took any thing in hand if there was hope to effect it: it is vain impossible. Neither doth any profit arise from it. To count evil for gain, is unjust, but human; but mischief intended for mischief's sake is devilish. The old way of wickedness began at, What shall it profit us? But that is a new way of malicious sin, when men cannot be pleased to live in quiet themselves, unless they disturb the tranquillity of others: as vipers and the venomous cantharides and stinging spiders are more detestable than bears and wolves, because they sting folk to death without any benefit. That is an odious mischief, which is vain unprofitably.

The apostate church swells in words, both in respect of her promises, and of her menaces; but mere words of vanity. That when the sin is forgiven, the penalty remains: the poet could say, Pœna potest tolli; culpa perennis erit, The punishment may be removed, but the guilt will be perpetual: they say, Culpa potest tolli, pœna perennis erit, The guilt can be removed, but the punishment will be perpetual; at least during their purgatory. Kings are the anointed of God, to whom only they are inferior; Inde illis potestas, unde Spiritus, Their power proceeds from that source, from which is the Spirit, as one says. And by whose will they are born men, by the same they are made princes. Yet how big is the noise, that the pope is above them, may dethrone them, that his assassins may kill them! these be swelling words, not only of vanity, but of treachery. That we may merit heaven by our good works, or at least bear half the charges of our own salvation: these be mighty words, but they are vain men that trust them. I know not what trick they have to pay God, but I am sure I am infinitely in his debt, and no ways can pay him but by his own coin, the blood of his own Son. So innumerable are their swelling tenets, that their very mention would swell to a volume; but I leave them to their conclusion, mere vanity.

Quid feret hic dignum tanto promissor hiatu? i. e.

Let me conclude with this summary observation. Harmony is the sound of the gospel, unity the band of the church: her true members know no discords; with one mouth, with one heart, they praise God, and love one another. All the noise and jars come in by broken instruments, such as the sower of contention hath put out of tune. He fills the lips of his engines with repining, cavils, and wranglings, which are the right sounds of hell. "If any seem to be contentious, we have no such custom, nor the churches of God," 1 Cor. xi. 16: there is no such voice in the quire of the Holy Ghost. Indeed Christ came "to send fire on the earth," Luke xii. 49; but he never meant such a fire as comes out of two flints by percussion, or out of steel by hard-edge. But rather such a fire as he sent down in parted tongues upon the apostolical assembly at pentecost; a fire that shall enlighten the understanding, warm the heart with grace, and consume the stubble of iniquity; this is the fire that burns in Jesus' name. They grossly mistake, that think Christ is come to his spouse in whirlwind and thunder, (such is the coming of antichrist,) for Christ comes whispering, as it were, in the light breeze; in silence, as the dew upon the tender grass, and the fruit of his coming is peace, Psal. lxxii. 6, 7. There came a strong wind, that rent the mountains, and brake the rocks, but the Lord was not in the wind, 1 Kings xix. 11. That tearing blast was from God, God was not in it: so in it as in his other extraordinary works, not so in it as to impart himself to Elijah by it. It was the usher, not the carriage of God. Then came an earthquake, more fearful than the wind: that did but move the air, this the earth; that beat upon some prominences of the earth, this shook it from the centre: but God was not in the earthquake. Then a fire, more fearful than either. The first affected the ear, the next the feeling, this last lets in horror to the soul by the eye, the quickest and most apprehensive of the senses: but the Lord was not in the fire. The prophet shall see God's mighty power in the earth, air, fire, before he hear him in the soft voice; all these are but boisterous harbingers of a meek and still word. In that God was; he came in the gentle voice of mercy:

Observe this, ye thunderers of Rome, who come with roaring bulls, and teach the ordinances of your church to speak louder than the ordinance of war; there is not the greatest efficacy where is the greatest noise. God showed but his powerfulness in those fierce representations; he loves to make way for himself in terror, but he conveys himself to us in sweetness, in that mild breath of mercy. Those Boanerges, the sons of thunder, first tame our proud natures with the gusts and flashes of the law; but then the soft voice of evangelical grace doth comfort and confirm us. But for those Jesuits, that preach unto us with the word in one hand and the sword in the other, threatening blood and ruin, let them read Isa. liii. 7, and see whether they be like that Jesus, whose name they usurp. Examine their books, and you shall find many of them so fraught with boisterous invectives and desperate untruths, that it is a question whether the father of lies could outdo them; as if they meant plainly to write, not in the defence, but in the defiance of truth, of modesty, honesty, God, and all goodness. The scope of their disputations, is rather to vent their own passions and uphold a side, than in zeal to holiness and to maintain the truth. Themselves would have the conquest, with out respect of the truth. They cannot yield either to truth or to peace; as Augustine said of the Rogations. But where there is no mind of yielding, there is no end of disputing.

To conclude against these high, swelling terms; we have reason, as to suspect the cause that needs them, so the men that use them. Even in moral or civil demeanour, a loud tongue is commonly a lewd tongue. "We are in danger to be called in question for this day's uproar, there being no cause," says the town clerk of Ephesus, Acts xix. 40. If no cause, why all this noise? Why be many of our courts of justice turned into a Babel, if there were not more confidence in a lawyer's tongue than desire of truth? Why are those railings and invectives among men? Why instead of the voice of the turtle, is the voice of the screech-owl heard in our land? O there is a swelling heart in unmortified breasts, which cannot be suppressed, but would like new wine burst the vessels, if it were not broached and vented by foul language. What swelling words did Rabshakeh utter against the living God, and his Israel! yet Hezekiah held his peace, 2 Kings xviii. 36. How contumelious and false were the accusations of Christ! yet even his silence was their conviction, Matt. xxvii. 63; xxvii. 14. The best confutation of their slanders, is not by our great words, but by our good works, 1 Pet. ii. 12. Sophocles being accused by his own children, that he grew dotard, and spent their patrimonies idly; when he was summoned did not personally appear before the magistrates, but sent one of his new tragedies to their perusal; which being read, made them confess, This is not the work of a man that dotes. Against all clamours and swelling opprobries, set thy innocence and good life: and, Sic verbosa tacet clamosi turba sophista: i. e. The noisy crowd of talkers hold their peace: they shall be driven to acknowledge that these be not the courses of a dissolute sinner. Thus patience shall overcome clamour, and thy quiet heart shall be accepted of God.

In a word, the church of God is not built up with noise. There was no axe nor hammer heard in the building of the temple; the frame was made in Lebanon, and set up in Zion; there was no noise in the rearing, whatsoever was in the preparing. Lebanon might be loud, all is quiet in Zion. So doth the church love peace, so do all seek peace that love the church. Quarrels and contentions are for the world: let those dogs snarl and fight whose portion lies without, peace and concord becometh the house of God. Schisms and wranglings, like axes and hammers, are the weapons of pride; cudgels thrown in by the devil, and taken up by malcontents, who baste one another while he stands by and laughs. All Christians, especially pastors, should be men of meekness; otherwise while they pretend to take birds with their nets, they drive them away with their noise. The house of God is not built up with blows, with blows it is beaten down. God loves to see holiness and peace, and without peace and holiness no man shall see God, Heb. xii. 14. It follows.

"They allure." This is their imposture. The metaphor is taken from fishing or fowling. Those fishes that were taken out of the feculent pond of this world, and put into the crystal streams of the church, are by these seducers again drawn out of the streams of the church into the pool of the world. The hook whereby they perform this, is fraud: the same devil teacheth his trade to all his followers: by fraud he overthrew our parents, and the same train he lays for their children: the lion is strong enough, but the serpent doth the mischief. While Satan appears like a roaring lion, we are ready to run from him; but when he transshapes himself into a familiar form, we admit him too often, and suspect not the danger. They be the foxes that spoil our grapes, that worry our lambs. First, foxes prey far from home, and do not mischief too near their own dens; so these compass sea and land, and will sail to the Indies to beguile souls. Secondly, foxes range in the night, and keep their holes in the day; so these seducers abide not the day-light, but wander in shades, masked with visors, to effect their purposes. Thirdly, these foxes fasten upon young lambs, such as are poor in knowledge and weak in faith; enticing simple women, that they may entice their husbands; after the practise of that old reynard, who wrought Eve to work Adam. Fourthly, hungry foxes will prey upon slight purchase, rather than fast; so they will stoop to cozen the meanest, where the great ones are too wise for them. Yea, desperate fortunes have been the pope's special engines. The ivy creeping along the ground, begins at first to compass the lowest part of the oak; but works itself upwards by degrees, till it overtop the highest branch, sucks the sap, pierceth the pith, and ruins the whole trunk. Fifthly, these foxes will tell some truths, where it may win credit and advantage to their lying. If they spake nothing but true, they could not deceive us; if nothing but false, we would not believe them. Therefore they have some few truths at first, like three or four good strawberries at the top, to help away the rest, even their sophisticate trash. A thief lighting into true-meaning company by the way, can talk of sincere dealing and uprightness, against robbery and oppression, to take off suspicion, till he spies his opportunity. The decoy will suffer the simple man to win for a while, till he hath whetted him on, then he leaves him in the lurch. If fraudulent merchants had not some good wares, their base ones would not be saleable. But Paul cast out the foul spirit, that confessed him to be the servant of the most high God, and to teach the way of salvation, though he spake true, Acts xvi. 17, 18; for he knew to what hellish purpose he spake it. The devil acknowledged Jesus, yet he commanded him to come out, though his testimony were true, Mark v. 7, 8; whereby he taught us, not to give ear to Satan, though he tell the truth. Thus they cast dust in our eyes, that we might not see our way, and strike a hook in our nostrils, to lead us their own way: but it is no hard matter to spy out their juggling: though the ass have put on the lion's skin, he may be discerned by the length of his ears. But in the mean time, if they be conscious of their own frauds (and I am so persuaded of many of them) and still persist, what hell is deep enough for them, that seek and study to fill hell with souls? You will say, that is but my persuasion; and so well I wish them, that I would for their own eternal state's sake it were not true.

That they may not too unperceivedly catch us, let me a little bare their hook, and discover some of their wiles.

First, they tell us, the church agrees, the church cannot err; all which in their language is the church of Rome. Take it so, and we may as soon find paradise in hell, as any text in Scripture for it. The seat of abomination, the city of the beast, it calls her, not the chair of the church of God. That the apostate Rome is the catholic church, the wit of earth and hell shall never be able to prove.

Secondly, that the pope sits successively in Peter's chair. If we should grant it, for they cannot prove it; so did the Pharisees in Moses' seat, yet neither the better nor the holier for all that. A Seriphian told Themistocles, that his glory arose rather from the renown of his country than from the merit of his virtue. Not so, says Themistocles; for if I were a Seriphian, I would not live without honour; and if thou wert an Athenian, thou couldst not live without shame. For quæ non fecimus ipsi, viæ ea nostra voco: i. e. what we do not, we hardly call our own. If St. Peter were at Rome, he neither taught nor lived like the pope: if the pope sit in the same chair, he neither lives nor teaches like St. Peter. Neanthus, a bungler, having got Orpheus' harp, so jangled and arrid with it, that while he looked for listening beasts and dancing trees, he brought the dogs about his ears. The pope hath so long boasted the name of Peter, that the world sees he hath nothing left out the bare name to boast of.

Thirdly, the consent of councils; a glorious gull and guile; as if no council had ever condemned both their popes and opinions. As if the council of Basil had not decreed, That one simple man alleging plain Scripture, was more to be believed, than a whole council to the contrary. As if the last Trident council were any other than the pope's notary or secretary, to engross that in fair characters, which he had before written in a foul copy. One saith truly of them, Whereas they should have brought their doctrine to the rule, they forced the rule to their doctrine; and did not mean to say as Christ taught them, but to expound Christ's words as they would have them.

Fourthly, the harmony and consent of the fathers. Indeed they were holy men, but men, not privileged from errors. Besides, the fathers are to be heard as witnesses, not as judges. Yet were they heard speak their own meaning, none of them would ever have been a papist, sure not a Jesuit. I hope they do not mean those holy ancients, as father Moses, father David, father Isaiah; no, nor father Paul, father Peter: for impudence itself cannot deny that their faith is built upon those fathers, the foundation the prophets and apostles; which they, for theirs, are scarce able to pretend, never to prove. What then? Father Lombard, father Thomas, father Scotus, father Cajetan, father Bellarmine; all the pope's true-born children: who, though in many things they agree no better than Herod and Pilate, yet they all conspire to degrade Christ from his office, as the other consented to bereave him of his life. Abraham is our father, is a vain brag for the Gentiles.

Fifthly, the Scriptures, say they, are deep mysteries, dangerous for common eyes; it is sufficient to credit their teachers. Pestilent subtlety! so men shall never understand what the Lord says, but as they are pleased to report it. This is called fides carbonaria, or the collier's faith; and it shall leave animas carbonarias, souls as black as ever fire left coals. "Search the Scriptures," saith Christ. You shall not, saith antichrist. He saith, there is lively food; this saith, there is deadly poison. Whether of these shall we believe?

Sixthly, universality. All ages speak as we do: a gallant flourish, not unlike to varnish, which makes seelings not only shine, but last. To discern the true church (whereof we must be, if we will be saved) from the false, (from which we must separate, unless we will be damned,) they wholly stand upon multitudes. But if in secular affairs there be more fools than wise men, what is there in spiritual? As if it were not the broad way which leads to destruction, through which many pass; and the narrow way that leads to life, which few do find. When the deluge came upon the world, whether was multitude or paucity a mark of the church? What was Abraham's family in comparison of the Canaanites? What was Israel, and take in all her hypocrites, to the whole world? How was the church discerned by multitudes, when the rulers and multitude rejected Christ's own person; "Away with him, crucify him!" John xix. 15. What be the largest dimensions of popery to the extent of paganism? either for multitude they are not better than we, or for multitude the pagans are better than they.

Seventhly, antiquity of religion; a fraudulent ostentation. He is a shallow herald, who when he must give honour of the first head, cannot fashion a sound of ancestors. The Jews taxed Christ of novelty, Mark i. 27; I hope no papist will tax him of falsity. We derive our doctrine from the blessed apostles; one would think that were ancient enough: will they go further? We have better proved ourselves the true church before Luther, than they can ever vindicate themselves from being a false church since Luther. Let them look to their invocation of saints, purgatory, prayer for the dead; I hope they will pretend no antiquity for these. Their mass, like a monster, was not begot all at once; but here a limb, there a member. God hath not built us a new church, but reformed the old, by taking away their corruptions; whereas they will rather be confounded than reformed.

Eighthly, unity is a good argument, if it were true. But where is that church which knows no division? There must be sects, that the approved may be known, 1 Cor. xi. 19. What unity can Rome brag of, when Canus is against Cajetan, and Bellarmine against them both? To say nothing of Thomists against Scotists, the Black friars against the Grey, the Dominicans against the Franciscans, and the Jesuits against them both. We have some petty jars about the lace of Christ's coat, they rent the coat itself. When was the whole church of God so happy, as to know no contention? Yea, rather such miserable distraction doth it suffer, that not only Christ's garment is divided, as it was by the soldiers; but his own blessed body is torn, as if it were no better than the body of the Levite's concubine, which was chopped in pieces, flesh and bones, and the twelve pieces sent into the twelve tribes of Israel, Judg. xix. 29. Such is the faction and fraction, schism and separation, in the body of Christ; church against church, altar against altar, priest against priest, religion against religion, Christian against Christian; yea, Satan sends his instruments with Christ against Christ, and opposeth the truth of divinity under the colour of divine authority. So that religion is in a manner lost in the questions of religion; and speeds in the world, as she did in Plutarch, who had many suitors; when every one could not have her to himself, they pulled her in pieces, that so none might have her. Because all men do not like their religion, they will refuse all. So distraction in religion is the destruction of religion; for while they say, I am of Paul, I am of Apollos, I am of Cephas, I am of Calvin, I am of Luther, I am of Arminius, I am of Dominick, I am of Francis, I am of Jesus, almost none are of Christ. Thus the conscience of religion is lost in the controversies of religion, and men rather strive to have a subtle head than a sanctified heart; they had rather dispute than live: so little is the hope of unity.

We partly see their nets to insnare us; which allurements if we have light to discern, they do not so give us over. Yea, they will rather mood all their syllogisms in a blow, and turn their arguments into armadas; and whom they cannot subdue with the sword of the mouth, they assault with the mouth of the sword: their fraud shall betray itself into force, the devil puts off the fox, and puts on the lion. Antichrist thunders out his excommunications, commands our throats to any knife, esteems our blood more vile than beasts, and accounts us as dogs; but it is only for baiting his bulls. Swelling words declare themselves in wounding blows, so their villany comes out; and that religion which pretended nothing but holiness, discovers itself in the highest degree of wickedness. True religion is defended with prayers, not with violence; Ferunt, non feriant Christiani, i. e. Christians bear, not strike. So Christ conquered by dying, not by killing, as it was said.

But oh, to what execrable impiety will not mis-religion drive! The king of Moab will sacrifice his eldest son, 2 Kings iii. 27: as if he would win his cruel gods with so dear an oblation, he sends up the blood of his heir-apparent in smoke to those hellish deities. Such was the act of Agamemnon, assisting at the immolation of his own daughter. Tantum religio poterat suadere malorum, says Lucretius; i. e. Such mighty ills religion would persuade. That massacres, homicides, parricides, powder-treasons, should be a proof of religion, is an argument fetched from the pit of hell, whereof the devil himself, if he could blush, would be ashamed. It was a great blasphemy when the devil said, I will ascend, I will be like the Most High: but a greater blasphemy, when God is feigned to say, I will descend, and I will be like the prince of darkness. To make religion stoop to such abominable actions, as the murdering of princes, firing of states, butchering of innocents, is such a doctrine, as is not to be found in Lucian, Machiavel, or the most desperate patrons of atheism. Certainly, it is the nearest sin to that against the person of the Holy Ghost; instead of the likeness of a dove, to bring him down in the likeness of a vulture, or a raven: nor can there be a greater scandal to their usurped apostolical see, than out of the bark of St. Peter to set forth the flag of a bark of pirates and assassins. Wise men observe, that there is no knot of thieves so dangerous, as when there is a harlot in the company; that robbery is seldom without bloodshed: Naboth cannot lose his vineyard without his life, if Jezebel have a hand in it. Now there is not so mischievous a harlot in the world as "the whore of Babylon:" to what cruelty cannot she exasperate her besotted amorists! Whither she can stretch her arm, she fills the church's back with furrows, and her heart with sorrows. But force never got ground of truth: all attempters of that kind shall be driven to confess with that cruel queen, Ego pro me sola nocendo; i. e. By doing ill alone I get my good.

I conclude. The law of nature, and the conscience of every man, must needs secretly condemn fraud; how much more doth it misbecome Christians! Let us look to that absolute Pattern, in whose mouth was found no guile, 1 Pet. ii. 22; and to that true Israelite, whom he commended, John i. 47. The wit of man finds out many tricks and shifts in the world, either to do mischief, or to avoid it: there is one worth them all, simplicity of heart and plain-dealing. Themistocles being entreated to play on an instrument, answered, that he could not fiddle: but asked again, what he could do then? answered, that he could make a great city of a little one. St. Augustine applies it to points of subtlety and perplexity: answer, that thou knowest not what to answer; thy learning lies not that way. If further urged wherein thy learning lies, answer, in knowing how without all these thou mayst be saved. (Ep. 56.) Let others be full of the politics, it is good for us to be well habited in the morals. Martha, Martha, thou art troubled about many things, but one thing is necessary; integrity of heart. When the fox boasted what a number of shifts and devices he had to get from the hounds, the cat said, she had but one; which was, to climb a tree. But when it came to the proof, this one was better worth than all the rest. Many a man's brain is a forge of frauds, wherein there are more engines of craft than cords in a bark. But there is one worth a thousand of them, sincerity of dealing, and the integrity of a good conscience. "Lord, remember how I have walked before thee with a perfect heart," Isa. xxxviii. 3. I have not deceived for any reward on earth, and the Lord will not deceive me of my reward in heaven. A plain heart, through a plain conversation, finds a plain way to everlasting benediction.

"Through the lusts of the flesh." Nothing sooner wins flesh and blood than a doctrine that tends to licentiousness. This is one especial cause of the increase of popery, the plausibleness of it to carnal dispositions. Every religion bears in her lineaments the image of her parent. True religion is spiritual, and looks like God in her purity. False religion is carnal, and carries the face of nature, her mother; and of him whose illusion begot it, Satan. The former would kill the lusts of the flesh, the other would feed the lusts of the flesh, and make both a wanton mind and a wanton body.

1. It advanceth the pride of nature, by telling her, that she can merit her own glory, without being much beholden to God's mercy; that she can fulfil the royal law, and so brave God in his judgment, as if she needed no pardon. Yea, that she hath more works than she needs, and can (for money) help her neighbours; that some of her sins be venial in their nature, and not worthy of death. Oh how sweet a lesson this is to flesh and blood, even enough to make her run mad of self-conceit! Now hear the voice of truth: we say, that we have no good of our own, nor can do good of ourselves; that we are not sick, but dead in sins, and move not more than we are moved; that our best works are faulty, all our sins deadly, all our natures corrupted originally; that we have no merit but the mercy that saves us; that nothing but the blood of Christ can cleanse us; that his mediation is more than sufficient to save us, his sufferings to redeem us, his obedience to enrich us. Now come to the trial; which of these gives the glory to God, and which the reins to concupiscence? If nature be honoured, is not God dishonoured? Is not all that bravery stolen from grace, which is put upon the back of nature? Will Sarah take it well, that Hagar should usurp her freedom? No, God eacheth us to abase nature, to tread her in the dust, o spoil her of her proud rags, to load her with reproaches; and to give that glory to Him, who says he will not give it to another. This is to give nature what is nature's, and to God what is God's.

2. It tends to dissoluteness, while they teach that it is both easy and safe to believe with the catholic at a venture; that they may spare the labour of searching, and need not much knowledge to salvation; that the mere sign of the cross can drive away devils; that a little alms can make amends for a great deal of injustice; that they may have an indulgence to dispense with a sin before they do it; that a man may buy himself out of hell while he lives, and his executors or friends may buy him out of purgatory when he is dead. O doctrine delectable to flesh and blood! What matters it how unsound his levotions be, how lewd his life, how heinous his sins, that knows these refuges? Hear the truth, that eacheth us (against nature) to strive unto sincere faith, without which we have no part in Christ, no benefit by his sufferings, no comfort in our own good works; that our heart must be zealously active in all our devotions, and without it the hand and tongue are but hypocrites; that the hand must do good deeds, or else the presuming heart is but a hypocrite; that we must expect no pardon for sin before we commit it, and from Christ alone when we have committed it, and to repent before we expect it; that life is the time of mercy, death of retribution. I hope flesh and blood takes no pleasure in such a message. So clearly manifest is it, which of these two religions is framed to the humour of nature, and so indulgent to the lusts of the flesh. From all which, let me deduce these two conclusions:

1. It is a very easy thing to be a papist; for what conjunction hath it, which a libertine will not admit? To sin and confess, to confess and sin; to be drunk and vomit, to vomit and again be drunk, what true Trojan dislikes? But they have strait rules, as fastings, scourgings, hair-cloths, weary pilgrimages, blushing confessions, wilful beggary, and perpetual continency by solemn vow: what a fair pretence is here of mortification, by them that love it as dearly as a dog doth a cudgel! But is all this true? To be lodged like princes, and clothed like Dives, in fine linen, is this hair-cloth? To abstain from coarse flesh, and feed on choice dainties, is this fasting? Or to drink the strongest wines, till their faces discover their hypocrisies? When the world is together by the ears, who shall bestow most upon them, is this their wilful poverty? Surely they take great pains, to tell over so many thousand crowns, as come yearly tumbling into their coffers. For the pope to ride on men's shoulders, is this humility? or to think he does the man a grace, whom he admits to kiss his pantoffe? To forbear allowed matrimony, and admit forbidden adultery, is this their vow of continence? Oh that these criminal doings were not more true than their penal sufferings! And what if they should perform all that they pretend, and in the austerity of their will-worship go beyond us; yet let them not insult in the victory, for the priests of Baal went beyond them. I hear much of the Romanists' whips, I hear nothing of their knives; they may scourge, they will not lance and carve their flesh in their devotions. The Baalites did it, yet were never the wiser, never the better, never the nearer. What then do they get by this self-devised rigour? Either it makes them not better than us, or it makes the priests of Baal better than them; let them take their choice. In all these, the flesh is served, the soul is starved; a small difficulty is admitted, that a greater might be avoided; they leave that which God commands them, to do that for which he will never thank them.

2. To be a good Christian, is a far harder task, and lies in another kind of combat; not in macerating the flesh, but in mortifying the lusts of the flesh. I do not find that God ever required or accepted the self-tortures of his servants; he takes no pleasure in our blood: they mistake him, that think to please him by destroying that nature which he hath made, and measure truth by the rigour of outward extremities. Elijah drew no blood of himself, the priests of Baal did. It is true, inward crucifying of our corruptions, the subduing our spiritual insurrections, by the noble exercises of severe restraint, that he commands and accepts. To work our stubborn wills to an awful subjection, to draw this untoward flesh to a sincere cheerfulness in God's service, to reach unto a sound belief in the Lord Jesus, to pray with a true heart, without distraction, without distrust, to keep ourselves in the continual fear of God; these be the tasks of a Christian, worthy of our pains, worthy of our comfort. The rest is but a careless fashionableness, as if it had nothing to do with the soul. Give us obedience, let them take sacrifice. For men to walk with God, so long as plenty doth walk with them, and while they may stretch their limbs on a peaceable couch, eating the fruits of their own vineyards, is not worth either reward or thanks. The valour of such men will faint when it comes to the push; and, with Archilochus, they will rather cast away their shield than perish. But to love that God who crosseth us, to kiss that hand which strikes us, to trust in that power which kills us; this is the honourable proof of a Christian. It is a vain consideration, Will Jerusalem yield me the same delights that I enjoy in Egypt? Is there such store of flesh-pots in that country, as we have in ours? Will religion allow me this wild liberty of my actions, this loose mirth, these carnal pleasures? Can I be a Christian, and not live sullenly? None but a regenerate heart can choose rather to suffer affliction with God's people, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season. An easy importunity will persuade Orpah to return, from a mother-in-law to a mother in nature, from a toilsome journey to rest, from strangers to her kindred, from a hopeless condition to likelihoods of contentment, Ruth i. 14. A little entreaty will serve to move nature to be good to itself. But to hamper our extravagant lusts, to subdue our rebellious desires, to cross nature in her affected delights, this is the business of a Christian. To persist in the actions of goodness, though tyranny, torment, death, and hell stood in our way, this is that conquest which shall be crowned with glory.

"Those that were clean escaped." Some read, for a little, or, for a little while; the one translation having respect to the degree of their escaping, the other to the time; for a small measure, or for a short space. We read it, "clean escaped:" they were not quite delivered from sin, but from the external profession of sin, and from the doctrine that maintains sin. The people that escaped from perishing in the conspiracy of Korah, were not all holy; for the next day fourteen thousand and seven hundred died in the plague for murmuring against their governor, Numb. xvi. 49. "They went out from us, but they were not of us," 1 John ii. 19. The children of the world may outwardly be gathered to the congregation of Israel, yet not be of Israel. When it was represented to Alexander, to the advantage of Antipater, who was a stern and imperious man, that he only of all his lieutenants wore no purple, but kept the Macedonian habit of black; Alexander replied, Yes, but Antipater is all purple within. Divers good men do not pretend so much strictness outwardly, but they are pure within; "The King's daughter is all glorious within," Psal. xlv. 13. Whereas hypocrites wear not the colour of mischief in their external habits, but they are all purple within. "Inwardly they are ravening wolves," Matt. vii. 15: their inwards are rotten; "their inward part is very wickedness," Psal. v. 9. They are escaped, as a man from some dangerous sickness, but not fortified against death: as a man flees from a lion, and a bear meets him, or leans his hand on the wall, and a serpent bites him, Amos v. 19. They are escaped from the lion and the bear, gross and raging impiety and idolatry; but in the house of God they are bitten by a serpent, sly hypocrisy. Escaped, as a vagabond from a shoal of beggars, reformed to some civility; yet tempted again to wander with a new doxy. Oh how far may a man go in the outward profession of truth, and yet be a hypocrite, be an apostate, be a reprobate! This is discerned by their next estate.

They are again returned to error. What a poor way went they toward heaven, so soon to turn back! Even so far as Orpah with her mother Naomi toward Canaan, a mile or two, and then back again to Moab. The devotion of worldlings is all for a gird; they will run apace for a spurt, and then afterward stand still and breathe them. They were but equivocal members of the visible incorporation; and when their consciences shall be wounded with God's judgments, they shall cry as he did in Homer, This is the blood of a man, not such as issueth from the gods: this was at the first and best but flesh and blood, not the unloseable grace of sanctification. It is but Ephraim's morning dew; let the sun of prosperity rise but two hours high, the dew is gone. A Galatian humour, to begin in the spirit, and to end in the flesh: like a meteor or gliding star, that seemed in heaven, shot through the air, and lighted on a dunghill. Or like a bowl thrown up a hill, which climbs according to the strength that forced it; and when it is come to the furthest, returns down to its own place. These violent motions have ever the less perpetuity. Their cloth hath a fair gloss, but when the iron of trial is put to it, presently it shrinks. As the Samaritans sought bread for their life, not the bread of life; and when that bread failed, Christ might sit long enough ere they sought him. But good Christians seek not, as Musculus saith, the bread of multitude, but the multitude of bread, Christ himself. They that adhere to God for any second cause out of himself, shall soon lose him, and all good things with him. Beasts will suspect the train, and birds the snare, out of which they are escaped: have rational creatures less wit than beasts or fowls? Lucullus having entertained Pompey in one of his magnificent houses, Pompey commended it for a stately house in the summer, but he thought it would be too cold for the winter. Whereto Lucullus; Do you not think me as wise as divers fowls are, to remove with the season? Have we less providence than birds, to fall into that trap out of which we have been delivered? Alas, that there should be any among us, who from the midst of our salt waves should come out fresh and unseasoned! that all these heavenly show-ers shall fall beside them, while they, like Gideon's fleece, want moisture! that being by a mighty hand delivered out of Egypt, they should again fall down before that calf, whose power they so confounded! that being haled out of the lake of iniquity, they should again plunge themselves into it, to their own everlasting ruin! Now the Lord lay hold upon us, that we may lay hold upon him, and never let go that hold till we come to heaven.

1. Wrapped in error. Some notice is to be taken of the phrase, ἀναστροφεύς, involutos, intricatos, involved, entangled. All sin is a labyrinth; the entrance is easy, all the difficulty is to get out again. Jael invites Sisera to her tent, and wraps him warm, but he shall never return through those doors alive. A bird is so wrapped in the net, that the more she strives the faster she sticks. The fly entangled in the web, soon becomes the spider's breakfast. Sin hath such a clinging quality, that if it once embrace and take hold of the soul, it binds it up in pleasing fetters: as Samson was tied with Delilah's tresses, more than with the cords of the Philistines. Therefore they are called ropes of sins, Prov. v. 22, nets of hell, and chains of the soul; the worst obligation, where-out the bounden shall never get, till Christ have discharged the debt. Suppose the sinner walks abroad, yet he is not at liberty, because he carries his jail about with him. Other malefactors are within their prison, he hath his prison within himself: and whithersoever he runs, like the stricken deer, hæret lateri lethalis arundo, i. e. sticks to his side the deadly shaft. All his honours and pleasures cannot free him from his bonds; only he is in the number of those jail-birds, that have the favour to beg in their chains. Why cannot we persuade rich men to be charitable? Alas, they are so wrapped up in their covetous desires and insatiate lusts, that you may with as good success stand in the street, and bid a prisoner come out of his dungeon. As Lazarus in his grave was wrapped up with his towel and winding-sheet, so are dead sinners folded up in their sensuality; and nothing can loose them, but that same "Lazarus, come forth," from the mouth of Jesus Christ.

2. The practice of these deceivers is upon them that are escaped from their errors. As the good shepherd leaves the ninety-nine that are safe, and seeks that which is lost; so the malignant jailer, without any strict watch upon the malefactors in safe custody, pursues after him that hath broke prison. Sensual men have the least trouble; they are as sure as temptation can make them; they are rebels, not parasites, against whom the tyrant bends his forces. They that are wedded to the world as to a wife, and count pleasure their harlot, seldom hear the roaring noise of the enemy. It is the fort of holiness that is most besieged with assaults and stratagems. There is some satisfaction and comfort in this, that Satan will not let us alone; it is a sign we are not his, when he is so busy about us. Even this just war is a thousand times better than an unjust peace. It was the spouse's charge concerning her beloved, Waken him not till he please, Cant. viii. 4. No other is Satan's command to his officious spirits concerning his sleepy followers; Do not waken them, let them sleep their last. But for those that have renounced his sovereignty, and denied him allegiance, let them sit fast; if all the winds from the smoky corners of hell, or all the gentle airs of the pleasures on earth; if either the blandishment of fair words, or the brandishment of keen swords, can prevail against them, they shall fall. But as a gallant soldier said, Let me be a Carthaginian, though I have Rome mine enemy; so, let me be a Christian, an escaped soul, reformed from error and sin, though Rome and hell, man and devil, conspire against me. There is one able enough to save me, in whom I trust.

"Through much wantonness." This is that little postern set open, to which Satan is so much beholden for his readmittance. Wantonness, whether of soul or body, makes way for him. There be such as love crotchets and divisions, not caring for the plain song; stomachs that within one month are weary of manna; that set more by salads and sauces and kickshaws, ashes of wit, than substantial food, the word of God. These indeed turn grace into wantonness, while they turn the word of grace into curiousness, and into vanity. How easily are these wanton minds wrought upon! What wind is so weak, as not to move the fan! What toy will not win a child! A mind forestalled with levity, is like a vessel without ballast, soon overset. The advantage of seducers, is the lightness of those who are to be seduced. At his hint Mahomet begun his religion, compounding of all opinions, to allure and gratify all nations. The Sabellians had lost the distinction of persons, or the Arians Christ's Divinity, or the Marcionites his humanity, or the followers of Macedonius the Deity of the Holy Ghost, or the Jews their circumcision, or the rabbins their Talmud, they are sure to find it all in Turcism. Because the Arabians were thieves, he allowed theft; because his soldiers, especially those of Heraclius, were malicious, he allowed revenge: hurt him that hurts you: he that killeth his enemy, or is killed by his enemy, shall not fail of entering into paradise. To satisfy lust, he permits the multitude of wives, and divorcement for trifling causes. Now what a potent king, and of what large command, is he grown by this indulgence to men's wantonness?

I would we had no parallel for him in Christendom. But alas, what is papism, but a truss of schisms, a bundle of heresies, a religion many ways compounded, that all might be pleased? If old men be covetous, young men voluptuous, nobles ambitious, common persons ceremonious, whosoever is led with any kind of wantonness, they have allurements for all. For the avaricious, that follow riches with craft and cruelty, they have devised a purgatory; by which rich, they will get one half, the offender shall keep the other half, and the poor shall have never a doit. To draw on the dissolute, they have ordained many odd holidays, and half-holidays, wherein they may sing, and dance. To win ambitious spirits, they teach that the pope can give kingdoms (to such as can get them); they dispense with loyalty, and bestow a crown in heaven on those that can pluck a crown from any excommunicate king's head on earth. Lest men should be disheartened with the greatness of their sins, they have abundance of venials, to be washed off with a sprinkling of holy water; a connivance for the least, a pardon for the greatest, to all them that will pay for it. Because knowledge is a trouble in the getting, and men naturally love to be lazy, they fit their humours, with devotion as the seed of ignorance, images are lay-men's books, reading the Scriptures makes heretics, and that faith is sufficient which is folded up in the common bundle. Lastly, that poverty of truth may not breed contempt, they have mimic and comical actions in those mysteries which should be sacred; clerical shavings, uncleanly unctions, crossings, creepings, censings, sprinklings, cheating miracles, garish processions, tossing of beads, christening of bells, hallowing of candles, wax, chrism, ashes, palms, garments, swords, water, salt, and what not? So easily do these pontifical solemnities allure to wantonness, and work upon petulant affections.

I conclude. We see here the danger of wantonness, of dallying with our conscience, and yielding the reins to our inordinate affections. There be three goodly sights, a penitent sinner, a patient sufferer, and a thankful receiver. And there be three other as ill-favoured and scandalous; a proud beggar, a rich robber, and a wanton professor. Of all conditions there is none more culpable than a wanton Christian. That heavenly Pattern of ours, in the days of his humiliation, is never read to laugh.

I do not bid you follow him in that altogether; for there is a season for us to be merry in him, who could never have been happily merry without him. But when our laughter shall turn into profaneness, our mirth into lasciviousness, this is a demeanour unbecoming Christians. But wanton children play with their meat: we come with fear and reverence to deliver to you these holy mysteries; as it was told the vestal, that holy things were to be handled magis sancte, quam scite, rather holily, than knowingly. O let the fruits answer the seed: "Serve the Lord with fear, and rejoice with trembling," Psal. ii. 11. Otherwise, they that drown all their devotion in wantonness, shall at last lose all their jovialty in wretchedness. Death will set a period to all joy, if sorrow have not prepared an antidote for death. Let us mourn here; this is the way to be merry hereafter. Our tears are but temporal; when God hath wiped them off, our joys shall be eternal. Now the Spirit of God keep us in the sobriety of grace, that the Son of God may admit us into the court of glory.

While they promise them liberty, they themselves are the servants of corruption: for of whom a man is overcome, of the same is he brought in bondage.

THE common pretence for the most unbounded licentiousness, hath been liberty. In that nefarious and disloyal conspiracy and murder of Julius Cæsar, the general dispensation of their conscience was liberty. Cataline's foul treachery was set off with the colours of liberty. When Sheba would invite Israel from a just and lawful subjection, to the bondage of a usurper, he proclaims a liberty, "Every man to his tents," 2 Sam. xx. 1; he meant every man to his own tent. And that people, which had but as yesterday fallen into the design of Absalom, a son of their king; are now again up in arms under Sheba, a subject of their king, a rebel against their king. As bees when they are up in a swarm, are ready to light on every bough; so the Israelites being stirred by the late commotion, are apt to follow the head of any faction. When the rulers conspire against Christ, they project liberty; "Let us break their bands," Psal. ii. 3. Laws are bands; for the wild, to cure and humble them; for the weak, to secure and keep them: they that would oppress their inferiors, and never be called in question for it by their betters, would break the bands. Pride, idleness, drunkenness, and all manner of dissoluteness, cannot range their voluptuous chaces, till the boundaries be removed: let them dissolve the cords of morality, and then they proclaim liberty. So doth corrupt nature abhor restraint, that it embraceth any doctrine which shall but promise liberty. "While they promise them liberty," &c.

The parts of this text have a chain of dependence. First, the main scope is the allurements of the weak, in general. Secondly, the way of this allurements is by promise. Thirdly, the force of that promise is liberty. Fourthly, the conviction of that force; the promisers are bound, themselves are the servants of corruptions. Fifthly, the proof of that conviction, For of whom a man is overcome, of the same he is brought in bondage.

First, for the main scope, the seducement of the weak. It was Christ's charge to Peter, "When thou art converted, convert thy brethren," Luke xxii. 32. It is Satan's charge to his agents, Now you are confounded, confound your brethren. He that is not cross to Christ, cannot be antichrist. "There be many antichrists," saith St. John: there is a mean antichrist, and a main antichrist; every false teacher is a mean one, but there is another that is the main antichrist. The old fox hath abundance of cubs; and as Christ said to Peter and the apostles, "Feed my lambs;" so he to these instruments, Fleece, flay, worry the lambs. Christ came to heal the wounded, to bring deliverance to captives; they come to wound the whole, to bring the delivered into captivity. He to call sinners to repentance; they to call the righteous into wickedness. He to save that which was lost; they to spill that which might be saved. Such is the implacable enmity of the prince of darkness against the children of light, that he will rather make his own fire hotter, than not labour to bring them to the participation of his torments.
